and he afterwards became moſt obedient. After this warre there grew a greater, made by the the Hungars and Sclauons, which the Emperor happily ended. He againe came into Italy, by reaſon of Berengarius, who tyrannized the ſame, and forced him to flie, and comming to Rome he was crowned Emperor by Pope Iohn. Many other rebellions enſuid by the Popes and the Romans againſt the Emperour, whileſt he warred againſt Berengarius and his ſonne: of which, hauing fortunate ſucceſſe he returned into Germany, and ordained his ſonne Otho his ſucceſſor; where being old, and buſied in vertuous exerciſes, he yeelded his ſoule to God.

This Otho is called the firſt, for that he is firſt of the Germane Emperors called by that name.

BEing come to write the life of OTHO the firſt of that name of the German Emperors, of whom I am now to treate; it fareth with me, in my opinion, as with one which hath wandred, and is now againe returned into his right way. I make this compariſon, for that there are ſome which account not thoſe amongſt the Emperors, which I haue placed after ARNOLPH, the ſonne of CARLOMAN, vntill this OTHO; of whom I ſay, that after the death of his father, he found no contradiction in attaining to the name and dignitie of Emperor of Germany; for his father HENRY before his death had nominated him for his ſucceſſor. Truly this OTHO was very well worthie of the Empire: for he was a Prince of an excellent wit, and of a wonderfull great and noble minde; and his great valour was accompanied with ſingular humanitie and clemencie; but notwithſtanding al theſe deſerts and vertues of a good Prince, yet there were many great inſurrections and rebellions againſt him; and he was a Prince which had greater warres then any other then liuing, for the ſpace of thirtie and odde yeeres that he held the Empire; in which time he paſſed many aduentures, and obtained great victories: and notwithſtanding that he vnderwent ſundrie daungers and hazards, yet he euer ſhewed himſelfe milde, and pitifull to the vanquiſhed; which (in my opinion) in the end made his Empire more ſtable and firme, then all the victories which he obtained. As ſoone as his father was dead, he was in the citie of Aken, or Aquiſgran choſen Emperour, and anointed and crowned by OLDERICVS Archbiſhop of Mentz, all the Princes of Germany (which could com) being there preſent; and the reſt which could not, wrote their Letters, and ſent their Ambaſſadours, acknowledging their obedience: And ſo his beginning was very peaceable and highly eſteemed, and he ſhewed himſelfe iuſt, and valiant, and gouerned the eſtate with wiſedome and clemencie. It happened preſently after this, that BOISLAVS, brother to the Duke of Bohemia (which at that time had not the title of King) by treaſon ſlew his brother WENCESLAVS (for ſo was he called) to the end to haue the Soueraigntie; and rebelled againſt the Emperor: whereof when OTHO was aduertiſed, moued with the hatred and vilenes of the fact (for WENCESLAVS was a iuſt and faithfull Prince, and his father HENRY had receiued him for his ſeruant and his ſubject, after that (as wee haue heertofore ſaid) he had ſubdued him, hee reſolued to ſend a good Army, vnder the leading of a valiant Captaine: whom the tyrant Duke attended in the field, and therewith fought a terrible battaile; and was ouerthrowne with ſo great loſſe of his people, that the Imperiall Generall aſſuring himſelfe of the victorie, was leſſe carefull and circumſpect, then he ought to haue been; but BOISLAVS within few daies reinforcing his Armie, gathered courage from the others neglect; and charging him ſuddenly in diſorder and vnawares, ouerthrew him, and ſlew the greateſt part of his people: wherewith OTHO was highly diſpleaſed, and ſending thither a new ſupply he ſufficiently reinforced his Army: But BOISLAVS was growen ſo haughty, and had ſuch reliefe from the Hungars, that the warres grew to be doubtfull, and of long continuance, and in the meane time others happened; but OTHO's courage and reſolution was ſo great, that hee neuer forgat to prouide for this warre, during the furie of all the other, as we will declare: yet it laſted fourteene yeeres, before he could obtaine any complete victory; and then BOISLAVS yeelded as you ſhall heare.

Boiſlaus ſlew his brother Wenceſlaus by treaſon.

The Emperor proceeding in this warre of Bohemia; in the greateſt heate thereof, there began ciuill and domeſticall combuſtions and Inſurrections, which reſolued into a very cruell war, the beginning whereof was this. EBERARD which (as I remember) was brother to the Emperor CONRADE, and carried the Imperiall enſignes to the Emperour HENRY, fatherof this OTHO, being a great Lord, rich and mighty, did an iniury to an Earle, a man of leſſe account then himſelfe, and burned a towne of his; which for that the new Emperour would not ſuffer ſuffer to eſcape free, he condemned him in a ſum of money, and to be impriſoned and baniſhed: which ſentence higly diſpleaſed EBERARD, expecting oportunitie to ſhew his diſcontent.

It happened alſo that a baſe brother of the Emperors called DAVZMAR, found himſelfe grieued, for that the Emperour had not giuen him the gouernment of the Prouince of Saxony, with the title of Earle, which was OTHO's patrimony by the death of Earle SIFREDVS, lately deceaſed. In like manner the ſonnes of ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere, who then died, were diſcontent, for that OTHO had giuen that eſtate to his elder brother BERTOLD; and they would not accept of the Earldome, and of that part which the Emperour had aſſigned them: wherefore vpon this occaſion EBERARD made a league with them, and with SIGISBERT Duke of Lorraine, notwithſtanding that he had maried one of the Emperors ſiſters; and contending with HENRY the Emperours ſecond brother, who was a very young man, about the bounds of certaine lands, he beſieged him in a citie, and very ſhamefully took him priſoner. And his baſe brother DAVZMAR, with the aide of the ſaid EBERARD, at the ſame time, tooke a citie in Saxony, and ſacked it, thinking to haue gotten the Earldome, which he demanded perforce as his right. The Emperor vnderſtanding thereof, marched againſt his brother; and entring the citie by aſſault, DAVZMAR was ſlaine in a Church, whither he was brought by EBERARD the motor of this treaſon. And after other practices, EBERARD agreed with HENRY the Emperors brother, whom he held priſoner, to releaſe and ſerue him, ſaying that the Empire appertained vnto him, for that his father begat him after that he was Emperor, and OTHO before. HENRY moued with a deſire to raigne (a thing which leadeth men to greater miſchiefs) reſolued to rebel againſt his elder brother and ſoueraigne Lord; whereto SIGISBERT Duke of Lorraine yeelded ayde and aſſiſtance; who was a mighty Prince, and had the ſiſter of the Emperor and of HENRY to wife. And as the report went, that HENRY ſhould be Emperor, each of them deſired to haue the Empire for himſelf, and ſo practiſed the ſame in ſecret, for amongſt the wicked there is neither faith nor truth: But they all agreed together to ruine OTHO; and that let being remoued, each of them thought to haue been a ſoueraigne Lord; and to haue had the Empire. The power and Army which they leuied was ſo great, as they took many townes: and as it vſually hapneth, fame and feare aduanced the effect, ſo as OTHO was in great danger. Neuertheleſſe the other Princes of Germany did well and faithfully helpe and aſſiſt him; and he, with the courage and diligence of a good Captaine, leuied his forces, and marched againſt his enemies; and being come with his armie to the banks of the riuer of Rhine, and part therof being tranſported in boates to goe againſt his enemies, which were encamped on the other ſide, whereof his brother HENRY was Generall; his enemies hauing marched in great haſte, were gotten thither before them, and charged his men in ſuch manner, as they were likely to haue been ouerthrown in the Emperours ſight, who had not yet paſt the Riuer: but in the end, the Emperour making his prayers to God, obtained the victory, and his brother being wounded, ſaued himſelf by flight. After this victory, the fame went, that the Emperors brother HENRY was dead: which brought the Emperour this profit, that the moſt of the Cities which held for his brother, yeelded to him: which when HENRY vnderſtood, he gat him into the City of Merſeburgh, which is in Saxony, and fortified the ſame in the beſt manner he could: and the Emperor followed and beſieged him, and brought him to that extremity, that he was driuen to giue vp the City vpon condition, that he ſhould ſuffer him freely to depart whither he would. After which he went into Lorraine, and renewed the war, ioining with Duke SIGISBERT, and with Duke EBERARD, his kinſmen: who with greater fury and power then at the firſt, inuaded the Emperors Countries, who then was buſied in beſieging a town of Duke EBERARD'S, called Stiſaca; before which he lay longer then was fit he ſhould haue done, through the deceit and treachery of the Archbiſhop of Mentz, who ſecretly was a traytor to him, and had intelligence with his enemies, to the end that HENRY and his confederates ſhould in the mean time make themſelues Lords and Maſters of the Country: which when HERMAN Duke of Sueuia, and his brother OTHO, and CONRADE called the wiſe, and other great Lords and Knights (which were the Emperors ſubiects) vnderſtood, they ioined al their forces together, and by his direction, with an Army fought their enemies; and meeting them, fought a terrible battell: But the Imperialiſts had the victory, and EBERARD, the ring-leader, was ſlain fighting, & SIGISBERT D. of Lorrain, was drowned in the Rhine, neer the battell: yet ſom ſay that he died in another battel, and that HENRY the Emperors brother was not that day in the field, but made war elſewhere. In this ouerthrow were ſlaine, and taken priſoners, all thoſe which held with theſe Lords, amongſt which were many Earles, and great Perſonages.

The Emperors victory againſt his brother Henry.

Duke Eberard ſlain fighting, & Duke Sigisbert drowned in the Rhine.

This great victory being obtained by OTHO's faithfull friends and subjects, the city which he besieged yeelded, and he prepared himself presently to pursue his brother HENRY, who fled into France. And then the Emperor went into Lorrain, where his sister yeelded herself into his power, together with her son: where having set good order in that estate, and made peace with LEWES King of France, and recouered certain Towns which he formerly had lost, hee returned into Germany. In this manner he wholly subdued and tamed all the Rebels; and in the end his brother HENRY humbly yeelded himself into his power: and hee forgaue him, and gaue him lands and reuenues for his maintenance, and likewise pardoned the other Barles and great men which had bin his aduersaries, together with FREDERICK Archbishop of Mentz, who was a Traitor vnto him, and was now in his power: but in the end he pardoned him also. And forasmuch as his brother HENRY continued loyall vnto him, he made him Duke of Bauiere after the death of BERTOLD, who died without issue male; whose brethren lost their right to that estate, for that they had conspired against the Emperor; and HENRY had his legitimate daughter to wife, and so in good grace he remained in his brothers seruice: Who, hauing brought these matters to an end, resolued to make an end of the troubles in Bohemia, which through the aid of the Hungars stil continued, without any one daies intermission, from the first beginning of his Raign, which was a long time.

Henry fled into France.

Finally, in some battels (wherein he was himself in person) BOISLAVS was ouerthrown; in such manner, that he submitted himself, and became subject. Hauing in this manner subdued the Hungarians, the Bohemians, and such as rebelled, he resolued to relieue LEWES the French King, who was his brother-in-law, and had sued vnto him for succours; whom for som occasions, too long to be recited, certain Dukes and great Lords of France oppressed. Yet some Authors say, that this his going into France was before the warres of Bohemia: but at what time, or in what order soeuer it was, he went thither with a great Army, and relieued his brother-in-law, and so again returned into Germany; where we will leaue him to enjoy his victories & good successe, and will briefly declare in what estate Italy then stood, and the accidents which then hapned: which appertain to our History, aswell for that it was part of the Empire, as also for that HVGH before named raigned there with the name of Emperor, although a tyrant. HVGH hauing for certain yeers space possessed Lombardy, and a great part of Italy, no man seeking to depriue him of his estate; for, OTHO (as is already said) was busied with the troubles of Germany: in the end BERENGARIVS the Third, after many long journies, hauing a desire to recouer the Kingdom which his father and vncle had possessed, and of all Italy, whereof the Emperor RODVLPHVS had bereaued him; with the aid of certain Princes of Germanie and of Italy, resolued to make warre against HVGH; and to that effect leuied a great number of good souldiers, and took his way towards Italy. HVGH, houlding himself vnable to make his party good against him, finding that such as were of greatest power and authority in the cities, did not fauour his faction; he resolued to come to any composition: and so, finally, they agreed that HVGH should leaue the title of King of Italie, and return to his Duchie of Arles in France, vpon condition that his son LOTHARY should remain King in Italy together with BERENGARIVS. BERENGARIVS accepted these conditions; and HVGH returned to his ould Dukedome, and left his son a King, and companion with BERENGARIVS. This LOTHARY was married with ADELHAIDA, which by some was called ALVADA, daughter to ARNOLPH Duke of Burgundy, who had raigned some certain time in Lombardy, as we said before, and was expelled by HVGH. It hapned that HVGH afterwards died in France: and in a short space (and after other matters that ensued, which I leaue to relate) LOTHARIVS died in Lombardy. And BERENGARIVS, seeing himself freed from company, took to wife the widow Queen ADELHAIDA, which was a very excellent Lady. And sith that he found no contradiction or resistance in the Estate of Italie, against the dignity of the Emperour OTHO (from whom he had receiued many benefits and fauours) he took vpon him the name and title of Emperor, and instituted his eldest sonne, whose name was ALBERT, King of Italy, and beganne to entreat the people very badly, and in other matters to behaue himself altogether like a Tyrant.

Boislaus ouerthrowne by the Emperor.

The death of Hugh and Lothary, two Tyrants.

At this time AGAPETVS the Second was Pope, who was held a vertuous, religious, and innocent man (which, among men of that coat, was a matter not slightly to bee regarded) and he considering the violence and tyranny vsed by BERENGARIVS, hauing now been Pope the space of 6 yeers, sent to solicite OTHO, Emperor of Germany, to come into Italie, to free the same from so pernicious a Tyrant. The like was done by sundry other Prelates and great men.

OTHO

OTHO at that time was a widower of his wife EDITHA; by whom hee had a sonne whose name was LVITOLPHVS, a valiant and high minded young man: and hauing heard the Italian ambassadours, at such time as hee had ended the warres before mentioned, moued by their persuasions, and through the desire he had to marrie Queene ABELHAIDA, whom BERENGARIVS held prisoner in Pauia, and to make himselfe Lord of Italy, he leuied an Armie of fiftie thousand men, and came downe against BERENGARIVS; who hauing no sufficient power to make head against him, in the best order that he could, gaue ground, still defending the strongest castles and fortresses. OTHO marching forwards, taking townes and cities, coming to Pauia, set ADELHAIDA at liberty, and with her good liking maried her, holding solemne nuptials: by reason whereof, his sonne LVITOLPHVS was very sory; and after it there ensued many inconueniences. This being done, and OTHO hauing settled all matters concerning the State of Italy in good order, he returned into Germany, leauing CONRADE for his Lieutenant in Lombardy. This CONRADE was called the wise, and was Duke of Francónia, and sonne-in-law to the Emperor by the mariage of his daughter LVIGVARDA: but his son LVITOLPHVS was gon before into Saxony, which was his fathers house and patrimony, where he raised som Commotions against him, for he was much grieued & discontented with his fathers late mariage. OTHO being returned into Germany, and BERENGARIVS seeing that by warre, he could not recouer what he had lost, came into Germany, and brought with him his sonne ALBERTVS, and desiring pardon, yeelded himselfe into the Emperours power, vowing to be his loyall seruant and subiect; which he protested in such manner, that the Emperor thought himselfe well assured of him, and thereupon made him his Lieutenant in Milan and all Lombardy, the auntient inheritance of the Empire, and gaue certain lands to him, and to his sonne ALBERTVS; wherewith his sonne-in-law CONRADE, which before held that charge, being greatly discontented, he ioyned with LVITOLPHVS the Emperours sonne, and so the sonne and sonne-in-law rebelled against him. BLONDVS and other Italian writers, make no mention of CONRADE's abode in Italy, neither of BERENGARIVS his going into Germany; yet they mention his pardon, and the offices that the Emperor bestowed vpon him: But ABBAS WESPERGENSIS writeth in the same manner as I haue related, and so do NAVCLERVS and other Dutch writers. Italy remaining in this estate, the Emperor did not so soone abandon it (as I suppose) without some suspicion conceiued of his sonne LVITOLPHVS, who departed from him and rebelled: truly he had reason to mistrust him, for LVITOLPHVS being accounted his successor, found many friends to ioyne with him against his father; amongst which was his brother-in-law CONRADE, and ARNOLD, and the other sonnes of BERTOLD late Duke of Bauiere; who dying, the Emperor gaue to his brother HENRY that Estate: wherefore all those which were called Dukes of Bauiere, were so much discontented with him, that they raised an Armie, and tooke many townes and castles, meaning by force to defend the same, with a resolution to depose him from the Empire, without regard of the faith and loyalty which they, as his sonne and sonne-in-law, ought to him.

Otho made Berengarius his Lieutenant in Lombardy.

Luitolph and other rise against Otho.

OTHO making such account of this warre as the importance thereof required, leuied his forces, and went against his sonne; who daring not to keepe the field against him, fortified himselfe in the citie of Mentz, where his father besieged him the space of threescore dayes, after that he had recouered many of those townes which had giuen their voices against him; the citie in the meane time being battered, and most valiantly defended, in the end the besieged made a motion of peace: and to the end they might haue time to treate thereof, a truce was granted; in which time, the forces brought by the Emperors brother HENRY to his seruice, through the secret persuasion of ARNOLPHVS, and his brethren, which were called Dukes of Bauiere, came to an agreement with LVITOLPHVS; with which, and with those which already were in Mentz, in a night hee found meanes to depart the citie, and to get into Ratisbone. The Emperor without making one daies tariance, raised his siege, and went to Ratisbone, which was better fortified and furnished then Mentz, and so the siege was more hard and doubtful; and in the assaults and sallies many men lost their liues, of the one and other party. And although that LVITOLPHVS desired peace, and his fathers pardon, yet the Emperor would neuer yield thereto, vntill that by the importunacie of some Prelates, hee limited a certaine time, wherein his faults and offences should be examined, and a treaty should be held concerning what was to be done; and so LVITOLPHVS gaue vp the citie: And going thence, absented himself from his fathers presence, till that (within the time prefixed) the Emperor being on hunting in the fields, LVITOLPH acknowledging his error, and being very sory for it, without security from his father, came before him vpon the way, bare headed and bare footed, and kneeling at his fathers feete, wept; who being amazed at the strangenes thereof, expecting no such matter, stood still: and the sonne recouering spirit, in this manner entreated him to haue compassion on him, acknowledging his faults and offences to be very great, rather deseruing a thousand deaths then any pardon; and therefore being hartily sorie for the same, (like the prodigall childe) he presented himselfe before his father, who also had a father in heauen, by whom he hoped to be forgiuen: and if it might please him to grant him his life, he should be assured of him, to be euer after a loyal and obedient sonne, and one which liued, and would liue, in continuall sorow for what was past: if he meant to do otherwise by him, he should yet consider that he was his owne flesh and blood, and although that the offence were onely his, yet of the punishment inflicted vpon the guiltie sonne, the iust father would beare part of the sorrowe; and that in shewing him mercie, there could no inconuenience ensue; but if he did to the contrary, he should lose the most obedient sonne that euer father had.

Luitolph besieged by his father Otho.

Luitolphus submitting himselfe to his father entreated him.

Hauing ended these words, and other to the same effect, with great humilitie he prostrated himselfe vpon the earth, expecting his fathers sentence of life or death. This strake so great an impression into the Emperours heart, to heare and see his sonne to shew such humility, and to shed so many teares, that he could not forbeare from doing the like: and commanding him to arise from the ground, with ioy mixt with teares, from himselfe, and the rest which were there present, he presently pardoned him, and restored him to his grace and fatherly fauour, and to the same place and dignity which he held before; and so he continued constant in that loyalty and duty which he ought to his father and soueraigne Lord. This is a notable example to bee read with attention, whereby sonnes and subiects which haue erred and offended their soueraigne Lords, may learne to repent and amend; and Princes to pardon those which truly desire to bee restored to their grace and seruice: for although that it be most certaine, that it is expedient for the good of the Common wealth, that offences be punished; yet generally no rule ought to be so strict and seuere, that no exception should be allowed, seeing that sometimes for the common good, clemencie is as profitable. Moreouer, the shame and sorrow for the offences committed, is no smal punishment to him that is pardoned.

The pitie of Otho towards his sonne Luitolphus.

Otho hauing pardoned his sonne, and recouered Mentz and Ratisbone, and all the other strong holds which had rebelled, and (according to the most and best authors) reclaimed his sonne-in-law Conrade, (yet some say the contrary) when he should haue taken rest, and haue reposed himselfe, there arose new warres, more dangerous then the former; for on the one side the Dalmatians and Slauons entred the territories of the Empire; and on the other side, the Hungars (who now had liued sometime in rest) gathering together an infinite number of them, began the most dangerous and cruell warre they euer had made; for besides that they were a most valiant and proud people, they were so many in number, that they reported of themselues, that the skies migh fall and so kill them, or the earth might open and swallow them; but the power of no nations, or of any Kings of the earth was sufficient to make head against them. Against a nation so valiant and resolute, the valiant Emperor leuied the best and mightiest Armie that euer he had done; for it consisted of eight legions, vnder the leading of excellent Captains, and those, Dukes and Princes of the Empire. In this war were many conflicts and exploits of Armes worth relating, which I omit for breuitie which I am bound to obserue.

In the end these two mightie Armies ioyned, and fought a battaile neere the riuer Danubius, which began about noone, and continued vntill night, without any signe of victorie to either side; the fields lying full of dead bodies, and died with the bloud of the slaine and wounded; and the darknes of the night parted the Armies, and made them leaue fighting: but the Emperor spent the whole night in dressing the wounded, giuing them meate, and encouraging the rest; and as soone as it was day, setting his troupes in order, he took the field, where they againe began the fight, with as great furie as the day before: But the Hungarians began to giue ground, and within short space were ouerthrowne, and the Imperialists made an exceeding great slaughter of them, and obtained one of the most famous victories that hath bin in the world: wherewith the Hungarians were so much daunted, that they neuer durst after that time attempt to make wars in Germany. There died that day of the Emperors side some principall men, among which was his sonne-in-law Conrade Duke of Franconia, of whom all authors write, that he was the best and most valiant captaine of his time. Of the Hungarians died in a manner all the Nobilitie, and three Dukes or Reguli, were taken prisoners, which the Emperor commanded to be hanged, for an example, and punishment of the rebellion and pride of that nation.

Otho's victorie.

This

This battaile was fought in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, after which he spent many daies in processions, and in shewing himselfe thankfull to God for so noble a victorie: which being ended, he sent the greatest part of his Armie against the Slauons, and other nations which warred against him; all which he vanquished and subdued with the like felicitie, and then went to visit sundrie townes and cities of his Empire, to the great ioy of his subiects. Great matters in these times passed in France and in Spaine, and in other parts of the world, which I haue not time to relate. In Italy Berengarius and his sonne Albert (seeing the Emperor busied in those daungerous warres) forgetting the good which they had receiued from him, committed many tyrannies and insolencies, aswell against the Church of Rome, as against the inhabitants of the countrie: and therein also were other tyrants in diuers other parts. At this time died Pope Agapetvs, who held that seate almost ten yeres, and after his death (by sinister meanes more by force and fauour, then by any iust forme of election) Octavianvs, a Romane borne, the sonne of a man of great power and authoritie in Rome, was chosen Pope, and called Iohn the twelfth; a most vicious wicked man, and giuen to all kinde of dissolution and ribaudrie; and aboue all, extreme cruell and couetous.

The commendation of Pope Octauianus called Iohn the twelfth.

At this time died also in Constantinople Romanvs the Greeke Emperor, who was a Prince farre vnworthie thereof; for he was both wicked and of a base mind, and suffered his seruants to rule him. In his time were two great warres in the East Empire; one against the Mahometists Infidels, who had taken the Ile of Candia; and the other in Asia, against the Turks and Persians. In the first, Nicephorvs (nephew to that Nicephorvs which in the time of Basilivs was so excellent a Captaine) was Generall, and wan great victories: In the other, Leo was General, cousin germane to this Nicephorvs; both which had happie successe: In the rest of his gouernment he was a wicked and cruell Emperor; for although that he had an excellent sharpe wit and vnderstanding, yet he abused the same. Romanvs being dead, notwithstanding that he left two sonnes, Basilivs and Constantine, and one daughter called Theodora; yet by reason of their young yeeres and the hatred borne to their father, they then obtained not the Empire; but yet afterwards in processe of time they gat it: and the said Captaine Nicephorvs was chosen Emperor, who in the warres was very fortunate, and both valiant and carefull, but in peace careles and couetous.

The Greeke Emperour.

Returning now to our Emperour Otho, I say, that it was aboue six yeeres after his first comming into Italie, in which time hauing ended the wars with his sonne, with the Hungarians and with the Slauonians, as we haue declared; when as (besides other times, that he had been prayed and entreated) Ambassadours came vnto him from Rome, and from sundrie cities of Italy; entreating him to come thither, and to free them from the tyrannie of Berengarius, and the cruell tyrannous Pope Iohn, who also sent Ambassadours to him: whereto Otho consenting, resolued vpon his iourney into Italie with strong hand: and staying to set some things in Germany in order, he sent his now louing and obedient sonne Lvitolphvs before him with the greatest part of his forces against Berengarius; who after some victories obtained against him, and the taking of many cities, died of an infirmitie: whereupon his father hastened his iourney; but first he made his then eldest sonne called Otho, of the age of seuen yeeres, whom he had by his second wife, Cæsar and his successor. And being come into Italie, neither Berengarius nor his sonne Albert durst keepe the field, but fled to their holds and castles; and Albert gat into the Ile of Corsica, and Berengarius put himselfe into a very strong castle in Mount Leon: And so Otho, without shedding any drop of bloud, took all Lombardy, and marched towards Rome, where Pope Iohn attended his comming, and had by all meanes possible sought his friendship; his conscience accusing him of his vices. In matters which passed at Otho's second comming into Italy, there is some difference betweene the Historiographers which write the same; but I will follow that rule which the most of them haue set downe, and that which by many coniectures seemeth to be most true. Being come to Rome (where of long time they had not sene any Emperor) he was receiued with great solemnitie and incredible pompe, by Pope Iohn and the Romanes; and with the like was by him crowned, hauing first sworne those things contained in the Chapter Tibi Domine in the thirteenth Distinction. The Emperour being enformed in what manner Pope Iohn had attained to the Papacie, and withall of his loose kind of life; after that he had remained there certaine daies, in friendly sort hee secretly admonished him to reforme his dissolute life, and the manner of his gouernment in the Church; and seeing that his secret warning preuailed not, he spake to him in the Consistorie before his Cardinals, with greater authoritie & seueritie,

The death of Luitolphus.

The Emperor Otho crowned by Pope Iohn the twelfth.

then the other would he should haue done: which being ended, in hope that the Pope would haue reformed himselfe, he departed from Rome, to seeke Berengarius; and besieging him in a Citie which he had fortified, he daily assailed it with great force and resolution: in the meane time that he busied himselfe herein, Pope Iohn, with some of his confederats (shewing himselfe an enemy to the Emperor) called Albert the son of Berengarius into Italie, and made a reuolt against him: whereupon, Otho leauing to besiege Berengarius, returned towards Rome, where the Pope had vsed great cruelty to those which held for the Emperour; among which (it is said) that he cut off the Noses, and put out the Eyes of some of the Cardinals and Citizens: but knowing with what furie the Emperour came, he durst not stay his comming, but fled, and so lurked in sundry parts: and Otho being comn, the greatest part of the Cardinals, Clergie, and People of Rome informed him of the Popes lewde life, and the insufficiency of his election; desiring him to place a new: whereto he answered, that if their informations were true, they had authority of themselues to choose whom they listed: And they holding Iohns election to be of no effect, made choise of another, whose name was Leo, the eighth of that name, who was presently receiued for Pope, the Emperour holding him for such. And leauing him seated in his throne, Otho went from Rome, returning to his enterprise against Berengarius and his sonne Albert; wherein he vsed such diligence, and had so good successe, that Berengarius despairing to be able to defend himselfe, yeelded to his mercie; and his sonne Albert, with his wife and children, were taken prisoners: And the Emperour Otho (vsing his accustomed clemency and magnanity) would not put them to death, but contented himselfe to banish them: Berengarius he sent prisoner, and banished into a strong Castle in Saxony; and his sonne Albert to Constantinople, and so ended the tyranny of the Berengarii in Italie.

Berengarius condemned to perpetuall imprisonment, and his sonne Albert to be exild, by the Emperor Otho the second.

Blondus and other authors write that their imprisonment was as soone as Otho came into Italy: but I follow the Abbot Wesspergensis, and the most part of all the other Historiographers.

Within few daies after that Otho was departed from Rome, wherein he had left Leo the eighth for Pope; the Romane people, by the perswasion of Pope Iohn, and of his Allies and kindred (with the like lightnesse as they vsually are moued) altred their mindes, and determined to cast out Leo, and to receiue Iohn; and so Iohn was restored, and Leo driuen to flie, and to complaine to the Emperor at Spoleto.

When the Emperor was aduertised hereof, making an end of such businesse as he then had in hand, he concluded to come within few daies with his forces to Rome, against his enemy Pope Iohn, who died there before his comming: some writers say, that a Roman, taking him with his wife, slew him, when he had continued Pope nine yeeres. The Romanes hating Pope Leo, who was now with the Emperor, chose another called Benedict the fift; and hee and they presently sent their Ambassadours to the Emperour, to entreate him to be pleased with his election: wherewith the Emperour was more offended then before, and gaue them a very sharpe answere: But the Romanes (who by this time loathed the Germanes, murmurring against the Emperour) persisted in their opinion of holding Benedict for Pope: for this cause, Otho remoued with his Army, and came to Rome, where Pope Benedict and the Romanes had made prouision of men and munition for their defence; and he first spoyling the territory thereof, besieged the Citie, and brought it to such distresse, that they write wonders of the famine and want which the besieged endured; which was such, that being vnable to endure the extremity thereof, they gaue vp the City to Otho; who being now Lord of that Citie, deposed Benedict whom he held for no Pope; and reestablished Leo, whom he brought with him: then he stayed some daies in Rome, setting all things in good order, and carrying Benedict with him, whom they had chosen in contempt of him, together with the sonnes of many of the chiefe men in Rome for his better securitie; he departed thence, and came into Lombardy, wherein, placing gouernours and garrisons in all the Cities which appertained to the Empire, he returned into Germany; where he was solemnly receiued by all the Princes and estates thereof: Within few daies Benedict (whom the Emperour brought with him) died of sorrow, six moneths after his election; so that Pope Leo remained sole Pope without any competency: but his prosperity continued but a while: for within little more then one yeere, after that he came to be Pope, he died also; and through his death they chose Pope Iohn the fourteenth of that name, but he was not receiued; for the President of Rome, who then was called Peter, rose against him, and with the fauour and assistance of the the Decarconi, which were Rulers for one yeere; and of the two Consuls of the City (this was the manner of their gouernment at that time) and a certaine Prince which was Earle of Campania, whose name was Gotheredvs, rising against the Pope, they became so mighty, that they apprehended him, and committed him to the Castle S. Angelo; and afterwards, being masters of the Citie, they released him thence; so as he liued exiled eleuen moneths: which being past, with the aid of Iohn, Prince or Duke of Capua, he was restored to his estate, and the aforesaid Gotheredvs was put to death: this was in the yeere of our Lord, nine hundred sixty and seuen. Otho hauing raigned Emperour thirtie and odde yeeres; and being in Germany aduised of what passed in Rome, and much grieued therewith, he resolued presently to take his way towards Italie, to punish so great a contempt, and to supplant other Tyrants; and putting the same in execution, he came thither with great forces of foot and horse, and brought with him his eldest sonne and successor; comming to Rome, hee inflicted notable punishment vpon this prefect Peter, and the rest of the principall offenders.

Pope Iohn prisoner in the castle S. Angelo.

This being ended, he sent his sonne Otho with part of his Armie against the Moores, who held many Townes in Pulia; and this Otho draue them thence by force, and was then contracted by his Ambassadors to Theophania daughter to Nicephorvs, at that time Emperor of Constantinople: And for as much as her father would not send her vnto him, he resolued to make a conquest of those Lands which were subiect to that Empire in Italie, and did so: for which cause (as some authors write) the Greekes rebelled against Nicephorvs, and depriuing him of his Empire slew him, taking Iohn for Emperor, whose sister or cosin germane Otho afterwards married.

Otho's second coming into Italy.

The death of the Greek Emperor Nicephorus.

Others say that the cause of this warre was, for that the Greekes which dwelt in Pulia, held peace and friendshippe with the Infidels which dwelt among them, and did assist them. But, whatsoeuer was the occasion, Otho and his sonne bereaued them of the best lands that they held in Italie; wherein Pandvlphvs Duke of Capua did him especiall seruice. All which being brought to a wished end; Pope Iohn, with the consent and good liking of Otho, crowned and made his sonne Otho his companion in the Empire, with great feasting and solemnity: and so, very joyfull and victorious, both the father and the sonne returned into Germany, leauing the Pope in peace absolute Lord of Rome; and so was Italie maintained seuen yeers in peace without any tyranny.

The Emperors, being comn into Germany, were with great joy receiued; and to them came Ambassadors of amity and friendship from all the Princes Christian. The rest of his life, which was not long, he spent in doing iustice, in building of Churches and Monasteries, and in such like exercises: In which; in the six and thirtith yeer of his Raign in Germany, and the thirteenth yeer after his Coronation in Rome, it pleased God to take him out of this world, in the month of May, in the yeer of our Lord 974.

The death of the Emperor Otho

A little before the death of Otho, Nicephorvs Emperor of Constantinople was deposed and slain, who had raigned six or seuen yeers, and had obtained great victories against the Infidels: but, through his euill gouerument in time of peace, they rebelled and slue him; And an excellent Captain, whose name was Zimices, was chosen Emperor: who, the better to confirm himself in the Empire, chose for his companions the two sonnes of Romanvs, who was Emperor before Nicephorvs, whose names were Basilivs and Constantine; and married himself to a sister of theirs called Theodora. This proued an excellent and valiant Emperor, and subdued the Russians, and other northerly Nations, and also Phocas a Tyrant, who rebelled against him: of whose end you shall hear more hereafter.

THE LIFE OF OTHO, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSCORE & EIGHTTH ROMANE Emperor; And of IOHN, BASILIVS & CONSTANTINE, Emperors of Constantinople.

This Otho was according to the order of the Roman Emperors, the Second; but the third Roman Emperor of that name.

OTHO the sonne of OTHO, and therefore called the Second (yet in truth he was the Third) as soon as his father was dead; as well for his fathers worthinesse, as for that in his life time he was elect and crowned in Rome by the Pope, as wee haue related, was without any contradiction receiued and obeyed for Emperor. This OTHO was a man of a great spirit, and very valiant, and so shewed himself in all his actions; though in the later end of his Raign hee was vnfortunate, as you shall vnderstand. Hee beginning to rule the Empire, all Christian Princes sent Ambassadors vnto him, to condole the death of his father, and to congratulate his succession; and the Princes of Germany came to do him homage: onely HENRY Duke of Bauiere (who was his cosin germane, sonne of the other HENRY, brother to his father OTHO, of whom we haue made some mention, and whom his father made Duke of Bauria; being a man of great power, and therewith very proud) refused to yeeld obedience to the new Emperor: but OTHO raised an Army, and went against him, and compelled him to submit himself, and to yeeld his obedience; this befell in the first yeer of his Raign. From thence hee marched against some Towns in Slauonia, which took Arms against him. In the mean time, in the Prouince of Lorrain were some combustions, procured by LOTHARIVS King of France; vpon the newes whereof, OTHO returned into Germany: but the French King had raised such forces, and was so suddenly entred Lorrain, that he made himself Lord thereof; pretending, that the Prouince did appertain to the Crown of France. And not content to haue subdued all that Country, within fewe daies after he marched forwards, spoiling and wasting the Country euen to Aken; where OTHO then was with small forces, nothing mistrusting that the King of France would haue proceeded so farre in that warre, where he was like to haue been taken, and was driuen to depart thence in more than haste: but the French King retiring with great prey and spoils; the Emperor, much displeased with his doings, raised a very mighty Army, and the next yeer following, with great courage and equall power, entred the Kingdome of France; in such manner, that the French King neither durst nor was able to fight with him; but retired, and fortified himself in the City of Paris: whither OTHO came (the King being therein) and spoiled the Country, in reuenge of the harms receiued; and in coming within sight of the City, he lost some of his people in a skirmish against the French: and seeing that the King salied not forth to giue him battell, and that he could not besiege him with any aduantage, he resolued for that winter to return into his Country: and in his retreit the King of France sent the Duke of Burgundy and other Princes, to charge him in the arieregard (as GAGVIN and other French Historians write) and at the passage ouer a riuer, which was growne so high by reason of the raine, that it could not be waded through, he receiued great harme by his enemies, and they slew a great part of his Armie; which the Germanes doe not so brauely describe (yet they acknowledge to haue lost som of their people at that passage) and the Emperor being returned, resolued to haue prosecuted that warre; but it hapned otherwise: for he gaue eare to a treatie of peace betweene him and the French king, moued by certaine prelates; which was concluded, as we will shew you; whereof the warres in Italie, made by the Greeke Emperor, were the chief occasion; which passed in this manner.

IOHN ZIMICES (as is before recited) hauing obtained the Empire of Constantinople by the death of NICEPHORVS, and taken for his companions the two sons of the Emperor ROMANVS, whose names were BASILIVS and CONSTANTINE; and hauing obtained many victories, and gouerned the Empire very well, was poisoned in Constantinople, when hee had raigned six yeers and a halfe, and BASILIVS, and his brother CONSTANTINE, which were his brothers in law, remained Emperors; but BASILIVS bare the chiefest sway in the gouernment, being now twenty yeeres old; who in processe of time wan many great victories, as well against tyrants which rebelled, as other people, and raigned fifty and od yeers; in which time many raigned in Germany, the story whereof I am to write, although I euer make some mention of Constantinople, as I haue done hitherto.

The Emperor of Constantinople poysoned Basilius, and his brother Constantine succeeded Iohn in the Greeke Empire.

In the beginning of the raigne of BASILVS, and of his brother CONSTANTINE, they being both yong, and of great power, and seeing that OTHO was busied in the warres of France, and grieuing that he and his father had taken the lands belonging to the Greeke Empire in Pulia and in Calabria; they resolued to recouer the same, imbracing the oportunitie, considering that OTHO was pestered with these troubles, and that the Popes were of small power by reason of the great tyrants which were in Rome, and in a manner through all Italie by reason of the Emperors absence. The two brethren hauing placed good Captaines and Garrisons in the prouinces of Asia, and Gracia, tooke their passage into Italie, and brought in their Armie many Infidels, as well such as were newly entertained, as such as in former time had made warre in that countrie; and began to take Cities and Castles, and in short space tooke all the rest of Pulia, and Calabria: and Rome it selfe and all the countrie thereabout stood in great feare of them.

OTHO hauing intelligence hereof (at what time as he was in parley of peace with France) and grieuing much that the Greekes should recouer what he had conquered at the time of his fathers coronation in Rome, with a resolution to recouer and to defend the same, he concluded a peace with the French: wherein was granted to him the supreme jurisdiction, and all the prouince of Lotharingia, otherwise called Austrasia, which afterwards was diuided into sundrie estates, as Braband, Gelders, Cleue, Gulick, and that which now is called Lorraine; whereof he gaue the Dominion to the French kings brother, whose name was CHARLES, with the title of Duke, the more to binde the king of France to obserue the peace: And hauing taken such order herein, and in the rest of Germany, as was expedient; he went with great power into Italie, where his comming was long expected; and taking his way towards Rome, he was there againe crowned by the Pope, notwithstanding that he was so in the time of his father: and he required the Cities of Italie, that at a certaine time and place appointed, they should send him their men of warre, which was performed accordingly: and staying but a very small time in Rome, he drew all his Armie to one head; and so went to seeke his enemies, who refused not the battell: and both parties desiring the same, it was fought, wherein OTHO had very ill successe. For, hauing a greater number, and better men then were the Greekes, the Romanes, the Beneuentanes, and others which had the auauntguard, at the first encounter charged so cowardly, that without making any resistance, they abandoned the field in such confusion, that they disordered the other Battalions and Squadrons of the Germanes: so as the Greekes encouraged hereby, followed the chace of them which fled; in such manner that OTHO's people, being vnable to doe as they would, and ought to haue done, were broken and ouerthrowne, and a very great number of them slaine.

The Emperour made peace with France.

The Emperour seeing no hope of better helpe, fled from the battaile; and comming to the Sea side (which was not farre from thence) put himself into a small boat, which he found there by chance, thinking so to escape: but he was taken vnknowne by a Pirat, and carried into Sicilia, where he was discouered by a Merchant of Slauonia; who, vpon promise of reward made by the Emperor, bewrayed him not, but agreed for his ransome. This is reported in sundry sorts: but but in the end he was deliuered by the Merchants means, they nothing knowing that hee was an Emperor. And so he returned into Italie, and came to Rome, whereof the Greeks might haue been masters if they had knowne how to haue followed their aduantage; for, their enemies being ouerthrowne, they had not found therein any resistance: but, God hauing otherwise ordained, they left the war, contenting themselues with the victory.

OTHO, being comn to Rome, gathered together the remainder of his Armie; and, adding thereto new supplies, the first enterprise that he attempted, was, to go to Beneuent: where hee put the greatest part of the Inhabitants to the sword, and sacked the City, becausse they fledde from the battell. It is written of him, that hee inflicted cruell punishment in Rome for the same cause; so as he was therefore called bloudy: the cause whereof was, The great grief and sorrow which he conceiued for the losse of the battell, and his flight; considering, that through the fault and cowardize of his friends it had hapned: so as they write of him, that euer after, whilst hee liued, his countenance was euer sad and pensiue, and that hee often gaue great gronos and sighes: and, finally, in his apparell, and in all other things, he shewed continuall sorrow and extreme heauinesse; and all his speeches and discourses were, how he might be reuenged, and recouer this losse.

The death of the Emperour Otho the third

After this, liuing in this care and melancholie in the City of Rome, he was taken with a mortall infirmity, which (as some say) came through sorrow (but not without suspicion of poison) which increased so, that hee died thereof, hauing raigned tenne yeers, in the yeer of our Lord nine hundred fourescore and foure. He left behinde him, when he died, one sonne called OTHO (as himselfe) of the age of twelue yeers, who was afterwards Emperor; and another called HVGH, who was Duke of Saxonie, and one daughter called ALASIA, which afterwards was married to a Prince of Saxony, whose name was ALRANE or ALEDRANE, and was Marquesse of Monferrato; in whom that house and state had beginning. All these hee had by his first wife, whose name was THEOPHANIA, who had been late wife to IOHN Emperor of Constantinople. He had also another daughter called VTILHVIDA, by his second wife, which was the Marquesse of Austrich his daughter, who was married to THEODORICVS, the first Earl of Holland: and, OTHO being dead, the Greeks for that time continued Lords of Pulia and Calabria.

THE LIFE OF OTHO, BEING THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSCORE AND NINTH ROMANE Emperor; And of BASILIVS & CONSTANTINE, Emperors of Constantinople.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter long disputations and contentions about the election of the Emperor, betweene the Romans and the Princes of Germany; in the end Otho the sonne of the deceased Emperor, was chosen, being a childe not fully twelue yeeres old; and so one Crescencius in the beginning of his raigne rebelled against him in Rome; who aspired to the Empire, and made himselfe a tyrant ouer many Countries, and persecuted the Pope, driuing him to flie; but finally for feare of the Emperour, who came into Italy to protect the Pope, he made his peace with him, and became his subiect: the Emperor being departed, Crescencius againe tooke Armes and made a new Pope: and persecuting the Pope made by the Emperor, he constrained him to flie to the Emperor, who conducting him into Italie, tooke Rome, and slew Crescencius; and the other Pope died miserably. At this time, an order and forme was set downe for the choosing of the Emperor, and the honor being giuen to the Germanes, the Romanes were therewith much displeased; and conspiring against the Emperour, put him so to his shifts, that he was driuen to flie disguised; but in the end, vnable to eschew treason, he died of poyson, when hee had raigned eighteene yeeres.

IN such manner as I haue declared, the Emperor called OTHO the Third deceased: and in the Citie of Rome, was great contention and controuersie about the election of a new Emperor, betweene the Princes of Germany which were there, and came with him; for some would haue his sonne to succeede him, whose name also was OTHO, being then but a childe of eleuen and halfe yeeres old; being the fourth of that name, but the third of the Germanes. Others were of opinion (by reason of the childes nonage) to make HENRY Duke of Bauaria Emperor, who was his fathers Cosin-germane, the first OTHO's brothers sonne; who being a mighty man and there present, sought to haue gotten his yong cosine into his power, to the end that he should not haue been chosen; and did so, and tooke vpon him the title of Emperor: And the Romane and Italian Princes (desiring to be freed from the Gouernement of the Germanes whom they naturally hated) sought by all meanes that an Italian might haue beene chosen; and they named one who was a very mightie Romane, called CRESCENCIVS NVMITANVS, who at that time was Gouernour, and Consull in Rome: for (as it is said) they had established a new manner of Gouernement, imitating the antient custome; for at this time they had a certaine kinde of Consulate.

Obseruing the ordinary course, this Otho was the fourth of that name, although the third of the Germane Emperor.

The Princes of Germany standing in feare of the Romane and Italian people (in a manner) by common consent, maugre HENRY Cuke of Bauaria (who thought to haue beene Emperour) resolued to choose OTHO sonne to the last OTHO; for although that hee were but young and scarcely twelue yeeres old, yet he gaue great signes and hope of a future excellent Prince; & taking him out of the power of the said HENRY of Bauiere, they departed with him from Rome towards Germany, and came with him to the Citie of Aken, where he was crowned with great solemnity, and obeyed and held for Emperor; and so he was in Milan, and in other parts of the Empire. But in Rome CRESCENCIVS NVMITANVS, who (as we said) sought to haue beene Emperour, possessed himselfe of the Citie, and of the territory thereof: and for asmuch as Pope IOHN tooke part with OTHO, he made him to be apprehended in the third moneth of his Papacie, and committed him prisoner to the Castle of Saint Angelo, a wicked and impious act, where within fiue moneths after he died of sorrow. Afterwards IOHN the sixteenth came to be Pope, who was a couetous wicked man, and consented to the Tyranny of CRESCENCIVS afore named, and rebelled with Rome against the Emperour OTHO (whereof the Emperours nonage gaue the chiefe occasion, and for the same cause som Princes of Germany likewise rebelled against him) but within short space; hauing attained to the age of fourteene yeeres, he was of such courage and discretion, as he might well be accounted for a perfect staid man: And with the ayde of those which continued his loyall subjects, he subdued and ouercame (although long first) all such as rebelled against him; with such happinesse and good successe, that he was held for the wonder of the World, seeing in him so great valour and so ripe a judgement in so greene yeers.

Crescencius apprehended Pope Iohn the fift, and committed him prisoner to the Castle S. Angelo, where he died of sorrow.

What Rebellions these were, and in what manner he had so great good fortune, none of the Historiographers doe write particularly, that I could euer see; so briefly they passe ouer this place: Wherefore I can relate no more then I finde written; onely this they affirme, that for for the ſpace of ten yeeres, he was buſied in pacifying and ordering the ſtate of Germany: in which time CRESCENTIVS tyrannized Rome; which paſſed in this manner:

Pope IOHN the ſixteenth, who (as I ſaid) ſucceeded IOHN the fifteenth (as it pleaſed God) liued Pope but ſeuen moneths; all which he ſpent vilely: and hee being dead, a learned man was choſen, whoſe name was IOHN alſo, which was IOHN the ſeuenteenth, but much vnlike his Predeceſſor; for, he was an honeſt man: and for being ſo, was ſoon at variance with the Tyrant CRESCENTIVS; who was of ſuch power, that Pope IOHN was driuen to leaue Rome, and to giue place to his tyranny. He oftentimes ſent to the Emperor OTHO for ſuccours, and to come and reform the ſtate of Rome and Italie: But the Emperor could not then perform his requeſt, by reaſon of his other waighty affairs; yet afterwards he did it, as you ſhall hear.

In the mean time, CRESCENTIVS fearing the Emperors coming, acknowledging his error, practiſed with Pope IOHN to return, promiſing him to bee obeyed and reſpected: and he ſo effectually handled the matter, that a peace was concluded between them; and the Pope came, and was receiued with great ſolemnity. But, this notwithſtanding, the Emperour held on his way, and came into Italie with great power (which was in the eleuenth yeer of his raign) and was receiued euery where as he paſſed, with great joy and feaſting: and ſo he came to Rome, where the Pope and CRESCENTIVS (after ſome treaties and ambaſſages which paſſed) made great preparation to receiue him. And the Emperor beeing comn neer to the City; the Pope, accompanied with all his Cardinals and Clergie, and with all the Roman Nobilitie and Gentlemen, went forth to entertain him: and ſo in peace and good friendſhip the Emperour ſtaied ſome daies in Rome; and, to gratifie the Pope and the Romans, hee went with his Armie to Capua and to Beneuent, which diſobeyed, and were at warres among themſelues: whom hee compelled to liue in peace, to the contentment of the Romans.

The coming of the Emperor Otho into Italy

About this time died Pope IOHN; and the Emperor, returning to Rome, procured an vncle of his of the houſe of Saxony, whoſe name was BRVNO, to bee made Pope, and hee was called GREGORY the Fift: who, being ſeated in his papall dignity, anointed and crowned the Emperor, with ſuch ſolemnity and pomp as his father and grandfather had been before him. Which being ended, and OTHO imagining that the eſtate of Italie ſtood now in good form and order (conſidering that his vncle remained higheſt Biſhop) he took his way towards Germany, and by the way viſited Lombardy, and other parts ſubject to the Empire.

In the mean time, whil'ſt that OTHO was buſied about the affairs of Italie, the Succeſſors of CHARLES the Great were depoſed from the Crown of France; which although it concern not our Hiſtory, yet for as much as it is a matter of great importance, I think it worthy to bee reduced to memory; and thus it was: King LOTHARY being dead (who as we ſaid made war againſt OTHO the Second) his ſonne LEVVES, ſucceeding him, within one yeer died alſo. This LEVVES being dead; HVGH called CAPVTIVS or CAPET, Earle or Gouerner of Paris, being a man of great power and authority in that Kingdome, tyrannically took vpon him the title of King, and made himſelf Lord of France; hauing no right thereto, but the right of warre: and firſt he took CHARLES (brother to LOTHARIVS) priſoner by treaſon (who, by the death of his nephew LEVVES, was called King) and cauſed him to dy in priſon, and (ſubduing all ſuch as made any reſiſtance) got the Crown and Kingdom; which hath continued in his Succeſſors vnto this day.

Hugh Capet vſurped the kingdoms of France.

OTHO being returned into Italie; the Romans, who had euer murmured at the election of Pope GREGORY, and loathed the rule and command of the Germanes, choſe the Tyrant CRESCENTIVS for Conſul: by whoſe aid and counſel they again rebeld againſt the Pope; in ſuch ſort, that hee was driuen to flee Rome, and earneſtly to intreat the Emperor to relieue him; in hope that he would haue comn to his reſcue, or that CRESCENTIVS and the Romans, fearing the Emperors coming, would haue recalled him, and haue made peace with him, as they had done with his Predeceſſor. But it fell out cleen contrary: for, CRESCENTIVS, alleaging that Pope GREGORY's elelection was violent (the Emperor forcing the ſame) hee cauſed the Biſhop of Placentia to be choſen and made Pope, who was called IOHN the eighteenth (yet ſundry Authors hould him not for Pope). Wherefore Pope GREGORY, leauing Italie, went into Germany to the Emperor; who, being highly diſpleaſed, leuied an Armie, and came into Italie, and ſo directly to Rome, where CRESCENTIVS had fortified himſelf, and prouided a garriſon to defend the ſame; and the Emperor beſieged the City: which put the Romans in ſuch fear, that they durſt not ſtand to their defenſe; but, opening the gates, deſired the the Emperor to pardon them; and the two tyrants, CRESCENTIVS and Pope IOHN, withdrew themſelues into the caſtell S. Angelo, which CRESCENTIVS had ſo well fortified, that it was held for impregnable: whereupon OTHO came to a parley with him, to the end that he ſhould haue yeelded: and CRESCENTIVS preſuming that his life ſhould haue been ſaued (whereof he was put in ſome hope) deliuered vp the caſtle; and hee and the Pope comming towards the Emperor, were apprehended vpon the way; and CRESCENTIVS was preſently put to death by his commandement, as a violater of his faith, and one that had been twice a traytor. Others write that he cauſed him to be hanged, and Pope IOHNS eyes to be put out, who afterwards died miſerably: ſuch are the rewards which the world beſtoweth vpon thoſe which to follow the ſame forget God, their owne honour and honeſtie. Theſe tyrants being ſuppreſſed, the Emperor reſtored Pope GREGORIE to his ſeate and dignitie, and ſet the beſt order in all matters in Rome, that the time would permit.

Creſcentius put to death.

Pope Iohn the eighteenth had his eyes put out.

Pope Gregorie reſtored to his ſeate.

All this which I haue recited being ended, Pope GREGORY acknowledging the ſuccours which the Church of Rome had receiued from the Emperour, and from the Princes of Germany (as a man affected to his native countrey, and to the Germane nation; by the will and conſent of the Emperor, and to preuent and eſchue the diſcord which did ariſe, or might happen, about the chuſing of the Emperor) made a law and Cation, which hath laſted about ſix hundred yeres, euen vntill this day, which was, that the election of the Emperor, ſo long as the Empire ſhould be voide, ſhould appertaine to ſixe Princes onely, which we will preſently nominate; three, whereof were Prelates, and the other three, ſecular Princes, viz. a Duke, a Marqueſſe, and an Earle, and if by chaunce there ſhould be equality of voyces betweene theſe ſix, the King of Bohemia (which then was no King) ſhould alſo haue his voyce, and the party whereto he inclined, ſhould make the choiſe, and their election ſhould ſtand: the Prelates are, the Archbiſhop of Mentz, the Archbiſhop of Colein, and the Archbiſhop of Treuier: the Princes are the Count Palatine of Rhine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Marqueſſe of Brandenburgh. And he further ordained, that no man ſhould be choſen Emperor, except he were a Germane borne; and that being choſen by the Princes Electors aforeſaid, hee ſhould bee called King of the Romanes, and not Emperor Auguſtus, vntill that he were confirmed and crowned by the Pope, as it is obſerued vnto this day.

The originall of the order of the chuſing of the Emperours, ordained by Pope Gregorie the fift.

This decree and law (as moſt authors write) was made in the yeere, one thouſand and two: which cannot be ſo, for all agree, that Pope GREGORIE the fift which made the ſame, died in the yeere, nine hundred ninetie and ſeuen: but this contrarietie is eaſily ſalued, for the Emperor OTHO died in the yeere, one thouſand and two, or three; and ſo in that yeere, or the next, that law was put in execution, notwithſtanding that it was made ſome time before, and therefore they ſay that it was made that yeere: And thus they are excuſed, which attribute this order and forme of election to Pope SYLVESTER, which ſucceeded Pope GREGORIE, who indeed was the man which made the ſame. And hee further ordained, that the election ſhould bee made in the citie of Frankford, and that hee which was choſen, ſhould come to the citie of Aken to bee crowned King of the Romanes. And the Emperour OTHO ordained certaine preheminences and offices, which each of theſe Electors ſhould hold in the Emperors houſe and court; as one to beare his Sword, another to be his Cupbearer, with ſuch like, which concerne not our hiſtorie.

This being ended and concluded in this manner; ſome authors write, that the Emperour went into Germany, to ſet an order in the affaires of the Empire, where this election before recited was approoued & ratified: others make no mention of this his going, but rather report, that he ſpent the reſt of his time in Rome. Howſoeuer it was, after the death of Pope GREGORIE (which was when he had been Pope two yeeres and halfe) in his place was choſen one GILBERT, a more excellent man for wit and learning, then any in his time was to be found: but he abuſed and ill employed the ſame; for he was a great Necromancer and enchaunter, and gaue himſelf to bargaining with the diuell, and to other vnlawfull Artes: he was a French-man born, and was called SYLVESTER, and had been the Emperours Schoole-maſter, whom moſt authors affirme, to haue learned Magicke in the citie of Seuill in Spaine: which notwithſtanding that it was in the power of Infidels, yet the Artes and Philoſophie did floriſh there.

Pope Sylueſter a Necromancer.

This people held the chaire foure yeeres, in which time the Emperour came againe to Rome (or had not gone foorth of it) and very effectually applied himſelf to the good gouernment of the Empire, puniſhing and reforming the abuſes committed by ſundrie, through the ſmall authority and worth of former Popes, and the tyrannies and factions which had beene in Rome, all which was done by the Popes consent, as by him which had been the Emperours Schoolemaster; and was placed there by his authority. The Emperour (as it is written of him) was a man of great vnderstanding, and of a very good condition: But the Romanes, who now were much discontented with the forme set downe, for choosing the Emperour, wherein they had no voice or authoritie, either to chuse or to be chosen; it being the chiefe seate and head of the Empire; and being also extreamely grieued, to see that OTHO did so absolutely command in Rome and in Italie, and made so long abode there: first they began to murmure thereat, and afterwards secretly to conspire, and to practice his death; and in the end their enuie encreasing, their audaciousnes and contempt likewise encreased: whereupon, one day when the Emperour suspected no such matter, and the people which he then had with him in the Citie being but onely Courtiers, the Romanes arose with a great tumult, and putting themselues in Armes, slew many of the Germanes: and then went to the Palace where the Emperor was, and being vnable to enter at their first approach (for that his guard and Gentlemen which repaired thither defended the same) they compassed the house, in such sort as the Emperour had been either presently taken, or slaine; but that one HVGH (who was his Lieutenant, and gouerned a great part of the Emperors countries in Italie, with the title of Marquesse, and was well beloued amongst the Romanes) came to a parley with them, desiring some treaties of peace and agreement: and with him ioyned HENRY Duke of Bauiere, to whom they also gaue eare; which restrained the furie and rage of the people: and holding them thus in talke, a meane was found whereby the Emperour (changing his habit) gat forth of the Citie, not being discouered, and went to the place where his forces lay (and the Pope did the like) whither repaired to him all those which fled from the furie: and so for that time he escaped death. But although that he was delinered from this publike treason, yet he could not free himselfe from that which was secret: for within short space after, being busie in gathering his forces together (with an intent (as some say) to haue gone into Germany, and as others say, against Rome) he was poisoned (as some write) by the wife of CRESCENTIVS the tyrant before named (whom he commanded to be hanged in Rome) with whom, as she was the faireſt woman of her time, they say, that the Emperor being in Rome had secret conuersation; and that she fayning to be greatly in loue, poysoned him in a paire of Gloues, which she sent him excellently perfumed: whereof within three or foure daies after, he died, the poyson working slowly and leisurely.

The Romanes made an insurrection against the Emperour & would haue slain him.

The death of the Emperour Otho by poyson Anno 1002.

Other Authors beleeue not this, but that he was poysoned by others; yet they all agree that he died of poyson, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand and two; when he had raigned eighteen yeers compleat, and liued only nine and twenty and a halfe, leauing no sonne to succeede him: which some affirm was the cause why he procured Pope GREGORIE to ordaine that manner of choosing the Emperour, as I haue already described: And they say moreouer that he was married with the king of Arragons daughter, whose name was MARY, a woman not so carefull for the preseruation of the honour and honesty of her person, as shee ought to haue beene.

This Prince is accounted amongst the good Emperors, for his many vertues, and for that he ruled the Empire with iustice, and vprightly. Before his death there appeared great signes in the firmament, as Comets, which continued many daies; and the most notable was, that one day in the morning about nine of the clock, there appeared in the element a great flaming fire, like to a burning torch, which continued a great while; and the light being vanished, there appeared in the same place the likenes of a Serpent. The body of the Emperour was carried by HENRY Duke of Bauiere, and the other great Lords, into Germany, and buried in the Citie of Aken. A little before his death Pope SYLVESTER died in Rome, whither it seemeth that he was returned, who died through Gods great goodnes (as it is written) very penitent for his sinnes; and in his place was chosen IOHN the 19, who dying within foure moneths after without doing ought worth the writing, another IOHN succeeded him, which was IOHN the 20, of whom we will hereafter make mention.

The Emperor Otho buried in Aken.

During the raigne of OTHO; in Constantinople raigned BASILIVS and CONSTANTINE, brethren; but (as I said) BASILIVS was the more valiant, and the man by whose counsell and direction, all actions were worthily and happily atchieued in the wars: for he inlarged that Empire both in Asia and Europe, and obtained many great victories. In the beginning of their raigne (as is before declared) they came into Italie, and ouerthrew OTHO the Second: after this, their quarrels were with tirants, the first was with a Captain called SCLERVS a very valiant valiant man, and of great power, who was their Lieutenant in Syria and in Phenicia; who rebelling, made himselfe to be called Emperour: this was a very dangerous warre, but in the end he was ouerthrowne, and escaped by flight to Babylon: but afterwards (many things happening in the meane time) hee was reduced to their seruice. The second was with PHOCAS, another Captaine of no lesse renowne and valour then SCLERVS, who would also haue been Emperour, and to that effect had leuied so great an armie, that hee doubted not to fight a battaile with BASILIVS, wherein he was slaine, and therewith ended his life and tiranny; and so atchieued BASILIVS these two great exploits: after which ensued the warre which hee had begun with SAMVEL, King of the Bulgarians; from whom, the lands of the Empire had receiued much harme by fire and sword, in the time of the warres with the Tirants aforesaid; of whom BASILIVS was sufficiently reuenged in many battailes, as hereafter shall bee related when time shall serue: the Greeke Emperours also held the greatest part of Pulia and Calabria; for the said BASILIVS and CONSTANTINE recouered the same, when they ouerthrew OTHO the second in Italy; and they sent some thither, with the titles of Gouernours and Captaines, who were calle Caliſti, as in auntient time were the Exarchi: yet Sicilia was in a manner wholly possessed by the Infidels of Africa.

THE ARGVMENT.

OTho being dead, the Germane Princes Electors, according to their authority chose and crowned Henry Duke of Bauiere (Cousin Germane to the deceased Otho) Emperour. This Prince, in the beginning of his raigne, was much troubled, by reason of certaine rebels. He warred against Robert King of France, and leuied a power against the Duke of Bohemia which rebelled: in both which attempts, he obtained honourable victories. He made the King of Hungarie (who desired his sister in marriage) to be baptized; and went into Italie, whereto he had a great desire; and marching with an Army against the Infidels, which held many Townes in Italie, chiefly in Pulia, he subdued them. Returning into Germany, he inuited Pope Benedict to come to visit him; and the Pope coming thither, he was receiued with exceeding great honour. He liued with his wife in continuall chastitie, and left her as good a maide as he found her; and so falling sick of an extreame infirmity, hauing performed all things appertaining to a good Christian, he departed out of this life; but he first intreated the Princes Electors, to make choice of a good Emperour. 1002

IT cannot be denied, but that the three OTHOE's, the Father, the Sonne, and the Nephew, of whom but euen now we left to discourse, were very valiant and worthie Princes; and which repaired the credit and reputation of the Empire, very much torne and decayed; and for such are commended and recorded by Historiographers. OTHO then dying in Italie (as I haue declared) after that the Germane Princes and people were returned into their Countrie, with the Emperours dead bodie, and had buried the same, with such solemnity as thereto appertained: the afore named Princes, that were made Princes Electors (which were the Archbishoppes of Mentz, Colayn, and Trenter;

the Duke of Saxony, the Marqueſſe of Brandenburgh, and the Count Palatine of the Rhine) purpoſing to ſhew their Authority, and to chooſe an Emperour, met together in the Citie of Frankford; where knowing the many vertues and merits of HENRY Duke of Bauiere, they choſe him for King of the Romanes, and future Emperour AVGVSTVS; and hee was anoynted in Aken by the Archbiſhop of Mentz, which was in a manner by the common conſent of them all, excepting HERBERT Archbiſhoppe of Coleyn, who was of a contrary faction.

This HENRY was couſin german to OTHO, whom he ſucceeded in the Empire, and Nephew to HENRY Duke of Bauiere, Brother to OTHO the firſt (yet ſecond of that name) who by the ſame OTHO was made Duke of Bauiere, as in his life we haue ſpecified; and was the ſecond of the Emperors ſo called: yet the Italian writers ſay, that he was the firſt, for they doe not reckon the other HENRY, Duke of Saxony, for Emperor (whoſe life we haue before written, who was Father to OTHO the firſt) for that he came not into Italie, neither was crowned there by the Pope. The election of the new Emperor was commended and approued by all thoſe which deſired the good of the Common-wealth, for that he was a good man: yet there were ſome ambitious, and vnquiet Princes, which rebelling, took Armes againſt him; but he ſhewing his power and valour, in ſhort ſpace tamed and brought them to his obedience: who they were which thus rebelled againſt the Emperour HENRY, I could neuer reade, for writers doe not ſpecifie the ſame.

Henry the ſecond choſen Emperor.

This HENRY being confirmed and aſſured in his ſeate, deſired to come into Italy: but hee could not bring it to paſſe, vntill the eleuenth yeare of his raigne, by reaſon of ſuch warrs as happened. Firſt, ſome Authors write, that there preſently grew warres betweene him, and ROBERT King of France, who (by the report of all writers) was alſo an excellent Prince, although the ſon of HVGH CAPET, which vſurped thoſe Kingdomes: for what cauſe thoſe two good Princes fell at variance I finde not written: but thoſe which make mention thereof, ſay, that HENRY had the victorie in this warre; and that afterwards they came to an agreement: which being ended, there followed a farre more dangerous warre than the former: which was againſt BODISLAVS D. of Bohemia; who being of great power & ayded by the Slauons, the Polacres, Moranians and other nations, rebelled againſt the Empire; and the Emperour with a great power reſolutely marching againſt him, the warres grew to bee very cruell; and ſome battailes were fought, wherein BODISLAVS was ouerthrowne: but not diſmayed therewith, perſiſting in his rebellion, he reinforced his armie, and leuied the greateſt power hee was able, and againe gaue the Emperour battaile; which, through the valour and courage of the Captaines and Souldiers of either ſide, was very doubtfull and terrible, but the Emperour HENRY with much difficultie obtained the victorie; and followed the ſame in ſuch manner as BODISLAVS was conſtrained humbly to craue pardon, and ſue for peace: which was granted vpon very hard and heauy conditions; and ſo hee was ſubdued, and made ſubiect to the Empire, together with his Confederates.

Bodiſlaus Duke of Bohemia, ouerthrown by the Emperor.

This enterpriſe being ended, and hee free from warre, in the meane time that hee made preparation for his going into Italy, (which hee greatly deſired) hee applied himſelfe to matters of peace and good gouernment, doing iuſtice to all men indifferently; and builded and enriched many Churches and Monaſteries; and honored and aduanc't Biſhops, Monks, Prieſts, Friars, and other ſuch like religious people. In thoſe dayes (being importuned, and in a manner compelled by the great Princes of the Empire, wholly againſt his will) hee married the daughter of the Count Palatine of Rhine, called AMIGYNDA, a religious Lady: with whom (vndiſcouered and vnknowne to any, vntill his death) he liued moſt chaſtely, both of them obſeruing voluntary virginity, without hauing any carnall knowledge the one of the other; which is one of the moſt rare things that I euer read, of any King or Emperour.

Voluntary chaſtity obſerued by the Emperor & the Empreſſe.

This Emperor had alſo a ſiſter called GISELA, which (as they write) was the faireſt woman of her time, whom STEPHEN, Duke and Lord of Hungarie, deſiring to haue to wife, he could not obtaine his ſute, except hee would firſt become a Chriſtian, and be baptized (for although that in that Kingdome were many Chriſtians, yet the Princes were Infidels) whereto STEPHEN yeelded, and became ſo deuout, that he is accounted amongſt the Saints: and the Emperour gaue him his Siſter, and with her the title of King, and ſo he was the firſt that was called King of Hungary. Some write that this GISELA was Neece and not Siſter to the Emperour. In theſe accidents before related, HENRY ſpent ten yeeres of his raigne, and and then reſolued to leuie a great Armie to go into Italy, wherein had paſſed ſome great matters: among which, MOLOCHVS, Gouerner of Pulia and Calabria for the Emperor of Conſtantinople, and with him WILLIAM, and his other brothers, ſonnes to the Duke of Normandy (a Prince and great Lord in France, who at that time was in Italy with great forces, whither they came about ſome certain enterpriſes) joyned their forces together, and agreed with the Duke of Salerno and other Princes, to expell the Infidels of Africa out of the Ile of Sicilia where they inhabited; which they did with ſuch force and courage, that within leſſe than two yeers they recouered the whole Iland: whereof (according to the agreement) certain Cities and Towns were to haue bin giuen to the ſaid WILLIAM, and to the other Dukes; but MOLOCHVS ſatisfying the debt with part of the prey and booty which they had taken, of all the reſt would part with nothing, but put garriſons into all the Towns, to hould the ſame for his Lord the Emperor. WILLIAM and the reſt, being diſcontent heerwith, came into Italie, where they tooke by force ſuch Cities as were vnder MOLOCHVS gouernment: and MOLOCHVS coming out of Sicilia to make head againſt him, they joyned battell; and WILLIAM, obtaining the victory, became Lord of the moſt part of Pulia and Calabria: where dying, his brother DROGVS ſucceeded; and afterward, through ſundry accidents, his of-ſpring becam Lords of thoſe Prouinces, and in proceſſe of time of Sicilia alſo for a long time after (firſt with the title of Dukes, and afterwards of Kings of Sicilia) and in the end of both the Sicilies, which are Sicilia and Naples, as in time ſhall be remembred in our Hiſtory. Of the time when this WILLIAM and the Normans came into Italy, Authors differ: but ſo farre as I can conjecture by the true computation of times, it hapned at ſuch time as I haue ſet down. This being paſt, Pope SERGIVS died in Rome, and BENEDICT the Eighth ſucceeded him: yet BLONDVS cals him STEPHEN, which is contrary to the opinion of all other Hiſtoriographers; ſo as I imagine it was through the errour of the Writer: for, in that time there was not any Pope that was called after that name.

In the time of this BENEDICT, the Emperor HENRY prepared for his comming into Italie, and came very mighty: and by the way viſiting Milan, and the other Imperiall Cities, he came to Rome, where by Pope BENEDICT he was moſt ſolemnly receiued, and afterward crowned with exceeding feaſting and magnificence; where making his abode ſome few daies ſpace, he marched thence with his Armie againſt the Infidels, which through the aid and permiſſion of the Greeks (to vſe their ſeruice againſt the Normans) came into Italie, and had beſieged the City of Capua: with whom the Emperor fought, and, ouerthrowing them, forc't them to abandon the Country.

The Emperor Henry's coming into Italie.

After this, he went againſt SVBAGENVS, Generall for the Emperor BASILIVS, for that he had ſupported the Infidels in Pulia; and, making cruell warre againſt him, diſpoſſeſſed him of many Towns: and in the end laying ſiege (which laſted foure moneths) to the City of Treya which was but newly erected and ennobled, he took it by force; ſo as, expelling the Infidels, and taming the Greeks, leauing them ſome part of Calabria to inhabit, and in part fauouring the Normans, as thoſe which had ſhewed themſelues his obedient and dutifull ſeruants, hee left to them Pulia, whereof they were already poſſeſſed; and, returning to Rome, ſtaied there certain daies, and thence went into Germanie with great honor; and by the way viſiting Milan and other Towns, was receiued in Germany with great joy and ſolemnity: and ſo, his dominions being in peace, he ſpent his time in miniſtring juſtice, and in well gouerning his Empire. As the Emperor HENRY buſied himſelf in thoſe actions before ſpecified, and had raigned two and twenty yeers (ſome ſay, two yeers leſſe; yet PLATINA and BLONDVS write, that hee raigned but eight yeers, wherein they are much deceiued: but I think for certain, that, as they were Italians, ſo they reckon his Raign but from the time that hee was crowned in Rome, which was in the twelfth yeer thereof; and ſo cometh their account to agree with the reſt of the Authors: whereof let the Reader be well aduiſed, as well in this, as in what ſhall be ſaid heerafter) at the end of this time he was taken with a greeuous ſickneſs; wherewith ſeeing himſelf oppreſſed, he commanded ſuch of the Princes Electors as might come in ſo ſhort ſpace, to be ſent for: who being comn, hee counſelled them, that after his deceaſe they ſhould chuſe the valiant Prince CONRADE, Emperor; who was one of the Dukes of Suenia, others ſay of Francconia: the cauſe whereof may be, that he came of both houſes; and ſo, after the German manner, was called by both names, as at this day the Dukes of Bauiere are called Count Palatines of Rhine. Hee nominated this man vnto them, for that he thought hee was deſirous of the Empire; and within fewe daies after died, viz. in the yeer of our Lord one thouſand foure and twenty, leauing his wife as good a virgin as she came to him. It is written that she being accused of adultery, shewed her innocencie, by going barefooted vpon certaine places of fiery hot yron; and that the Emperor became very penitent for permitting her to expose herselfe to such danger, being so chaste and vertuous a woman.

The death of Basilius Emperor of Constantinople.

In a manner about this time died BASILIVS Emperor of Constantinople: I say in a manner, for that in this place, it is a hard matter to reconcile the times, by reason of the incertaintie and varietie among writers. BASILIVS when hee died was seuentie and two yeeres old, and had raigned two and fiftie, in most matters, in great prosperitie, at least in Armes, as well against the Bulgarians, whom he compelled to pay him tribute, as against the Infidels; and dying left his Empire to his brother CONSTANTINE, who raigned three yeeres, and gouerned the same negligently and viciously: and he before his decease, ordained and left a great and valiant personage, called ROMANVS ARGIROPHILVS, for Emperour; whom he first married to his daughter.

This ROMANVS in the beginning, shewed himselfe to be an excellent and valiant Prince: but being afterwards ouerthrowne by the Infidels in Asia, he altering his condition, became couetous, and gaue himselfe ouer to many other vices; for which cause hee grew to be so much hated, that hauing raigned but fiue yeeres, his owne wife ZOE practised his death, by the hands of one MICHAEL PAPHLAGONVS, with whom she liued in adulterie; and afterwards married him, being a man very well conditioned; who by her meanes had the Empire, which he valiantly and manfully defended the space of seauen yeres, in the warres which he held with the Infidels in Asia, in Soria defending the frontires of Phenicia.

THE ARGVMENT.

CONRADE the second was chosen Emperour accordingly as the Emperour Henry before his death had ordained, and thereto had perswaded the Princes Electours; yet notwithstanding, his election was not without some contradiction and difficultie. Being in possession of the Empire, he was to prouide for many matters, and to subdue many Rebels, which rebelled through the long vacation of the Imperiall seate, which was two yeeres without any Souereigne. But all these rebellions and tumults of warre were pacified without shedding any drop of blood, or drawing of sword; for he subdued them all through his humanitie and courtesie: these warres hindred him three yeeres. This being done, he came into Italie with a verie great Armie, and tooke Milan: which was a more rebellious Citie, then any of the rest; and comming to Rome was crowned by Pope Iohn the one and twentith. Afterwards vnderstanding of certaine tumults in Germany, hee speedily returned: and that enterprise prise being ended, he came againe into Italie, where many Cities had reuolted: but inflicting terrible punishments vpon the malefactors, he came at length to Rome, to relieue the Pope against such as molested him; and hauing reformed all matters in Italie, he returned into Germany: where being assailed by an infirmitie, hee died, hauing raigned Emperour ten yeeres.

THE Princes Electors of the Empire being assembled, to choose a successor to the Emperor HENRY (whose History we haue now written) notwithstanding that he aduised them to make choice of CONRADE, yet they could not so easily agree, but that the difference continued betweene them the space of two yeeres, not being able to resolue, who should, or ought to be Emperour, whereof many inconueniences and disorders ensued, and many Cities and Townes in Italie, and some Princes in Germany, attempted to set themselues at libertie, and to shake off the Imperiall yoake: wherewith the new Emperor Elect was afterwards greatly troubled. At the end of this time, the aforesaid CONRADE was chosen & crowned Emperor, as HENRY had willed; yet he was in som sort contradicted, particularly by CONON one of the Dukes of Bauiere, and Vncle to the late Emperour HENRY; who would haue been Emperor.

This Emperor CONRADE was a singular good man at armes, and had been Generall in the warres for the Emperor HENRY. Here authors doe vary, and contend about the matter, viz. Whether, that he were of the Dukes of Sueuia, or of Franconia, and spend many speeches about prouing their opinions; but I will auoide this trauell, notwithstanding that it seemeth to be most certaine, that hee was of the house of Suenia, or (as I said aboue) was peraduenture descended from both the houses, and after the Germane manner, enioyed both titles, as at this day is vsed. But let it be, as it shall please the reader. He was chosen as a man which best deserued the same; which hee afterwards very well verefied and made manifest. As soone as hee was inuested, he wrote his letters to all parts, procuring peace and friendship with all the Kings and princes which desired it, and commanded his subiects duely to obserue the same: but the two yeeres vacation had bred such a custome of libertie, as they rebelled against him. The first was BODISLAVS Duke of Austria, whom HENRY had subdued, and made tributarie to the Empire; who (taking vpon him the title of King) denied both his vassalage and tribute: against whom CONRADE leuied an Armie, purposing to haue gone against him in person; but at the same time BODISLAVS died and left two sonnes, the one called OTHO, and the other MISICVS. MISICVS was the elder brother, and remained absolute Lord, and imitating his father, persisted in his rebellion against the Emperor, and expelled his brother OTHO, because he would not ioyne with him in the action; and this OTHO departed presently to the Emperor, who entertained him well, but was so much displeased with his brother MISICVS his presumption, as he sent the same OTHO with part of his Armie to begin the warre: and within few daies, he himselfe followed with the rest, and entred the countrie with such power, that MISICVS durst not abide his comming, but went into Bohemia, to craue ayde of WALDERICVS Duke and Lord thereof, who was also one of those which rebelled against the new Emperor.

The loyaltie of the Emperor Conrade.

WALDERICVS hauing entertained and assured him; in lieu of ayding him, sent to treat secretly with the Emperor, with an intent to haue deliuered him into his hands, thinking by this meane to haue comn to the better composition. But the Emperor disdaining to circumuent his enemy by Treason, was so much displeased with WALDERICVS for his treacherie, as besides that he would not accept his offer, he shewed the greatnesse of his generous and noble disposition, by sending to MISICVS, secretly aduising him to come to his obedience, or to seeke relieefe some where else; for in Bohemia he had no securitie. MISICVS vnderstanding what passed, and well considering the Emperors bountie, went out of Bohemia; and comming into his countrie, left the Ensignes and title of King, which his father and he had vsurped, and with a small traine, came and yeelded himselfe into the Emperors power, humbly submitting himselfe, more in regard of his kinde and gentle admonition and aduice, then for feare of his force: and the Emperor pardoned him, and granted him peace vpon the same conditions as before.

Following the example of MISICVS, the Duke of Poland and all the rest which had taken Armes, and rebelled, came to the Emperors seruice and obedience; amongst which were STEPHEN King of Hungary, and WALDERICVS Duke of Bohemia, notwithstanding that they first failed not to try the vtmost of what they were able to doe by Armes. In all which, CONRADE spent the first three yeeres of his raigne, and could not (accordingly as he desired) goe into Italie to be crowned; where he had much to doe, by reason of the great leagues and confederacies made against him, that they might free themselues from the imperiall yoake and subiection.

Conrade came into Italy.

This time being expired, and hauing taken order for the estate of Germany, he leuied the greatest Army he could, and came into Italie; but he first nominated his sonne HENRY, King of the Romanes: and forasmuch as Milan, and all the Townes in that quarter, which in former time were wont to be most seruiceable and in greatest subiection, were now in Armes, and rebelled, he therefore marched directly thither, and so it behoued him to doe: for Pope GREGORIE the fift (in the rule and Canon which he made in the time of OTHO the Third, concerning the Princes Electors, and the choosing of the Emperor) instituted and ordained, that he which was chosen, besides the golden Crowne which he should receiue of the Pope, should be crowned with two other Crownes; the one of straw in Monza, a Citie in Lombardie; and the other of Iron, in the Citie of Milan; which (of set purpose) I haue reserued to be written in this place, and doe here finde it written by those Authors which I follow. Wherefore, for the full accomplishment hereof (although I haue not read that any his predecessors had done the like) the Emperor, battering and forcing such townes as would not receiue him, came to Milan, which then was more obstinate and rebellious then any other: and doing much harme in the territorie thereof, he narrowly begirt the citie with a siege, with a resolution to haue ruinated and burnt the same, for the great displeasure which he had conceiued against it; and for an example to the rest. Which he might and had easily performed, and that in short space (as many writers affirme) but that (I know not vpon what occasion) he raised his siege and went towards Rome (no man daring to make head against him) where Pope IOHN the one and twentith most solemnly receiued him, and with the like solemnitie crowned him with the Crown of gold: at which coronation (as affirme some authors which I follow) was KANVTVS King of England in pilgrimage, with whose daughter, they say, that HENRY, sonne to this Emperour CONRADE, was before this time married. And there was also RODVLPH, King of Burgundie, and Vncle to GISELA the Empresse, who was descended from CHARLES the Great; and being depriued of his estate of Burgundie, by ROBERT brother to the French king, came to implore the Emperors aide and succours.

CONRADE being in Rome, there arose a great tumult betweene his traine, and the citizens; in so much that they all took Armes and fought a whole day together, and many were slaine of either side, but the Imperialists had the better; and the Emperour in the best manner he could, pacified this ryot: and staying but a short space after this in Rome, he departed thence and out of Italy also towards Germany; for his sonne-in-law ERNESTVS Duke of Sueuia, son to the Empresse GESILA, by her first husband Duke of Sueuia, rebelled, and made warre, seeing him possessed in Italy. But he being come into Germany. ERNESTVS, being of no sufficient power long to defend himself, was soone ouerthrowne, and fled to the Mountaines: where he was afterwards taken and slaine by the Emperors souldiers, and his estate was giuen to his brother, whose name was HARMAN. At this his comming (so farre as I can gather, comparing the times with the accidents) CONRADE gat by his Captaines the countrie of Burgundie, and made it subiect to the Empire, which one hundred and odde yeeres had been subiect to the house of France (but yet there had been very mightie Kings and Dukes therein) which was effected by the will and testament of RODVLPH, who was present at the Emperors coronation in Rome: and hee bequeathed it to the Emperors son HENRY, which could not be done without war and bloudshed; for the King of France of the one part, and a certaine mightie Earle of another, pretended right thereto, and were possessed of great part of the countrie; but to be short (for herein much might be said) at this time the supreme dignitie of Burgundie was transported to the Empire: yet ROBERT GAGVIN in the end of his fift booke, saith, that Burgundie was then diuided into two pars, the one remaining subiect to the French, and the other to the Empire.

The diuision of Burgundie into the Duchy and the Countie.

The

The Emperor CONRADE hauing ended these things so happily for his profit, after that he had liued quietly some yeers in Germany, without any accident worthy writing (by reason of which, the History of his time is more brief than of other Emperors) he resolued to come the second time into Italie: for at the first, by reason of the small time that he made his abode there, he could not settle things in such order as hee desired; and also for that he vnderstood that the Italians sought aid and relief from the Slauons and the Hungars, against him, with a determination not to yeeld him any obedience. So as, hauing all things in a readinesse for his journey, as speedily as he could he departed, and came with greater expedition and power than anie man thought of: and in his journey ruinating some Towns, and punishing some offenders, which thought to haue made head against him, he came to Milan, which presently yeelded; where he punished the guilty for former offenses, and remained some daies therein.

Conrade's second coming into Italie.

Departing from thence, he took all the Cities in that Territory; and then went to Rome to see the Pope, and to relieue him against such as disobeyed him (which now, as I conjecture, was BENEDICT the Ninth, IOHN the one and twentith being dead, who was Pope eleuen yeers). And from thence with great power he trauelled ouer all Italy, visiting all the lands belonging to the Church of Rome and to the Empire, not finding any resistance whatsoeuer: yet in Pulia and in Calabria the warres were still on foot between the Grecians and the Normans.

In this manner returned CONRADE into Germany triumphing and mighty, whose History I haue written very briefly; for, so do Authors handle the same: and thinking now to repose himself after his former toils (which for the space of fifteen yeers that he was Emperor he had endured) he was taken with an infirmity, whereof within fewe daies hee died, in the yeer of our Lord one thousand and fortie; some adde thereto three yeers. Hee left behinde him one sonne whose name was HENRY; who, as I will presently tell you, succeeded him in the Empire.

The death of the Emperor Conrade.

In the time of the Emperor CONRADE, MICHAEL PAPHLAGONVS (as is already said) raigned Emperor of Constantinople, for that ZOE took him for her husband; with whom she had liued euer since the decease of ARGIROPHILVS her first husband; and hee ruled the Empire seuen yeers. After his decease shee took another husband of the same name, called MICHAEL CALAFATES; and, being accustomed to that trade, she made him Emperor: but, for that he liued with her but foure moneths, shee remained a widow. By reason whereof, the same ZOE, together with her sister THEODORA (which were the Emperor CONSTANTINE's daughters) gouerned the Empire three moneths: and as shee was both inconstant and incontinent, so shee resolued once again to haue a husband; and vpon this occasion banished her sister, and married a man whose name was CONSTANTINVS MONACVS, for that he came of the line of the Emperors; who neuertheless was a wicked and euill Emperor: which was the occasion that the Empire began to decline, and to be of small account. At this time died the Emperor CONRADE. What end this Emperor CONSTANTINVS MONACVS made, more shall be said hereafter.

THE ARGVMENT.

IN the beginning of this Emperors Raign there were some troubles, for that he was not chosen according to order: nevertheless, being held for such, he warred upon the Duke of Bohemia, which denied him tribute; and, taking him prisoner, constrained him to become a good and obedient subiect. He afterwardi took Armi against the Hungars, as well for that they had given aid to the Bohemians, as for committing some unlawfull mouations; and gaue them a very great ouerthrow: and their King being dead (who knew not how to make benefit of the Emperors clemency) hee restored Peter to the Crown; and afterwards subdued the Duke of Berwin, which denied him obedience. He came into Italie; where he reformed the estate of the Church, which was fan out of order, and was crowned in Rome; and afterwards, bending his forces against the Infidels, he drave them out of Italy, and being come into Germany, he sent a Pope to Rome (having accepted the offers made vnto him by the Cardinals concerning the Popes election) who being received by the Cardinall Vbaldo, a Pope this Pope, being against the Duke of Normandy, being in a battell taken prisoner, was the very same day set at liberty; and obeyed by the victor. This Emperor ouce again made war against the Hungars, for pursuing Peter their King to death: and after many accidents chanced in agreement with them: in which time there were so many calamities and scourges sent from God into the world, that the Emperor falling sicke, died of sorrow when he had held the Empire 17 yeers.

IT cannot be denied, after that the Empire was wholly transported to the Germanes in the person of OTHO, but that the Emperours thereof defended and gouerned the same very valiantly, as by the History appeareth; principally, the OTHONS and the HENRIES, as will appear by the two of whom we are to treat. This HENRY, being the son of CONRADE, was a good Emperor, and in condition no lesse vertuous than his father, or any of the HENRIES, or other his Predecessors; neither in Arms of lesse valour and courage. We haue told you before, how that his father in his liue time had made him King of the Romanes, which was a policy that the Emperors haue euer since vsed, to procure the Empire for their sons; and by that meanes to leaue the same to them by election, seeing they could not do it by inheritance: which in truth seems to be but a deuice to frustrate and preuent the law and decree made and established by the Emperor OTHO the Third, and Pope GREGORY the Fift, concerning the place where, in what manner, and by whom, the Emperors (the Empire being void) should be chosen; and that it should not be inherited by succession, but by election: whereupon there grew some question & doubt about the matter; viz. Whether this HENRY should bee held for Emperor or no: for, the Princes of Germany held it for very inconuenient and vnfit, that his father should nominate him, and that it was a dangerous matter to introduce such a custome; for, this was a thing that ought to be done by the Princes Electors onely: but in the end (they acknowledging his good parts and deserts) he was confirmed and crowned Emperor, and generally obeyed for such, according to the accustomed manner: onely GRATISLAVS Duke of Bohemia, whom the Abbat WESPERGENSIS, BLONDVS, PLATINA, and OLDERICVS, call FRATISLAVS (a man of great power) rebelled against him, denying any superiority, or to pay him any tribute, which (as IOHN CVSPINIAN saith) was one hundred cowes, and fiue hundred Marks of siluer yeerly. Against whom, HENRY (as a new Emperor, of a great courage, and desirous to winne honour and reputation) raised a great Armie, and that sooner than he should haue done: for, they write, that he began his warre in the winter, and therefore failed of his expectation, and that through the vnseasonablenesse of the time, and the distemperature of the Countrie, in skirmishes and encounters he lost many of his men, which were taken and slain by the enemie; so as for that time hee had the worst, and was driuen to retire, without accomplishing what he had projected, and with losse of reputation: wherewith he was so much grieued and ashamed, that presently in the beginning of the next spring he returned to the warres of Bohemia with all the force he was able to make: and GRATISLAVS, growne proud of his late good successe, and through the new supplies which came to him out of Hungary, offred him battell; wherein (notwithstanding that both Armies fought courageously) in the end the Duke was ouerthrowne, and afterward taken flying: and the Emperor (shewing what compassion the other craued) granted him life, and pardoned the offense vpon security, that from thenceforth he should be a loyall subject; first gathering-in the arrerages of three yeers tribute which was behinde vnpaid, as COSMVS de Andrepragana recounteth in his Annals; whereby the Emperor wonne much honour. And presently after this, followed another warre against the Hungarians for the same occasion.

Henry the Third chosen & crowned Emperor.

The Emperor Henry's victory against the king of Hungary.

By the death of King STEPHEN, who was K. of Hungary, PETER came to the Crown: against whom, for some ill vsage, his subiects rebelled, and made a kinsman of his, King; whom the Abbat WESPERGENSIS cals VBO, and others call him ABA: and the Tyrant ABA being of greater power than the King, PETER was expelled his Country, and driuen to seek iustice and relief from the Emperor HENRY; who notwithstanding that hee was not well pleased with him for assisting the Duke of Bohemia against him, yet for that he had subdued them both, he as his soueraign Lord entertained him, seeing that to him it appertained to do iustice, and not to permit any tyranny in his time: and ABA or VBO beeing aduertised heerof, and hauing sent his Ambassadors to the Emperor to shew him the equity of his cause, and to desire his confirmation in the Kingdome, not contenting himself in that he had tyrannized Hungarie, entred Austria and Bauaria; and robbing and spoiling those Countries, carried great booty and prey out of those Quarters. This he did at such time as the Emperor held a Diet or Parliament in Colein; where the Princes of Germany were assembled: whereupon, by the generall consent of them all, the Emperor (accompanied with some of the Princes) with a great Armie departed from Colein towards Hungary, sending GRATISLAVS Duke of Bohemia before to begin the warre: which, ABA the Tyrant-king of Hungarie fearing, hee sent Ambassadors to meet the Emperor vpon the way, with all the booty and prey that they had gotten in Austria and Bauaria; intreating him for peace, promising to do what he should enjoyn him vnto, conditionally that he might not be deposed from that Kingdome: whereto the Emperor for that time yeelded and consented; moued thereto by a rumor spread abroad, that the Duke Lorrain, with the aid of France, was in Arms and rebelled; which was the occasion of the peace granted to the King of Hungary, to the end that the Emperor thereby might haue the better leasure and opportunity to follow the warres of Lorrain, which were so much doubted. But ABA made not the benefit of that peace, which a wise and a peacefull Prince would haue done: but hee intreated his subiects rather with greater pride and rigor than before, putting many of the chief of them to death: vpon which occasion the Emperor the next yeer following (with no lesse an Armie than the former, but with greater resolution) entred Hungarie; where ABA already attended his his comming with his whole power; and with such other aide and assistance as he could get; which was such and so great, that assuring himselfe to preuaile against the Emperours forces, he offered him battaile; which was exceeding resolutely fought of either side, and was very bloodie and cruell: but the King in the end was ouerthrowne, and (as writeth HENRICVS MVCIVS) twenty and sixe thousand of his men were slaine: and of the Emperours side who had the victorie, three thousand: ABA escaping by flight, he was afterwards in a village (where he had hidden himselfe) found and slaine by his owne people: yet some say that he was taken and slaine by his competitor PETER. After this ouerthrow, all the whole Kingdome of Hungary sued to the Emperour for pardon, imputing all their former faults to their King; and hee gaue them a generall Pardon, and restored King PETER to his throne, first reconciling him to his subiects, and placed a Noble-man to bee in some sort assistant to him in the gouernment: But this King (as he was naturally cruell) agreed so ill with his subiects, as in the end he lost both his Kingdome and his life, as hereafter shall be specified.

Aba king of Hungary ouerthrowne in a battaile by Henry the Emperor, and slaine by his owne people.

In This warre being ended, as I haue related, the Emperor longed to come into Italie, aswel to be crowned, as to take away the schisme out of the Church: but first he resolued (for so was it requisite) to tame the pride of GODFREY Duke of Lorraine, who would neither obey nor acknowledge him, but rather vsurped some townes of his; which he had long dissembled, attending some fitter oportunitie, thinking that at length he would haue submitted himself to his seruice: but now holding it vnfit any longer to dissemble, calling a Diet or Counsell in the citie of Spire, without declaring his intention vntil that all the Princes were assembled, he then manifested the wrongs and contempts committed by the Duke of Lorraine, and by common consent it was concluded to make warre against him: whereupon the Emperor without any further delay, departed with such forces as he had alreadie leuied for that purpose, towards Lorraine; and made such haste, that the Duke (notwithstanding that hee was promised great aide and fauour both out of France and Germany) before that he could vnite those forces together, the Emperor had entred his countrie, and besieging him in a towne took him prisoner, and so ended that exploit: yet they write not in what forme the state remained. And so I aduertise the Reader, that in the order and time wherein these warres were, those which wrote the same doe much varie: I therefore haue chosen this which I haue set downe.

The Duke of Lorraine taken prisoner by the Emperor.

The Emperor hauing now ended and performed (so much to his honour) three such enterprises and warres, as these before mentioned, of Hungary, Bohemia, and Lorraine, about which he had spent six yeares, reinforcing his Armyes (wherein he staied some daies) he tooke his way directly towards Italy to be crowned, and to procure a reformation of abuses in the Church wherein was a schisme, such as before that time had neuer been, which was thus. The Emperor CONRADE being dead, and BENEDICT the ninth being Pope (as I said) the Emperour HENRY hauing then raigned more then foure yeeres; the Romanes which knew not how to liue without factions and tumults, rebelled against the Pope: the cause whereof, and in what manner it passed, I finde not written; but their boldnes was such, that they deposed him from the Papacie, alleaging that he neither was, neither ought to be Pope, and so they placed in his seate a Bishop, whose name was IOHN, who took part with them, and was called SYLVESTER the Third: And as PLATINA and BLONDVS report, was Pope but ninie and fortie daies, at the end whereof BENEDICT was restored by those of his faction: and he within six weekes after, as a coward (being a wicked man and of ill behauiour and condition) for feare to bee againe deposed, for a certaine summe of money before hand paid, compounded with the Archdeacon of Saint Iohn de Lateran, who was a mightie rich man in Rome, to renounce to him the Papacie; and did so, but afterwards recanting his bargaine, he challenged to be still Pope: and the Archdeacon with the title of BENEDICTS renunciation, assisted by his friends, was made Pope, and was called GREGORIE the sixt, his owne name being IOHN, alleaging that he held the Papacie by graunt, by renunciation, and also by election; and he enioyed the name and authoritie of Pope (as PLATINA saith) aboue two yeeres: BLONDVS and others say, but one yeere, seuen moneths and halfe: and some authors, as GILBERTVS, and IOHANNES DE COLVMNA, and ANTONINVS are of the same opinion, and write in their histories that he performed the office of a good Pope, and was valiant, administred iustice, maintained the Papall dignitie, and recouered much of the Church patrimonie, which others had vsurped: so as in time of this confusion, and of setting vp, and putting downe Popes (for there were at one time three which were so called, and had been so) and (as writeth GOTHIFREDVS VITERBIENSIS, an author of foure hundred yeeres antiquitie) they all three came to a composition composition, and diuided the Churchrents amongst them: whereof one of them dwelt hard by S. PETERS Church, another in S. MARIA MAIOR, and this BENEDICT in the palace at LATERAN. Things standing in this estate, the Emperour HENRY with many good men of warre entred Italy, and came to Rome; whither he called a Synode, and Councel to be held of all the Bishops in Italy, and of most parts of Christendome; which being assembled, together with the three Popes, they treated of them three: and (after many consultes and opinions) the Emperor and all the rest concluded, that these three should be held for no Popes, but be deposed, and that another should be chosen; considering the voluntarie renunciation made by BENEDICT, and other nullities and insufficiencies in the three elections: And this resolution was put in effect, and they were condemned, deprived, and banished the countrie: And by the same Councell, with the fauour of the Emperour, a Germane prelate, and Bishop of Bambargh was elected, and was called GVIDO the Second, whose name, as he was Pope, anointed and crowned the Emperor, after the accustomed manner, with great feasting and solemnitie.

The Emperor came into Italy.

After this coronation the Emperor departed from Rome towards Capua, in which the African Infidels had taken, in time of the warres made by the Normanes in those parts, and obtaining notable victories against them, draue them out of the countries: and setting the best order he could in all the rest, returned to Rome; and thence visiting Italy and Lombardy, returned into Germany, & was scarcely come thither when POPE CLEMENT the Second (whom he had chosen) died at Rome, when he had been Pope but 9 moneths; and that with suspicion of poyson by the practice of one SIDENA B. of Bauaria, who more by his force and through friendship then any right of election, got the Papacie, and was called DAMASVS the second: Onely BONAVS putteth another Pope between CLEMENT the Second and DAMASVS, whom he calleth STEPHEN, of whom no other author (that I haue seene) maketh any mention: but Ighesse that he is deceiued in the name, for this DAMASVS was first called STEPHEN: with those times the Popes were of so little worth, and the Church lands were so vsurped by tyrants, that they durst not attempt any thing, and therefore were accordingly disobeyed and lightly regarded. Returning to Pope DAMASVS, I say, that the Papacie which he obtained by force, he held and enioyed the same but three and twentie daies; and being dead, the Romanes neither would, nor durst make choice of a Pope, without the Emperours consent: for (as some write) Pope CLEMENT the Second had so ordained when he was (at his suite) chosen; and they did so, imagining that the Emperor would haue sent them word, that they should haue chosen him whom they should hold most worthie thereof.

Pope Clement the second crowned Henry the Third Emperor.

The newes of Pope CLEMENT's death, and of his successor DAMASVS, and the Ambassadours, came to the Emperor in a manner all at one instant: to the Ambassadours he gaue no such answere as they expected, but accepting their offer, chose the Bishop of Tulon a German whose name was BRVNVS, whom he nominated to be chosen Pope, and made him presently to depart towards Rome; which the said Bishop was constrained to accept, much against his will, and in a manner perforce. PLATINA and BLONDVS say, that from the time of his departure out of Germany, he made him to weare the papall habite: but a Monke whose name was ILDEBRAND meeting him vpon the way, perswaded him to put off that weede, seeing that yet he was not chosen; alleaging further, that the Emperor had no authoritie thereto: which perswasion so much preuailed with BRVNVS, that he went to Rome as a priuate man, repenting that he had entred so farre into the action. This was in the yeere of our Lord 1049.

Being come to Rome, the Cardinals, clergie, and people consulted about chusing a new Pope, but would not accept of BRVNVS, because the Emperour should not challenge to themselues any right of election: but this ILDEBRAND vsed such meanes, and gaue such counsel to the Cardinals, that by a generall consent BRVNVS was chosen, and called LEO the Ninth; when the Chaire had been voide six moneths. LEO being made Pope, GISVLPHVS Duke of the Normanes, being then Lord of Pulia and Calabria, made warre against him; and besieged the citie of Beneuent, which the Emperor HENRY the Second gaue to the Church of Rome: whereof when the Emperour was aduertised, besides the forces which the Pope had already leuied, hee sent him other; with which the Pope departed from Rome against GISVLPHVS: but GISVLPHVS being the better man of warre, and hauing already taken the citie of Beneuent, gathered his forces together and staied for him in the plaine fields; and the Pope more like a valiant Almaine, then an expert man at Armes, gaue him battaile, and was ouerthrowne and taken prisoner. So, as saith IOANNES DE COLVMNA, it might be said to him as CHRIST said to S. PETER; Put vp thy sword into the sheath: But being prisoner, GREGORIVS entertained him with great honour, and presently the same day set him at libertie, and gaue him companie and seruants fit to attend on him, wherewith he went to Rome, and they afterwards came to a composition between themselues. Herein is a great confusion among the Historiographers: for the Germanes write that this Pope went into Germanie to see the Emperor, and that he called a Synode or Councell in the Citie of Mentz, and that the Emperor came the second time into Italie: Others write nothing, either of the Popes going, or of the Emperors second comming; in the rest they all agree. LEO held the chaire fiue yeeres and a halfe, and when he was dead, one GEBEARDVS a Germane Bishop born in Bauiere, was chosen, and called VICTOR the Second; which they did to gratifie the Emperor: and presently without any delay, to the end hee should not be discontented, for that they had made choice of a Pope without his consent; the new Pope and Clergie sent ILDEBRAND to him, who performed his legacie in such sort, as the Emperor approued and confirmed what they had done.

Peter king of Hungary was taken by his subiects, and had his eyes put out.

Whilest these things passed in Italie, the subiects of PETER King of Hungary (whom the Emperor had placed in that Kingdome) rebelled against him; and sent into Poland for certaine great men of Hungary which liued there in exile, one of which was called ANDREVV, and another LEVENTA, who were their Captaines; and after other great matters (which I omit) they seised on their King, and putting out his eyes, caused him die in prison; and with the help of certaine Barbarians and Infidels which came to their aide, slew some Bishops: which when the Emperor vnderstood, he made great preparation for war against them, especially against ANDREVV, who tooke vpon him the name of King; and hauing built and rigged vp a great number of Barkes and Ships, the Emperor came downe the riuer Danubius, from Austria to Buda, and to other places, where this ANDREVV and the rest were; which voiage had ill successe, for his aduersaries gat certain excellent swimmers and diuers which would lie a long time vnder the water, and these in a night bouged the Emperors barkes, in such sort, as the greatest part of his munition and victual was lost; so as he was constrained to returne with his people in the best manner he could, without effecting any thing of worth. Afterwards he twice entred Hungary; in the first, notwithstanding that he went with great preparation of horse and foote, yet he obtained no notable victorie; and the third yeere he made peace with the Hungarians, ANDREVV remaining still their King, who acknowledged a certaine kinde of superioritie.

Calamities by Gods prouidence

This being ended, and it seeming a small time since that the Emperor began to repose himselfe; through the secret iudgement of God, great calamities ensued in many countries, as famine, cruell plagues, horrible earth-quakes, and other lamentable disasters: after which ensued the death of the Emperor; the end of whose raigne was, for the causes afore said, pitifull and sorrowfull. It is written, that for sorrow and griefe, to see so great afflictions and miseries happen in his time, he fell sick and died; leauing behinde him one sonne about about ten yeers old, called HENRY, whom before his death he made to be crowned king of the Romanes, the Electors consenting therto; and three daughters, which afterward were married to seuerall princes. He raigned seuenteene yeers, and died in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiftie seuen.

The death of the Emperor Henry the Second.

When the Turks began to grow mighty in Asia.

In Constantinople during the time of this Emperor HENRY (of whom we now treated) raigned CONSTANTINVS MONACHVS, by his marriage with the Empresse ZOE, as I said in the end of the Emperor CONRADE: This CONSTANTINE was a negligent and vicious Emperor, and a publike ill liuer. In his time began the Turks to be of great power in Asia, and did much harme in the territories of the Empire. This Emperor was also much troubled by some which rebelled against him; yet he at length subdued them all: and so betweene prosperity and aduersitie, he raigned thirteene yeers. In his time also the Empire did greatly decay, both in power and authority. One only good qualitie he had, which was, that he was an Almsgiuer, and a great relieuer of the poore; and made a great Hospitall for old men only, such as through their great age being decrepit, could not get their liuing. Both he and the Empresse died (in a manner) at one time; and both of the plague.

The husband and wife being dead, THEODORA, sister to ZOE, had the Empire, by the authoritie and sentence of the Senate, and people of Constantinople; and gouerned the same with such equitie, iustice and quietnesse, for the space of two yeers, that they sorrowed she had not liued much longer. Before her death, by the counsell of certaine Eunuches (by

(by whom she was much ruled) she made YSACIVS CONNENVS Generall of her forces, who was a valiant and wise Captaine. THEODORA being dead, a man of great age, called MICHAEL, was made Emperor: but proouing to be incapable and insufficient for the gouernment, which he had not ruled one whole yeere; by a generall consent he was deposed from the Empire, and YSACIVS CONNENVS (whom THEODORA had made her Captaine Generall) was chosen in his place; who raigned two yeeres; and although he made a good shew of himselfe, yet (considering his short time) he could not doe any notable exploit, and him succeeded CONSTANTINVS DVCA.

THE ARGVMENT.

HENry being yet a childe when his father died, and chosen and proclaimed Emperor; it behoued him for many yeers space to liue vnder the gouernment of his mother, who by the consent of all men took the charge of him, and the protection of the Empire; but afterwards, being comm to riper yeers, hee would no longer liue vnder her commands, but took the gouernment into his own hands. His first warlike enterprise, was against the Saxons; wherein hee behaued himself so gallantly (notwithstanding that he was but yong) that he brought them to his obedience: yet they afterwards rebelled, for that hee would not endure the insolency of the Pope and Court of Rome, which he little regarded. This second warre was farre more dangerous than the first (although he had the victory) and made him more disobedient to the Pope than before; whereupon he was solemnly excommunicated, and depriued of the title and dignity of the Empire, for that hee cald a Councell in Germany against Pope Gregory. Of which excommunication he could neuer be absolued, vntill that hee had three daies together comm barefooted to intreat the Pope for pardon, who met him at Vercelli. Whilest the Emperor was in this parley with the Pope, many Princes of Germany rebelling against him, made another Emperour, which was Rodulph Duke of Saxonie: with whom Henry coming to a battell, had no such victory as hee expected; but was again excommunicate, and depriued of the title of Emperor, which was giuen to Rodulph newly chosen: vpon this occasion, Henry being much incensed, chose another Pope called Clement, and made a schisme in the Papacy, which was the occasion of very great warre: but Henry, after the death of his competitor Rodulph, came into Italie, and besieged Rome; and entring it, was crowned by the hands of Pope Clement; the other Pope being retired into the Castle Saint Angelo: to whom great succours coming, Henry abandoned Rome, and with Pope Clement went into Germany; and Pope Gregory, accompanied with his crue of Cardinals, went to the City of Salerno, where hee ended his daies. At this time followed the enterprise of Ierusalem, and the rebellion of Henry's eldest son Conrade, because the Emperor sought to make his second son called also Henry, his successor: which being done, he also rebelled against his father; so as there were more than still wars betweene them, neither could there any meanes bee found to appease them, neither could this warre be brought to an end but through the death of the ould Emperor Henry; who hauing publiquely (but by constraint) renounced all his iurisdiction of the Empire vnto his sonne, and afterwards repenting, and seeking to recouer the same, could obtain no composition with him; and so for sorrow and grief falling sick, died, God suffering him to make a miserable end.

TRuly, the three Emperors called HENRIES, of whom wee haue treated, were very valiant and worthy Princes in Arms; as, the father of him of whom we now begin to write, and the other two before mentioned: but none of them can be compared to this Fourth, of whom wee are now to discourse. It is certain, that he was valiant and addicted to Arms, as being traind vp therin, and was one of the most excellent Princes that euer was; for, vnto this day it is not found written, that any Emperor came so often to blowes with his enemies, as he did: for, all Authors affirm, that he fought in ranged battels with ensignes displaied, threescore and two seuerall times, and for the most part had euer the victorie: to which number IVLIVS CÆSAR or MARCVS MARCELLVS neuer attained (which two in their time excelled all others).

The qualities of the Emperor Henry the Fourth.

This Emperor raigned fifty yeers. He was a man liberall, wel spoken, very wise; and had many other natural gifts and vertues: but (as saith this Author) he stained and blemished them all with his ambition, for hee would be Lord ouer all both spirituall and temporall, contemning the Canons and Decretals of the Church of Rome: which was the occasion, that in his later daies, he was disobeyed by those which ought him greatest obedience, which were his owne children. The Historie of his life cannot but be longer then ordinarie, for that it treateth of many great accidents which happened in the space of more then fiftie yeeres that he raigned. I say then, that when his father died, he was not fully ten yeeres old; but yet for his fathers worthinesse, and his mothers vertues, called YNES (an excellent & discreet woman) he was crowned and obeyed for Emperor and King of the Germanes, as his father in his life time had intituled him; and, by the consent of the greatest part of the Princes, his mother gouerned both his person and the Empire: And all that time she ruled very wisely and valiantly, as well in peace as in warre, against some Princes, which, for that she was a woman, and her sonne the Emperor so very a childe, rebelled against him. Into Italie she sent one GILBERT for Gouerner, who afterwards was the cause and motiue of great schisms and dissensions in the Church of Rome. Of those which rebelled, the first was a great Lord called FREDERICK of Gilbergh, and his brethren and kinsfolks, who were men of great power: but she took so good order with them, that she compelled them to sue for pardon, and to yeeld their obedience. The greatest trouble and difficulty that she had, was against RODVLPH Earle of Reinfelt; with whom in processe of time, HENRY had most cruell warre: who, by the aid of ROMOLDVS Archbishop of Constance, took the Emperors sister MAVD, and maried her; thinking by this title to becom Emperor: and the Empresse (to gratifie him, and to reduce him to her sons seruice) made him Duke of Suenia, which then was void through the death of OTHO who died without issue; which Dukedome was promised to a great Earle called BERTOLD: in recompense whereof, the Empresse gaue him Carinthia. And so she pacified the great troubles which then arose; and som other by force, with the aid and assistance of such as remained loyall Subjects. But in the end the yong Emperor growing to riper yeers, by the aduice of some which were of his Councell, disobeying his mother, sought to be free from her authority, being thereto perswaded chiefly by ANO (and, as others say, OTHO) Archbishop of Colein; who dealt so cunningly, that hee got him into his protection: and by the assistance of some others, hee assembling the Princes, alleaged that it was very vndecent and vnfit to be ruled by a woman, seeing the Emperor was of sufficient discretion and vnderstanding to do what was conuenient.

The Emperor being gotten out of the power and controulement of his mother, the Archbishop commanded in such sort, that all went to wrack: for, being bred vp in such liberty, he did what he listed, which in the end was the cause of his ruine; for, he became both licentious and presumptuous, fauouring some, and grieuing others: by reason whereof he was ill beloued of many; and gaue himself to hunting, and to such other sports as that age is chiefly delighted withall. His mother, seeing herself so little regarded, and that she could bear no more sway with him, went to Rome, where she liued and died in a Cloister of Nuns.

The death of pope Nicholas.

Germany standing in these tearms, in Italie a little before this time died Pope NICHOLAS the Second, when he had held that Chair foure yeers. This Pope recouered much of the Church-lands which were vsurped by sundry Captaines and Gouernours, which did make themselues tyrants. And he also gaue the title of Duke of Pulia and Calabria, to GVISCARD a Nora Normane being alreadie Lord of those prouinces, who made himself and his countries subiect and feudatorie to the Church of Rome. This Pope held a Councell, wherein he ordained that from thenceforth, the Cardinalls onely should chuse the Popes, thereby to auoide the factions and dissension which arose concerning the same; as it appeareth in the chapter In nomine Domini in the three and twentith distinction; which is obserued vnto this day. By this meane, the Deacons and Cardinals Priests attained to great authoritie and credit: for vntill then, they were not of any such account (although alreadie very much esteemed.)

The dignity of Cardinalls.

This name and dignitie of Cardinals, was in Rome at the beginning but a troublesome and painefull office; for they were as the Curates of parishes, and had the charge of ministring the Sacraments and of burying the dead, and were called Priests Cardinals, as the more worthie and of greater reputation: and as Rome was then held for the head of all other Churches, so these Priests Cardinals were regarded and more respected then any other; and they afterwards attained to greater preheminence, for that they were euer neere vnto the Pope; and being in the time of this Pope NICHOLAS the second established Electors, they grew to be of greater reputation; but not in so high a degree, as wee now see them, vntill the time of Pope INNOCENT the fourth, about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand two hundred foure and fortie; for hee gaue them libertie to ride on their footeclothes, and to weare such robes as they now vse to weare, to the end, that as they did excell other men in their degree and ornaments, so should they in their behauior and vertuous conditions: wherfore to paint Saint AMBROSE with a Cardinals crimson hat is a meere mockery; for in his time there were not any: and so at length the dignitie of Cardinall came to bee the greatest and the highest degree next to the Pope, and they accompany and counsell him in all matters of importance: but many of them haue carried themselues so prophanely, as they haue giuen iust occasion to the world, to note and murmure at their Consistorie.

Pope NICHOLAS being dead, ANSELME Bishop of Luca was chosen, and called ALEXANDER the Second; against whom, GILBERT Gouernour of Lombardy for the Emperour, by the consent of certaine Bishops of that Prouince, made a Schisme in the Papacie, and chose another Pope: But GOTHIFREDVS and his wife MAVVD, (which were the greatest Princes in Italie at that time) protected the first Pope: And in Rome and abroade elsewhere; followed many slaughters and murthers of the one and the other partie, vntill that in the end Pope ALEXANDER preuailed, and the other Pope fled to Milan.

Whilst these matters passed in Italie (the Emperor, as it was said, permitting and allowing the same) the like or greater were tolerated in Germany; for he suffered Priests to marry, and gaue Benefices and Bishopricks without the Popes licence or authoritie: wherewith the Pope was much displeased, and twice or thrice sent his Ambassadors to the Emperor about that businesse. And in other matters were great troubles and factions, and many rose against the Emperor: the first were the Saxons: for from OTHO Duke of Saxonie and Bauiere, who was accused of treason, the Emperor tooke the Duchie of Bauiere, which his mother had giuen him, and gaue the same to a Noble man, named GVELPHO; against these Saxons the Emperor attempted his first wars, when he was not full 18 yeers old; wherin shewing himself to be of an high mind, and free from feare or cowardise, he personally fought in many battailes and skirmishes against that people, which is, and euer hath been accounted for one of the most valiant Nations of the world: but he finally ouerthrew them, and compelled them (for this time) to yeeld his seruice.

Hauing obtained these victories, the Emperor sent into Italie for his Ambassador to the Pope, the Archbishop of Coleyn, with sufficient authority to conclude what to him seemed best to be done, and to excuse him of such things as were laid to his charge: who being come into Italie, he put GILBERT out of the Chancelorship and gouernment of Lombardy, which the Empresse INES had giuen him, and placed therein the Bishop of Bercelli: and from thence, with great authority and majesty, he went to Rome, where (Pope ALEXANDER giuing him publike audience) he made a solemne Oration; wherin in effect, in the behalfe of his Lord the Emperor, he reproued the Pope, for hauing accepted the Papacy without his confirmation, with other matters in the behalfe of the Emperour: whereto HILDEBRAND, by the Popes order, answered peremptorily; alleaging that the Pope ought not to attend any such confirmation; and he so sharpely reprehended the Emperor, as the Archb. was constrained to rest satisfied and to craue pardon for his speech. After this, many matters followed in Italy, which (vnwillingly) I omit, to the end to treate of what passed in the time of the Emperor HENRY, of whom only I write this History.

About this time, which was in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand sixty and six, EDWARD King of England dying without issue, he made WILLIAM Duke of Normandy his heire, who with the aide of BALDVVIN Earle of Flanders, obtained the Kingdome; and so the houses of England and Normandy were vnited, and so haue continued a long time in the kings thereof, and in their successors.

The Archbishoppe of Coleyn hauing dispatched his businesse in Italie, returned (discontent with his answere) into Germanie, and within few daies after died Pope ALEXANDER, hauing held that seate eleuen yeeres and a halfe: Afterwards the Archbishoppe of Rauenna reuolted from the Church of Rome. ALEXANDER being dead, by the generall consent of all the Cardinals and Clergie, HILDEBRAND the Arch-deacon (often before named) was made Pope, and was called GREGORIE the seuenth; who sent his Ambassadours to the Emperour, praying and requiring him to become an obedient sonne to the Church, and to alter the manner of his gouernement in Germanie; and thereby gaue him further to vnderstand, that he was resolued not to allow thereof, but to vse his authoritie to reform the same.

Pope GREGORIE at this time (as some approued Authors write) injoyned the Bishops of Germany (contrary to the antient Lawes) not to suffer the Emperour to conferre any Bishopricks, who he said would giue them to vnworthy men or not fit, neither should they from that time require any confirmation from the Emperour; which care and ordination did not belong to any secular Princes, but to the holy order, and chiefly to the Bishop of Rome, the President thereof.

The Emperour hereto gaue a doubtfull answere, but performed in effect nothing of what was required; maintaining, that the Pope ought not to accept the Papacie without his confirmation, according to the agreement made betweene his father the Emperour, HENRY the third, and Pope CLEMENT the second, and so these Ambassadors returned without any conclusion: this was in the seuenteenth yeere of his raigne, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand seuenty foure. At this time, (and also before and after it) the Emperour had cruell warres with the Dukes of Saxonie, which againe rebelled against him, they alleaging the Emperours disobedience to the Church of Rome to be the occasion thereof. This was the most dangerous warre that euer he vndertooke, wherein passed many perilous Incounters, the Emperor hazarding his person (so valiant and warlike he was) and he principally fought one verie bloudy battell, wherein he preuailed; but (as sayth BLONDVS) with the losse of fiue thousand men: and the Emperour and his brother in lawe RODVLPH, who afterward was his great enemy, fought therein with their owne hands most valiantly.

During these Combustions in Germanie, Italie was not free from factions and controuersies, betweene the Imperialists and the Popes adherents. GILBERT, the abouenamed Archbishop of Rauenna (who had been Gouernour for the Emperour in Italie) finding that the Pope had resolued to excommunicate the Emperour, he secretly agreed with one CINCIVS a yong Romane Knight, a man of a bold spirit (whose father was Prefect of the Citie) that he should seise vpon the Pope; assuring him that the Emperor would accept thereof, for a speciall peece of seruice; and he accordingly put the matter in execution: the Pope being vpon Christmas Eeue saying Masse in the Church of Saint MARY the greater in Rome; this CINCIVS with a good guard, entred the Church, and laying hands vpon him, caried him away, and in a Tower detained him prisoner. But the people as soone as it was day (being aduertised thereof) went to CINCIVS house, and setting the Pope at libertie, rased the Tower, from the toppe to the foundation: And of all such of CINCIVS his seruants as they found, they cut off the Noses, and banished them from Rome; and CINCIVS escaping the death (which they desired to haue giuen him) by flight, durst not stay in Italie, but went into Germany to the Emperour: This Archbishoppe GILBERT, whose practice was not yet discouered, setting a good countenance vpon the matter, departed the Citie; but being come to Rauenna, hee was by the Pope excommunicate and depriued of all his ecclesiasticall dignities and Benefices.

A Councell held in Germany against the Pope.

In Germany were no lesse contempts, against his Holinesse then in Italie: for (as the Abbat WESTPERGENSIS and other Germane Authors report, besides the Italians which verefie the same) by the procurement of SIGEFRIDVS Archbishoppe of Mentz, with some other Bishops and Abbats which ioyned with him, a Councell was held against the Pope, (the Bishops of Saxony disallowing and contradicting the same) in which Councell it was resolued, that that GREGORY should not be held for Pope; and that they all should renounce their obedience vnto him: Whereupon the Emperour and his Councell, sent for Ambassadour to Pope GREGORIE, a Priest, whose name was ROVVLAND.

The Pope in like manner called a Councell against the Emperour, at Saint IOHN DE LATERAN in Rome; where ROVVLAND being arriued, and the Pope and his Councell giuing him audience, he in the behalf of the Emperor, required GREGORY to desist from any longer exercising the papall function, and to resigne the authority of Pope: and he likewise signified the same to the Cardinals, willing them to repair into Germany to the Emperor, who would nominate a Pope. GREGORY was heerwith much troubled; and for as much as ROVVLAND was an Ambassador, he commanded him presently to depart without any answer, and without any other disgrace. But it is also written, that the Emperors mother at the Popes request went into Germany, accompanied with many great Prelates, to perswade her sonne to desist from intermeddling with the donation of Bishoprieks or other ecclesiasticall Benefices; to forbid the mariage of Priests, and to yeeld obedience to the Church of Rome: but for that it took no effect, the Pope very solemnly excommunicated the Emperor, and depriued him of all imperiall dignity; and he also excommunicated all such as took his part, and freed all the Princes and Lords of Germany and elsewhere, which ought him any duty or allegeance, from their oaths, homage, and bands of obedience or subjection, giuing free liberty to all men; and authority to the Princes Electors to chuse another Emperor, such as should best please them. The Archbishop of Mentz was likewise excommunicate, and depriued of all ecclesiasticall dignity, and with him all such as had been in the Councell aforesaid: but before the Pope had proceeded so far, he aduertised all the Princes in Christendome, of all, both past and present; and the Emperor wrote to them, in like manner defending his cause, and excusing himselfe against the Popes accusations.

The Emperor Henry the Fourth excommunicated by the pope.

The Popes terrible Sentence being published in Germany (as there were many that took his part, principally the Prelates of Saxony and others) RODVLPH Duke thereof, with many other Princes, called a Diet or Councell; wherein they resolued to require the Emperor to ask the Pope forgiuenesse, and to submit himselfe to the Church of Rome: which if hee refused to doo, they concluded to renounce their obedience vnto him. The Emperor, notwithstanding that he was a very braue man, and exceeding valiant (as some say, fainedly; and as others say, of his owne accord) promised to do what they required, which he openly protested. Finally, it was agreed, To send to the Pope to come into Germany, where full and entire obedience should be yeelded to him; and in the name of the Princes and Lords assembled at that Diet or Councell, the Archbishop of Treuier, and others of great account, went to the Pope, and intreated him with such instancy, that he was perswaded to take his way toward Germany to meet the Emperor, who staied (as they said) for him, and would come to ask him forgiuenesse, and submit himself into his hands. The Pope came to the City of Bercelli in Lombardy; where being aduertised, that the Emperor marched towards him with great troops of men at Arms, fearing that he would haue either slain him or taken him prisoner, gaue ouer his journey, and turned into the Country of GOTHIREDVS and his wife MAVD, and was by them protected in an expugnable Town and Castle, called Canusio or Canisio; whither within fewe daies the Emperor came: who, lodging his Army before the Town, in great humility sent to intreat the Pope to absolue him of his excommunication, offering to become his obedient sonne and subject; and three daies together came barefooted to the gates of the City, to sue for this absolution: but the Pope would not yeeld thereto. In conclusion, there passed many treaties, oaths and promises; but at length (through the instant suit of the said MAVD, and of ADELAYS Earle of Sauoy, and, as some say, of INES the Emperors mother also) the Pope, admitting the Emperour into his presence, absolued him: but whereas he had depriued him of his Empire, and had laid other penalties vpon him for former matters, he referred that to the iudgement of the next generall Councell, which should presently be called; and the Emperor promised to stand to the Councels arbitrement, and to banish from his company CINCIVS, who seised on the Pope in Rome, and some excommunicated Prelates.

The Emperors submission, who came 3 seuerall daies barefooted to the city gates wherein the pope was, ere he (or absolution.

The Emperor continued some daies in those parts (as some write, expecting when the Pope would haue come forth of that City; imagining that he, trusting to the peace, might haue bin apprehended) and departing from thence, he went to Pauia in Lombardy, where the before-named CINCIVS died; and the Emperor, by reason of the great abundance of rain which fell at that time, made his abode there for certain daies: in which he was giuen to vnderstand, that in Germany the Saxons and other his enemies (among which were BERTOLD Earle of Carinthia, the Duke of Bauiere, RODVLPH Duke of Sueuia, and others) rebelled against him; and assembling themselues together (denying him their obedience) made the Duke of Saxony Emperor, of whom we haue heertofore made mention; who was a man of the greatest accompt, both for power and valour, of his time in Germany. This (after the Abbat WESPERGENSIS his computation) was in the yeer of our Lord 1079, and in the twentith yeer of the raign of the Emperor HENRY the Fourth.

Rodulph Duke of Saxony chosen Emperor.

Li Duke Suevia Emp

These newes being brought to the Emperor HENRY (as hee was a man of an high minde and great courage) with the greatest fury of the world hee departed towards Germany, and by the way gathered together all such his friends as took his part, which were many: and RODVLPH, assisted by the Saxons and Sueuians, accompanied with some Princes and great Prelates; the most cruell war began betweene them two, that had been euer seen in Germany, which lasted full foure yeers. In the beginning whereof (besides sundry conflicts and accidents of warre, whereto either of these Emperors did set their hands) they came to a pitched battail, Armie against Armie: which because that their forces were in a manner equall, and both the Generals very valiant, was very doubtfull and bloody: HENRY to defend the Empire, and RODVLPH to get the same, did both that day marueiles in Armes in their owne persons. Finally, authors affirme, that either partie fought with such resolution, that hauing spent the greatest part of the day, the battell was ended without any certaine apparance of victory, both Campes remaining full of dead and wounded bodies; and each Generall was constrained of necessitie to withdraw his Armie from the other, to refresh and relieue his troupes; but yet the warre ceased not.

A battell betweene the Emperor and the Duke of Saxonie.

In the meane time both these Princes sent their Ambassadours to the Pope, either of them entreating him to condemne the other: and the Pope returned Ambassadours to both these Princes, requiring them both to lay downe their Armes; and HENRY (according to the agreement made with him in Lanusio) to permit a generall Councell to be held in Germany; and that either of them should stand to such arbitrement, as by that Councell should be concluded. RODVLPH accepted these conditions; but HENRY answered that he was not bound thereto, except the Pope would first excommunicate RODVLPH; and so prosecuted the warre with greater resolution then before. The Pope receiuing this aunswere, sent a new excommunication against him, and ratified the election of RODVLPHVS; to whom (as IOHANNES DE COLVMNA, ANTONINVS, VINCENCIVS, IOHN CVSPINIAN, IOHN CARION, and many others doe write) he sent a Crowne, wherewith he should be crowned, with this inscription, Petra dedit petro: Petrus diadema Rodulpho.

After this, both these Emperors resolued againe to try their fortunes by battaile; notwithstanding that it was in the middest of winter, which was no lesse cruell and doubtfull then the former, but rather more, and therein (as saith PLATINA) was as little signe of victorie, as in the last: some authors attribute the victorie to RODVLPH, and others to HENRY; the cause whereof was (as saith the Abbat WESPERGENSIS and some others) for that in the beginning RODVLPH's vauntguard of Saxons was put to flight, and HENRY prosecuted the victorie: wherein the Duke of Bohemia, who bare RODVLPH's imperiall standard, made a great shew of his valour, which standard his successors afterwards bare in the wars, in remembrance of this victorie. And in the meane season, RODVLPH's arierguarde spoiled the Emperour HENRIE's campe, and so they might well retire without any defeate, and either party might pretend to haue gotten the victory: this is the cause why it is so diuersly reported. But howsoeuer it was, HENRY was wounded, although not dangerously, but yet the war ceased not; for shortly after either of these Emperors reinforcing his Army, desired to fight the third battaile, with power against power, (notwithstanding that betweene them there were daily some incounters) and neither partie refusing the fight, the two Armies ioyned, and they fought with greater furie then at any time before: for the harmes which were done, and the slaughters of their people of either side were so great and so many, and their hatred and malice was growne to so high a degree, that they thought on nothing else but how to kill and destroy; with this desire and rage they maintained the fight: wherein after the death of an infinite number of men, and the effusion of much bloud, HENRY obtained the victorie, and RODVLPH was ouerthrowne, and lost many of his Saxons, which were very good men; but notwithstanding RODVLPHV's ouerthrow, yet (as a valiant Prince) gathering his forces together, and reinforcing his Armie, he retired into Saxony, which was his best refuge: where were some treaties of peace and and of a composition to be made betweene the Emperor HENRY and him; which tooke no effect, for HENRY would not determine the warres, but by the sword: for as he was a man of a great and high minde, so hee presumed to subdue all his aduersaries by his power: and his hautie courage was such as could endure no riuall or equall; which through his late victory greatly encreased.

The affaires of Germany standing vpon these tearmes, HENRY still following the warre, sought the Popes destruction, and procured to be assembled in a citie in Germany, such prelates as took part with him, in the name of a Councel; which chose the before named GILBERT Archbishop of Rauenna, Pope (who was Pope GREGORIE's capitall enemie; and a wicked man, and had laid the plot before mentioned for his apprehension in Rome by CINCIVS) hee was called CLEMENT. Hereupon besides the miseries which afflicted Italy began a schisme and diuision in the Church of Rome, for those which took part with the Emperor HENRY held him for Pope. The Emperor at that time sent his sonne HENRY into Italie, there to gouern such estates as were subiect vnto him, and to make warre against such as held with Pope GREGORY: of which that MAWD (before named) was the principall; who leuied her forces and came to a battell with HENRY the sonne, wherein she was ouerthrowne: for which the Pope was wonderfully grieued, comparing this ill fortune, with the schisme made by Pope GILBERT. The Emperour was herewith so much encouraged, as leuying the greatest power that he was able to make, he went to seeke RODVLPH; who (as I said) was in Saxony, making preparation for the warres, and was alreadie in such order, that he doubted not to fight with the Emperor, in hope to haue ouerthrowne him. And so they fought a most cruell and bloodie battaile; wherein (as then there were no Cannons, Culuerines, Musket shot, or other artillerie, as now is vsed) neither partie wanting either force or courage, or standing in any feare or doubt to come to blowes with the other; with dint of sword and launce, they slew and wounded their enemies; the two Emperours in person fighting in the thickest of the prease. This fight was maintained the greatest part of the day; the end whereof is related by Historiographers diuerslie. The most common opinion is, that the Emperor HENRIE's Armie was ouerthrowne, and that RODVLPH had the victorie; but he was sore wounded and lost his right hand: some say that he receiued that hurt by mischance amongst his owne people; which wound bled so much and pained him so sore, that he could not prosecute the victorie, and therefore was constrained to retire himselfe to a strong castle to be cured; where within few daies after he died. So as the Emperor HENRY of a man conquered became a conqueror: for RODVLPH being missing, his people disbanded, and so HENRY became Master of the field. Yet BLONDVS writeth, that the Emperor HENRY fled out of the field the same day wherein the battaile was fought, and lay close in a castle, vntill that he was certified of the death of RODVLPHVS; and that he then came foorth to enioy the victorie, through the death of his enemie, whom he had not ouerthrowne. CARION writes that when RODVLPH was readie to breath out his last (his right hand which he had lost in the battaile being brought vnto him) detesting the wickednes and the treacherie of Popes too late; speaking to a troupe of Bishops which were about him: This is the right hand (sayed he) by the which I confirmed my plighted faith vnto the Emperor. This is an argument of my periurie (you being the motiues) and a testimony of your wicked treacherie whereof you shall giue an account vnto God. RODVLPHVS his seruants going about to burie the body of their deceased Lord, with the ensignes and ornaments of Emperour; some asked of the Emperor HENRY, wherefore he suffered RODVLPHVS to be buried with such honour, seeing that he was a tyrant and his enemie: whereto he made an excellent answere: I would to God (quoth he) that all mine enemies were (like RODVLPH) buried with the ornaments and ensignes of Emperours.

A fourth battaile betweene the Emperor and Duke Rodulph: and his end.

A notable saying of the Emperour Henry the Fourth.

The Emperor HENRY hauing slaine his competitor RODVLPHVS, making small account of the rest, seised Suenia into his hands, and dispossessed BERTOLDVS therof; to whom RODVLPH had giuen the same; and leauing garrisons in the frontiers of Saxony (which was not yet throughly pacified) and establishing the best order he could in all parts of Germany; with his victorious Armie he took his way towards Italy; whither he came within few daies, hauing with him Pope CLEMENT who was chosen in Germany, with a resolution to depose Pope GREGORIE; to whose aide the forenamed MAVD had sent a great supplie of men; and Pope GREGORIE had alreadie fortified and victualled Rome: for the Emperour came with so great force and furie, that there was no reason to attend his comming in the open fields; so as without encountring or resistance, he came to the very walles of the citie, whereto he presently commanded assault to be giuen: but he found such resistance, that being out of hope to enter it at that time, he burned and spoiled the suburbs and Countrie round about, continuing his siege before the Citie notwithstanding; which was one of the most famous that hath beene seene before any City in the World, as well for continuance of time, as for the many accidents and aduentures in Armes, for it continued aboue three yeers, in which time there were many cruell assaults and sallies; and the besieged endured great famine, and want of all things necessarie: in the meane time the Emperor made some incursions into Lombardy, and into other parts of Italie: the Germane Pope CLEMENT commanding his Armie in the time of his absence In this siege the Vaticane was taken, wherein are the Popes Palace, and Saint PETERS Church, which were ruined and burnt by the Emperor, together with the best and faireſt houses and buildings.

Rome besieged by the Emperor Henry.

Whilest now the Emperor was busied in Italie, they were not quiet in Germany: for besides the ordinary warres, the Saxons aduanced a great man, called HARMAN, to the dignity of Emperour: but this was a matter of small moment which did little disturbe HENRY, for they themselues expelled him. In the end, after so long a time as the Pope was thus besieged in Rome, ROBERT GVISCARD a potent Normane, Prince and Lord of Pulia and of Calabria, grieuing to see the Pope thus distressed, resolued to giue ouer his warres with the Grecians in Dalmatia and in other parts, and (as the Popes liege man) to come to the reliefe of Rome: and to that effect left his sonne BOHEMVND in his place, and leuied forces and other necessaries, fit for so high an enterprise.

Harman made Emperour in Saxony

The newes hereof, being euery where published, the Emperor with greater care and circumspection more strictly continued his siege; and vsing as well policie as force, he caused to be published amongst the Romanes, that his desire was, but to be absolued and crowned by the Pope, and that confirming him in the Empire, he would presently depart from Rome: Whereto the Pope would not giue care, except the Emperour would giue securitie for the performance of his promise: For, knowing that all was but dissembling and deceite, he would rather continue constant in his resolution, then yeeld shamefully to such basenesse, and thereby lose himselfe: But the Emperor vsed such meanes, that the greatest part of the Romanes (being tyred with so long and so cruell a siege) went ouer to the Emperors Campe; and others presumed to tell the Pope to his face, that he did ill in not receiuing him into Rome, seeing he promised to depart againe speedily: Besides this, the Pope was certified, that some had resolued whether he would or no, to let the Emperor into the Citie: Whereupon he withdrew himselfe into the Castle S. Angelo, and with him all the Cardinals; and made a Nephew of his, whose name was RVSTICVS, to possesse himselfe of another Castle called Septem Solia; wherein he was well aduised, for the Emperor was presently receiued into the Citie, and with him the Germane Pope CLEMENT, and the said Castles by his commandement were presently besieged, which was in the yeer of our Lord, one thousand foure score and foure: And the Emperour with great solemnity was anointed and crowned by Pope CLEMENT, more accompanied with men of warre then with Bishops and Prelates. Yet not omitting to batter the Castles, wherein Pope GREGORIE and his Nephew were; the assaults giuen were so furious, that RVSTICVS was driuen to yeeld himselfe prisoner: But the Castle S. Angelo was so strong, that the Emperor could not preuaile against it.

The Emperor anointed and crowned in Rome.

The affaires standing in this estate, the said ROBERT GVISCARD so much hastened his comming with so great force, that (as the Italian Authors write) the Emperour durst not stay for him, but giuing it out, that by reason of some vrgent affaires in Germany, it behoued him presently to depart; he left part of his forces for the defence of the Citie, and to continue the siege of the Castle, wherein the Pope was; and fortified the Capitoll, which then was strong, and repayred other towers and fortresses decayed.

The Abbat WESPERGINIS, and other Germane Authors write nothing of any such feare the Emperor was in, but make mention of all the rest. But howsoeuer it was, he went out of Italie, and with him his Pope, whom RICHARD Duke of Beneuent did support for a season. Within few daies following, ROBERT GVISCARD came to Rome with all his troops of Normans and Calabrians (it had been better that he had neuer come, as it afterwards happened) and others which came to his aide, to set Pope GREGORIE at libertie: for from elsewhere it was not to be expected, for in Grecia the Emperors were at wars: and from France could come no reliefe, for that Lombardy held for the Emperor: and in Spaine, the Princes were troubled and turmoyled with warres against the Moores; so as onely ROBERT GVISCARD, had had meanes to doe it and none other. Being comm, the Citizens of Rome which had receiued the Emperor, with the assistance of those which he had left in garrison, offered themselues to defend the Citie, so as he entred it by force, with the ayde and fauour of some which were within it. He found so great resistance in his aduersaries, that the two factions oftentimes fought within the citie; the greatest part of the citizens taking part with the Imperialists: and there was so great disorder and confusion, that the greatest part of miserable Rome was burnt and ruined; for whatsoeuer either partie gat, they ouerthrew or set on fire: so great was the rage and furie wherewith they made this warre. But in the end ROBERT GVISCARD, and the Popes partie preuailing against their enemies, they took, burnt and destroyed the Capitoll; and left Rome so ruinated, that neither ATTILA, or any other barbarous nation, did euer commit the like spoiles: for at this day there are orchards, vineyards and gardens, where before that warre, were streetes, houses, Churches and other sumptuous buildings. ROBERT hauing obtained so pitifull a victory, went to the Castle S. Angelo, which vntill then was besieged; and freeing Pope GREGORY from thence, restored him to his seate and palace. But within few daies after, the Pope considering into how miserable and pitifull estate the citie was brought, by the counsell of the said ROBERT, he determined to absent himself; and being accompanied with the same ROBERT, and with his Colledge of Cardinals he went to the citie of Salerno, where he afterwards died, hauing been Pope twelue yeers, one moneth, and three daies. It is written that this Pope was a iust, an vpright, a wise, and a charitable man, and an almes giuer; but it is certaine that he was an obstinate, presumptuous, stout, and firme defender of the Romane prelacie, with the liberties and immunities thereof. BRVNVS, and SIGISBERTVS report him to haue been both ambitious, a Negromancer, and an Inchaunter; and that he had poysoned seuen other Popes before he could attaine to the Papacie.

Before we proceed any further, it shall be very requisite to make some relation of the Emperors of Constantinople (seeing that we are not to discourse of other kingdoms and commonwealths) to the end that hauing ended herewith, we may proceede with our HENRY and the successors of Pope GREGORY. I say then that in the space of seuen and twentie yeeres of HENRIE's raigne, little more or lesse, fiue or six Emperors had raigned in Constantinople, before which time, the Turkes, Persians and other nations made themselues Lords of what the Greekes held in Asia: whose euent was this, as we said in the end of the life of HENRY the Third, father to this HENRY of whom we now write. The better to vnderstand the matter, it shal not be amisse to returne to YSACIVS CONNENVS, who raigned two yeers Emperor in Constantinople: to whom succeeded CONSTANTINVS DVCA, who in the beginning behaued himselfe very valiantly, subduing and punishing such as rebelled against him, and in the rest was a very deuout Christian: but, being infected with the disease of couetousnes, he was therefore contemned both by his owne subjects, and by the Barbarians; and in his time were lost many Towns in Asia: and in Constantinople was so great an earthquake, that the Churches and other Buildings fell down. And so his Empire being infortunate, hee died in the seuenth yeer of his Raign; and his sonnes remaining his successors, his wife EVDOXIA took vpon her the gouernment, who held the same the space of seuen moneths onely: for, by reason of the wars with the Turks and Barbarians, the Greeks made her to take to husband a great man amongst them, called ROMANVS DIOGENES, to help to defend the Empire; who, not content to goueme in the behalfe of her sonnes, but proclaiming himself Emperor, vsurped the Empire, and going into Asia with an Army against the Turks, had variable successe, and was sometimes victorious, and sometime vanquished; and in the end was in a battaile ouerthrowne by them, and many of his people slaine; and being afterwards by the Generall of the Infidels well intreated and set at libertie, comming to Constantinople, he found alreadie placed in his throne the eldest of his wiues sonnes, called MICHAEL PARAPINASSVS: And notwithstanding that hee attempted by force to haue recouered the Empire, yet he could not bring it to passe, but was taken prisoner, and had his eyes put out (a cruelty much vsed in Grecia in those daies) and banished in the habit of a religious man to a certaine Iland, where he died, when he had been Emperor about the space of foure yeeres. MICHAEL PARAPINASSVS remaining in the Imperiall throne, grew to be so careleſse and negligent, and therewith of so little worth, that hee applied himselfe to nothing but to making of verses, and to dresse the gowt wherwith he was grieued: he held the Empire six yeeres and halfe, with great losse in Asia, the Infidels conqueting many cities thereof: for which cause his subiects rebelled against him, and chose for their Emperour a man of great fame and parentage, whose name was NICEPHORVS BOTANIATES, brother, who was descended from the Emperor Phocas aboue mentioned: this man much honoured the brothers of his predecessour Maximilian Palæologus; who were the sonnes of Constantine and Helena and of Eudoxia before named: and giuing them offices and commands, louers drew by their assistance Andronicus and Basilius: with which rebelled against him; for which and other faultes which he did, hee was very ill requited; for they being sonnes and brothers to Emperours, sought to be so themselues: and so the youngest and most valiant of them, called Alexius Comnenus (procuring friends) deposed him from the Empire, and gat the same for himself, when he had raigned three yeers, causing him to take religious habit. And this Alexius held the Empire seuen and thirty yeeres, and fought many battailes, both with Infidels and with Christians, but chiefly with Robert Guiscard Lord of Pulia and Calabria, who reuolted Pope Gregorie as we haue related, who also sought to haue been Emperor of Græcia; which warres he continued with the aid of the Venetians. In this estate stood the affaires of Græcia, at such time as the Emperor Henry the Fourth departed out of Italy, and Pope Gregorie the seuenth died: wherefore let vs now returne to speake of them.

The Emperour Henry being departed out of Italie in such manner as wee haue declared, and leauing Rome in such combustions as afore said, he came into Germany, where he called a Diet or Councell in the Citie of Mentz, as well to iustifie himselfe concerning such matters as were done in Italie; as to prosecute the warre against the Saxons and their adherents. In this Councell (being perswaded and in a manner compelled by sundry prelates) he yeelded to the altering of some things in the Church; as to decree that Priests should haue no wiues, and some other matters; yet he persecuted in supporting Pope Clement, who was chosen against Pope Gregorie, and in such other things as before he did. This Councell of Mentz being dissolued, the Emperour againe prosecuted the warre against the Saxons; in which, betweene both parties endued great spoiles, many slaughters and great battailes and encounters; wherein the Emperour did often hazard his person; and in the most of them fighting most valiantly, obtained the victory, there being of either side great Princes, Captaines, and very valiant men, with many of which he came to an accord in the end, and so grew daily more potent, yet neuer without enemies. Wherein succeeded many and sundry accidents, which the breuitie of the Historie, permitteth me not to relate in particular.

In the meane season, whilest he was thus busied, Pope Gregorie the seuenth died in Salerno; in whose place was chosen (notwithstanding that Clement was still called Pope) an Abbat, called Desiderius, who being installed, was called Victor the Third; This Pope also withstood the Emperors proceedings.

At this time also died Robert Guiscard, Lord of Pulia, of Calabria, and of great part of Sicilia, to whom succeeded his sonnes, Roger and Bohemund. Victor continued Pope one yeere and foure moneths onely: and being dead, they chose to succeede him, the Cardinall of Hostia, whose name was Otho and called him Vrban the Second; who in the beginning of his Papacie was somewhat troubled in Rome, by some which were the Emperours adherents, and tooke part with Pope Clement, who yet liued, whom a certain Duke of Italie maintained in his Countrie: Whereupon this Pope (for his better safety) went from Rome to the Citie of Melfi: but he afterwards remoued to the Citie of Placencia, (there to be of the greater power, by reason of Mavvd the great Lady so often before named) where he called a Councell, wherein some new orders were made; but he still vpheld and maintained the quarrell of his predecessors Pope Gregory, and Pope Victor, against the Emperor and his followers: And there also he held not himselfe to be safe, for that the Emperour Henry was of very great power; wherefore he resolued to goe into France, where what befell him you shall vnderstand.

A Councell at Placencia.

In this place Authors doe greatly varie, in relating the acts of this Emperour: for some make not any mention of his second comming into Italie: others hold it to haue beene at this time; and those which write it, agree not well together in the times, neither doe they distinctly set downe what he did there; which hath been a great trouble to me, and hath bred a great confusion: wherefore let the reader passe it ouer as he may, for I cannot certainly auerre, which accidents preceded the other.

The Abbat Wespergensis, and Blondvs say, that the Emperor Henry after that he had buried his first wife, whose name was Verta, and had married againe the second time, came into Italie, and made his abode there about seuen yeeres, making warre against the Popes

Popes dominions in his own person, and that he took many cities by force; among which were Mantoa and Ferrara, which were held by Mavvd. And Blondvs likewise affirmeth; that others write that these cities were in the same warre recouered by Mavvd, by the sufferance and ayde of Conrade the Emperours eldest sonne, who openly fauoured her and the Pope against his father: whereupon (they say) Mavvd grew to be so hardie as to ioyne all her owne forces, with the power of his friends and allies, to stop the Emperors passage to Rome; and that she fought with him and ouerthrew him; so as he was constrained to depart out of Italy. Howsoeuer it was, among such diuersitie of opinions, the truth is, and is approoued by all without any difference, that in this time the Pope being come into France, he called a generall Councell in the citie of Cleremount, in the yeere of our Lord 1094: where hauing treated of many things concerning the faith, hee attempted the greatest matter that euer any other Pope had done; which was, the conquest of Ierusalem, and other cities in the East, which of long time had been subiect to Mahomet's successors; and he solicited the same in that Councell, with such instance and efficacie, and his speeches so incensed the hearts of the people, that many great Princes resolued to vndertake the action: for out of France, Spaine, England, Italy, and Germany, there went so many, that all writers affirme, they did exceede the number of three hundred thousand fighting men, which took for their deuice the signe of the Crosse: the chiefe Commanders of the one side, were Peter the Hermit, and another great Lord Duke of Lorraine, called Godfrey of Buillon, and his two brethren, the one called Eystace, the other Baldvvin, and with them other great Princes: And on the other side went Hvgh, brother to the French King, Robert Earle of Flanders, Robert Duke of Normandie, Stephen Earle of Chartres, Raimond Earle of S. Giles, and Bohemvnd Prince of Otranto in Italy, and others of equall and inferiour degree.

The conquest of the holy Land.

Some taking their way through Germany, Hungary, and Græcia, passed ouer into Asia; and others through Italy, (taking for their good speede, the Popes blessing with them, who then was Vrban the Second) and passing the seas, they diuided themselues into two Armies, although not without great trouble and difficultie; the cause whereof was Alexivs Emperor of Constantinople. In the end, these troupes passed ouer into Asia, and made cruell warres in sundry parts, principally in Soria, and in Iudea: This was one of the greatest actions that euer was: which I forbeare to write at large, as well for that it maketh nothing to my purpose; as also, for that so great an enterprize deserueth a particular historie; but the successe then was, that after many battailes, hauing taken many cities, and continued the warre the space of three yeers; the citie of Ierusalem was taken by Godfrey of Buillon, the Duke of Normandy, and the Earle of Flanders, and others, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand ninety and nine, vpon the 15. day of Iuly: foure hundred and ninety yeeres after that it was first taken by the Sarazins, in the time of the Emperor Heraclivs.

Many Authors write of this warr, as Abbas Wespergensis, in the life of Henry the 4th. Paulus Emilius in his fourth booke of the history of France. Merula in his third booke of the history of Milan. 1099 Blondus in his fourth of his second Decade. Antoninus. Platina. Sabellicus. Nauclerus.

The citie being taken, the sayd Godfrey was made King thereof, and of all the countrey round about it. Other of the Princes and Captaines before named, remained Lords and gouernours of other great cities and townes in Syria; yet many of them returned to their countries, after the performance of so honourable an action; among which were the Earles of Flanders, of S. Giles and others: And the war continuing, this kingdome remained in him, and his successors, the space of fourescore and eight yeers: which being expired, through the weakenesse, and dissension among the Princes, it was againe lost, in the time of the Emperor Barbarossa, as hereafter you shall vnderstand.

Let vs now returne to our discourse of the Emperour Henry I. who at such time as these matters passed in Ierusalem, being returned out of Italy, the last time that euer he was there; wherein he then left his eldest sonne Conrade for his Lieutenant; assembling then some of the Prince Electors in the citie of Colen, hee labored to haue his sonne Henry to bee chosen King of Romanes, whom he had alreadie made Duke of Franconia (which was his house and patrimonie) which Henry was his second sonne, and whom hee loued best. When this was made knowne to his eldest sonne Conrade, hee was much distempered and grieued at his fathers proceedings; and therefore resolued openly to denie him his obedience (as to an Emperour; which was a Schismatike, and excommunicated) and so hee seised into his hands all the Lands of the Empire in ITALIE, finding all men well affected thereunto, for the hatred which they bare to his father; and he held the same nine yeeres with the title of King of Italy; his father either dissembling, or not daring to come against him. And they say that he gouerned as a wise and vertuous Prince: at the end of which time, he fell sick and dyed, about about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand and twentie: and at the same time died GODFREY the new King of Ierusalem, whom his brother BALDVVIN succeeded, and Pope VRBANE the Second likewise died in Rome, and there succeeded PASCAL the Second: and within few daies after died CLEMENT, who was made Pope by the Emperor: and after his decease, the Earle of Capua, and others attempted to make one ALBERT Pope; and afterwards one THEODORICVS: and in Rauenna one MAGINVLPHVS, a man of great courage and power attempted to haue made himself Pope; but none of all these continued long: and so PASCAL remained Pope in esse, who performed great matters both touching the spiritualty and temporalty, in reforming the corruption of manners, and recouering and defending the patrimonie of the Church: which the Emperor could not hinder, as he would haue done; for at that instant, his sonne HENRY (being desirous to rule) rebelled against him, and warres began betweene them two, which were more then ciuill, which I will breefly set downe. The Emperour HENRY (the better to assure himselfe in his estate) procured his sonne HENRY to be chosen King of the Romanes (publishing that he meant to go into Italy) and summoned a generall Councell to be held in Rome, with intent (as some write) to haue deposed Pope PASCAL. The Pope being aduertised hereof, he presently excommunicated him: for which cause, after many accidents which happned (which for breuitie I ouerpasse) by the aduice and counsell of some of the Princes and prelates of Germany, his sonne HENRY began to take Armes against him, pretending that he did it, for that his father was disobedient to the Church, and that he abhorred his Simony, and other crimes which hee laid to his charge: and in short space vnder this pretext (which as is most likely, was rather to depose his father, then for any loue he bare to the Pope) he grew to be so mightie, that his father offered him large compositions, to reduce him to his obedience; which taking no effect (for the son was resolued to be absolute) they took Armes, and each of them assembled their forces and leuied Armies, and began to make cruel war one against the other. The sonne was aided and assisted by the Dukes of Bauiere and Saxony, and by other Princes and great cities; and the father by the Duke of Bohemia, and the Marquesse of Austria, with other mightie Dukes and Earles. In the beginning, neere the citie of of Ratisbone, with the aide of those of that citie, the father obtained the vpper hand against the son, so as he was driuen to retire to reinforce his troupes: afterwards much desiring a battaile, the sonne came against the father, in whom his men now for his old age had lesse confidence then in former times. And the Armies and Emperors drawing neere together, they stood the space of three dayes continually in sight the one of the other, marshalled, and readie to fight; a little riuer being betweene the two Camps, where were many skirmishes, in which died many notable personages; and both father and sonne being resolued to fight, the night before they should haue fought, LEOPOLDVS the Marquesse of Austria being wearie of the fathers quarrell, holding it vniust, counselled him to withdraw himselfe and not to fight; but seeing that his aduice was not accepted, he retyred with all his forces, and the Duke of Bohemia being aduertised thereof, did the like, and presently after this there came a gentleman of his sonnes troupes, to warne him to looke to his person, and to take heed whom hee trusted, for hee was in daunger: whereupon the old Emperour, with some small troupes of horse, and those the best that he could chuse, forsooke the Campe, and went into sundrie parts, emploring aide and succors. The sonne by reason of the fathers flight, seised into his hands the best and most of the cities of Germany, and the most of the Princes came to his side: and then he went against the citie of Spire (wherein his fathers treasure and iewels lay) and took the same.

Henry rebelled against his father the Emperor.

A battaile fought betweene the father and the sonne.

After this were moued some treaties of peace betweene the father and the sonne, which was concluded vpon condition, that they two should meete in the towne of Binge, which lieth vpon the Rhine side, before that the Councell should be assembled, which the sonne had procured to be called, of all the Princes Secular and Regular, to bee held in the citie of Mentz, the next Christmas following; which was in the end of the yeere of our Lord one thousand, one hundred and fiue, and the beginning of the yeere one thousand one hundred and six. They two meeting there, the sonne protested that hee pretended nothing but the peace of the Church of Rome, with a reformation of abuses in Germany, that his father should be absolued and reduced to the Popes obedience; and that hee neuer meant to bereaue him either of title or dignitie of Emperor, but that he should set matters in such order as was conuenient. The father promised to do al that he ought to doe, and offered more then hee either would or could performe: but the one distrusting the other, the father said that he would stand to that which the estates should conclude in Mentz, and in the best maner he could, departed departed thence to a strong Castle, where he made account to liue in safety in the meane time. But the sonne being there with his troupes, hee shut vp all the waies and passages towards that Castle, in such sort that the Emperour could haue no conference with any, without the knowledge of his sonne. Some authors write, that he was taken and committed thither prisoner by his sonne; and that his sonne made him to renounce the Empire, and that he afterwards died in his power. But the Abbat WESPERGENSIS (an author of those times) and OTHO FRISINGENSIS, and the most and best Historiographers write, as I haue related it.

Christmas day being come, all the great Princes of Germany met in Mentz, excepting the Duke of Saxony, who could not come, by reason of his great age; and with him Pope PASCAL'S Legates; where the said Legates (as it was thought) not without the sonnes consent and procurement, againe pronounced the Popes censure against the father, and all such as took his part: and as they debated hereof, and of the Emperor which was in the Castle (who offered to performe what they required; humbly suing for absolution, for which purpose he desired to come to Mentz) the sonne protested that he neither desired, neither pretended any other thing, but that his father should reform himself, and become obedient to the Church of Rome, but in truth the issue did manifest, that his principal intent was to make himself Emperor. The Popes Legates aunswered to the Emperors offers and promises, that they neither could, neither had authoritie to appoint any penance for the Emperor, neither could they giue him any absolution, but that it must be done in a general Councel, and that by the Popes direction, as it had been decreed by GREGORIE the Seuenth concerning his depriuation, and all the rest. Matters standing in this estate, all men were now most affected to the sonne, and desiring to winne his grace and fauour; for they saw that he was mightie and victorious, and the father as he was a man of great courage, comming to haue put himselfe into Mentz, many Princes and prelates went foorth to meete him, and perswaded him, that vnlesse he would wholly bring himself to ruine, there was no remedie but to renounce the Empire to his sonne, and to repose his trust in him.

The Emperor Henry the Fourth renounced the Empire to his sonne.

HENRY seeing himself thus distressed, and finding no redresse or counsell in any body, accepted hereof, as some say voluntarily, as being tired and worne out with wars and troubles. Finally, reposing his trust in his sonne, or in despaire by reason of the solemne decree, he resigned his title to the Empire to his sonne HENRY; and sent to him from the Castle wherein he was, the Crosse, the Launce, the Scepter, the Globe, the Crowne, and his other Imperiall ensignes and ornaments: which renunciation being receiued in the Councell, by a generall consent HENRY the sonne was chosen and created Emperor, and called HENRY the Fift, after the Germane, and Fourth after the Italian writers; for they allow not of HENRY the First, as is before said: and the election was confirmed and ratified by the Popes Legates; and like an Emperour, in that Councell, he treated with the Popes Legates, and with the Princes of Germany, of all matters spirituall and temporall, concerning the Empire: and for his Ambassadours he sent certaine men of great account and authoritie to Pope PASCAL, and so continued and was held for Emperour. But before many daies were past, the father seeing himselfe deprined; and his sonne exalted, repenting, secretly sought and procured friends, to the end to haue been restored; and wrote to the French King, and to other Kings and Princes, complaining of his sonne, alleaging that he was forced to what he did; and standing in some good hope, he openly shewed his intent, and leuied men of warre, the Duke of Lorraine taking his part, and som others, with the cities of Colen and Gulike, and other imperiall townes.

Henry the Fift chosen Emperor.

Duke of Lorraine for Emperour his brother.

The sonne hauing intelligence hereof, againe raised great forces, and desiring to haue gone to a Councell in the citie of Liege, he sent three hundred men at Armes to take a bridge vpon the riuer of Maze, all which were either taken or slaine by the Duke of Lorraine, who tooke the fathers part, and came vpon them at vnawares: whereupon HENRY the son proclaimed him traitor, and depriued him (being absent) of his Duchy of Lorraine: in the meane time, the father entred the citie of Colen, fortifying and furnishing the same with men and munition, and thence went to haue put himself into the citie of Liege, whither the Councell was called, which is a most strong citie: in hope (as hee was a man of great spirit) to haue been restored, hauing some other assistance, besides those alreadie named; principally amongst the common people, by whom he was wel beloued, they being moued thereto with compassion to see him deposed. The sonne with his forces went against the citie of Colen: and they within it fearing the siege sent Letters and messengers, in generall both to him and to all the estates, in the name of his father, complaining in that he was thus deposed and deceiued; and laying great matters to his sonnes charge, he excused and iustified his owne cause, so much as he might, desiring to be relieued relieued: whereto the ſon made aunſwere, reciting his fathers exceſſe, his ſimonie, his ſchiſme, and rebellion committed againſt the Pope and Church of Rome, to the generall preiudice of the ſtates of the whole Empire; proteſting further that what he did, was to doe God ſeruice, by obeying his Vicar, procuring the vnion of the holy mother Church of Rome, with many other matters which the Abbat WESPERGENSIS, BLONDVS, and other authors do ſet downe at large. Finally, he ſent him word, that he ſhould not dote by reaſon of his old age, but that he ſhould come priuate, and aske forgiuenes of the Church; and that then the equitie of his cauſe ſhould be heard, both for himſelfe, and for all the princes which were with him. The father not onely refuſed to follow his ſonnes direction, but ill entreated his Ambaſſadours; ſo as they could hardly returne to their Campe before Colen in ſafety. Whereupon the Sonne (ſeeing that hee could not take that Citie in any ſhort ſpace) hee marched with his army towards Lorraine; and before his departure, ſent a ſecond ambaſſage to his father, the effect whereof was, that if he deſired iuſtice, he ſhould peaceably come to the Councell, which he ſummoned to be held at Aken: if otherwiſe, he gaue him to vnderſtand, that by the conſent and will of all the Princes, he was reſolued to make warre vpon him, as againſt a common enemie. Theſe Ambaſſadours came to the citie of Liege, where HENRY the father then lay; who was ſo enraged with his ſonnes anſwere and reſolution, that he did and ſaid many things in furie. Matters ſtanding in this eſtate (whereof it was both thought and feared, that great warres, troubles, and other euils would haue enſued) it pleaſed God to take compaſſion of his people, which by reaſon of the cruel warres betweene the father and the ſonne, endured daily grieuous and intolerable oppreſſions, robberies, and irreparable calamities; which was, by taking the old Emperor HENRY out of this world; which happened on the ſeuenth day of Auguſt, about the fiftith yeere of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord, one, thouſand, one hundred and ſix. It is written, that he died of paſſion and griefe to ſee himſelf (as it were) a priſoner, and beſieged in that caſtle, and depoſed and forſaken by his owne ſonne and blood. By the diſcourſe of this Hiſtorie, it may ſeem to the Reader that the Emperor HENRY was an vnworthie and ill deſeruing Prince, conſidering that he was excommunicated by the Pope, and his Empire giuen to an other, his onely Sonne took Armes againſt him, his Nobles rebelled, his ſubiects forſooke him, and in a manner all the world abandoned him, being in the end forced to reſigne the Empire to his Sonne, and the Imperial enſignes and ornaments violently wreſted from him: yet for the Readers better ſatisfaction, I will ſet downe what CARION (whom MEXIA voucheth among his other Authors) writeth of him in theſe tearmes. Thus dyed HENRY the Fourth, a valiant and warlike Emperor, moſt louing to his Countrie, the laſt reuenger of the Imperiall Maieſtie; who when hee had fought 62 battailes, hauing felt the ſharpeſt ſtormes of aduerſe fortune, yet he was neuer daunted nor dejected, neither did he euer abandon or betraie himſelfe, or thoſe things which concerned the Maieſtie of the Empire by the conſtitutions of his Predeceſſors. The dead bodie of the Emperor HENRY, was buried by the Biſhop of the place where he died, in a Monaſtery; from whence (by the decree of the Prelates, and conſent of his owne ſonne) it was afterwards remoued, to the end, that (as a man excommunicate) he ſhould not be buried in Chriſtian buriall, and was caried to Spire, where, in a prophane place, was made for him a marble ſepulchre, wherein he lay fiue yeeres; at the end of which time it pleaſed the Pope to permit him to bee buried in Chriſtian buriall. This Emperor had two ſonnes, and three daughters by his firſt wife VBERTA, who was the daughter of a great Marqueſſe in Italy, allyed to the Lady MAVVD: his ſonnes were CONRADE, who died before him, and HENRY the Fift which ſucceeded him; his daughters names were INES, which married with FREDERICK Duke of Sueuia, and was mother to the Emperor CONRADE the Second; and LIMPERGA which married with the Duke of Carinthia; and SOPHIA, which was wife to the King of Hungary. In Conſtantinople at this time raigned ALEXIVS, whoſe Empire continued ſeuen and thirtie yeeres, and hee died afterwards in the time of HENRY the Fift: and to him ſucceeded his ſonne CALOIOANNES, as hereafter you ſhall vnderſtand.

The death of the Emperor Henry the 4.

THE ARGVMENT.

HENRY hauing taken vpon him the gouernment of the Empire, after that the death of his father was known, all the Cities and Princes, which had bin his aduerſaries made their peace with him, and became his ſubiects. He ſent ambaſſadors to the Pope, promiſing to become his good ſonne; to whom he granted to call a Councell, wherein all matters concerning the Church ſhould be reformed, chiefly thoſe which were introduced by his father. He committed the Count Palatine to priſon, by reaſon of ſome alterations, and made warre againſt the king of Polonia, who intituled himſelfe King, and ſubdued him; but not without great difficulty. He came afterwards into Italy to be crowned by Pope Paſcal: and being come to Rome in S. Peters Church, he ſeized vpon the Pope, and committed him to priſon, ſacking Rome and the territory therof; neither would he releaſe the Pope vntill that he had confirmed his priuiledges of inueſting Prelates in the Beneſices of Germany: the Pope being out of priſon, and the Emperor returning crowned in Germany, the Councell did annulled the authority giuen him of inueſtiture, as a matter granted by force: which when he vnderſtood, he was incenſed and commaunded the Biſhop of Mentz to priſon, who fauoured the Popes party. But the Emperor comming into that City, the people matined and apprehended him, and would not releaſe him, vntill that he had promiſed to ſet their Biſhop at liberty. He was afterward excommunicated and in danger to haue bin depoſed from the Empire; but leauing Germany, he went to Rome, where he found not the Pope, neither would he come thither ſo long as the Emperor was therein, neither would he giue credit to his promiſes, or believe any thing that he ſaid. He againe returned the third time into Italy, and ſet a ſchiſme in the Church: and vnderſtanding of the Popes comming againſt him, he returned into Germany, and then made his peace with the Pope baſely, humbly ſubmitting himſelfe to him. There enſued in thoſe parts a very grieuous famine, and peſtilence, and the Emperor falling extremely ſick, dyed, without leauing any ſonne to ſucceed him; when he had raigned Emperor, little leſſe then twenty yeeres.

IN that I was longer then ordinarie in writing the life of the Emperor HENRY the Fourth, whom the Italian writers call the Third, I haue alreadie made my excuſe; which was, for that he raigned a long time, in which many great accidents happened: and as hee was a moſt warlike Prince, valiant, and high minded, ſo his raigne was troubleſome and vnquiet: by reaſon whereof, all men (excepting ſome few which tooke his part) were well pleaſed with his death, which (as it then ſeemed) brought to the eſtates of Italy and Germany, a cleere skie and deſired, after the cloudie ſtormes of cruell combuſtions: and to his ſonne HENRY, who was Emperor in his life time, all lay ſmooth before him: Colein, and all the other cities which had held againſt him, ſubmitted themſelues, yeelding their obedience; and the Duke of Lorraine ſubmitting himſelf, ſought his grace and fauour, and ſo he became abſolute

Lord ouer all: and then sent Ambassadours to Pope PASCAL, who with the assent of his Cardinals and of the Emperours Ambassadours, summoned a Councel to be held in October, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and six, in a citie of Lombardie called Gardacastello, vpon the riuer of Po; where many things touching the state of the Church both in Lombardy and in Germany were reformed: and the Pope deposed such as were not confirmed by his authoritie.

The Councell of Treca.

In the second yeere of this Emperour HENRY (the better to corroborate the peace betweene the Pope and him) it was agreed that the Pope should come into Germany to the citie of Auspurgh, where the Emperor (for certaine daies space) expected him: but the Pope vpon some iealousie & reposing smal trust in the people of that citie, by reason of their ancient hatred, came not, but went into France, where he assembled a Synode in a citie called Trecas; whither came a great number of prelates: and in that Councell amongst other matters which therein were handled, it was ordained, that the Emperours authoritie concerning the prelacies and Church dignities in Germany, should be abolished, and that he should not therein inuest prelates, contrarie to the Popes Canons and Decretals: which when he vnderstood, he sent to the Pope, intreating him not to determine so of the matter, but to allow him such right of donation, as his predecessors had done to the Emperor CHARLES the Great. This matter was greatly argued, but in the end it was deferred till the next generall Councell; and so the Pope returned to Rome, and the Emperour in his progresse visited sundrie cities of Germany; and vpon some occasion apprehended the Count Palatine of Rhine, whose name was SIGIFRED, and for a time held him prisoner: I call him of Rhine, for the difference betweene him and other Counties Palatine.

The warres of Hungary.

The warres of Poland.

At this time ALNIVS King of Hungary, came vnto him to complaine and to desire iustice against his brother COLOMAN, who had deposed him, and made himself king: whereupon the Emperor entred Hungary with an Army, purposing to haue restored him: but through want of victuals, and by meanes of other disasters and disgraces which befell him, he was driuen to retire without effecting aught; and so COLOMAN enioyed the kingdome, the Emperour permitting the same. There likewise grew warre betweene him and the Duke of Poland, who without his leaue, entitling himself King, denied to pay him any tribute, or to be subiect: to which warre hee went with a mightie Army (it behooued him to do so, for hee was to encounter a mightie enemie) and some write that they came to blowes, and that the Emperor had the victorie: but not without much bloudshed and great difficultie; and so Poland returned to the Emperors deuotion, and paid the tribute accustomed. In these actions and others of lesse moment, the Emperor spent little lesse then fiue yeers, which were in the beginning of his raigne: in the end of which, moued with a desire (common to al Emperors) to be crowned by the Pope, he resolued to come into Italy; and to that effect ordained a Diet or Councell to be held in Ratisbone; wherein shewing his intent, his departure by common consent was generally applauded: and leuying thirtie thousand choise men (besides the Princes and other voluntaries, which had a desire to serue and follow him in that iourney) he came into Italy, where other troupes of the states of Lombardy ioyned with him, and by the way befell many accidents, which I omit, to relate such as were of most importance.

The Emperor Henry the Fift came to Rome.

Afterwards taking his way towards Rome, many ambassages passed betweene him and Pope PASCAL; he requiring to be crowned, and the other promising the same; but vpon condition, which was, that he should relinquish his demand concerning the inuesting of prelates: about this matter some things so fell out, that the Pope grew iealous and mistrusted the Emperor. But in the end the Emperour promising to maintaine and obserue the priuileges and immunities of the church of Rome, and to desist from inuesting of prelates, as is aforesaid; the Pope sent a solemne ambassage to meete him, offering him amiable and friendly entertainment. Whereupon he came to the citie, vpon the twelfth day of February, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and eleuen, being the first Sunday in Lent, where he was solemnely receiued by all the Clergie and Romane people, with the greatest prouision, and shew of ioy, that the Pope and citizens could possibly make; and the Pope accompanied with al his Cardinals, attended his comming in S. PETER's Church porch. The Emperour with his Princes and men of warre being entred the gate of the Castle S. Angelo, alighting, mounted vp the steps to meete him, and kist his foote: and the Pope blest him, and raising him vp, three seuerall times embraced him: and then they went together into the Church, and comming to the high Altar, where the Pope that day was to say Masse, they sate downe vpon seates prouided for them; where the Emperor Emperor againe desired the Pope to confirme the priuileges which he and his predecessors had held, concerning the nomination of prelates, and the donation of Benefices; which the Pope absolutely denied. Some authors say, that the Pope requested the Emperour (in performance of his promise) to renounce the right which he chalenged to haue in ecclesiasticall causes; and that the Emperor therewith displeased, arose, and with his Germane Bishops and Princes went into a chappell (from whence hee sent him his answere; and denying what was required, persisted in his demand concerning the confirmation of his priuiledge: so as there was much striue and contention about the matter.

Some report this after another manner; which is no great maruel though it so happen amongst Historians; seeing that we daily reade, that when sundry men haue seene a matter which hath happened in their sight, yet the same men which then were present, haue afterwards related it after diuers manners, each one pretending to tell the truth. I say this, for that some men are so hard of beleefe, that if they finde any contrarietie amongst writers, they account the whole Historie to be a lie: which is too great a seueritie. But returning to my storie, I say, that although they differ herein, yet all Authors agree, that vpon this occasion the Emperours Captaines and Companies entred the Church; and the Masse being ended, by the Emperors order, the Pope was apprehended, together with the most part of the Cardinals, and that the Germans made boote or prize of the Bishops, Priests, and other the Popes friends.

Pope Pascal apprehended by the Emperor Henry the fift.

The Citizens and people of Rome, tooke this in such disgrace, that betaking them to their weapons, they went against the Imperialists, which held the Vaticane; where, fighting with incredible furie, they forced the Emperor to abandon that part of the Citie, and to withdraw himselfe to his Campe; betweene whom and the Citizens for three or foure daies space, were great skirmishes, and much blood was spilt, and many men were slaine of either side. Yet BLONDVS and some others report, that during the three daies that the fight lasted, the Emperor held the Vaticane, and that he being vnable to defend it, abandoned the same and went vnto his Campe, leading the Pope and his Cardinals with him prisoners. Finally, these three daies being past, he remoued his Armie, and pitcht his tents at the foote of Mount S. Syluester: and so marching forwards, left the Pope with some of his Cardinals in a place of strength, and there left he in another place, guarded with great troupes of souldiers, and then marched vp and downe the Countrie, burning and spoyling the Castles, Townes, and Villages, neere thereabouts; and so within some few daies after, with great furie returned to Rome, and sate downe before it; but the inhabitants were resolued not to receiue him, except hee would first set the Pope and his Cardinals at liberty: But he persseuering earnest in his demand, would haue his request first performed; imitating (in the action, although not in the intent) the Patriarch IACOB, who wrestling with the Angell, said, I will not let thee goe, except thou first blesse me. Wherefore the Pope to auoide further inconueniences, and to get out of the Prison wherein he was detained, came to a composition with the Emperour, and confirmed to him the priuilege of inuestiture which he required, and admitted and allowed those prelates which the Emperor had preferred and inuested. And so all being concluded, the Pope was conducted to Rome: and at the day appointed, the Emperour entred the Citie, and came into Saint PETERS Church, first setting a good guard in the Ports and Turrets of the Vaticane; and with the accustomed solemnitie was therein by the Pope crowned, with apparance of very great ioy and gladnesse generally, by reason of the wished peace, after so long and tedious warre.

Pope Pascal being released from the Emperors prison, crowned him Roman Emperor.

The coronation being ended, the Emperor (taking his leaue, and the Popes blessing with him for his good speede) departed from Rome very peaceably; and so passing through Italy, and the estate of Lombardy, he returned into Germany; where hauing made sufficient proofe that his father dying, and acknowledging his fault, desired to be forgiuen, he obtained leaue to burie him in the Church; which was performed with accustomed solemnity; and in Italy and in Germany generally was peace.

A little while after this, died that great and mighty Princesse MAVD, who was Lady of many Townes in Italy: This Lady after her death, left a great part of her estate to the Church, among which, is reckoned the Citie of Ferrara: but the Emperor FREDERICK neuertheless afterwards challenged to be her heire, by reason of the alliance betweene her and his mother. The Emperor being in England solemnizing his marriage with another MAVD, daughter to the King of that Countrie; Pope PASCAL at the request and perswasion of his Cardinals and Clergie, summoned a Councell of Bishops and Prelates of many Nations; in which Mawd the Empresse daughter of Henry the First, King of England, and wife of the Emperor Henry the fift.

Councell (amongst other matters) it was concluded; that the priuilege granted by the Pope to the Emperour, for the inuesting of Bishoppes and other Clergie men, should be reuoked, and held for none; sith it was exacted by force, the Pope being then his Prisoner; and for such they declared and published the same, excommunicating the Emperour, if he persisted in the execution thereof: in this Councell were one hundred Bishops, some Archbishops and Patriarchs, and all the Cardinals.

This being made knowne to the Emperour, he was much discontented for the same: and much more, after that he vnderstood that many of the principall prelates in Germany tooke part with the Pope against him, and had left his seruice; amongst which was ALDELBERT Archbishoppe of Mentz, a very mightie Prince, whom the Emperour commaunded to be apprehended, and held him aboue two yeeres Prisoner; whereof ensued many great tumults: And some Bishops were so hardie (being authorised by a Cardinall Legate in Hungary) as to excommunicate the Emperour: The number of those which conspired against him, daily encreasing, he fearing the like fortune as befell his father, appointed a Councell to be called in the Citie of Mentz, there to treate of those affaires; offering to stand to that which should be determined, and to right any wrong that he had done.

The day appointed for this Councell being come, and the Emperour therein appearing, so few made their repaire thither, that he was therewith much troubled, and highly discontented, and therefore with greater instance procured the assemblie, but it little auailed him: for before they could come, the inhabitants of Mentz mutined against him; as well for that he held their Bishop Prisoner, as for that in former time in the warres betweene him and his father, that Citie had endured much losse by his meanes: whereupon they putting themselues in Armes, went to the palace where he was, whereof they became masters, and of his person also; and threatning to kill him, they made him to promise satisfaction for the losses and injuries they had receiued, and that he should presently set their Bishop ALDELBERT at libertie: all which he promised and confirmed with an oath, in such manner that they holding themselues satisfied, left the Palace; and the Emperour departed, and in performance of his promise, presently released the Archbishop: but yet notwithstanding he continued much displeased, for the affront done him in that Citie, and no lesse with them which failed to come to the Councell. The next yeere, which was in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and sixteenth, he holding his Christmas in Spire, many prelates assembled themselues in the Citie of Coleyn, and with them some Princes, with a resolution to seeke to depriue him, for that he was excommunicated, and disobedient to the Church of Rome: which he (to his great disliking) hauing vnderstood, and desiring to redresse the same, sent his Ambassadors to that assemblie, promising to beare what should be imposed, and protesting that he was in all points ready to satisfie the Pope: but his Ambassage was ill receiued, and as ill answered; for they sent him word, that he should make his peace with the Pope, and conforme himself to his will; otherwise, they would neither serue, nor obey him, but generally would all forsake him. Whereupon hee tried his friends, seeking ayde by all meanes possibly; and as Princes neuer faile to finde some to helpe and assist them (some of duty, and others in hope of gaine) he gathered many men together, thinking to effect his businesse by force: and depriuing some of his aduersaries, which held with the Pope against him, of their estates, be bestowed many graces and fauours vpon his followers; and leuying a great Armie, resolued to goe into Italie, as well to be farre absent from the fury of Germany, as for that he purposed (as he gaue it out) to come to some agreement with the Pope: for he had newes (which were certaine) that through factions and partialities in Rome, which arose for that the Pope would not bestow the Prefecture, or office of Lord President, vpon the sonne of him which last presided, the most part of the people rebelled against him, and fought with such as took his part; and the matter came to this issue, that it behoued him to leaue Rome, and to goe into Pulia, where he was harboured by WILLIAM the Feudatorie Duke thereof, and by some other Princes.

The Emperor coming with his Army into Italy, he tooke his way directly for Rome: yet some write that he first sent his Ambassadors to the Pope, and requiring absolution vsed some complements; but for as much as he would not make such satisfaction as was required at his hands, the Pope would not absolue him.

Others write, that the Emperours Ambassadors found the Pope in Rome, and that he, vnderstanding of his comming, would not stay for him. But howsoeuer it was, he came to Rome with his wife without any resistance (but yet he found not the Pope there) hauing first made cruell warres in the territories of the Church as he came: And pretending that his coronation was violent, and done by force, although by the Pope, he therefore made himselfe to be crowned againe by an Archbishoppe, whose name was MAVRICE DE BRACHIA, whom he brought with him; the whole Clergie, together with the people of Rome murmuring thereat.

This being done, he departed thence, and made very cruell warres against all such townes as held for Pope PASCAL: But knowing that through his absence Germany was like to bee lost, for (as all writers affirm) at that time iustice and equitie took no place, and there were such warres, factions, robberies, insolencies and other disorders, as cannot be recited: Wherefore he marched with his Armie thitherwards, taking his way through Lombardy. Comming into Germany, with the aid of FREDERICK Duke of Sueuia, and of CONRADE Duke of Franconia, which were his Nephews (being his sisters sonnes) and of some other Princes which followed him, without any stay he went to make warre against the Duke of Saxony, who renouncing his obedience held for the Pope; with whom he fought a terrible battail, and had the victory; whereby his power and authoritie greatly encreased with those which had rebelled against him.

A battaile betweene the Emperor and the Duke of Saxony

While these things passed in Germany, Pope PASCAL came to Rome, and after some troubles which there arose, he departed out of this life, hauing been Pope thirteene yeeres and a halfe, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and eighteene: and in his place was chosen a Cardinall, whose name was IOHN, and was called GELASIVS the Second. About this time also died ALEXIVS the Emperour of Constantinople, and to him succeeded his son CALOIOANNES, as I haue said.

The Emperor hauing receiued newes of the death of Pope PASCAL, and of the Election of GELASIVS (seeing himselfe excommunicate, and shunned by many prelates and Princes, which neither serued him, nor saw him, although they warred not against him) setting the affaires of Germany in the best order he could, with a great Army, he came the third time into Italie, addressing his way to Rome, where Pope GELASIVS durst not stay his comming; for in Rome were partialities and factions against him. Whereof the Frangepanes (who were many in number, and of great power) were the chiefe; yet some others tooke his part, as the Cossi, the Normanes, the families of the Leoni, and the Colunnesi, which then beganne to growe great.

The Emperors third going to Rome.

The Pope being fled from Rome in his Gallies downe the riuer of Tiber; the Emperor comming thither, he pretended that the Election of GELASIVS was insufficient, for that he was chosen without his consent, and therefore procured such Bishops and prelates as were of his faction, to make that MAVRICE, who (as I said) crowned him, Pope: and they did so, and called him GREGORY; who being installed and lodged in the papall Palace, absolued the Emperour, and confirmed and ratified his donations and inuestitures: And hauing set vp this new Idol, whom the Romanes in disgrace called Burdino, the Emperor recommended him to the protection of the Frangepanes: who were so much discontented with the Election of GELASIVS, that they would haue killed him; and then tooke the field and spoiled the Lands of the Church, to make his Pope GREGORY Lord thereof. Which Pope GELASIVS vnderstanding, with the aide of WILLIAM Duke of Pulia, ROBERT Duke of Capua, RICHARD, and other great Lords of Italie, he leuied such an Army, that the Emperor doubting what would follow, published, that sith he was absolued of his excommunication, he meant to returne into Germany. And being departed, Pope GELASIVS (leauing the Army which he had raised) came to Rome; where, betweene such as took part with him, and the Frangepanes, which held with Pope GREGORY, were so many encounters, and so many men slaine, that he was driuen to forsake Rome, and (in a manner) to flie into France, where he died in the Monastery of Clunia, hauing been Pope almost one whole yeer and a halfe.

He being dead, CALIXTVS the Second was chosen, who before was called GVIDO; and before his comming to Rome, the Anti-pope GREGORY BVRDINO, departed thence, and went to a Towne that was called Sutrio, where what happened to him, you shall hereafter vnderstand.

The Emperour to auoide losse of time, presently when he came into Germany besieged the Citie of Mentz, against which hee bare an old grudge, for the injurie which he had receiued: and holding it straightly besieged, sundry insurrections were raysed against him; for such as before had shewed themselues his enemies, feared that he would now be reuenged on them all:

Wherfore

Wherefore with him, and againſt him, were euery where making of parties. ALDELBERT Archbiſhop of Mentz, with the aide of the Duke of Saxony, and of other Princes and Prelates, had a great Armie in a readineſſe: and of the contrary ſide, the Duke of Suevia, and others, had no leſſe on his behalfe; in ſuch manner as it was feared that great warres would haue enſued. But the Emperor (being perſwaded by ſome, his loyall ſeruants, and certaine other Eccleſiaſticall perſons, which interpoſed themſelues) inclined to peace, which was treated of; and all the differences and controuerſies were referred to the arbitrement of certain Princes of the Empire; and a Diet or Councell was appointed to be holden in the Citie of Wittenbergh, where all controuerſies ſhould be decided and ended: and it was ſo. And thoſe which were appointed to be Arbitrators and Iudges of this controuerſie, and of the reſt, being there aſſembled (and certaine Legates, as ſome ſay, being alſo there from Pope CALIXTVS) it was by common conſent determined, that through all Germany a generall and vniuerſall peace ſhould be proclaimed and kept betweene the Emperour, and all the Princes both Eccleſiaſticall and Secular; and that the Princes in like manner ſhould maintaine the ſame peace amongſt themſelues, vpon paine of death: And that whatſoeuer was taken from any Church, ſhould preſently be reſtored: and that the like ſhould be done by any thing withheld from the Emperours chamber of accounts or Exchequer: And that the like ſhould alſo be done betweene all eſtates, which had taken aught (from other) by violence: And that all matters in controuerſie ſhould be ſpeedily decided: And that iuſtice ſhould be equally adminiſtred in all parts: And that all offences and wrongs paſt ſhould be forgiuen and forgotten: And that theeues and robbers by the highwaies, ſhould be ſought out and puniſhed: And that ſuch order ſhould be taken, that the countrey ſhould be maintained in peace: For the due execution whereof, the moſt ſufficient perſonages that could be found, were appointed; and euery where was done all that was poſſible to further the ſame.

As touching the excommunication and the Popes fulminations and cenſures; and the differences betweene the Emperour and him, all was referred to be at Pope CALIXTVS his order and diſcretion; to whom the Emperour ſent Ambaſſadours about the ſame in great humilitie.

This being ended, Pope CALIXTVS ſent his Legate Alatere, and Ambaſſadours Cardinals, to another meeting or generall Diet held at Wormes; the Emperour being there preſent, where peace and concord was concluded betweene them: And the Emperour acknowledging the Pope for Chriſts Vicar here on earth, and vniuerſall Pope of the Church, deſired abſolution; and reſigned into the Legates hands, all the right and title that he could pretend to the inueſting of Prelates, and donation of any ſpirituall dignities; and then gaue vp the poſſeſſion of all Townes and goods belonging to any Church; and bound himſelfe to vſe his beſt meanes, that if any other Princes vſurped any, they ſhould be reſtored; and himſelfe to be obedient to the commandements and Injunctions of the Church, and to aide, protect, and defend the ſame. The Deedes and Letters-patents made hereof at large, were carried to the Pope, who allowed thereof, and gaue his Bull; whereby he granted that all the Prelacies and Abbeyes which in Germanie ſhould be voide, ſhould be prouided by the Election of the Chapters of the ſame Churches, and that the Emperour might be preſent at the Election: prouided alwaies that it ſhould not be made by force, or for bribes, or through any other kinde of Simonie; and that hee which was choſen might receiue from the Emperour, all that was meerely Laicall or Temporall; but muſt haue recourſe to the Sea of Rome for the reſt, according to the Popes Canons.

The Emperor reconciled to the Pope.

This being ended, the Emperour and all thoſe which ſtood excommunicate, were publikely abſolued, and then the Letters-patents and inſtruments were ſolemnly read; which befell in the Moneth of September, in the yeere of our Lord, one thouſand, one hundred, twenty two: But thus (ſaith CARION) the Conſtitutions and Imperiall Lawes made by CHARLES the Great, and maintained for the ſpace of three hundred yeers, by the ſeditious conſpiracy of his owne ſubiects, and a fatall ſucceſſe, in fauour of the Popes, almoſt in an inſtant, were made void and ouerthrowne: What miſeries fell both vpon Church and Common-wealth by this grant; What miſchiefes Popes haue done, being armed with this tyranny; what did they not attempt to ouerthrow the authority of Emperors, being much ſhaken? Finally, how often by their cruell practices, Germany being in combuſtion, hath taken Armes againſt it ſelfe, and imbrued her ſelf, with her own blood, our fore-fathers haue felt and lamented: By pretext of this Seſſion, the Popes haue violently taken the lawfull power of the Keyes of the vniuerſall Church, and haue fayned fayned themſelues to be diuinely conſtituted Lords and Iudges of all Churches, Biſhops, Paſtors and Kings: Finally, of the whole Chriſtian World, in all cauſes whatſoeuer: they forced Biſhops to take the power of their adminiſtration from them, and to the Keyes they added new diuine worſhip, and the making of new Lawes, which whoſoeuer ſhould infringe, it was lawfull for them to declare them members cut off from the bodie of Chriſt, ſeditious Hereticks, Schiſmaticks, and to damne them perpetually: Finally, by the weapon of excommunication, they haue vſurped earthly poſſeſſions, and haue ſettled and diſpoſſeſſed Kings.

The Emperour from thence went to Norenbergh, from whence he diſpatched the Popes Legates very well contented, with great gifts and preſents both for the Pope and themſelues, and they returned to Rome: By reaſon whereof Pope CALIXTVS and all the Romiſh Court made ſhew of great ioy, for the recouery of their loſt ſatte Sheepe: and truely they had great reaſon, for it much imported them; and they recouered him but by great good hap.

The Emperor abſolued from the Popes excommunication.

In this time ROGER Earle of Sicilia, who afterwards was King, and very mightie, being Vncle to WILLIAM Duke of Pulia and Calabria, knowing that WILLIAM was gone to marrie with the Emperours ſiſter of Conſtantinople, came into Italie, and by force tooke all that his Nephew held there; and hauing made himſelfe Lord thereof, he was called King of Italie; and afterwards leauing the title of Italie, he was called King of Sicilia: I haue reduced this to memory, to the end that the Reader may haue the better light of what ſhall be ſaid hereafter; and may alſo vnderſtand, that his ſucceſſors haue beene euer ſince called Kings of both Sicilies, which are Naples and Sicilia.

The Emperour HENRY being reduced to the Popes obedience; in little more then two yeeres which he liued afterwards, he had two warres, the one againſt the Hollanders, and the other againſt LEVES the French King: Againſt the Hollanders he went with an Armie, and ſubdued them; againſt the King of France he leuied a great Army, in the behalfe of his father in law, HENRY King of England; and marching towards France the warre ceaſed, and he returned; for the Citie of Wormes rebelled, and he went thither, and beſieging it, tooke it by compoſition, and puniſhed the offenders.

At this time in Rome died Pope CALIXTVS when he had beene Pope ſix yeeres, within two moneths; and in his place was choſen LAMBERT Biſhop of Oſtia, and was called HONORIVS the Second. CALIXTVS before his death ſent a great Army, vnder the command of a Cardinall, againſt Pope GREGORIE who liued in Sutrio; which beſieging the place, tooke him priſoner, and brought him to Rome, where he was ſhamefully (to diſgrace him) made to ride vpon a Cammell, and the Pope granted him his life vpon condition that he ſhould ſpend the reſt of his time in a Monaſterie.

In Germany the Emperour applied himſelfe to purchaſe the good will of his ſubiects, and to make himſelfe well beloued; taking warning by his fathers ſucceſſe. But there befell in all that Countrie ſo great a peſtilence and famine, that it was thought (as all writers affirme) that the third part of the people periſhed: for which calamitie and affliction, the Emperour being very ſorrowfull, fell ſick, and within few daies died, penitent for his ſinnes, deſiring God to forgiue the ſame. And although it pleaſed God to giue him a good death, yet he left neither ſon nor daughter that might ſucceede him, but two Nephewes which were his ſiſters ſonnes; the mightie Dukes of Suevia, and of Franconia, the one called FREDERICK, and the other CONRADE: ſome Authors call CONRADE Duke of Suinia, and others of Franconia: hee died the firſt day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord one thouſand one hundred twentie and fiue, when he had raigned about twenty yeeres: and thoſe which account but fourteen, reckon but from the time of his coronation in Rome; but I euer make my account from the day of his Election; His body was embalmed and borne to Spire, and there buried amongſt his Anceſtors.

The death of the Emperor Henry the fift.

When the Emperour HENRY died, in Conſtantinople raigned CALOIOANNES; who was an excellent Prince and very neceſſarie for that Empire. Hee was very liberall, loued iuſtice and equitie, and obtained many great victories in Aſia againſt the Turkes and Perſians, and recouered from them many Cities which his father and predeceſſours had loſt; His brother ISACIVS being Generall of his Armies, whom hee deerely loued, and leuied Italian ſouldiers in ſteed of Greekes. But with theſe vertues, enuying the Warres and Conqueſt which were made in Aſia, hee did greatly hinder the French and others which went thither, and for the ſame occaſion fell at variance with the Venetians, which which tooke from him by force certaine Ilands in the Archipelagus : of his end shall be spoken hereafter.

At this time in Ierusalem beganne the order of the Knights Templers, and also the order of the Knights of Saint IOHN, called afterwards of Rhodes, and now of Malta, where they inhabite.

THE LIFE OF LOTHARIVS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSCORE AND FIFTEENTH ROMAN Emperour; And of CALOIOANNES, Emperour of Constantinople.

THE ARGVMENT.

HEnry the fift being dead, Lothary Duke of Saxony was chosen Emperor: against whom Henries Nephewes (aspiring to the Empire) in the beginning of his raigne rebelled, who after many fortunes of warre, in the end became his subiects. He came into Italie, to the aide of Pope Innocent; against a Pseudo-pope which had driuen him out of Rome. The Emperor was no sooner returned into Germany, but the other Anti-pope, whose name was Anacletus (through the fauor and assistance of the King of Sicilia) made Pope Innocent to flie: Whereof the Emperor being aduertised, hee returned into Italie, and restored Innocent to his seate, and tamed Roger King of both the Sicilies. But returning victorious towards Germany, he died in the Mountaines of Trent; when he had ruled the Empire fourteene yeeres, leauing neuer a sonne, that might succeede him in the Empire.

THE two HENRIES, father and sonne, which held the Empire seuentie yeers, being dead; LOTHARY Duke of Saxony, a mighty Prince (like as his predecessors had beene before him) was chosen Emperor. His house euer (or for the most part) was enemy to the Emperour HENRY, and to his house and familie, and rebelled against him: wherefore for his vertues, and for the worthines of his person, many of the Princes and people of Germany, as soone as the Emperour HENRY was dead, fixed their eyes vpon him, to the end to haue him for their Emperor and Soueraigne Lord: for they hauing been likewise enemies to HENRY, stood in feare of his Nephewes, CONRADE and FREDERICK, Dukes of Sueuia, and Francconia, who had euer held with him; and for the same reason, the two brothers sought by all meanes that the one of them might haue beene Emperour, and with all their might withstood LOTHARY. These two brothers (as I said) were Nephews to the Emperor HENRY the Fift, and his sisters sonnes, who was the daughter of the Emperour HENRY the Fourth. LEOPOLD Marquesse of Austria, and CHARLES Earle of Flanders, by reason of their estates and power, sought also to haue gotten the Empire. These foure great Princes being competitors, by the procurement and industry of ALBERT, Archbishoppe of Mentz, who remembring that he had beene imprisoned, and ill entreated by HENRY, for contradicting his friends; found meanes to draw the Princes Electors to meete at Mentz, where they chose LOTHARY Duke of Saxony, Emperor. Wherewith CONRADE and FREDERICK were so much discontented, that in lieu of doing him homage as to their Emperor, they rebelled against him as their enemy : and in him wanted neither will nor industry to persecute them.

Lothary the second chosen Emperor.

First, he sent to Pope HONORIVS the Second, to complaine of them; who approued and was well pleased with the election of the Duke of Saxony; for as much as by that house the Popes had euer been relieued and supported; wherefore he might easily obtain of the Pope, to command them (by his censures) to yeeld their obedience. But these two brothers (taking Armes) found so many friends, and their Lands and Countries were such and so great, that a cruell warre began between them; which I omit, for that I finde it briefly written : yet it continued many daies, and came to that issue, that CONRADE the elder of these two brethren, with the help of his brother FREDERICK, and of GODFREY Count Palatine of the Rhine, was called Emperor : and raising the greatest power that he was able (leauing his brother in Germany to make head against LOTHARY) he went into Italy, and took many Imperiall cities in the state of Lombardy; where the Archbishop of Milan crowned him with the Crown of iron: by reason whereof, Pope HONORIVS afterwards depriu'd him of his Archbishoprick, and set another in his place : and the Emperor LOTHARY being thus distressed, knowing that HENRY of Bauiere (who was called the Proud, and was descended from the linage of the famous GVELPHONS; of which, the Abbat WESPERGENSIS and other Authors make so great account) was a mighty Prince and very valiant, he practised with him to marry his onely daughter, whose name was GERTRVDE; and to the end that he should be a faithfull and loyall seruant vnto him, he gaue him with her for her dowry, the title and succession of the Duchie of Saxony, which after his death he enjoyed, and was Lord of both estates : yet afterwards in processe of time there were alterations in them, and in others; whereof I will make no speciall relation, for that it requireth too long a time : yet I will sometimes speak thereof as occasion shall be offered.

The Duke of Bauiere, and other Princes now helping the Emperor with all their powers, made cruell warre in CONRADE's Countries, whil'st that he was busie about his Coronation in Lombardy, with intent to haue gone to Rome. But as he had leuied mo men than he was able to pay, and wanted means to giue them satisfaction, he was driuen to return into his Country, and to join with his brother; and being returned, was not of power able to make head against the Emperor, or at the least to go through with what he had begun : whereupon he sought to make some agreement with him, and to obtain his fauour; which was effected (as saith the Abbat WESPERGENSIS) at the intercession of Saint BERNARD, he renouncing the name and title of Emperor, and giuing other security to serue him as a Subject : the like did his brother FREDERICK. And so ended the Emperor LOTHARY this warre, which (as he writeth) was very bloudy : during the which, in Rome died HONORIVS the Second, hauing bin Pope fiue yeers; and to him succeeded INNOCENTIVS the Second, a Roman born, who as soon as he was Pope, resolued to haue driuen ROGER Earle of Sicilia out of Pulia; where ROGER was called King of Italy (as I said in the end of the life of the Emperour HENRY) hauing taken the same from WILLIAM, who was his Nephew, or (as some say) his cosin germane : and leuying a great Army for those warres, he went thither in person. But for as much as Authors differ in the recitall thereof (the Italians accounting it to be at this time, that the Pope was taken prisoner there : and the Germanes affirme it to haue happened in the time of CONRADE the Third, who succeeded LOTHARY) we will therefore leaue it vntill that time; in which it seemed most likely to haue passed.

But here we will speake of another disaster, which befell Pope INNOCENTIVS; which was, that with the fame of his imprisonment, or (as I rather beleeue) of his death; a mighty Romane, of great power, whose name was PETER LEO, came to Rome, publishing the news thereof: and procuring fauour and assistance, was chosen Pope, and called ANACLETVS; who taking all the Gold and Siluer out of the Temples and Churches, and giuing the same to his followers, grew to be of such power, that Pope INNOCENTIVS being returned to Rome, could not make his partie good against him, but was constrained in a manner by flight, to get him into France, and from thence into Germany, to the Emperor LOTHARY; who by reason of the peace and agreement betweene him and Duke CONRADE, was growne very rich and of great power; who giuing him very good entertainment, offered to goe in person to restore him to his estate: and although that the affaires of Germany were not yet throughly settled, yet he in short space made ready a faire Army, and they both together departed towards Italie, but by seuerall waies, diuiding their Army, to the end to march the more commodiously: and againe meeting neere to Rome, were there receiued, where Pope ANACLETVS durst make no resistance; whom his friends had hid so secretly, as at that time, he could not be found; which was in the sixt yere of the Emperors raigne: And so with great solemnity Pope INNOCENT was restored to his chaire; and with the like or greater, the Emperor LOTHARY was by him crowned; and within few daies after, returned with his Army into Germany, not finding any contradiction or resistance.

The Emperour LOTHARY being arriued in Germany, and hauing by the consent of the Princes thereof summoned a Councell to bee held there: By the Authority of the Empire, hee resolued to goe himselfe in person against the Duke of Polonia, because hee refused to pay the Tribute, in acknowledgement of superioritie, which he ought for the space of twelue yeeres behinde-hand, vnpaid: But the Polacres not daring to stand to the hazard of Warre; the Duke accompanied with men of peace, came forth of his Countrie to receiue the Emperour; whom the Emperour would not see, neither admitte into his presence, before such time as hee had paid him all the arieareages due for so many yeeres past; and the Duke accomplishing the same, came to see the Emperour in the Duchie of Saxony; whither being comn, and hauing promised to perform the premisses, he return'd home in peace.

At the same time the King of Hungary sent his Ambassadors and presents, in acknowledgement of superiority. Pope INNOCENT in the meane time had ill successe; for within few daies after the Emperours departure out of Italy, and that he had called a Councell to be held in the City of Spire; Pope ANACLETVS aforesaid (through the fauour and assistance of his friends and kinsfolks, and of ROGER which was called King of the two Sicilies) returned againe to Rome, and tooke vpon him as Pope, being already Lord of the Citie, and of some other fortresses: whereupon Pope INNOCENT sent to the Emperour, imploring his aide and succor, to restore him to his dignity.

The Emperor setting the affairs of Germany apart, and raising a greater Army then at the first; within short space came into Italie; with whom (besides those which the Abbat WESPERGENSIS setteth downe) came his sonne in law HENRY Duke of Bauiere, with great and very good troups of men of warre: OTHO FRISINGENSIS saith, that CONRADE Duke of Sueuia, which in former time had beene his enemy, came with him also: and being arriued in Italie, entring Lombardy, he found great warre and dissension between the Cities of Cremona, and of Milan, and he as soueraigne Lord, tooke vpon him to decide the cause of their difference; and finding those of Cremona to be faultie, he proceeded against them; and they rebelling were by him subdued by force. From thence he went to the Citie of Pauia, and so to Bolonia, visiting and pacifying the other Cities of Lombardy; which through ciuill contention, and the long absence of the Emperours, were in a manner at liberty, and tyrannized; all which he subdued and brought to subjection: and from thence (sending his sonne in law with the one halfe of his Army into Tuscane, to receiue the Pope, which lay in Pisa) he himself by another way went with the rest into the Marca di Ancona, wherein he assaulted and tooke many townes which rebelled; as well against him as against the Church of Rome; which he recouered and restored. Afterwards joyning with the Pope and with his son in law HENRY, he took his way towards Rome, where he restored the Pope to his seate and Palace; and thence marched forwards, to warre against ROGER, who with the helpe of his friends and subjects, had raised a great Army, vaunting in braue tearmes, that he would fight with the Emperor. But ROGER shamefully retiring without daring to meete him, put his men into garrisons, to defend his countries; but the Emperor followed the warres with such expedition and courage, that within short space he became Lord of Pulia, and Calabria, and of all the rest that ROGER held; and constrained him to flie out of Italy, and to get him into Sicily. And to the Emperor at his being there came Ambassadors from CALOIOANNES Emperor of Constantinople, to congratulate his victories obtained against ROGER, whom he much hated, and against whom he had afterwards great warres.

Roger king of Sicil a driuen out of Italy.

At this time died the Antipope ANACLETVS. And so the Emperor finding no resistance in Italie (hauing subdued the rebellious, and rewarded and honoured those which had faithfully and valiantly serued him, in such manner that they write of him, that since the time of CHARLES the Great, not any Emperor had euer liued there in so great power and authority) he returned into Germany: but before his departure, he bestowed vpon a great German Prince, who was his neere kinseman and fauorite, whose name was RAYNOLD, the State of Pulia, with the title of Duke thereof, which he tooke from ROGER. About which gift, notwithstanding that the Pope was well content therewith, OTHO FRISINGENSIS (who was an eye witnesse and an Author of those times) writeth, that there was some difference betweene the Emperour and the Pope; The Pope alleaging the Countries of Pulia and Calabria to be subject and feudatory to the Church of Rome; and that the fauor and title which was giuen to RAYNOLD, should haue beene giuen by him, and not by the Emperor: but in the end, a meane was found, that it was done in both their names; and the Armes and Ensignes of Duke, were giuen to RAYNOLD by them both; and so RAYNOLD remained a Duke; and the Emperor departing, left many good men of warre with him, whereof he afterwards stood in neede, as you shall heare: And so leauing the Pope in Rome, he returned towards his countrey, triumphing of his victories. Vpon the way comming to the Mountaines of Trent, he fell so grieuously sick, that vnable to trauell any further, he died in a little village, in the thirteenth yeere after that he was chosen Emperor, and in the seuenth after his coronation in Rome, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred thirty and eight: his body was carried into Saxony, and there most sumptuously entombed, and by his death grew great alterations, both in Italy and Germany, as shall be related.

He left no more children behinde him when he died, but his only daughter GERTRVDE, who (I said) was married to HENRY Duke of Bauiere; for his onely sonne called LOTHARY died a childe before him.

In the time of this Emperour (as he was a great Iusticer) the lawes and institutions collected by the Emperor IVSTINIAN, were againe reuiued and tooke effect; which through the diuision and declining of the Empire, were growne out of vse, and in a manner quite forgotten; and VERNERIVS whom ACVRSIVS (a glosser vpon the ciuill law) calleth YRNERIVS, sought, and tooke out of the auntient Libraries, the bookes of the lawes which IVSTINIAN had compiled, and abbreuiated out of the institutions of the Pretors and Ediles, and auntient Emperors; which lay forgotten, and euen lost: and hee corrected and reduced the same into the best form he was able; which the Emperor LOTHARY commanded to be read in Schooles, and that all Pleas should bee determined by them; and so it is obserued vnto this day.

A reformation in the Ciuill law.

Within a while after this, these lawes beganne to be glosed vpon by AZO a famous Doctor; and afterwards succeeded ACVRSIVS: and they haue still so encreased, that since that time there haue been many great and famous men in that facultie; which hold the greatest authority and degree in the estate and gouernment of all Common-wealths. In Constantinople yet raigned CALOIOANNES, warring against the Infidels, and against ROGER King of Sicily.

THE LIFE OF CONRADE, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSCORE AND SIXTEENTH ROMAN Emperour. And therein is treated of CALOIOANNES, and of his sonne EMANVEL, Emperours of Constantinople.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter Lothary succeeded Conrade, Nephew to the Emperor Henry the Fift; who was chosen by the Electors, and confirmed by the Popes Legate. He was in the beginning of his raigne disturbed by the sonne in law of Lotharius, who withheld from him the Imperiall ensignes; and not only refused to deliuer them, but also to yeelde him any obedience; whereupon the Emperor proclaimed him Rebell, and tooke from him by force many estates: but this warr had so many variable accidents, that the Emperor therein spent seuen yeeres, during which time, he tooke no great care how matters went in Italie. He went to the warres of the Holyland, and being comn iato his enemies Countries, receined so great an ouerthrow, as there scarcely remained the tenth man of those which went with him. After this rout, he prosecuted his attempt, in company of the French King, from whom he afterwards departed; holding his being with him for dishonorable. He returned thither the third time, and together with the Kings of France and of Ierusalem, did nothing of any account. Afterwards, sith it pleased not God to fauor the proceedings of the Christians in this enterprise, eyther of the Princes returned into his Countrey: And the Emperor being comn into Germany, whilst he was making preparation for his going into Italy, to be crowned, died (as many men thought) of poyson, in the fifteenth yeer of his raigne.

HAue already related how that the Emperor LOTHARY married his only daughter to HENRY Duke of Bauiere (called the Proud) who was a valiant and mighty Prince; and that he gaue him the title of Duke of Saxony, which was his house and patrimonie: and that this HENRY did him great seruice in his journey into Italy, and also against the two mightie brethren, CONRADE and FREDERICK, Dukes of Sueuia and Franconia, who were his enemies a long time: for when LOTHARY was chosen Emperor, they thought to haue had it for one of themselues, being Nephews to the deceased Emperor HENRY the Fift, and Grand-children of the Emperour HENRY the Fourth. When-as the Emperour LOTHARY was dead, his sonne in law HENRY Duke of Bauiere, who came with him, and was already called Duke of Saxony, gat into his custody the Imperiall Ensignes; as the Scepter, the Crosse, the Crowne, and the Globe, imagining that he should haue had vse for them, for that he thought to haue beene Emperour, but they were of little vse to him: For the two brethren, CONRADE and FREDERICK Dukes of of Sueuia and Franconia (afore named) were of so great power and authoritie, as assembling the Princes Electors in Confluence (where the Riuer of Mosella joyneth with the Rhine, THEODORICVS a Cardinall and the Popes Legate being there present) CONRADE was chosen Emperour, and all the Princes sware to him homage and obedience; which the Saxons and Bauarians onely opposed with HENRY their Lord, and his brother GVELPHO, who was a great and valiant Prince. Whereupon the new Emperor called a generall Diet or Councell to be held in the citie of Bambergh, whither came the widow Empresse, late wife to LOTHARIVS, and the Deputies of Saxony, to acknowledge and yeeld obedience vnto him; But Duke HENRY would not appeare, neither would he send the Imperiall Ensignes which he had in his power: and so by all the Princes there assembled, with the Emperours authoritie, he was enioyned to appeare and to send the Ensignes aforesaid, by the feast day of Saint PETER and PAVL then next following; which he did (for he durst doe no other) but would not come himselfe in person: Whereupon the Emperor (desiring to be at peace) after two or three summons, enjoyned him, within a certaine prefixed time, to make his appearance in the Citie of Ausburgh; for which purpose he presently caused a Councell to be summoned, and made great preparation, meaning to haue proceeded against him with all rigour and seueritie.

Conrade chosen Emperor.

The Councell being assembled, HENRY accompanied with many men of warre, of Saxony and of Bauiere, came neere to that place where it was held, and lodged his Campe, and began to treate of meanes to come to the Emperors obedience; which treaty continued three daies without any conclusion: for the Emperour required him to resigne certain lands which his father in law the Emperor LOTHARY had giuen him: but the Emperor holding himselfe not in safety in that Citie, departed without any speech of his remouing, vntill he was gone, and went to the Citie of Herbipoli: where many Princes meeting, by the generall consent of them all, he pronounced sentence against HENRY of Bauiere; whereby he condemned him in the losse of all his estates: and many great matters happened, which we will declare, when we haue told you what befell in Italie to the Pope and to Duke RAINOLD, whom the Emperour LOTHARY made Duke of Pulia and Calabria, with ROGER King of Sicily; which passed in this manner:

As soone as the Emperor LOTHARY was dead, there grew so great alterations and troubles in Italy, that ROGER in great haste raised his forces, and went into Pulia, with a resolution to haue reconquered those Countries, whereof he was dispossessed: But RAINOLD had so good men with him, that he fought with him in battell, and ouerthrew him; so as he was driuen to returne with losse of part of his Army: And being busied about making new preparation for the same enterprise, RAINOLD died in the time of his good fortune; so as without any great difficultie, ROGER recouered all the Countries of Pulia and Calabria, which he first tooke from his Nephew, and which had been his grand-fathers. Pope INNOCENT seeing what passed, he sent to the Emperor to desire him to come into Italie, or to send an Army to driue ROGER out of that Countrey: but for as much as the succours came slowly (as writeth GOTHIFREDVS VITERBIENSIS) the Pope leuied a great Army, and went against ROGER: but as he was no very expert man of warre, so by a deuice his Army was ouerthrowne, and himselfe together with his Cardinals taken prisoner. But ROGER making a conscience of the matter, set both him and all his Cardinals at liberty: for which his liberality and courtesie the Pope confirmed him King of Sicilia; and ROGER as his liege man did homage to the Pope, calling his Countries the Church Patrimony; and so remayned ROGER and his successors kings of Sicilia, and Lords of Pulia and Calabria, and was a very mighty Prince.

Warres between the Pope and Roger King of Sicilia: wherein the Pope was ouerthrown, and taken prisoner, with all his Cardinals.

This being passed, ROGER fearing the Emperors comming into Italie, he sent to solicite HENRY the proud, and his brother GVELPHO, with Letters and money to beare Armes against the Emperour CONRADE, with whom they already had great warres; for HENRY the Proud being condemned by the Emperour, in the losse of all his estates of Bauiere and Saxony; and the Emperour hauing giuen the Duchie of Saxony to ALBERT cousin-germane to the Duke; and Bauiere to LEOPOLD sonne to the Marquesse of Austria (who was the Emperours mothers brother) so as all was in combustion, and the warre was prosecuted with great cruelty, the one party seeking to hold and to defend their estates, and the other to get the same: and he which chiefly followed this warre was GVELPHO, brother to HENRY the Proud; for HENRY now by reason of his old age could not well beare Armes; and hauing prouided a very good Armie, the Emperour went against GVELPHO, and fought a battaile with him, Warres between the Emperor & the duke of Bauiere and Saxony.

which was very doubtfull, for GVELPHO was an excellent Captaine and very valiant: but he being ouer-matched, was ouerthrowne, and lost many of his men, both Bauarians and Italians; which ROGER King of Sicilie had sent to his aide, and he himselfe escaped by flight. But he was a man of so haughtie a minde, and therewith vsed such industry and expedition, that within few daies he reinforced his Army; and sought aide of the King of Hungary, who repined at the prosperity of the Empire, for that he would not acknowledge any superiour: and so to his ayde came many Calabrians and Sicilians, sent by ROGER King of Sicilie; and the Emperour of necessitie was driuen to doe the like, and made his eldest sonne called HENRY Generall of his Army, who afterwards died before his father: and he besieged a Towne called Winsperg And lying before it, his sonne HENRY, neer to a place called Elnosen, fought a battaile with GVELPHO, in which, some of GVELPHO his partie (which were Italians) cryed, GVELPHO, GVELPHO, after the name of their Generall; and the Imperialists cryed, GIBELLIN, GIBELLIN, for that HENRY their Generall was bred vp in a place so called.

The originall of the Guelfs and Gibelins.

Some Authors affirme, that vpon this occasion it afterwards followed, that in the controuersies betweene the Emperours and Popes, the Imperialists tooke their name of Gibellins; and the Popes partie, Guelphs. And from hence sprang the cruell factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins in Italie: Heerof are other opinions, which import not much to be treated of in this place.

The battell was very cruell, but GVELPHO his troupes (being of diuers Nations and conditions) did not so well second and relieue one another, as HENRIE's did, so as GVELPHO was likely to haue been ouerthrowne. And finding no other remedie, to auoide a further danger, he abandoned the field, and HENRY apparantly had the victory: who after that he left the pursuit, joyned with his father the Emperour at the siege of Winsperg; which being greatly distressed, yeelded to mercy. But all the grace the Emperor would grant to the inhabitants, was to permit all the women which were in the Town, freely to depart, and to haue to their owne vse whatsoeuer they could beare on their backs: Whereupon they vsed a commendable and memorable deceit, which was, that as they went forth of the Towne, each of them tooke her husband vpon her back, and those which had none, tooke their children or brothers, and so comming into the fields, set them at libertie: and notwithstanding that FREDERICK the Emperours brother alleaged that it was deceit and cosonage, and therefore not to be permitted; neuertheless the Emperor held it for well done, and commended them for the same. And truely I hold it for one of the most memorable acts done by women that euer I read of.

A commendable deceit vsed by women in Germany.

Through these two ouerthrowes, the partie of GVELPHO, and of his brother HENRY the Proud, was so broken and weakened, as ALBERT, to whom the Emperour had giuen the title of Duke of Saxony, had time and oportunitie to make himselfe Lord thereof: And LEOPOLD, to whom he had giuen the Duchie of Bauiere, made daily Conquest of more and more of that Countrey. Duke HENRY seeing this, came disguised to such places as held for him in Saxony, where he vsed such effectuall speeches, and wrote so pittifull Letters to his friends and subjects, that they being moued therewith, repaired vnto him in such order, that ALBERT was driuen to flie to the Emperour for helpe; and HENRY the Proud hauing this good successe, and being in hope to haue preuailed, died; after whose decease, the Saxons in despite of the Emperour, tooke a sonne of his called also HENRY, for their Lord; and they recouered great part of that estate: But LEOPOLD was seised of the greatest part of the Duchie of Bauiere, who (as I said) was the Emperours mothers brother: GVELPHO as soone as his brother HENRY the Proud was dead, was called Duke of Bauiere, pretending that it did belong vnto him by inheritance: and many friends repairing vnto him, cruell warres beganne between him and LEOPOID, and GVELPHO ouerthrew LEOPOLD in a battaile: The Emperour seeking redresse (to the end he would not at one time haue so many Irons in the fire together) compounded and made peace with the Saxons, marrying the widow Ducheese of Saxony, daughter to the Emperour LOTHARY, with whom HENRY the Proud had that Dukedome, of the greatest part whereof his sonne HENRY was then in possession: and this being effected, he resoluted to aide LEOPOLD against GVELPHO: but in the meane time LEOPOLD died, and with the same trouble his sonne called HENRY had the Duchie of Bauiere, against whom (with no lesse courage and diligence) GVELPHO prosecuted the warre: But CONRADE assisting his cousin-Germane the new Duke, neither GVELPHO nor his Nephew phew HENRY Duke of Saxony, could preuaile against him; notwithstanding that GVELPHO was a warlike and valiant Captain.

CONRADE hauing spent six or seuen yeeres of his raigne in these ciuill wars, a voyage was pretended to Ierusalem; which although it had no great good successe, yet it was good and commendable. And to the end that you may the better vnderstand the same, it shal be requisite briefly to set downe the most important causes thereof, and the estate wherein the affaires of Graecia then stood, and of Italie also; which was in this manner: The Christians hauing possessed Ierusalem, and many other Cities in Syria and Mesopotamia, now aboue fiue and forty yeers, and hauing performed wonderfull matters in their continuall warres against the Infidels, which they waged at what time as CONRADE was busie about this quarrell; FVLCO sonne-in-law to BALDVVIN, being then the fourth King of Ierusalem, and hauing done great exploites against the Sarazins, there arose some controuersies betweene some Princes, Dukes of certaine places in the East; and so betweene them, and CALOIOANNES, Emperor of Constantinople, which gaue occasion to the King of Persia his Captaines, to doe much harme in the countries which the Christians possessed: against whom, FVLCO King of Ierusalem made the greatest resistance he was able, and did many worthie exploits.

The Emperor Conrade his attempt for the conquest of Ierusalem.

Then ensued the death of the Grecke Emperor, who had raigned six and twentie yeeres: And although that hee had troubled the state of the East, yet neuertheless by reason of his great power he was much feared of the Infidels; and died of a small wound giuen him in the left hand with a poysoned arrow: by his last will and testament, he ordained his youngest sonne for his successor, for that his eldest sonne was incapable of the gouernment. The state of Syria being thus troubled, FVLCO King of Ierusalem went to encounter a great Armie of Turks and Persians, which came against the citie of Antioch; and ioyning in battaile, ouerthrew and slew three thousand of them: whereupon the Soldane King of Persia, whose name was ALAPH, drew together all his whole power, and came before Edissa, a very mightie citie in Mesopotamia, which the Christians had held fiue and fortie yeeres; which citie by the Iewes is called Aracna, and is very famous, through the fertilitie and greatnes thereof; and for that it was the place, whither TOBIAS sent his sonne TOBIAS to GABELVS for his mony, and the same was conuerted to the Christian faith by THADEVS; and adorned with the bones of S. THOMAS the Apostle, and at this time was inhabited and frequented by excellent Christians: But ALAPH comming in person against it, King FVLCO not being able to relieue the citie, it was taken and sackt; wherein the Infidels vsed such cruelties and villanies, as haue not been heard of: some writers reckon the losse of this citie to haue happened after the decease of King FVLCO: but PLATINA and BLONDVS relate it as I haue done.

After the losse of this citie, another great misfortune ensued, which was the vnhappie death of FVLCO King of Ierusalem in this manner: As he was busie, applying himself to recouer this lost citie, and to leuie new troupes of souldiers, being one day in the fields hunting the Hare, his horse fell with him, and his head fell vnder the backe part of the saddle, wherewith hee was bruised, and so sore hurt, that losing both his speech and senses, hee died within three daies, leauing behinde him two young sonnes, the eldest of which called BALDVVIN, had the title and kingdome of Ierusalem: but through the want of FVLCO, and other occasions, the Infidels daily took townes, and did much hurt to the Christians.

The death of Fulco King of Ierusalem.

Pope INNOCENT and the Christian Princes vnderstanding how matters went in the East, and being sorie to heare thereof (as indeede they had reason, especially for the losse of the great citie of Edissa) they began to consult of some redresse and reliefe for the same; and as S. BERNARD was then in great credit and very famous, he took vpon him to perswade the Christians Princes, to goe in person to this warre, Pope INNOCENT giuing him in charge to performe that action; which Pope hauing held that seate the space of fourteene yeeres, died (as saith PLATINA) in the yeere of our Lord 1144. and to him succeeded CELESTIN the Second, who was Pope but fiue moneths; and he being dead, LVCIVS the Second was made Pope, in whose time (as saith PLATINA and BLONDVS) S. BERNARD vndertook this enterprise; and as others say, in the time of INNOCENTIVS. This difference doth not discredit the authors: for the losse of the citie of Edissa, and the death of King FVLCO, and other matters which happened in the East, passed at seuerall times, and might happen in the time of all these Popes, for the small time they liued: for LVCIVS the Second was not Pope fully one yeere, and this was in the time of his successor EVGENIVS. I say then that by meanes of the Popes Letters, together with the perswasion of S. BERNARD, LEVVES who then was king of France, taking for his deuice the signe of the Crosse determined with many great Lords and Knights of his countries, to goe to this warre in the East, in the behalfe of the King of Ierusalem; and leuying an Army, BERNARD went into Germany to the Emperor CONRADE (whose life we write) and obtained of him to doe the like, as the French King pretended to doe: where- to he willingly and speedily prepared himselfe; and it pleased God that this iourney was so well liked of by all men, that notwithstanding that there were very sharpe and hot warres betweene the Emperor, and GVELPHO with his adherents, yet GVELPHO notwithstanding offered to goe this iourney with him, and to do him seruice therein. And so the Emperour and the French King (by their Letters) agreed to goe to that enterprise personally. But forasmuch as they both could not conueniently march together in companie, by reason of the great multitudes of their people; it was concluded that the Emperor should first set forwards (and so he did) in the yeere of our Lord 1147, according to most authors, yet some write one yeere lesse: and he departed, accompanied by these Princes, FREDERICK Duke of Sueuia, sonne to his brother FREDERICK deceased, the Duke of Lorraine, the Earle of Flanders and Friseland, the Marquesse of Austria, and GVELPHO his former cruell enemie, but then his seruant and companion, whome the Emperor in all that iourney called fellow souldier, and made great account of his person, with many other Princes and Lords of great account. In this all authors agree, that of the Emperors owne forces, with the forces of these Princes, together with the aduenturers, which came from al parts, vpon the report of so zealous an enterprise, his Army amounted to the number of threescore and tenne thousand horse, and (in a manner) as many foote: with which, marching through Austria and Hungary, he directed his iourney towards Constantinople; where he was very ioyfully and honourably receiued by the Emperor EMANVEL, son to CALOIOANNES; and his troupes were lodged in townes and places neere at hand; and staying there some few dayes, he crossed ouer the straight of Constantinople with his whole Armie, with lesse store of victuals then was needfull in such an action, through the Emperour of Constantinople his counsell and default, who promised to furnish him with all things necessarie; and so hee marched through the Emperors Countries, in Asia the lesse, and had Greekes for his guides, such as well knew the Country.

The Emperor Conrade and Lewes King of France went to Ierusalem.

Passing through the Prouince of Licaonia, which bordereth vpon Galacia, in the middest of Asia the lesse, being in his enemies Country in great want of victuals, all his guides in one night forsooke him: which, as some write, was thought to haue been done by the direction of the Emperor of Constantinople, who of malice or enuie repined at this war. Others imagine that they stood in feare, and fled, for that they saw the Army so vnprouided of victualls, or for that they had missed of their way: but howsoeuer it was, the Emperour stayed neere to the Citie of Iconium, which is in Silicia, and (as some say) besieged the same, for that it was rich, well furnished, and of great importance, thinking in short time to haue taken it. But forasmuch as victuals came not according to the trust he reposed in the Greekes; his people within few daies space endured extream hunger and sickues; and falling sick of the chaulk which (as some write) the Greeks did put into their meale, they dyed.

Treatherie of the Emperors guides.

The Emperor seeing himself thus distressed in his enemies countrie, and his friends being doubtfull and variable in their opinions, whether they should goe forwards, or retire (either of which was perillous) in the meane time, so great a multitude of Turks, Persians, and other heathen nations (knowing the distresse wherein the Christians were) assaulted his Campe, in such manner, that his person and Armie were in danger to haue been wholly lost (God in his secret iudgement, permitting it): and the Emperor knowing no better course to be taken, came to a battaile with them; some say two, and that the fight continued two daies together, one after another: and as the greatest part of his Army was sickly, and almost hunger-starued; so after that they had done what they possibly were able, they were broken and ouerthrowne; and so many of them were slaine and taken prisoners, that there remained little more then the tenth man of his Army; with which he escaped by flight, and therein endured extreame hunger and many daungers; and stayed not any where vntill he came to the citie of Nicea, in the prouince of Bythinia, in Asia the lesse, which was subiect to the Greeke Empire; where gathering together the remainder of his Army (which from many parts, held by Christians, came thither to him) he determined to attend the comming of LEVVES the French King, who was alreadie vpon the way. This ouerthrow happened in the moneth of Nouember, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand, one hundred fourtie and seuen.

The Emperor Conrade ouerthrowne by the Sarazens.

At what time as the Emperour CONRADE was thus ouerthrowne by the Infidels, the French

French King was come from Constantinople into Bythinia; where he had been well receiued and lodged by the Emperour EMANVEL: and within few daies after that the Emperour CONRADE was departed from Germany, Pope EVGENIVS the Third, which succeeded LVCIVS, flying from Rome, came to him in France, by reason of certaine mutinies raised against him in Rome, for the people would haue placed certaine citizens in the gouernment of the citie; and the Pope finding the King ready to depart, encouraged him to proceede in his iourney, and gaue him his holy benediction; and the King in requitall gaue him men and money, wherewith he returned to Rome, and was with much obedience there receiued.

King LEVVES of France being arriued in Asia, and vnderstanding nothing of the Emperors misfortune; FREDERICK Duke of Sueuia, Nephew to the Emperor, came to him, and certified him of their ouerthrow: wherefore the King hastened his iourney, and finding the Emperor in Nicea, he recomforted and perswaded him to proceede in his company; which he then willingly did, and so they marched together to the famous citie of Ephesus, which is the cheefe of all Asia the lesse, in the prouince of Ionia: where the Emperour considering that hee went not according to his estate and honour, going with so small forces, but rather as a subiect to the King of France, and for some other respects, giuing good words he tooke his leaue of the King, and departed; and drawing neere to the Sea, sent his people by land, and he by Shippe went to stay for them at Constantinople: where dissembling the iniurie he had receiued (or peradventure not suspecting any such matter) he remained the rest of the winter; to the end that reinforcing his Army, he might from thence the next Spring returne to his enterprise.

In the meane time the French King prosecuted his iourney, not without great trouble and losse of many of his men, in a battaile which he wonne; and in another, wherein part of his Armie was ouerthrowne: how it passed I doe not set downe, for that it appertaineth not to my Historie. After this, enduring great toile and dangers, by long iourneies he came to the citie of Antioch, in company of RAIMOND or REMON, Lord thereof, who came to meete him vpon the way, and to doe him honor, from whence he afterwards (as I will shew you) came to Ierusalem.

The Spring being come, and the Emperour CONRADE hauing leuied new forces, which he ioyned with the remainder of his last Armie; in a great fleete which hee had prepared, with the helpe of the Emperour of Constantinople, he embarked, and came therein into Soria; and there disembarking in a certaine harbour, came with his Army by land to Ierusalem, where, by BALDVVIN the King thereof, he was very ioyfully receiued; and within few daies they had intelligence, that the French King was comming thither also: whom the Emperour, and King BALDVVIN receiued with great ioy; and then to auoyde losse of much time, they presently took counsell about prosecuting the warre against the Infidels; concluding to besiege the citie of Damasco, from whence (for that it was very puissant and populous) they daily receiued losse, preiudice, and ill neighbourhood: and so taking that obstacle, they resolued to haue proceeded further, which plot was presently put in execution; and the Emperour, and the two Kings departed, with a great and very well ordered Armie, with a resolution, and in hope to haue effected some great matters: but it pleased God otherwise to dispose of their purpose: for being come to Damasco, and hauing encamped themselues on that side of the citie, towards Mount Libanus, they had many dangerous skirmishes: wherefore (through the aduice and counsel of certaine men of that countrie, which, being corrupted with mony by the besieged, desired to deceiue these Princes) they remoued their Campe to the other side, and abandoned the most fit place for their siege: whereof it ensued, that the Infidels taking the aduantage of an Hill (which they fortified) did greatly annoy them; and this Hill was so situate, that it stopt the comming of victuals to the Campe: and the besieged defended themselues so valiantly, and famine so much encreased in these Princes armies, that it was impossible for them to liue, if they remained there any longer, so as they were perforce constrained to raise their siege, and returned to Ierusalem, sorrowfull and in ill plight, there to consult of what course was best to be taken. In this siege (as saith the Abbat WESPERGENSIS) GVELPHO, the Emperors auntient enemie (yet then his good friend) fell sicke: and fearing to die if he had staied there any longer, he with his followers tooke shipping and sailed into Sicilia, where recouering his health; through the counsel and instigation of ROGER King thereof, he went into Germany, and there againe rebelling, made warres vpon the Emperours countries.

Damasco besieged by the Christians.

The Emperour and French King then resolued to returne into their dominions, seeing it pleased not God to prosper their proceedings; and the rather to the end to auoyde innouations and and troubles that might grow in the countries, by reason of their absence; and they did so, leauing the affaires of the East in as ill estate as they found the same. The Emperor rigging vp his nauie, embarked himself with his people, and again took land in Græcia (as saith OTHO FRISINGENSIS, who accompanied him in all this iourney) and in the prouince of Achaia, met the Emperor of Constantinople: where refreshing himself awhile after his comming from Sea, he departed from the said Emperour, and took his way into Germany, and so ended this religious enterprise, in the fourth yeere after the same began. The French King, within few dayes after the Emperors departure from the Holy land, tooke shipping also; and after some aduentures which befell him in the way, arriued in his countrie, in health and peace; and the Emperour againe warred against GVELPHO, to punish him for his rebellion in his absence: but at the entreatie of his Nephew FREDERICK, Duke of Sueuia, who was likewise Nephew to GVELPHO by his mothers side, he pardoned him, and graunted him peace, and allowed him certaine lands and reuenewes for his maintenance.

At this time came Ambassadours to the Emperour from the Christian Kings, and from the Pope, to congratulate his returne; and hee commanded a Diet or Councell to be assembled in the citie of Confluence; where, after many matters appertaining to the gouernment of the Common-wealth, he concluded to come into Italy, to be crowned (being thereto inuited by Pope VRBANE before named) and making preparation for his iourney, hee was entercepted by death; not without suspicion of poyson, giuen him by an Italian Phisician, through the procurement of ROGER King of Sicilia; he died in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred fiftie two, in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne (some reckon one thousand, one hundred fiftie and foure) and left one onely sonne called FREDERICK, who afterwards being Duke of Sueuia, died in Italy: which sonne he had by his wife the Empresse, whose name was GERTRVDE, an Earles daughter which was a great Lord in Germany, by whom he also had had another son, called HENRY; of whom mention hath been alreadie made, who died before his father the Emperor.

The death of the Emperor Conrade.

In Constantinople raigned EMANVEL, and held the Empire after this almost thirtie yeeres; this Emperour is reckoned amongst the wicked and vicious Emperors, and is greatly condemned, to haue beene the occasion of the losse of the two Armies, viz. the Emperors, and the French Kings, as we haue alreadie related. For which cause, it is written that ROGER King of Sicily warred against him: and hauing taken certaine Ilands from him; he came so neere to the citie of Constantinople, that the arrowes which he shot, fell within his palace; and they affirme, that he gathered apples from the trees, growing in the Orchards and Gardens belonging thereto. This ROGER died within a yeere or two after the Emperor CONRADE; and his sonne WILLIAM the First succeeded him.

Iehan de temps is reported to haue liued three hundred sixtie and one yeeres.

In the time of this Emperour, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred thirtie nine, died in France, a man called IOHN du Temps, who (as many authors affirme) had liued three hundred sixtie and one yeeres, and had beene an Halberder of the Emperor CHARLES the Great his guard; it is a matter hardly to be beleeued, yet possible; and many authors write the same.

THE LIFE OF FREDERICK THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, SVRNAMED BARBAROSSA; Foureſcore and ſeuenteenth Romane Emperor. And of EMANVEL, Emperor of Conſtantinople.

THE ARGVMENT.

After the deceaſe of Conrade, his Nephew Frederick, Duke of Suevia, was choſen Emperor; a man endued with all excellencies, as well of body as minde, ſaning that he was held to be more deſirous of glory then was conuenient. In the beginning of his raigne he ſhewed himſelfe verie deſirous of peace: but afterwards, in proceſſe of time, he vndertook great warres; and hauing cauſed many combuſtions in Germany, he purpoſed to make a iourney into Italy, there to be crowned. Hauing leuied a great army, and being paſt the Alpes, he much annoyed the Milanois, who made an inſurrection againſt him; but ſpending no long time about thoſe factions, hee went to Rome, where he was crowned by the Pope. In the time of his coronation many troubles aroſe in Rome, wherewith he was much diſpleaſed; which leauing imperfect, he returned into Germany, where he afterwards fell at variance with the Pope, by meanes of the King of Sicilia, who was his enemy: this controuerſie was pacified by Chriſtian Princes, which perſwaded him rather to ſeeke to be reuenged on the Milanois then to war againſt the Pope. Whereupon he reſolued againe to come into Italie, by reaſon of Milan, and came thither and ruined it, and made it to be razed by the Milanois themſelues, who were the Citizens and Inhabitants thereof; and beſides this, he did much more harme. He maintained a ſchiſme in the Church of Rome, and gaue great ayde to the Anti-Pope, whoſe name was Victor: but all Italie was diſcontent, by reaſon of the cruell puniſhment inflicted vpon Milan; ſo when as he was gone out of Italy, all the Cities of Lombardie vniting themſelues together made a league againſt him; wherein was included the City of Venice, which tooke the protection of Pope Alexander. Which the Emperor hearing, he ſent the Antipope into Italy, who died in Luca; where, by the Emperors conſent, a ſucceſſor was choſen, to maintain the ſchiſme, and he in perſon came againſt the league; wherein all Italy in a manner, being combined, bent againſt him; and comming to Rome, he conſtrained the Pope to fly to Gaeta, hauing firſt done much harme in Tuſcane in the Marca, and particularly in the Citie of Ancona: and after many aduentures, he went out of Italy, without effecting ought againſt the Pope as he deſired. After ſome ſpace, he againe returned into Italy: but, being abandoned by the greateſt part of his followers (inſtigated thereto by Henry Duke of Saxony) the Emperor was in ſuch diſtreſſe, as he was conſtrained to go ſomtime diſguiſed, as another manſeruant: but he very ſeuerely puniſhed Henry, for his mutining. He againe took his paſſage into Italy, and in a battaile, with his enemies, was vanquiſhed, and held for dead; but recanting his former proceedings, he ſued to be reconciled to the Pope; which was concluded in the City of Venice with a truce, with the cities of Lombardy. This done, all was in peace. Afterwards he went to warre in the Holy land: and hauing done ſome matters worthie memorie, in the moſt flouriſhing time of his victories, going to refreſh himſelfe in a riuer, he was caried downe by the current, his people being vnable to help him, and there was drowned, when he had raigned 28 yeeres.

NOtwithſtanding that the Emperor CONRADE, when he died, left a ſonne whoſe name was FREDERICK, who was called Duke of Suevia; neuertheleſſe, ſo great was the reputation of his Nephew FREDERICK, who was his brother FREDERICKS ſonne, and Duke of Suevia, that the Princes Electors being aſſembled in Franckford, made him Emperor; and he preſently went to be crowned, with the firſt crowne, in the citie of Aken, whither repaired all the Princes of Germany to ſee the new Emperor. For without doubt, FREDERICK (as all authors write of him) was a Prince of great valour, and worthie of the Imperiall dignitie, aſwell for the gifts of the body as of the minde. He was of more then a meane ſtature, of great ſtrength and agilitie, very well proportioned in body, and of a faire and pleaſing countenance, accompaaccompanied with grauitie and maieſtie. His haire and beard were red, wherefore he was called BARBAROSSA or ENOBARBVS. With theſe corporall gifts, he was endued with a ſharpe and excellent wit, and ſpake wiſely and effectually; and was of ſo excellent a memorie, eſpecially concerning the geſture and countenance of a man, that whoſoeuer had once negociated with him, although in long time after he had not ſeene him, yet he would know him at the firſt ſight. He was alſo of a milde and pleaſant conuerſation, very liberall and bountifull, and an enemie to couetouſnes; vertuous, without any noted vice: moſt valiant in Armes, and a contemner of daungers, very actiue both on foote and horſebacke; and very expert, and well aduiſed in the warres and militarie diſcipline. Theſe vertues were accompanied with a great deſire of glorie and renowne; for he was very ambitious, coueting rule and commaund, which in my opinion was the cauſe of many miſchiefes, of great warres, and of the effuſion of much blood in his time: the wars he followed in his owne perſon, with great courage and valour, for the ſpace of thirtie yeeres, that he held the Empire: and imitating HENRY the Fourth, he ſupported and maintained a ſchiſme in the Church of Rome, for the ſpace of twentie yeeres; and reuiued the emulation, and competencie betweene the Emperors and Popes, which LOTHARY, and CONRADE had pacified: as we will briefly recite. The firſt thing he did after he came to the Empire, was, to call a Parliament in the citie of Mesburgh, whither (amongſt other Princes) came the King of Denmark, newly come to his inheritance, who there was crowned by the Emperor FREDERICK, and did him homage, as a King ſubiect to the Empire. And there he alſo receiued the Ambaſſades of other Chriſtian Princes, which ſent to congratulate his election, and he concluded peace with them all. So in his beginning, he made ſhew of a very peaceable Prince, but he afterwards prooued to be one of the greateſt warriors in the world: and it appeared, that in the beginning hee ſought peace, thereby to be afterwards the better able to make warre.

The Emperor Frederickes qualities.

At that time was great contention betweene the Dukes of Saxony, and of Bauiere (both which were called HENRY) which extended itſelf ouer all Germany; ſome fauouring the one partie, and ſome the other. HENRY Duke of Saxony made claime to the Duchie of Bauiere, which had beene his fathers: whereof he was depriued by the Emperour CONRADE, and now HENRY Marqueſſe of Auſtria held the ſame, and was called Duke of Bauiere, for that his brother LEOPOLD had left it him; for to him had the Emperor CONRADE giuen it. The Emperor FREDERICK, for that he was neere of kinne to both theſe competitors (for the one of them was his Vncle, and the other his coſin german) reconciled them after this manner; that to HENRY of Saxony ſhould be reſtored the Duchie of Bauiere (but yet he afterwards loſt the ſame) and he made HENRY Marqueſſe of Auſtria (who was called the Duke of Bauiere) Duke of Auſtria, and gaue him ſome other places; and to GVELPHO, Vncle to the Duke of Saxony, he gaue certaine lands, and an eſtate in Italy, which he enherited from MAVD, often before mentioned.

This peace and agreement being concluded, and all other actions and debates in Germany ended, hee ſpent many daies in eſtabliſhing peace, and in doing iuſtice. After which, HENRY Count Palatine of the Rhine (a prince of great poſſeſſions) died without iſſue or any of his howſe, that might ſucceede him; but the Emperor found a meane to make his brother CONRADE his heire; who had that countrie, and he afterwards dying, left it to his onely daughter, which was maried to HENRY Duke of Saxony, by which mariage he gat that eſtate. Theſe and ſuch like accidents and alterations which I finde in the Hiſtories of Germany, written by the Germanes themſelues, make me to doubt of theſe genealogies, and antiquities of families, which they ſo much celebrate, to be of a thouſand, and of two thouſand yeeres continuance; deſcended in line maſculine from the father to the ſon without baſtardie; and other matters whereof the Germanes vaunt; which are, in a manner impoſſible, or at the leaſt improbable: for we know that all thoſe great houſes and eſtates began ſince the time of CHARLES the Great; and I ſee that in thoſe principall houſes there haue bin notable alterations, and chaunges, from one howſe to another; as heretofore hath bin ſeene in ſome of them; and now in this Count Palatine, which in this place cleerely paſſeth from the auntient linage, to the houſe of Sueuia, and to this Emperors brother which happened in the ſecond yeere of his raigne.

This being paſt, the Emperor maried the daughter of DIOPOLD Marqueſſe of Boſpergh, called Alda: but forasmuch as it was found that they were within prohibited degrees of conſanguinitie, a Synod was aſſembled in the citie of Conſtance, in which he was diuorced and ſeparated from her; and then he married with the onely daughter of RAINOLD Earle of Burgundie, by

by whom he afterwards had fiue ſonnes; HENRY, FREDERICK, CONRADE, PHILIP, and OTHO.

Pope Adrian the third an Engliſhman.

Theſe matters being ended, the Emperour reſolued to goe to Rome, to be crowned by Pope ADRIAN the Third, who was an Engliſh-man; leuying a great Armie; and ſetting order for the affaires of Germany, he departed towards Italy: it behoued him to do ſo, for the cities of Lombardy and others ſubiect to the Empire, through the long abſcence of the Emperour (for CONRADE had neuer viſited them) were accuſtomed to ſuch libertie, that any kind of ſubiection ſeemed to them intolerable, eſpecially Milan, which of them all was the richeſt, and moſt potent. And ſo FREDERICK being arriued in Italy, Ambaſſadours came to him from Milan; which after their due reuerence, entreated him to be pleaſed, to make Como and Lodi ſubiect to their citie, promiſing to giue him a great ſumme of mony: which requeſt he held vniuſt, and therefore would not graunt it: which was the originall occaſion of the rebellion of Milan, and of the euils which afterwards enſued: and the Milanois preſently began to ſhew their diſcontent; for the Emperors Campe being lodged within a mile of the citie, they not onely refuſed to lodge or to entertaine him therein, but denied to giue him victuals for his people for mony: whereupon, taking this their contempt in very ill part (as he afterwards manifeſted) he preſently battered certaine Caſtles within their iuriſdiction: but holding it no fit time preſently to beſiege the citie, his ſouldiers ouerranne their fields, euen to their citie gates; and he paſſing forwards, went to Bercelli, and to Turin, and paſſed ouer the riuer Po; and by the way burned Aſte, for that it ſtood at defence; and afterwards beſieged the citie of Tortona, for as much as it refuſed to receiue him, which was a very ſtrong hold. The ſiege continuing certaine daies with great loſſe of both parts; in the end he tooke it, and made ſo great a ſpoile in it, that he left it (in a manner) deſolate and wholly ruined: whereupon thoſe of Pauia (for feare) receiued him, making ſhew of great ioy; and there he receiued the ſecond Crown, and thence marched towards Rome, whither he went to be crowned.

The Emperor Frederick in Italy.

Pope ADRIAN at that time was not well pleaſed with the Romane people, about certaine Conſuls which they had choſen, a kind of gouernment (which for a long time they had ſought to introduce) greatly abbridging the Popes power and authoritie: about which, great matters had paſſed between the citizens and ſome of his predeceſſors, as before hath been mentioned. Wherefore to auoide this trouble, and to preuent certaine practices, which WILLIAM the new king of Sicilia attempted againſt the patrimonie of the Church of Rome, the Pope abſented himſelfe, and with his Cardinals attended the Emperours comming in Sutrio; from whence, with a ſhew of great loue, they came together to Rome: and the Emperour lodging his Army in the fields neere vnto it, he, together with the Pope (hauing a competent guard) entred the Vaticane, and the next day was crowned in S. PETER'S Church with great ſolemnitie. But the coronation was ſcarcely ended, when vpon the ſame day all the Romane people riſing in an vproare, without knowing any occaſion thereof, together with their Conſuls, put themſelues in Armes, as men diſcontented with the friendſhip between the Emperour and the Pope; and comming into the Vaticane, they ſet vpon the Germanes which came with the Emperour: who hearing what paſſed, hee cauſed certaine companies of ſouldiers, of thoſe which were encamped neere to the citie, ſpedily to enter, which fought with the Romaniſts, and many were ſlaine of either ſide: but in the end the Romanes were conſtrained to retire by their bridges into the citie (ſeuen hundred of them being firſt ſlaine and taken priſoners).

The people of Rome roſe against the Pope.

The Emperour remaining commaunder of the Vaticane, was ſo incenſed, that but for the Popes entreatie, he would haue cauſed the citie to haue been aſſaulted, and would haue giuen the inhabitants a terrible remembrance for their mutinying: but the Pope mitigated his diſpleaſure, and the Romanes ſtood all that night and the next day in Armes; wherewith the Pope being grieued, was little obeyed. The Emperor departed thence, and within few daies after his abode in that quarter, went into Germany (whereof the Pope complained, for that he left him at variance with the citizens) and by the way took ſome townes by aſſault; amongſt which, Spoleto was ſacked and burnt for reſiſting him: and ſo he afterwards paſſed through Lombardy, without any ſtay, with a determination to returne with greater power; where befell him ſome notable aduentures, which (the better to expreſſe ſuch as are of greater importance) I omit. Being now returned into Germany, with great power and greater authoritie, for that he was crowned by the Pope; the Duke of Bohemia whoſe name was VLADISLAVS, or LAVESLAVS, who came with him all this iourney, was (by reaſon of his great eſtate and the worthines of his person) made King: yet I finde it written, that the Emperour HENRY the Fourth, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, eighty and six, gaue the title of King to BRATISLAVS Duke of Bohemia: but that title was then giuen to his person, and not to the countrie; and so his successors enjoyed not the same, vntill the time of this VLADISLAVS, which continueth vntill this day. And the Emperor passing forwards, without discharging his Army, marched against the Duke of Poland; who for certain yeers space had refused to pay the tribute, which he ought to the Empire: but he compelled him to pay the same.

Vadislaus Duke of Bohemia made king.

The Emperor being gone out of Italy, great controuersie arose between the Pope and WILLIAM king of Sicilia; wherein the Pope recouered certaine places which WILLIAM had taken from him; EMANVEL Emperor of Constantinople (and WILLIAM's enemy) furthering those discords, who sent to the Pope, and made great offers and promises to aide and succour him: whereupon, after some conflicts which past betweene them, WILLIAM by all meanes possible sought the Popes grace and fauor, submitting himselfe to his obedience; and the Pope confirmed to him the title of King of both the Sicilies: wherwith the Emperor FREDERICK was much displeased, and greatly complained, for he hated WILLIAM; and at his comming into Italie, went of purpose to warre against him, although afterwards he could not effect the same as he thought to haue done.

William confirmed by the Pope king of both Sicil.es.

For this cause and other which are not mentioned, in those daies great strife and contentions grew between the Emperor and the Pope; which neither PLATINA nor BLONDVS specifie, nor any other Italian Authors: but RVDBERICVS FRISINGENSIS, who prosecuted the Historie which OTHO FRISINGENSIS left a little before, and other Historiographers, describe the same at large: the summe whereof is, that the Emperor began to doas some of his predecessors had done, in giuing Ecclesiasticall dignities, and inuesting Prelates without the Popes authority, or confirmation; and would not endure the Popes Legates in his countries, but when, how, and in what manner it pleased him; taking occasion hereof, that the Pope without his consent had made peace with his enemy WILLIAM: whereto the Pope answered, that he could doe no otherwise, for that the Emperour abandoned him in his distresse, when Rome rebelled against him. And the matter came to this issue, that the Emperor would not permit any appeales to be made to the Court of Rome; and about that matter he apprehended certain Bishops, which NAVCLERVS, and HENRICVS MVCIVS, proue by certain Letters passing between the Emperor and the Pope: which Letters they affirme to haue seene in a Monastery of Germany. They also speake of certaine very sharpe Ambassages from the one to the other; and that in the end the Pope standing in feare of the Emperors power (being aduised by certaine Prelates) and also for that there was great discord between the Cities of Lombardy, whither the Emperor meant shortly to come; they came to an agreement of peace, which was concluded by Ambassadors in a Parliament, which the Emperor caused to be held in Ausburgh: where after this was ended, he made relation to all the Princes, of the injurie which the Milanois, and certain other Cities in Lombardy had done him: And there it was concluded, that he should the second time come into Italie, with farre greater power then at the first.

And whilest he was busied about these matters, the Milanois (who at that time were of great power and very rich) being offended with what he had done in their fields and territorie, thought not only to free themselues from subjection, and to haue denied him their obedience, but also resolu'd to attend his coming in the open field with an Army, and to make themselues Lords of all that countrie with the marches thereof, and to shake off the Imperiall yoke, presuming vpon their great power, and the aide of their friends and confederats: and so they began to leuie men, and to make leagues and confederacies with other Cities, as with Crema, Brescia Placencia, and other Townes: and they repaired and fortified Tortona, which the Emperor had ruinated. Presently after this, they made cruell warre against Pauia, Cremona, and other places which held for the Emperor; and ruined the Cities of Lodi and Como, which of long time they had hated, and were vnder the Emperors protection. The chiefe Author hereof, was a man of great authority in Milan, whose name was GVALPHAGO, who (as a Lord or tyrant) was of such power in the citie, that all was done at his pleasure and by his direction; which made the Emperor the more to hasten his comming into Italie; two yeeres being not fully expired since his first comming thither: and with him came the king of Bohemia, LEOPOLD Marquesse of Austria, his Nephew FREDERICK Duke of Sueuia, and other princes, besides some which were sent before to guard the Cittie of Cremona: The Emperour being in Italy, there came to doe him seruice, HENRY the Duke of Saxony with a thousand thousand and three hundred men at Armes, and GVELPHO with three hundred. The Emperours comming into Italy did put the countrie in such feare, that Brescia (whither he sent the King of Bohemia, and his nephew the Duke of Sueuia) yeelded without assault, promising to be at his deuotion. From thence he marched with his Army towards Milan, and by the way had some skirmishes, which I passe ouer: being come into the marches thereof, he staied and took certaine Castles, which he did of set purpose, supposing that the Milanois would haue sued for peace, or haue vsed some submission: but they were now growne so proud, that they applied themselues to nothing else, but to fortifie their citie: whereof when the Emperour was aduertised, he commanded the cities which were vnder his obedience, to send him souldiers; and so from Cremona (as saith the Abbat WESPERGENSIS) came to him thirtie thousand fighting men; so great was the enuie they bare against Milan: and from Pauia and Noüarra, there came also great numbers; with which, and with his own Army he went to Milan: whither when he came, they salied out of the citie into the field, in a very great number both of foote and horse; and a battaile began betweene them, one wounding and killing another in most cruell manner: but the Milanois being vnable to endure the furie of the Imperialists, they retired, flying to the walles of the citie; and those of Cremona were so greedy in pursuing them, that they farre ouerwent the battallions of the Germanes: which when the Milanois perceiued, turning head, they charged them in such manner that they made them retire, and in their retreit slew many of their men: And FREDERICK who saw all this, charged with his squadron with so great force and furie, that he made them of Milan to turne their backes; and wounding and killing many of them, compelled the rest to fly to the gates of their citie, and he firing the Suburbes, presently besieged the same; and so he held it besieged for certaine daies, in which were many great and notable skirmishes. But the Milanois seeing the Emperours resolution, and great power, and the engines which he raised to batter their walles, were in so great feare, that they resolued to yeeld, vpon the best conditions they could get, and to send their Ambassadours to the Campe; which confessing their offences, and craving pardon, with a long set speech entreated the Emperour to admit them into his seruice; and afterwards in particular they treated thereof with the Princes in the Army, and (as some authors say) gaue great gifts and presents: finally, they obtained mercy, yeelded the citie, and were pardoned. Milan being now brought to subiection (as it was the head of all the rebels) the rest of the townes in Lombardy presently yeelded obedience, and gaue securitie, promising to serue the Emperour, and to doe what they should be commanded; and the Emperour in person visited many of them, and appointed Roncalia to bee the place whither they should send their Procters or Agents with their authority; where hee determined to hold a Parliament, to treate of the common estate of these prouinces. Hauing in so short space had this good successe in Lombardy hee disannulled some of their lawes and customes, and prescribed other new, with greater rigour then (in truth) he ought to haue done: whereof many inconueniences ensued.

The Milanois tooke the field and fought with the Emperour.

Milan yeelded to the Emperor.

The time appointed for their meeting being come, and they making their appearance accordingly; after many matters which there were debated, by the aduice of some of his Councell, he caused an Instrument to be made, concerning an vniuersall peace; which he enioyned all the cities, and principall men, Marquesses and Earles in all Lombardy, to obserue. This was done after the Germane manner, with penalties therein accustomed; which being published and made knowne vnto them, they all murmured, and held themselues wronged, principally the Milanois; and this discontentment encreased in such manner, that it was the cause of greater miseries then the former, by reason of the tolls and taxes which the Emperour imposed vpon all the countrie; reseruing to himselfe the election and prouision of all officers: and although he did it by the aduice and counsell of learned men and Princes, which maintained that the Emperour might doe it in all those countries; yet the people being vnaccustomed thereto, took it very grieuously: which was the occasion of the euils which ensued; although in the beginning they durst not rebell.

After this, the Emperor (for a trophey of his victories) made the citie of Lodi to be new builded, and with all speede and diligence to be walled and fortified; and the Castles, which had bin aduersaries to Milan, to be repaired and victualled; wherein he placed gouernours and garrisons, and did other things which my breuitie permitteth me not to recite. And setting all things in the best order hee could, notwithstanding that hee knew that Milan had not obeyed his lawes and ordinances, concerning the impositions which hee had set (as saith the Abbat WESPERGENSIS, and IOHN CVSPINIAN and others) he tooke his way towards the countrie of Burgundy; which was an eſtate he held by his wife: other authors ſpeake not of this departure, but recite what enſued, as though he had not gone out of Italy: but in my iudgement, Milan, Crema, and Breſcia, and the other cities, would not haue dared ſo peremptorily to haue rebelled, if the Emperour with his Army had continued in Lombardy: wherefore (holding with WESPERGENSIS, and ſuch others as are of his opinion) I ſay that as ſoone as the Emperour was gone out of Lombardy, theſe things inſued, which we will preſently relate.

The Milanois (which neuer yeelded to obey the Emperours lawes) ſeeing themſelues of great power, tooke the field with their forces, and went to a caſtle which the Emperour had built neere to Como, and aſſaulting it, took it by force; and ſo they began the warre, and did as much harme as at the firſt, but with greater reſolution: preſently the cities of Crema, Breſcia, and Placencia did the like, and all the reſt of their faction. IOHANNES CREMONENSIS in his fourth booke ſaith, that the Pope made a league with WILLIAM King of Sicilia againſt the Emperor, which was the cauſe of great hatred betweene them. The Emperour being aduertiſed of the bold attempts of the Milanois, and their adherents; with great celeritie (before that his whole Army was in a readineſs) returnd into Lombardy, and went directly to Milan; and finding no reſiſtance in the field, harried and ſpoiled the countrie, leauing nothing ſtanding vndeſtroyed; ſo great was the wrath and diſpleaſure which he had conceiued againſt it: and departing from thence he went to repoſe himſelf in Lodi (to be cured of a lame legge which hee had) whither came Ambaſſadours from Cremona, to complaine of thoſe of Crema, for the great wrongs they did them, and to craue ſuccour: the harms don were the greater, by reaſon of the ſtrength of the place, together with the aide and reliefe which they had from Breſcia, and from Milan. As the Emperour was a man of a very haughtie ſpirit, ſo he ſeeking a redreſſe for all diſorders, ſent his brother CONRADE, Count Palatine of the Rhine, and ſome other principall men, with part of his Army, to beſiege Crema; and the men of warre which were in Crema took the field, and gaue them battaile, which continued long, wherein many of both ſides were ſlaine: but in the end the Imperialiſts had the victorie, and compelled their enemies to returne runnning to their towne; ſo as they durſt ſalie foorth no more: and ſo the ſiege continued.

The Pope made a league with William king of Sicilia againſt the Emperor.

At the ſame time new ſupplies came to the Emperour out of Germany; wherewith came his wife the Empreſſe, with many men at Armes out of Burgundie, and with her came HENRY Duke of Saxony and of Bauiere, of whom we haue ſpoken much: with which, and with the reſt which he had before, he laid a plot for thoſe of Milan; whereby he took priſoners aboue three hundred of them, and ſlue aboue ſix hundred. But, houlding it his beſt courſe firſt to make an end with Crema (which by his commandement was already beſieged) hee remoued his Camp thither: and the better to juſtifie his quarrell, hee ſent to command them to receiue him into their City, as their Emperor and liege Lord; which they not onely refuſed, but gaue him many peremptorie proud ſpeeches: whereupon he cauſed ſundrie great engins & inſtruments to be made, therewith to batter the towne; and the beſieged reſolutely defended themſelues, and all their priſoners daily taken of either ſide, were either hanged or ſlaine: but at length they were conſtrained of neceſſitie to yeeld, and held themſelues for happy, and charitably dele withall, that the Emperour would vouchſafe to giue them their liues; and that leauing the citie, they might depart with their wiues and children, and ſuch luggage as they could carrie on their backes.

Crema beſieged and taken by the Emperour.

Whileſt the Emperour was at the ſiege of Crema, Pope ADRIAN, choakt with a Fly, died; after whoſe deceaſe, the Cardinals, being in number fiue and twentie, aſſembling together in Rome, choſe ALEXANDER the Third (before called ROVELAND) in a manner by a generall conſent of them all, excepting onely three which gainſaid it, which ſtood for the Cardinall of S. Clement, whoſe name was OCTAVIANVS, whom the Emperor much fauoured: and this OCTAVIANVS (notwithſtanding his few voices in the election) was ſo bold, as to proclaime himſelfe Pope, and was called VICTOR; and there wanted not ſome to take his part, and to ſupport him. The other Pope, ALEXANDER, ſeeing himſelf thus oppoſed, ſent his Ambaſſadours to the Emperor, lying then at the Camp before Crema, whereby he requeſted him, that (vſing the authority of an Emperor) he would fauour the Church, by taking away the ſchiſme. The Emperor for anſwere willed the Pope to come to the citie of Pauia, whither he alſo appointed VICTOR to come, to the end he might there hear both parties, and ſo determine of

of their controuerſie: herewith ALEXANDER was much diſcontent, and reſolued to ſeeke other redreſſe. The Emperor hauing raiſed his ſiege from before Crema, leauing to make war againſt Milan vntill the next Spring (which was after the Abbats computation, in the yeere of our Lord 1161) came to the citie of Pauia, from whence he ſent two Biſhops in Ambaſſage to Pope ALEXANDER, adui ſing him to come thither, where he ſaid, many Biſhops would meere in the name of a Councell, to the end that the ſchiſme might bee decided; which Ambaſſadors behaued themſelues towards him, as to a Cardinall, but not as to a Pope: for the Emperor (as he diſliked his election) deſired to ſupport Pope VICTOR. ALEXANDER taking this in ill part, diſpatching the Ambaſſadors, commmaunded them to returne, and they went to VICTOR with the ſame meſſage, to whom they ſpake, and did reuerence as to a Pope; and hee preſently departed, and went to Pauia, and was by the Emperour very well entertained, and there was proclaimed for right Pope: and the Emperour kiſſing his foote, vſed other accuſtomed ceremonies, whereof when ALEXANDER was aduertiſed, holding himſelfe intolerable iniuried, hee proceeded againſt the Emperour, and his Pope, whom hee excommunicated, and anathematized: and the Emperour ſending his Pope into Germany, returned to the warres of Milan, wherein what paſſed, you ſhall vnderſtand.

Pope ALEXANDER after his going to Rome, holding himſelfe not in ſaferie; through the aſſiſtance of WILLIAM King of Sicilia, went by galleys into France, where he was very well entertained by PHILIP the French King (I ſay PHILIP, for that BLONDVS, and al thoſe Italian authors call him ſo; but hereafter you ſhal vnderſtand that it could not be PHILIP, but his father LEVVES, comparing the times) and there he called a Councel in Cliermont, where he againe proclaimed the Emperor and his Pope excommunicate; what after enſued you ſhall heare.

The Spring of the yeere being come, the Emperor very reſolutely returned againſt Milan, Breſcia, Placencia, and ſuch other rebellious cities as were in league with them: but firſt he ouerran and deſtroyed all the countrey round about Milan: before and after this time were many skirmiſhes and encounters, which for breuitie I ouerpaſſe, wherein for the moſt part the Emperour had the better, vntill that hauing withdrawne his Army to take in a caſtle and fortreſſe at the paſſage ouer a riuer neere to Placencia, and the Milanois hauing a good Army, led by the tyrant GVALPHAGO, with the aid of thoſe of Placencia and Breſcia, went to aſſault a ſtrong caſtle, called Carcano, or Coracio: whereof the Emperour being aduertiſed, hee ſpeedily ſent for men to Pauia, Noüarra, and Lodi, with which, and with his ordinarie troupes, he put himſelfe betweene Milan, and the ſaid caſtle (before which the Milanois then were) in ſuch a place, and in ſuch manner, that of force they muſt fight, or not returne. The Milanois ſeeing themſelues in this extremitie, ſent ſome of the cheefe men amongſt them to the Emperours Camp, to intreate him to ſuffer them to paſſe, for they would not fight with him for the honor and dutie which they bare to his perſon. And the Emperour preſuming that he alreadie held the victory in his hands, or that they durſt not fight, would not graunt their requeſt: by reaſon whereof, his aduerſaries drawing courage out of deſpaire, ſeeing themſelues loſt if their paſſage were ſtopt, and that they were vnable to relieue their houſes and friends, or to be relieued by them, reſolued either to make way, or to dye in the action, and ſo marched in good order againſt the Emperour, who likewiſe in very good order attended their comming, where there began a moſt cruell battaile, as betweene very expert and valiant ſouldiers, and men in deſpaire. In the beginning, the Emperor apparantlie had the better, and many of his enemies were ſlaine, and their ſtandard was taken: but the fight continuing vntill noone, there came certaine companies from the vnited cities to the aid of the Milanois, which charged with ſuch reſolution and fury, that the Imperialiſts retired, and their enemies (as maſters of the field) flew and took priſoners very many of them: and the Emperour ſhewing the greatnes of his mind, drew together great part of his Army in the beſt order he could, and ranging his troupes into a round Battallion, moſt valiantly defended himſelf againſt his enemies; but truly he had bin either ſlaine or taken if the fight had continued any longer: but it pleaſed God that he being in this danger, there fell ſo much raine, and therewith the aire was ſo darke, that they neither ſaw, nor knew the one the other; and ſo the Emperour held it for his beſt courſe to retire towards Pauia, and his enemies as conquerors, with ſpoiles and priſoners went ioyfully to their houſes, which afterward coſt them very deare. This notable exploit, PLATINA, BLONDVS, and other Italian authors paſſe ouer in ſilence: but as they do not gainſay it, and the Abbat WESPERGENSIS and other Abattaile betweene the Emperor and the Milanois.

Germane authors report the same, I haue thought good to make mention thereof.

This aduenture being past and knowne in Germany, some Princes and great Prelates, with many very good men of warre, came to the Emperors aid; with which, and with all the rest he left Pauia, and with a mightie Army besieged Milan, purposing not to rise from before it vntill he had taken it; and the besieged being wel fortified and victualled, were no lesse resolute to dye in their defence: by reason whereof, this was one of the most cruell and terrible sieges that hath bin seene before any citie, aswell for the long continuance thereof, as for the skirmishes, sallyes, assaults, losse of men, and effusion of bloud, with the famine and other calamities which the besieged indured, and for the lamentable and pitifull end which it had. The siege continued two whole yeeres and one day: some authors reckon fiue, and some more, accounting (as I thinke) from the time the Emperour first made warre in the marches thereof. What skirmishes were betwixt the besieged and the besiegers, the Reader may coniecture, considering the power and splene of the Emperor, and the obstinacie and despaire ioyned with the great force and multitude of the Milanois. During the siege, there was so great want of victuals in the citie, that after they had eaten all the beasts, and other food that might be eaten, they dyed of hunger: and being out of hope to haue any succour, or meanes to liue (the Emperor refusing all other compositions) they were constrained to yeeld to his mercie; yet some affirme, that certaine Iewes gaue him enterance; and some there are which say, that he tooke the citieby force: but howsoeuer it was, the city came into the Emperors power; who conceiuing, that enow of them were slaine, he gaue the rest their liues; but in that citie, and in all the rest, he did the greatest spoile he could possibly: for first he commanded all the men & women to depart the citie, & his souldiers to sacke it; and then the buildings and walles thereof to be throwne downe and laid waste; and this to be done by the inhabitants themselues, and by such as were borne therein: and whereas they sufficed not, he caused a great number of people to come thither from Pauia, and Cremona, which should wholly ruinate it, and leaue it waste and desolate, like to miserable Ierusalem: which truly should seeme to be one of the most lamentable spectacles that euer was seene in this world. Some writers affirme, that he made the ground to be ploughed, and sowen with salt. The inhabitants thereof (as GVALPHAGO the tyrant, the Bishop, and many of the most principall) he commanded to be sent prisoners into Germany: the rest of the People he permitted to dwell in certaine fields, which he appointed for them, farre from Milan, amongst bushes, in cabbins and cotages. The reliques and bodies of Saints which were in the citie, and held in great account, he diuided amongst the Bishops and prelates which were there with him; of which, the three Kings, which came out of the East to adore CHRIST in Bethlehem, were giuen to the Archbishop and Cathedrall Church of Colen, where (it is said) they are at this day. In this manner was the citie of Milan laid waste, and left desolate; which a little before was so mightie, that it was of power able to fight with the Emperour in the plaine field, and to ouerthrow him: it hauing three hundred, threescore and fiue yeeres (as reckoneth RAPHAEL VOLATERRANVS, for so long was it after that the Lombards were expelled that Seigniorie) enioyed libertie, with good successe, vnder the soueraigntie and name of the Empire: which happened in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, sixtie and two. Some say, somewhat more.

Milan besieged and destroyed.

After this victory and terrible reuenge, the Emperor came to Pauia, where his wife the Empresse then lay; from whence he sent to demolish and throw downe the walles of Brescia, and Placentia; which (Milan being taken) yeelded themselues. BLONDVS, PLATINA, PHILIP BERGOMAS, and other Italian authors say, that he also destroyed the citie of Cremona, which in my opinion seemeth not likely; for Cremona had euer serued him, and been obedient. I beleeue it is taken for Crema, the error being the writers, or printers; and not theirs. And the Emperor hauing tamed and subdued all the other cities which rebelled against him, and made them to veeld obedience to Pope VICTOR, he resolued to take his way towards Germany: for he vnderstood that the same yere many alterations and troubles began, and that there was great want of Iustice; which grew principally through discord and enmitie betweene a certaine Earle called GVIDO, Count Palatine of Turingin, and GVELPHO the famous Knight of the Dukes of Bauiere before named, by reason of some iniury done by the said Count Palatine, to the said GVELPHO: whereupon young GVELPHO comming out of Italy (as a valiant young man, desirous to reuenge the iniurie done to his father) raised a power against him, and the other in his defence, and many great Princes taking part with either side, a cruell battaile was fought betweene them, wherein GVELPHO was ouerthrowne; whereof ensued great hurt, and the slaughter slaughter of many men, too long to be related: so as if the Emperour had any longer deferred his comming, the matter was come to that issue, that Germany was likely to haue beene lost and ruinated: but as soone as he came, he endeauored by all meanes, to set peace betweene them: wherein he found great difficultie, by reason that so many men were slaine and taken prisoners of either partie. And notwithstanding that he had once concluded a peace betweene them, yet within one yeere it was broken, and warres were againe renewed: but the great valour and respect of the Emperor, was a sufficient meane to make an entire and perfect peace, and to pacifie all: wherein he was the more earnest, for that he knew what was daily practised in Italy against himselfe, whither he had a great desire to returne. For as soone as he was gone out of Italy, leauing Milan desolate; the people conceiued a great feare and hatred against him: (as is vsuall against Princes which too seuerely, and with crueltie punish the offences of their subiects) and their feare and hatred increased in such manner, as they made new leagues and confederacies against him; casting out the gouernours which he had placed, and taking his rents and customes into their hands. In which league, besides those which before were friends, which were Brescia, Placencia, Crema, and the Milanois, there now ioyned with them Verona, and the Venecians, which greatly strengthened the league, theirs being a mightie common-wealth; together with Padua and other cities: all which took part with Pope ALEXANDER, against Pope VICTOR: and all these cities fortified and furnished themselues with men and munition.

Excessiue punishment is often the cause of greater offences.

A league made against the Emperor.

The Emperor seeing how resolutely those cities were bent against him, and knowing the doubtfull issue of the warre, and that the name and authoritie of Pope ALEXANDER was great; he resolued with himself to take another course, and by letters and ambassades dealt with PHILIP King of France, who supported ALEXANDER (yet in my opinion it should bee LEVVES, for this was in the yeere of our Lord 1175, at which time, as it appeareth by all the French histories, LEVVES raigned) for a meeting betweene them two, whither he would bring with him VICTOR, whom he held to be Pope: for which purpose, a place was appointed on the frontiers of France and Germany, and there a Councell to be held, wherein it should be determined whether of these two should be Pope: which (as some say) the Emperor procured, by that meanes thinking to haue depriued Pope ALEXANDER. The King of France, at the Emperors request, consented that this Councell should be assembled: but Pope ALEXANDER would not come, alleaging that he held that for no Councell, which was not held by his authoritie. Finally, the French King and the Emperor grew iealous and suspicious the one of the other, which authors report diuersly: but the truth is that the Emperour came, and brought with him his Pope VICTOR; and with him came the Kings of Scots, and of Bohemia, and many other great Princes and prelates, with a very great Army: and the French King brought no lesse, with whome came HENRY King of England with very choise men of war (from whom in my opinion he ought rather to haue feared warre, then expected or hoped peace) and these Princes encamped the one neere to the other, a riuer being betweene them. 1175

The Emperor vnderstanding that Pope ALEXANDER came not, but had summoned a Councell to be held at Turreon in France, was greatly displeased therewith, and resolued to depart: and the French King (to hold his word) without aduertising the Emperor thereof, came to the place appointed: and some say that he washed his hands in the riuer, and so returnd to his Campe. To be short, howsoeuer it was, they both returned into their countries, without treating of any thing; and not well pleased the one with the other.

The Emperor, with the greatest preparation he could make, resolued to returne into Italy, whither he sent Pope VICTOR before him; who being come to the citie of Luca (which held for the Emperor and him) there died. And by letters and commandement from the Emperour (persisting in his determination) the prelates which accompanied VICTOR (he being dead) chose him a successor, whose name was GVIDO, borne in Crema, and was called PASCAL. Pope ALEXANDER in France assembled the Councel which he had summoned; whither came many prelates and Bishops, out of England, Spaine, France, Sicilia, Gracia, and many other parts: where they ordained what they thought good. The Emperors preparation for his comming into Italy being published, the aforenamed cities, which were in a league and confederacie against him, sought new succours, and prouided an Army to make head against him.

It happened at this time, that in Rome died a Bishop called IVLIVS, who was Vicar or gouernour thereof in the Popes absence; who being dead, the Pope sent a Cardinall called IOHN: Who (notwithstanding a kinde of gouernement by Consuls, whereby the Popes power and authoritie was much diminished) vsed such meanes, that Rome and many Cities of Italie sent to entreate the Pope to returne; and he knowing with what affection he was called, resolued to depart thitherwards: and for that he would not goe through Lombardy (which held for the Emperour) he tooke his passage by Sea into Sicilia, and from thence went to Rome; with great companie and prouision, which WILLIAM King of Sicilie gaue him. Some write that hee himselfe accompanied him, and that he was receiued into Rome with marueilous great joy of all the people. With his comming, the Cities which in Italy held for him, tooke such heart and were so much encouraged, that they (not contented to haue rebelled against the Emperor) beganne to make warre against the Imperialists, and tooke some townes; wherein none were so forward as the City of Verona: which gaue the Emperor occasion to hasten his coming; which he had prolonged, to come with the greater power, seeing that his enemies forces daily encreased: and so he came into Italy with a greater Army then at any time before spoken of. What he did, and the effects which thereof ensued, I will recount as briefly as I may: for a raigne so long, and wherein happened so many and so great accidents, cannot be expressed in fewe words; neither reduced to a more breuitie. All this while raigned EMANVEL in Constantinople.

The Emperour FREDERICK's comming into Italy with so great power, did greatly terrify all the Countrey, considering what harme he had done there in former times: but the hatred of those which were his aduersaries was so great, as they would rather hazard any danger, then yeeld to his obedience. And he knowing by experience, that his rigour and seuerity had little auailed him, but had done him more harme then good, resolued now to make warre after another manner; at the least in Lombardy, wherein he pardoned those which submitted themselues vnto him, and would not permit the Country to be spoiled or wasted; vsing all men honourably; dissembling and making shew, that he vnderstood nothing of any conspiracy, or league made against him; and so drew neere to Brescia with his forces, where he gaue good entertainement to all such as from Crema, Verona, and Brescia, came to visite him (notwithstanding that those Cities were his greatest enemies, and had most practised against him) and so passed on, without comming into any of them, or doing them any violence; and went to Ferrara, where he was receiued; and from thence passed peaceably through the territory of Bologna: so as (at this time) he passed through Lombardy without doing any harme; and there he diuided his Army; part whereof he sent to make warres in Tuscane, and the marches thereof, for that it fauoured Pope ALEXANDER, and rejected Pope PASCAL, which lay in Luca: and with the rest of his Army he marched towards the City of Ancona; for that it held for his enemy EMANVEL Emperour of Constantinople: Which he besieged and beganne to batter with great furie: But it was so well defended, that the siege continued longer then hee expected.

Ancona besieged by the Emperor.

The Captaines and men of war, which he sent into the marches of Florence, Luca, and Pisa, after they had taken certaine Townes, marched through the territory of Rome, and made terrible war against all such places as held for Pope ALEXANDER; and in Rome wanted not some which fauoured the Emperors proceedings: yet the Pope left no meanes vnsought, as well by gifts, as promises, to assure himselfe, and to haue all at his deuotion: wherein (it is written) he issued much treasure.

Whilest the warre was prosecuted in this manner, the Emperor lying before Ancona; the Milanois, which after the destruction of Milan, had for the space of fiue or six yeeres liued as banished men, in cottages, cabbins, and villages; gathering themselues together, being wonderfully ayded and relieued with all manner of materials, instruments, workemen, and labourers, from the Cities of Verona, Placencia, Crema, and other their neighbours and friends, began to reedifie their old ruined Citie; repairing what might be repaired, and the rest they new builded, and wrought with so good a will, that within two or three yeeres the Emperour could not hinder them: and they reedified it in such manner, as there seemed nothing to be wanting. To all which (as writeth HENRICVS MVCIVS) the presence of GVALPHAGO (called Earle of Angleria) was a great helpe; who escaping out of prison in Germany came thither. Whilest that the Emperor lay before Ancona, and cruell warre was made against Rome, WILLIAM King of Sicilia died; and his sonne of the same name succeeded him, who was an excellent man of warre, and a great friend to the Church of Rome. At that time EMANVEL Emperour of Constantinople sent a solemne Ambassage to Pope ALEXANDER; whereby hee promised in person person with great power to come to his aide, and to driue FREDERICK BARBAROSSA out of Italie, and to conforme the Greeke Church, and to make the same subject to the Latine; conditionally, that he would reduce the whole Empire into one head, by taking it from the Germanes, and depriue FREDERICK, seeing that he had already excommunicated him, and that he was a schismatick and a rebell. But Pope ALEXANDER (notwithstanding that hee was much oppressed by the Emperor, reposing small confidence in the promises or power of EMANVEL) gaue a pleasing Equiuocall answere, and sent Ambassadors to temporize with him, but not to conclude any thing at all.

It happened at this time, that the flower of all the men of warre in Rome, went to besiege the towne and Castle of Tusculano, which is neere to Rome, from whence they were much annoyed, that Towne holding for the Emperour, whereof a Germane Prince was gouernour; and the besieged seeing themselues distressed, sent to the Emperour (lying before Ancona) for reliefe: to be briefe, from the Emperours Armie came for Generall, CHRISTERNE Archbishop of Mentz; who with such troupes as he brought from the Campe, and such others as hee could get by the way, came to fight with the Romanists which besieged that towne, being in number aboue thirtie thousand men; who fought with the Germanes (but not with order and valour like Romanes) and as as they were fighting, the besieged gouernour with his Garrison salied out of the Towne, and assailed his enemies at their backs, in such manner as the Romans were broken and ouerthrowne; and so many of them were slaine in the battaile and in the pursuite, as some Historiographers haue compared this ouerthrow to the battaile of Cannas, where they were ouerthrowne by HANNIBAL. Although the comparison be great, yet it is certaine that in a long time after Rome could hardly recouer it selfe: and Pope ALEXANDER tooke it very grieuously, and fought by all meanes possible to encourage and animate the remainder of the Citizens.

The Imperialists, as Masters of the field, daily tooke townes belonging to the Church of Rome; and the Emperour (who still lay before Ancona) when as he vnderstood of this victory, knowing the time to be fit for his purpose, departed presently thence towards Rome, and made no stay vntill he came before the same; where the Pope and his friends had already set all things in the best order they could for their defence. The Emperour presently caused the Vaticane to be assaulted; and notwithstanding that the assault was terrible, yet the place was so well defended, as it sufficed to keepe him from entring: wherewith he was so much enraged, that the next day he commanded a more terrible assault to be giuen, causing fireworkes to be throwne vpon Saint PETER's Church; in such manner, that the Pope being out of hope to defend the place, abandoned the Vaticane, and fled into the Citie, to lodge himselfe amongst the Frangipanes, who were his trusty friends, and set great guards to defend the Citie, and made many bridges ouer the riuer of Tiber: the which the Emperor (being master of the field, and hauing the Vaticane) greatly annoied and oppressed; with a resolution not to haue risen from before it, vntill it had yeelded, or that he had entred the same by force: and during the siege, he spoiled all the Countrie round about Rome.

Rome assailed by the Emperor.

WILLIAM King of Sicilie vnderstanding how greatly Pope ALEXANDER was distressed, and being willing to imitate his father WILLIAM, he sent to the Pope vp the Riuer of Tiber to Rome two Gallies with a great summe of money, men, and such other necessaries as they could beare, to the end that the Pope might flie away, if he pleased. The Pope made great account of this reliefe, and presently diuided this money amongst his friends and seruants, wherewith they were greatly encouraged to defend the Citie: and he sent back the Gallies to the King of Sicilia, and in them two Cardinals, to conferre with him, and to aske his counsell what was best to be done concerning his person.

William King of Sicilia releeued Pope Alexander against the Emperor.

In the meane time the Emperour seeing that the Citie defended it selfe, and could not suddenly be taken by force, he laboured to perswade the Romans both by secret and publike messages, to giue vp the Citie, and then he would restore whatsoeuer he held belonging to the Romanes; and that by them it should be determined, whether of the two ought to be held for Pope; to the end that he, generally by himselfe and by all others, might be respected and obeyed. With these practices which bare so great an apparance of a certaine peace, a great part of the Romane people were much moued, and were of opinion that these conditions ought to be accepted, whether the Pope would or not. The Pope vnderstanding hereof, held it for a great disgrace to his Holinesse, that he being Christs Vicar, should be judged by his enemies: and holding himselfe to be in no safety in Rome, he left the City by night and went downe the

Riuer

Riuer of Tiber to the Citie of Gaieta, and from thence to Beneuent: from whence he wrote his Letters to the Emperour of Constantinople, and to the Kings of France and Spaine, and to the Cities of Lombardy, which held for him, imploring their aide and succour. Some write that Pope ALEXANDER, flying from Rome, OTHO the Emperours sonne pursued him with seuenty fiue long ships or fregats; who comming to the coast of Histria, he was encountred by the Venetian fleete commanded by CIANVS, who fought with him, defeated his Army, tooke OTHO prisoner, and carried him to Venice: at which time the Pope entring there in triumph, he cast a Ring into the Sea, and wedded it vnto him, ordaining that euery yeere on the Ascension day they should obserue the like Ceremony.

A great pestilence in Rome, and in the Emperors Campe.

Hauing in this manner abandoned Rome, within few daies after the Emperor was forced to doe the like; for it pleased God to send so great a plague, both in his Campe and in the City, as there died daily thousands of the one and the other party: principally there died many Germane prelates, and some Princes, which came with the Emperour: Wherefore he hastily departed, leauing Pope PASCAL with a good guard of Souldiers in Saint PETER's in Rome: which was in the yeere of our Lord 1168, and he with his Army came into Tuscane, and the marches of Florence, where he tooke some strong holds which held for the Pope; in which, and in many other he placed Garrisons of his owne souldiers: and in the marches of Ancona and in Tuscane, he gaue some places to certaine principall men of Germany, with titles of Dukes and Earles, to annoy and oppresse Rome.

Whilest the Emperour was busied about these matters, Pope ALEXANDER procured aide and succour from all parts, and sought to support such as were his friends: And EMANVEL Emperour of Constantinople sent him an Ambassage, offering him a very great summe of money, desiring the same which we haue before specified, which was, that transporting the title of the Empire from Germany, by depriuing FREDERICK, hee should giue the same to him, and to his house: But the Pope for many considerations would not yeelde thereto, notwithstanding that he very pleasingly answered him. Within few daies after, Pope PASCAL died in Rome, where the Emperour left him: and the Emperour (persisting in his resolution) chose one IOHN borne in Hungary, who was called CALIXTVS, whom Pope ALEXANDER presently excommunicated.

The Emperour hauing remained some space in Italy, desiring to returne into Germany (for there was need of his presence) he sent a Bishop to Pope ALEXANDER with certain Articles of peace; what they were, Authors write not: but they all say that the Pope would not accept of them; and so they tooke no effect. The Pope labour'd with the Romanists for his returne to Rome; but as then the Citie being gouerned by Consuls, which were odious vnto him, hee could not effect the same according to his desire: And so went to other places in Romagna, and in the marches of Pulia, where he was fauoured and supported by WILLIAM King of Sicilia. The Emperor came to Pauia which held for him, where he fortified som Towns: and forasmuch as a great part of his Army was sick and many dead, he could not make war to any purpose against Milan and the other rebellious Cities: but, after, he took his way towards Germany, hauing done in Italy such harm as is expressed; without effecting what he principally desired.

Being returned into Germany, his greatest care was to make peace betweene all men, and to purchase the good will of the people, and to make himselfe rich; to returne into Italy, which he resolued wholly to subdue. At this time he inherited all the Castles, lands and goods, which belonged to his Cosin-german FREDERICK, son to the Emperour CONRADE, who died of the plague at the siege of Rome: and he inherited also the lands and goods of som other Princes, which died without Heires, and he also rewarded some, giuing them Titles, and Castles, and to some others he gaue new Arms and dignities. To the King of Bohemia he gaue for his deuice, a red Lion, in a siluer shield; and to others he gaue many such like honors. But in the meane time, GVALPHAGO tyrant of Milan, and the Milanois, were not careless, but continually fortified the City which they had new built: besides which with the other Cities in Lombardy of their confederacy, in honour of Pope ALEXANDER (vnder whose title and name they opposed themselues against the Emperour) by a common consent and contribution they began to build another Citie, calling it Alexandria, after the Popes name, vpon the side of the Riuer of Tanaro, in a place which should serue for a frontier Garrison against Pauia, Tortona, and the Marquisate of Monferrato, which were loyall to the Emperor. And in this his absence they made such haste (but chiefly those of Milan, Placencia and Cremona) as they walled and peopled the same, in such manner as it became a very strong fortresse; and many of those which liued liued in the borders thereof in villages, and vnfortified places, came thither to dwell, in such numbers, that the very first yeere it beganne to be inhabited, there were fifteene thousand men fit to beare Armes; so as at this day it is a good and a famous Citie, and is called Alexandria of Straw, which name the enemies thereof gaue it in the beginning in contempt. This alteration (added vnto the rest) made the Emperor to hasten his comming into Italie, when as he now had remained some time in Germany: And hauing disposed all things in good order, he set forwards and came with a mightie Army by sundrie waies, addressing his journey directly towards the estate of Monferrato, and those places which held for him: but he first took a Town at the foote of the Alpes, called Secusa, which he made to be throwne downe and ruined, for that it rebelled: and from thence he marched (not without trouble) towards Asse, which yeelded vnto him, more for feare of the like fortune as happened to Secusa, then for ought it wanted wherewith it might haue defended it selfe. And hauing such successe in the beginning, he went to besiege the new Citie of Alexandria, against which he came greatly incensed, purposing to haue vtterly destroyed and rased the same.

Alexandria besieged by the Emperor.

In Lombardy and in Piemont, the Marquesse of Monferrato held for the Emperour, together with the cities of Pauia, Noüarra, Turin and their territories, subjects and friends, and some other Townes. He besieged Alexandria, and lay before it foure moneths, in which time were done many notable feates of Armes; at the end whereof, the Emperour was constrained to rise from before it, for that it was relieued by the Riuer with great store of prouision; and all the Cities which were friends to it, sent thither souldiers to defend it. But the principall cause was, that the great Duke of Saxony, of Bauiere, and of many other estates, called (as was his father) HENRY the Proud, being at this siege before Alexandria, went from the Emperor with all his forces; alleaging that he would not be excommunicate, and a rebell to the Pope. It was suspected that he was corrupted and did this for money: or (which I rather beleeue) that he had some practice or conceite to haue made himselfe Emperour, vnder pretext that FREDERICK was disobedient to the Church of Rome: for which cause the Emperour raised his siege, and went to ouertake him, and sought by all meanes to haue stayed him; in so much that (as some write he would haue cast himselfe at his feet, if the other had not hindred him; and a priuate seruant of the Dukes called IORDAN standing by, said to the Duke, My Lord, suffer the Imperiall crowne to come to your feete, seeing that shortly you shall weare it vpon your head: Finally, Duke HENRY would not stay; and the Emperour had so fewe souldiers left, and was so voide of all reliefe, that within few daies he was constrained to leaue the warres, for that time; and so left Italie, without effecting ought more then I haue said. And although that BLONDVS and PLATINA conceale this his departure, let the Reader neuertheless vnderstand that I draw the webbe of my History from all the best Authors; and therefore I say, that he departed in great danger of his person.

WESPERGENSIS, NAVCLERVS, and HENRICVS MVCIVS write, that he was aided and succoured by those of Noüarra, and of Turin, in the passages ouer the Mountains, through which he took his way towards Burgundy, which was his wiues patrimony; and that vpon the way he was in some places in such danger, that he was driuen to goe disguised as another mans seruant.

After all these extremities, arriuing in Burgundy, he gathered together his souldiers, and raised some new companies, and so went into Germany; where the said HENRY had already practiced some Innouations against him, some Earles conspiring with him; for he was the greatest Prince in all Germany: But the Emperour brought him to be one of the least; for as he was much feared and very valiant, the Duke could do little against him. But the Emperour as soon as he came into Germany, assembled a Diet or Councell of all the Princes, whither he summoned HENRY to come: but he not daring to make his appearance, the Emperor proceeded against him (although not without contradiction and many difficulties) and in the end confisked his estate, and all his lands: which he might easily doe, by bestowing the same vpon men of great power, all which making warre against him at once, took the same from him: Yet some write, that this Sentence and confiscation was afterwards, in the yeer of our Lord 1180, when the peace was made between the Emperor and the Pope: It may peraduenture be, that at this time the proces began, and judgement was then giuen, but afterwards put in execution; which was in this manner.

The Emperour deprined Duke Henry of Saxony of his estate.

The Dukedome of Saxony he bestowed vpon a valiant Knight, called BERNARD, Earle of Anhald, whom the Arch-bishops of Mentz and Colen, and the Lantzgraue of Turingia holpe to to take the same. The best and greatest part of the Duchie of Bauiere he gaue to one OTHO Count Palatine, not of the Counties Palatines of Rhine, but of Wittilspach; which he took by the helpe of two of his brothers, who were men of great power: another part of this State, which lay on the other side of Danubius, he added to the house of Austria: other his lands and Earledomes he diuided betweene HENRY Lantzgraue of Alsacia, LEVVES Marques of Thuringia, BERTOLD of Carinthia, and some others; all which together made warres against him; so as to him, his of-spring and descendents, remained only the Countie of Bruinswick, which afterwards in the time of FREDERICK the Second was erected to a Duchie; and that estate encreasing, great enmity continued between the Dukes thereof, and the successors of BERNARD, to whom was giuen the Duchie of Saxony.

Count Palatine of Wittilspach

The Emperor did not only apply himselfe to suppresse this HENRY in Germany, but from the very first day of his comming thither, was carefull for the getting of money, and the raising of forces for his returne into Italy: and so, being assisted by all those Princes, to which he had giuen and promised to giue those estates, and by his owne house and kindred of Suenia, and his seruants and subiects; he in short space raised so good an Army, that he went very mighty into Italy, and carried his wife the Empresse with him. Being comm to the Citie of Como, in the moneth of Iune, notwithstanding that he wanted neither courage, discretion, power, or forces; yet matters prospered not with him as he expected, but rather cleane contrary: for the Milanois and their confederats had now taken such heart, and were in such readinesse, that they resolued to giue him battaile, after they had spoiled the fields about Pauia, and such other Towns as held for him: and so they took the plaine field iust in the way which leadeth from Como to Milan, by which the Emperor was to passe; who had no lesse desire to fight: and was very glad, when he vnderstood their resolution.

The two Armies being vpon a cleare day come within sight the one of the other, and the squadrons and battalions of either side marshalled in very good order; the Emperor drew neer to the place which his enemies held; and (in a manner) with equall spleene, hatred and power both parties began to fight: first the horsemen brake; and then all the rest; and so there was fought a very fierce and bloody battaile; the one wounding and killing the other most cruelly. It hapned, that in this so great fury, he which bare the standard and Imperiall Eagle (through his rash hardinesse, and desire of victorie) aduanced himselfe so farre forwards amongst his enemies, that he was slaine, and the Standard taken: which when the Emperor saw, who (as it seemeth) was not farre from thence, he was therewith so much enraged, that encouraging his soldiers, with a new fury and resolution, he so oppressed his enemies, that he slew and wounded many of them with his own hands: but as this could not be done without great danger to his person; so in the thickest of the preasse, and greatest throng, his horse fell with him; being as is thought, first wounded: and the charge on euery side was so hot, that the Emperor was held for dead; which gaue the Italians cause to gather courage, and the Germanes to faint; for both parties certified the death of the Emperor, which so much discouraged the Imperialists, that victory apparantly shewed it selfe for their enemies: and the Imperialists fled and abandoned the field, where a very great and cruell slaughter was made of them, besides those which thinking to escape by swimming, were drowned in the riuer Tesino, neere to the place where this battell was fought.

A battaile betweene the Emperor and the Milanois wherein he was thought to haue beene slain.

This battaile being lost, and all the Imperiall Army broken and put to rout; all men holding the Emperour for dead; and his wife the Empresse, remaining in the Citie of Como, clad in mourning attire, suing to haue her husbands body, to burie the same, which she requested the Milanois to graunt by her Ambassadors: the fift day after the battaile, the Emperour appeared aliue, and in health, in his Imperiall robes, in the Citie of Pauia: whither vpon the bruit of his being there, came all those which were dispersed and escaped from the battaile; and those which most desired to aide him, and to doe him seruice. In what manner the Emperour escaped aliue, it is not written; but it may be conjectured, that being salne, he remained in the field, although without hurt, and the night being come, escaped by secret and vnknowne waies. His enemies by reason of this victory gotte such credit and reputation, that many Townes and great men in Italy forsooke the Emperour, and went vnto Pope ALEXANDER.

The Empresse with some Princes and prelates of the Empire, being come to Pauia, boldly and plainly told the Emperor to his face, that for the schisme which he had made, and maintained in the Church of Rome, this calamitie was befaln him; for God would neuer giue him him any entire victory, and except he would submit himselfe to the obedience of the Church, they could not well doe him seruice: whereupon being moued with these admonitions, and knowing the time; (notwithstanding that his seruants and subiects daily repaired vnto him with many warlike troups) yet he sent his Ambassadors to the Pope; vnfainedly suing to him for peace: and so they began to treat thereof by Ambassadors. In this negotiation, and by what meanes this peace was made, there is great difference among Authors; some relating it after one manner, and some after another, which I recite not, auoiding the losse of time and labour: but they all agree, that after many daies spent in this treatie, the Pope went to Venice, whither the Emperour came, and that there with great solemnity the peace was concluded, and that the Emperour kist the Popes foot, and yeelded him obedience. Some Authors write, that (among many Dukes and others which were present, when as the Emperor did in all humility prostrate himselfe at the Popes feet) THEODORE, Marquesse of Misnia, seeing the tyrannous insolency of the Pope, setting his foot vpon the Emperors necke, moued with a generous disdaine, with a threatning countenance, and eyes inflamed with furie, ranne to take him vp: whereat the Pope was so terrified, as he fled into the Emperors armes and kist him; neither could hee bee drawne away, before he was secured.

Note the pride of Pope Alexander the third.

A peace concluded betweene the Emperor and the Pope in the citi. of Venice, where the Emperor prostrated himselfe at the Popes feete and the pope in in turning manner setting his foote on the Emperor: necke; vsed these words:

Super aspidem & Basiliscum ambulabo, & conculcabo leonem & draconem.

Then a truce was granted by the Emperour to the King of Sicily, for fifteene yeeres; and to the Cities of the league, for sixe: which (according to most writers) passed in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred seuentie and seuen; and afterwards in the yeere, one thousand, one hundred eightie and three, the peace with Lombardy was concluded in the citie of Constance; but all in such manner as it pleased the Pope; and such townes as were withheld from him, were commanded to be rendred: and so the Emperour continuing there some few daies, returned into Germany, and the Pope to Rome, but he first graunted to the citie of Venice, and the Dukes thereof, great priuileges, immunities, and exemptions. The Pope being come neere to Rome, before he entred the citie, some speeches were vsed concerning the deposing of the Consuls, and that no more should be chosen: but as it was a custome of fiftie yeeres continuance, so it could not then be abolished; but order was taken, that none should be chosen, but such as pleased the Pope, and that before they executed their offices, they should sweare to be in all things seruiceable, and obedient to his Holines.

This being concluded, the Pope came to Rome, where he was receiued with great solemnitie: and the other Pope CALIXTVS, acknowledging himselfe to haue erred, cast himselfe at the Popes feete, craning mercy (hauing first laid aside his pontificall habit) and renounced all the right and interest that he had to the papacy: and so ALEXANDER remained sole pope in peace all the rest of his life; and so this schisme (which had continued twentie yeeres) ceased.

The Emperour FREDERICK being come into Germany (now old and tired with fiue and twentie yeeres warres, and combustions) spent his time in preserning the peace which he had graunted, and in establishing his fiue sonnes in estates: which he did in such manner as you shall heare.

This peace being concluded in such manner as I haue told you, Pope ALEXANDER died, after that he had been Pope the space of one and twentie yeeres, the most of them, in troubles and contention, and LVCIVS the Third succeeded him: the yere before his death, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and eighty, died EMANVEL Emperor of Constantinople, who raigned seuen and thirtie yeeres, and left a son who was a child called ALEXIVS for his successor, appointing a kinsman of his, whose name was ANDRONICVS (a man of great parentage) to bee his Gouernour and Protector; who was so very a Villaine and so arrant a Traytor, that after that hee had gouerned certaine yeeres, and committed many insolencies; hee killed the young Emperour, and made himselfe tyrant of the Empire, putting many great men (such as he feared) to death: against whom for his detestable treason, WILLIAM King of Sicily made sharpe warre, and tooke many Townes from him; which brought him to such an end as hee deserued: for the Constantinopolitanes seeing themselues thus oppressed, rose against ANDRONICVS, and made one ISACVS or ISACIVS, descended of Imperial bloud, Emperor: and ISACIVS preuailing, ANDRONICVS was apprehended, and hauing one of his hands cut off & one of his eyes put out, was carried through the streetes vpon a Camel; and by the general consent of all men had such a death as he deserued, and as such deserue, as through ambition and desire to rule, are traytors and disloyall to their Lords. And so ISACIVS remained Emperor, and was an excellent prince: his end you shal know hereafter.

The young Emperor of constantinople murthered by his protector.

The Emperour FREDERICK enioying peacefull times in his Empire, summoned a Councell to be held in the citie of Mentz, where he settled his sonnes in such estates, as you shall heare. His eldest sonne he caused to be chosen King of the Romanes, and his successor: his second sonne FREDERICK he made Duke of Sueuia, which was his owne inheritance: to OTHO his third sonne, he gaue the title of Duke of Burgundie, appointing him to succeede his wife, the Empresse, to whom that estate appertained: to his fourth sonne CONRADE, and to his fift sonne PHELIP, he gaue other rents, and some townes wherein they might liue: but it afterwards ensued otherwise: for CONRADE succeeded FREDERICK in the Duchie of Sueuia, for that he died without issue; and PHILIP after the death of his elder brother HENRY, came to be Emperor.

Pope LVCIVS knowing there was great contention and discord betweene the Princes of the Holy land, and the states of Soria, and fearing the daunger that might ensue, endeuored by his Letters and Ambassadours to reconcile them, and to make them friends: and procured WILLIAM King of Sicilia, which then warred vpon ANDRONICVS, Emperour of Constantinople (who as I said made away the young Emperor ALEXIVS) to giue ouer his warres, and to relieue that countrie, which was oppressed by the Infidels; and so the King of Sicilia sent thither fortie armed gallies; wherein went some principall men and souldiers vnto that seruice.

The Emperor FREDERICK before that the time of the truce by him graunted in Venice to the cities which had rebelled in Lombardy, was expired; (desiring by faire and gentle meanes without rigour or Armes, to reduce them to his seruice) summoned a Councell, or Parliament, to be held in the citie of Constance; whither he willed them to send their Ambassadours, with sufficient power and authoritie to conclude a peace, shewing them signes of great loue and good will. The cities being wearie of the warres, imagining that there would be farre better conditions propounded, held it for their good: so as besides Pauia, Cremona, Aste, Alua, Tortona, and some others which had still perserued loyall and in the Emperors seruice; the cities of Milan, Bercelli, Lodi, Bergamo, Brescia, Mantoa, Verona, Noüarra, Vicencia, Padoa, Treuiso, Bolonia, Fauentia, Modeno, Rezzo, Parma, Placencia, and others sent their Ambassadours: with which the Emperor came to an agreement; graunting them perpetuall peace and pardon for all offences past; leauing to them, their lawes, customes, iurisdictions, ciuill and criminall, with authoritie to chuse Consuls and Gouernors, and commanded to be restored al whatsoeuer had been taken from them in time of war; and they acknowledging him and his successors for their soueraigne Lords, sware to him fealtie, and homage: and it was set downe, how, and in what manner they were to doe him seruice; greatly to their aduantage. And besides this, that whereas certaine appeales for certaine summes should come to the Emperor; he ordained therefore to haue his Agents in Lombardy, to the end that the people should not be constrained to come to him into Germany: and that the Consuls and Officers to be chosen, before they did execute their offices, should do their homage and be sworne to the Emperor: setting downe likewise what seruices they should doe, at such time as the Emperor in person should be in Lombardy. Finally, there were new couenants and agreements made, which were sworn, and confirmed by the Emperor, and the Ambassadors. The Instrument of all which, as it passed, appeareth at large, and in particular, in the Ciuill Law, in the end of the Volume intituled (De pace Constancia.)

Exemptions graunted by the Emperor to sundrie cities in Lombardy.

This peace being concluded in this manner, the Ambassadors with great ioy returned; and all the Townes approued and sware to obserue and keepe the same. Within few yeeres after this, in Verona dyed Pope LVCIVS the Third, whither he came to haue assembled a generall Councell, for the relieuing of the King of Ierusalem, and the Christian Princes of those Prouinces in the East, betweene whom was great combustion. And the potent King SALADINE did much oppresse them, who by stratagems, and great battailes, had made himself Soldan, and Calipha of Egypt, King of Damasco and Aleppo, and held great part of Armenia, Licia, and the most part of Mesopotamia; so as on euery side he had meanes to make warre vpon BALDVVIN the Fourth, then King of Ierusalem, who carried himselfe valiantly; and against the Princes of Antioch, Tripoly, and others which held, and defended those parts. And he so much oppressed BALDVVIN (who in former time had been of such power, that Egypt was tributarie vnto him, and he held certaine cities therein, which his father and predecessor ALMERICVS had gotten, and had in person conquered Palestina, and other lands) that he now employed all his forces in no other thing, but to defend himself: and in the end what befell him, we will declare; for that it appertaineth to our historie, to shew the reason, moving the Emperor FREDERICK to goe to the warres of the East, wherein he died.

Saladine Soldan of Egypt.

Pope

Pope LVCIVS (as I said) dying in Verona, was buried there; and in his place was chosen VRBANVS the Third, borne in Milan. At this time, which was in the beginning of the yeere, one thousand, one hundred, fourescore and six, the Emperour FREDERICK came peaceably into Italy, and with the good will of the Milanois, and of all Lombardy, and at their especiall request and entreatie went to Milan, and was there receiued, with the greatest ioy and solemnitie, that could be deuised; and there a marriage was solemnized, betweene his sonne HENRY, King of the Romanes, and the sister of WILLIAM King of Sicilia (yet some say that she was his Aunt, sister to his father King WILLIAM of Sicilia, and daughter of his grandfather ROGER) she was a woman of the age of thirtie yeeres, but very faire, and he of one and twentie, as GODFREY VITERBINGENSIS; and OTHO in the addition to OTHO FRISINGENSIS his Chronicle, and the Abbat WESPERGENSIS also write; which in my opinion is true; notwithstanding that PLATINA and BLONDVS say, that this marriage was made after that the Emperor FREDERICK was dead, by the procurement of Pope CELESTINE the Third, and that she was threescore yeeres old; and that WILLIAM King of Sicily dying without heyres, the Pope by this marriage made him King of Sicily. But in my opinion, the first Authors are to be beleiued, for that they might be eye witnesses, and the others deceiued; for as he was afterwards (through this marriage) king of both the Sicilies, they imagined it to haue been done then.

This wedding feast being ended, the Emperor, leauing his sonne HENRY for his Lieutenant and Gouernor of Lombardy, returned into Germany. Pope VRBANE knowing what passed in the East with the King of Ierusalem, and the other Princes; when as hee was confirmed Pope, endeuoured to perswade and encourage Christian kings and princes, to succour and relieue those places: but they making long delayes (notwithstanding that they sent some supplies) it came to passe, that Ierusalem, and many other Cities held by the Christians were lost: the cause whereof (as well for that it was so great a matter, as also for that it appertaineth to our History) I will set downe, although it will be somwhat long; for I presume that the Reader will not be discontented therewith, which as briefly as I can expresse the same, passed in this manner.

BALDVVIN the Fourth (as I said) raigning King in Ierusalem; and BOHEMVND who was a mighty Prince being Duke of Antioch: and RAYMOND, or REMON, Earle of Tripoly, who was also Lord of other Cities, and of the prouinces of Galilea, and Tiberiades, which hee had by the marriage of his wife, who was a great princes daughter, and Lord thereof; and so other Princes and Captains: which although they banded, and had quarrels with the Knights Templars, and of Saint IOHN, yet they joyntly together defended what the Christians held in the East (which was no small matter) against the forenamed SALADINE.

Matters standing in this estate, BALDVVIN who was a man of great spirit and valour, being in the citie of Nazareth (wherein he then lay) was taken with such a leprosie, that he was not able to goe, nor to stand on his legges; whereupon he was carried to Ierusalem, and his disease held him in such manner, that he daily expected his end. Which being published, so much encouraged the Infidels, that they made continuall rodes and incursions into the countries of the Christians. Hee seeing himselfe in this estate (hauing no sonne to succeede him, or to gouerne the countrie for him) made a man of great fort, called GVIDO of LVSIGNAN, gouernour thereof; who was the second husband of his sister SIBILLA, who by her first husband, called WILLIAM LONGSVVORD, Marquesse of Monferrato, had a son called BALDVVIN; and a daughter called SIBILLA. With this gouernment some of the Princes were much discontented, and SALADINE with a mighty Army inuading their countries, the Christians disagreeing amongst themselues, GVIDO the kings brother in law, and Captain generall of all his forces, dering not to fight with him, the Christians daily lost Towns and Castles: whereupon the sick King BALDVVIN resolued to take another course; which was before his death, to make his Nephew BALDVVIN, who was his sisters sonne, King, notwithstanding that he was but a childe, and RAYMGND of Tripoly, his gouernour and protector; and to put his brother in law GVIDO from the gouernment: by reason whereof, ensued new factions, after which followed the losse of those countries, through conflicts, besiegings, assaults, and taking of towns, by SALADINE in fiue or six yeers, that this war lasted, vntill the greatest losse of all; which was the death of King BALDVVIN; which hapned in the yeer of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, eighty fiue.

RAYMOND Earle of Tripoly, comming to gouern the kingdom, in the behalfe of the young King, GVIDO of LVSIGNAN and SIBILLA mother to the said King, were so inuested therein, that he could not execute his office: whereof ensued new troubles, the one for priuate and particular passions and quarrels (forgetting the publike good) seeking the ruine of the other. In this confusion died the young King BALDVVIN, eight moneths after the death of his Vncle; His father in law GVIDO, and his mother SIBIL, concealing his death for feare that RAYMOND Earle of Tripoly, by meanes of his great power, would by the generall consent of the people, haue made himself King: the matter was caried so cunningly, that by meanes of gifts and faire words, the Patriarch, and other chiefe men of Ierusalem, chose him for their King; which was the occasion of the euils which afterwards ensued: for RAYMOND Earle of Tripoly, was so highly offended herewith, that (to the ruine of himselfe, and of all the rest) he made a league with SALADINE; promising and assuring him, that he would neither aide, nor relieue the King of Ierusalem.

Guido Lusignan brother in law to King Baldwin deceased, was chosen King of Ierusalem.

This friendship being made, such courses were held, that after certaine truces and treaties of peace and breaches of the same, SALADINE began to make war against the King and kingdome of Ierusalem with greater furie then at any time before: and as GVIDO wanted the aide of the Earle of Tripoly, and BOHEMVND Duke of Antioch could hardly help him, by reason of the farre distance; and for that he also had enough to doe, to defend himself against the Captaines of the said SALADINE, he was much distressed, and daily lost townes & Castles; neuer ceasing by Ambassadours & Letters, to solicite the Emperor, the Pope, and other Westerne Princes for aide; and they resoluing to yeeld the same, and making preparation for the voyage, it happened, that RAYMOND Earle of Tripoly (either made a double league, as some write, or knowing that if the kingdome of Ierusalem were lost, he should be assured to haue an euill neighbour of SALADINE) agreed, and made a peace with the King of Ierusalem, and came with his power to aide him; whereupon SALADINE raised his siege from before Ptolomaide, and encamped himself before Tiberiades, which belonged to the Earle of Tripoly, strictly besieging the same.

The King of Ierusalem hauing drawne together all the power he was able to make, came with a great Army, the Duke of Antioch being with him; whither came with all their power, the said Earle of Tripoly, the masters of the orders of the Knights Templars, and of Saint IOHN, with other great men, Knights and Captaines, the Patriarches of Ierusalem, and of Alexandria, and certaine Bishops; so that (as it is affirmed) there were 30000. horsemen, and 40000. footes; which was the vttermost of the Christians power in the East.

After many Councels and opinions, the King at the instance of the Earle of Tripoly resoluing to free Tiberiades, and to fight with SALADINE, which lay before it, presently began to march, and the troupes and men of warre which he had with him, which were such, as no man seeing them doubted of victory; but it pleased God to giue it an other successe: for SALADINE, who knew their resolution (as a man which wanted not courage, and had an Armie containing double the number of the Christians, of very well trained souldiers) resolued to fight with them; (but not neere to the besieged City) and to that purpose went to meet them vpon the way: and it happened that the two Armies drawing neere together, and the King of Ierusalem one day purposing to march with his people with great speede, and to lodge them in a place wherein was very great plenty of water (whereof in those countries is great scarcity) SALADINE by espiall or some other misfortune being aduertised thereof, marched thither with so great celerity, that before the comming of the Christians, his men had taken the same place; and the Christians comming extreamly wearie, and thirstie, by reason of their long march, and the heat of the Sunne, found enemies in the place where they thought to haue found water and ease; wherewith they were much troubled: Neuertheless, the King seeing there was no other remedie, commanded the place forthwith to bee assaulted, presuming thereby to haue repelled the enemy: but missing of his purpose, hee with his Armie was driuen to lodge all that night in the drie fieldes; where they endured intolerable thirst; and by the breake of day, SALADINE (who the most part of the night had been busie in ordering his troupes) tooke the field with his squadrons, where the Christians (with tired and weake bodies through extreame thirst, and their horses being in the same extremitie) staied for them: and notwithstanding that they began the fight with great courage and resolution, yet their strength failing they were ouerthrowne by the Infidels; and there was the greatest and most cruell slaughter made of them, that in those daies had been seene, either in Asia or in Europe.

A battaile fought betweene Saladine the Soldane of Egypt, and the Christians.

The King was taken prisoner fighting; and the Earle of Tripoly escaped by flight, and and some say that he made all the rest to flee, and that he afterwards died miserably. The Duke of Antioch was slain after that he was taken, with all the Knights Templars, and of Saint IOHN, that could be found. SALADINE hauing obtained so notable a victory, following his course, went to Ptolomaida, which he easily took; and did the like by Berito, and other Cities too long to relate. Finally, in his owne person (after the taking of many Towns, which, out of hope of any succours, or to be relieued, rendred; and the sooner, for that hee was a very just Prince in performing his promise, and curteous, intreating those very friendly which yeelded) he marched forwards, and sate him down with his Army before Ierusalem: and hauing fiercely besieged and assaulted the same for the space of thirty daies continually, they yeelded, vpon the second day of the moneth of October, in the yeer of our Lord, 1187. And so was this City lost; and at this day is in the hands of the Infidels, almost eighty nine yeers after that it was taken by GODFREY of Buillon, and the other Princes before mentioned: in which time had raigned nine Kings with him who then was, to weet, GODFREY of Buillon the first and only King of that name; and then after him, the two BALDVVINS, and FVLCO, and BALDVVIN the Third, then ALMERICVS, and BALDVVIN the Fourth, and BALDVVIN the childe, and GVIDO which then raigned: and notwithstanding that the name and title of King of Ierusalem continued a long time, and that the Christians held many Towns and Cities in Soria for the space of one hundred and odde yeers afterwards, and many Princes went thither to haue made a conquest thereof: yet in the City of Ierusalem they raigned no more, neither possessed the same, but a small time that the Emperor FREDERICK the Second was there. The East parts being brought to this estate, and Ierusalem lost; Antioch, and the Prouinces thereto belonging, together with Tyre, Sidon, and Tripoli, were in the like danger.

Ierusalem yeelded to Saladine

The Emperor FREDERICK vnderstanding these vnhappy newes (although now old and tired) resolued to aduenture his whole power with his person, for the recouery of what was lost, and to defend the remainder: and God did put the like resolution into the hearts of the Kings of England and of France, and of many other Princes. The fame of SALADINES acts daily increasing; it is written, that besides the estate of Antioch, he took one hundred and fiue and twenty walled Cities, and that he made cruell warre ouer all the Country. Through sorrow and grief for so great losse, the greatest prouision and preparation was made to goe to the relief thereof, that hath been seen in Christendome at any time before or since. For, first the Emperor (leauing his sonne HENRY, who already was King of the Romans, for his Lieutenant, and with him his two brothers, CONRADE and PHILIP) prepared a great and excellent army both of foot and horse, and began to march through Hungary, Bulgaria, and Thracia, towards Constantinople, thence to passe ouer into Asia: and with him went his son FREDERICK Duke of Sueuia, and BERTOLD Duke of Morauia, and his brother the Marquesse of Bandaor Baden, and many other Dukes, Earls, Archbishops and Bishops.

A little before this, died HENRY King of England, who purposed to haue gone the same journey: for it was enioyned him for his penance concerning THOMAS BECKET, called S. THOMAS of Canterbury, which I had no time vntill now to speake of. But his sonne RICHARD King of England, and PHILIP King of France, concluding a peace (for they were at warres about the Duchie of Normandy) cyther of them with the best Army that hee could make, went to this warre in the East. The like did OTHO Duke of Burgundy the Emperour's son, and the Venecians sent thither a great fleete, and so did the Pisans, who then were mighty at Sea. To this seruice also went CONRADE Marquesse of Monferrato, and HENRY Earle of Champania, and many other great Lords and Captains of Italy, France and England, whose names for breuity I leaue. That which now most maketh me wonder in this zealous voyage of the Christians, is, that from Denmarke and Frisland came fifty Galleys, it being so long a voyage from thence into Soria: and the Earle of Flanders sent twelue: and WILLIAM King of Sicilia did very well set-to his helping hand: for (besides the fortie Galleys which he sent before) hee furnished and relieued all such as went, and came by him, and wanted, with shipping, victuals, armes, and other necessaries, and maintained (for a long time) a great Nauy, to assure all passengers that would go this voyage, from rouers and pyrats by Sea.

The successe which all these men had, and what befell them, aswell by the way, as in that war, is too long to be written (for they did great matters) and I should too much digresse from the history of the Emperors (which is my taske) wherefore it shall suffice that the Reader vnderstand by me the issue of these proceedings; the rest let him reade in the Authors which wrot therof, which I will name: I will conclude in the history of the Emperour, who comming with his forces to Constantinople, made a league with the Emperor ISACIVS; and being there, was giuen to vnderstand, that GVIDO of LVSIGNAN, King of Ierusalem, was gotten out of prison, together with the Master of Saint IOHN; and that with such men of warre as repaired vnto him, he had renewed the warre, and determined to take the Field, in hope to haue recouered certain places: whereupon the Emperor in great haste passed his Army ouer the Streight at Constantinople, in the yeer of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, eightie nine, and began to march through Asia the Lesse; where passing in peace through the Countries of the Christians, he entred the Country of the Soldan of Iconium, who was a mighty Prince in those parts, with whom he made peace; vpon condition, that hee should giue him victuals and free passage: which if he performed, then he would not warre vpon his Country. But, the heathen King not onely brake his promise, but gathering together a great number of Turks, stopt his passage, and did him the greatest hurt he was able: wherewith the Emperor being very much incensed, made cruell warre in his Countries; and coming to the mountains at the entry into Cilicia, he made his passage with great difficulty and danger: for, the Soldan had drawn a head of a great multitude of Turks and other heathen Nations, thinking to haue ouerthrowne the Emperour in those Streights. But it pleased God that hee passed, although with great danger and some losse: and, coming down into the Plains, he fought with the Infidels, and ouerthrew them, and slue a very great number of them. And so, taking and sacking Cities and Towns, hee marched forwards, and entred Armenia the Lesse, and by force took the greatest part of all that Prouince.

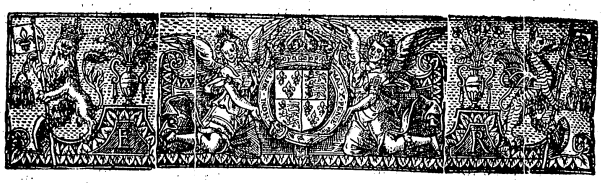
The Emperor Frederick his victory against the Soldane of Iconium.

The newes of his coming and victories strake so great fear into his enemies, and so much encouraged the Christians, that GVIDO King of Ierusalem, and his brother EMERICVS, and other great men before named, which were there assembled, leauing the Cities of Tyre and Tripoli, whither they had retired themselues; with a well ordred Army took the Field, and assailed Ptolomaida or Acon, purposing to haue the same, for that it was a Hauen of the sea, and of great importance; whither came the fleets from Denmark and Flanders, and from other parts. The siege was reinforced, and the Christians Army daily increased; and all men knowing the Emperor to be neer at hand, SALADINE thought himself vnable to defend what he had gotten: and King GVIDO, and those which were with him, recouered force and courage. But it pleased God in his secret iudgement, that in the time of this hope and of good successe, there hapned so great a disaster, that all was changed and turned vpside down; which was, the death of the Emperor, which hapned by great misfortune in this manner:

The Emperor being very neer to Soria, vpon a very hot day in the summer time, desiring to wash and refresh himself in a riuer (as they write that at other times hee had done) the swiftnes and depth thereof was greater than hee thought or mistrusted: and so in the presence of his people going into the water, without that any of them was any way able to saue or help him, he was carried down the stream, and therein drowned. And so in a little water died he, for fear of whom all Asia trembled; which hapned vpon the tenth day of Iune, in the yeer of our Lord, 1190, and in the eight and thirtith yeer of his Raign: through whose death the enterprise was extremely hindred.

The Emperour Frederick drowned.

At the same time befell another misfortune, which was a controuersie and discord between the Princes of those parts; which hapned by reason of the death of SIBILLA, wife of GVIDO King of Ierusalem, and sister to King BALDVVIN deceased. Whereupon, HERFRAND, who was married to ISABEL, sister to this Ladie, with the aid of some of his friends, would haue been King, by the right of his wife; which the widower GVIDO withstood, alleaging that he was the sworn and obeyed King, and therefore ought not to be deposed. And it followed, that CONRADE, Marquesse of Monferrato, took his Lady from him perforce, alleaging that she was not lawfully married to HERFRAND: and so he married her, and in like maner challenged to be King of Ierusalem; which (besides that it was a vile deed) caused great trouble: for, this Prince held the City of Tyre. By which means, the widower King GVIDO lost much of his authority, for that he would not fall at variance with them: yet he still held the name and title of King.



The matter remaining in this great confusion, after the sudden and infortunate death of the Emperor, a man may easily conceiue the great grief and sorrow of the whole Army: neuertheless, his sonne FREDERICK, Duke of Sueuia, as a valiant and courageous Knight (beeing presently vpon the death of his father, as reason was, made Generall and their Head) incouraged his people, and taking the dead body of his father, marcht directly towards Soria; and sent certain certain messengers to GVIDO King of Ierusalem, who lay before Ptolomaida, to aduertise him of the death of his father; and desiring him to send him such men as might guide and direct him what was to be done. Which although it was not to be effected without great danger (for, the most part of their way lay through their enemies Countries) yet King GVIDO sent him two Knights well experienced in the warres, which guided him and his people to the City of Antioch, which lay neerest to his way: where, after that hee had (for some daies space) refreshed his Army, he thought to haue made great warres, and to haue recouered the Cities lost in that estate; and so to haue proceeded forwards. But his Armie of Germanes, which came wearied and tired of their long iourney, finding there great abundance of victuals; by means of their forepassed hunger, so disordered themselues by surfetting (or, it was Gods will that it should be so) as there fell so great a plague among them, that within fewe daies most of them died; in such sort, that FREDERICK (with such as escaped the plague) departed from Antioch; and drawing neer to the sea, imbarked himself, and sailed to the City of Tyre, which (as I said before) was held by the Christians: and leauing there the dead body of his father, he went from thence with his people (but not without great danger of the enemy) to ioyn with GVIDO of LVSIGNAN, King of Ierusalem, who lay before Ptolomaida; which, SALADINE had so fortified and garrisoned, that the Christians were much troubled in the siege thereof; and preuailed little, vntill the coming of the Kings of England and of France, after many accidents befallen them in the way, which was in the same yeer: but they continued the siege, accompanied with other Princes, notwithstanding that there was euer little conformity among them; where wee will now leaue them, to make relation of the succession in the Empire, for this their history appertaineth not to my charge: and how HENRY the Sixt, the Emperour FREDERICKS eldest sonne was chosen Emperor, who held his fathers place in Germany, being alreadie made king of the Romanes, and what he did in Germany and in Italy. Yet forasmuch as this enterprise of Ierusalem was so notable a matter, and so great Kings came to the seruice, we will briefly tell you what end it had, though not the successe.

The siege of Acco or Ptolemaida.

In Constantinople all this while raigned ISACIVS: in Italy a little before this, died without issue, WILLIAM King of both the Sicilies: wherefore Pope CLEMENT the Third challenged those kingdomes for the Church of Rome; and HENRY King of the Romans, and future Emperor, pretended to be his, by reason of his mariage with Constance sister to King WILLIAM. But the Sicilians and Neapolitans, against the Popes wil, chose one TANCREDE, who was Vncle to King WILLIAM, a base son to ROGER King of Sicilie: who seised on the kingdome. In writing this Emperours life, I haue spent longer time then I ordinarily doe, for that many great accidents hapned in his time, and for that so much is written of him, I haue bin in a manner constrained thereto; and also as at other times I haue said, in matters which draw neere to our times, it shall not be amisse to make longer and more ample relation.

My authors in whose books the same may be seen more at large, are these which follow: OTHO FRISINGENSIS in the historie which he particularly wrote in two books, of the beginning of the Emperor FREDERICK's raigne, and RAVDAVICVS in what he added therto, and GODFREY VITERBIENSIS, all eye witnesses, and the Abbat WESPERG in his Chronicle, an author of the same time, wherin he writes his life; Abbat ROBERT in the addition which hee made to SIGIBERT's Chronicle, OTHO of *S. THE LIFE OF HENRY, THE SIXTH OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRESCORE AND EIGHTEENTH ROMANE EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter Frederick succeeded his eldest sonne Henry: who as soone as he had the gouernment of the Empire, went into Italy to be crowned, and to get the kingdome of Sicilia, which came vnto him, by the right of his wife; and was crowned by Pope Celestine. He would haue made a conquest of the kingdome of Naples, but the plague made him returne into Germany. He againe came into Italy, vpon the same occasion of Sicilia: wherein finding Tancrede dead, hee easily obtained the kingdome, notwithstanding that hee committed some cruelties therein worthy of blame: Being returned into Germany, he sent many men to the warres of Ierusalem. And liuing in peace, he came in progresse to visit his new kingdome of Sicilia: where, for his pleasure riding on hunting (as his custome was) he fell sicke and died, when he had raigned eight yeeres.

THE accidents which hapned in the time of the Emperor FREDERICK, were so many and so great, that I imagin to haue in som sort satisfied the desire, which men commonly haue to reade of great aduentures: and if they yet remaine with an appetite, from this time forwards they shal haue such and so many, that I presume they shall not want to satisfie them. I say then, that as euill newes are commonly more swift of foot, then the good: so the death of the worthie Emperor FREDERICK was soone knowne in Italy and in Germany, for which all Christendome generally was sorie; as well for that it was so vnfortunate, as for that it troubled and interrupted the enterprise which he had begun, and followed with such courage and good successe. His eldest sonne HENRY, who (as we said) in his fathers life time had been made King of the Romanes, and future Emperour; when as he vnderstood of the death of his father, wrote to the electors, and to the other Princes of the Empire: and they yeelding him the obedience which they had promised in his fathers time, he took vpon him the state and maiestie of Emperour: which was in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, nintie, and one, and was called HENRY the Sixt; yet the Italians call him the Fift, for that they reckon not the first HENRY. This man was a wise Prince, of a sharpe and quicke wit, well spoken, of a pleasing countenance, but somewhat pale faced, of a meane stature, and tender and delicate of body; but of a fierce and cruell minde, and very valiant, wherefore he was greatly feared of his enemies, and was more addicted to hunting, then was fit for the good gouernment of his estate. In the beginning of his raigne, those of Colen rebelled, led, and with them certaine Earls & other great men, but it was a matter of no great importance and so it was soone pacified. Being freed from this care, seeking the aid and fauour of his friends, he made preparation to go into Italy (which was the next yeere) with a desire to be crowned in Rome, and to get the kingdome of Sicilia, which fell to him by the right of his wife the Empresse CONSTANCE, whereto he was inuited and called by Pope CELESTINE the Third, who was newly chosen Pope (yet some authors say, that at this time, this CONSTANCE was giuen to him in marriage by this Pope CELESTINE, who gaue her a dispensation for that she was a professed Nunne, to the end, that they should haue the kingdome) for the bastard TANCREDE King of Sicilia and of Naples, who possessed the same, was odious and an enemy to the Pope.

The Emperour HENRY being comm into Italie, passing peaceably through the States of Lombardy (according to the agreement made between his father and them) went towards Rome to be crowned; but before the Pope gaue him the Crowne, he went against the City of Tusculano, which was situate in the Mountaines neer to Rome, which rebelled, and did and had done the Romans much harm; and taking the same (for it yielded without any resistance) he gaue it to the Romans (for so was he enjoyned to do, before the Crown should be giuen him) and they presently rased the City, and vsed the Citizens with great cruelty, for which the Emperor was much taxed, and blamed to haue suffered so cruell a fact. This cruelty being executed, and the Emperour being with great solemnity crowned in Rome by Pope CELESTINE; and other couenants and agreements being made between them concerning the kingdoms of Sicilia, and of Naples, as feodatory kingdoms to the Church of Rome, and the fee and tribute set down to be paid for the same: The Emperour marching forwards, found all those Countries in Arms against him, holding for TANCREDE, whom they had chosen, and held for King and their soueraign Lord; yet he took some Towns by force, and went as far as Naples, and besieged the same, as the head of that kingdom; and the Neopolitans valiantly defending their Citie, the siege continued the space of three moneths; in which time there fell in the Camp, so great a mortalitie, and so many of the Emperors souldiers died, that without effecting what he had purposed, he raised his siege and returned into Germany: And as he arose from before the City, his wife the Empresse (some say going into Germany, which seemeth most certain; and others say, that she comming to her husband, to go with him to the wars) was taken by certain Captaines vpon the way; but so great diligence was vsed, and such a course was taken, that within few daies she was set at liberty; and they which tooke her, were seuerely punished: and so at this time, he returned crowned, but not victorious, into his Countrey. Two yeers of his raign were expired, and he frustrate of his purpose and desire to recouer the kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia, but yet he still had a resolution to return thither again (as he afterwards did) where let vs leaue him; and I will tell you what hapned vnto his brother FREDERICK, and the other Princes which had continued in the East euer sithence the death of his father, the Emperour FREDERICK BARBAROSSA: wherein if all the skirmishes, encounters, battailes, and feates of Armes done by these three kings, of Ierusalem, France and England, in those two yeers warres, should be written, I should haue much to say; but the successe thereof was this, that the siege of Ptolomaida continued two yeers, reckoning from the time that GVIDO King of Ierusalem first besieged it, vntill it was taken; during which time, many great matters passed between them and the besieged, and SALADINE's other forces.

The Emperour Henry the sixt crowned in Rome by Pope Celestine the third.

The Emperour besieged Naples but could not take it.

At this time died the said FREDERICK Duke of Sueuia, sonne to the Emperour FREDERICK BARBAROSSA, and brother to the Emperour HENRY, and other great personages.

At the end of this time, the Citie was yeelded to the Christians, and the Kings were grown so mighty and so much feared, and the potent SALADINE had lost so many men, that thinking himselfe vnable to defend his countries, he caused the walles of Cesaria in Palestina, with Ascalon, Gaza, Porfiria, and of other Cities vpon the Sea-coast, to be thrown down: and the power of the Christians so much encreased, that SALADINE began to parle of the giuing vp of Ierusalem, vpon condition that he might liue in peace. But God otherwise disposed, for the Kings of France and England, were so ill met, that they could neuer agree vpon any thing: Wherefore the King of France resolued to leaue the warres, and to returne into his countrie, and did so, and left the greatest part of his people with the Duke of Burgundy; and so the oportunity of the taking of Ierusalem was lost; for by reason of his departure, SALADINE's minde altered: Neuertheless, RICHARD King of England was a Prince of so great a courage, rage, and carried himselfe so valiantly in those warres, as besides, that he new builded and fortified Iapha (whilom called Ioppa) and some other Townes, he reduced the warres to as good order and estate, as they were in before the French Kings departure. It followed in this time, that CONRADE Marquesse of Monferrato, who was possessed of the great City of Tyre, and the marches thereof, and was called King of Ierusalem, for that (as I told you) he married with ISABEL sister to SIBIL, which was King GVIDO's wife, was in the same Citie slaine by certain fugitiues, Turkes; and the widow ISABEL hauing one daughter by her husband, was married to HENRY, called Earle of Champania, Nephew to the French King; and he marrying her, had with her that Citie, and the title to the Kingdom of Ierusalem, against GVIDO, which held that name and title. Whereupon King RICHARD dealt with GVIDO to renounce the right which he pretended to the kingdom of Ierusalem, and he would giue him the dominion of the Isle of Cyprus, with the name of King thereof; which Iland the King of England took in his way as he came to this warre.

Ptolomaida yeelded to the Christians.

GVIDO accepted this bargain; and prouiding men and shipping necessary, sailed into Cyprus, as King of that Iland, and raigned therein all his life time; and that kingdom remained in him, and in his heyres and successors, vntill the yeer of our Lord, one thousand, foure hundred and sixty, that the Venecians (I know not by what title) made themselues Lords thereof: and the house of England hath euer since pretended right to the kingdom of Ierusalem, as saith PLATINA, and other Authors.

This being past, and many other matters in this warre, amongst which was a great battaile which continued from noone vntill night; wherein the valiant SALADINE was ouerthrown, and the King of England, and the Princes with him, had the victory; they resolued to goe and besiege the City of Ierusalem, knowing for certain that SALADINE durst not abide them, for he sued to them for peace, or truce, promising to render Ierusalem, and other places in those marches, to the end that he might obtain the same for some long time: but the Christians were of such power, that they were not therewith satisfied. But vpon a sodain the King of England (very vnaduisedly) gaue out in speeches, that he would return into his countrey, for that he was certified the French king had entred and taken his Duchy of Normandy: which if hee had concealed, he might haue had what composition he would haue required: but SALADINE knowing his determination, and that the fleets of Pisa and of Venice were already departed, by reason of discord and dissension between them, would not resign Ierusalem. In the end the king of England concluded a peace with him for fiue yeers; and leauing Garrisons and Gouernours in the Cities which the Christians had recouered (OTHO Duke of Burgundy, and HENRY the husband of ISABEL, which chalenged the kingdom of Ierusalem, remaining commanders thereof, with the Knights of Saint IOHN and the Templars) he departed homewards, in the yeer one thousand, one hundred ninety three, and by the way was taken prisoner by the Duke of Austria, and was ransomed, and other accidents afterwards befell him: and so hee left the affaires of the East, and more Townes, and better fortified then he found there: yet not so many as a man would haue thought that so great Kings, and such mighty Armies, might haue taken: what ensued, you shall vnderstand hereafter.

The cause why Richard was taken by the Christians.

King Richard Cueur de Lion, a man professed returning from the warres in the Holy-land is by the Duke of Austrich.

The Emperor HENRY (as some men write) was well relieued and furnished with the money which the king of England paid for his ransome, towards his iourney into Italie, for which he then made preparation but he first made his brother CONRADE, Duke of Sueuia, for that his other brother FREDERICK died in the East without issue. He then marching towards Italie, to conquer the kingdoms of Sicilia and Naples, which fell to him by his wife, and the Popes grant; and hauing sent certain Captains before with an Army, by which the warres were already begun; King TANCREDE which possessed those kingdoms died; and a little before him, his eldest sonne called ROGER, who was married to YRENE the Emperours daughter of Constantinople, and he left another sonne called WILLIAM (whom they presently made their King) and two or three daughters: by reason whereof the Emperor hastened his iourney, leading with him his brother PHILIP, and other great Princes: but for all this, the great men, and Cities of those kingdoms left not to rebell, and to withstand the Emperor HENRY, who with his men of warre entred the Countrie, besieging and battering Cities with such rage and fury, that whatsoeuer City resisted him, hee caused to bee ruined and burnt; vsing greater cruelty then befitted a vertuous or Christian Prince: and so perforce, and for feare, all the cities in the kingdome of Naples, and the most of those in Campania, and Pulia, yeelded; and thence marching into Calabria did there the like: and seing himselfe Lord of the estates estates in the maine land, he passed ouer into Sicilia: wherein, as there was not any King, or head, to rule and command (for TANCRED's sonne was a childe, and his father had been wicked, and a Tyrant) in short space he became Lord of a great part of that Iland. Neuertheless, after this the prelates and great Lords of those kingdoms, with the greatest power they possibly could leuie, gathered head neere to the City of Catanea, with a full resolution to try their fortune: where they fought with the Emperor (yet some say the Emperor was not in the battaile) and the Sicilians were ouerthrown, the Citie taken, and of them was made great slaughter, in which was executed extreme cruelty, putting to the sword both men and women, not sparing those which had retired themselues to the Churches for sanctuary: and some Noble men and Bishops were taken prisoners.

After this, many of the principall men conspired by any meanes howsoeuer to kil the Emperour; which being reuealed vnto him, he caused death to be inflicted vpon all those he could get, which had been accused to haue been of that conspiracy, with such cruelty and rigour, as he could not auoide blame for it: for some he made to be fleyed aliue, others to be burnt, and of some he caused sharpe nayles to be driuen into their heads: finally, he executed such horrible cruelty vpon them, that he made himselfe to be the most redoubted man in the World: By meanes wherof within short space he became Lord of the whole Iland; and comming with his forces to the City of Palermo (which was the richest and most populous Citie of the Iland) he was receiued without battaile or resistance, and made his entry most solemnly, with all the representations, triumph and shewes of victory that could be deuised: in that Citie (it is reported) he found many precious iewels, and great riches, which had beene the Kings of Sicilia, and there were kept.

He got also into his power YRENE the Emperours daughter of Constantinople, who was betrothed to the deceased King TANCRED's sonne, ROGER; which YRENE he married to his brother PHILIP, although against her will. And the childe whom the Sicilians had made their King, he made his eyes to be put out, thereby to make him incapable of the kingdom; and caused him to be carried prisoner into Germany, where he afterwards died miserably: and his mother the widow with her two daughters, he commanded to be put into a Monastery in Germany, so that hee left nothing forgotten that might assure him of those kingdomes.

This being done he went into Calabria, carrying with him for hostages, such men as hee held to be of greatest account in both the kingdoms: and for his better assurance, both in the maine land, and in the Iland, he placed Germane gouernors and captains: to some of which he gaue certain estates and titles. Before this, his wife the Empresse, who was there with him, bare him a son called FREDERICK; at whose birth, by reason that some doubted whether that a woman of her yeers might be with childe or no, he permitted all that would to be present at the birth, commanding it first to bee published, at such time as it was thought shee should bee deliuered. In this manner did the Emperour HENRY leaue the two Sicilies in peace and subiection: And with the hostages before mentioned, which were great Lords and Prelates, departed towards Germany (Milan and all Lombardy peaceably obeying him, both at his comming and going) which was in the fift yeer of his raign, and in the yeer of our Lord 1195.

It is true, that although the Emperor obtained his desire in the conquest of Sicilia and Naples, yet all writers affirm that he therewith purchased the name of a very cruel, and vindicatiue Prince, for the great cruelties which he committed. And PHILIP BERGOMAS affirmeth that through these cruelties, he fell at such oddes with Pope CELESTINE, that he excommunicated him, by certain Bishops and other men of orders, which the Emperor apprehended, and put to death: and that he afterwards suing to the Pope for pardon, was absolued. He was also noted and taxed of exceeding couetousnes, for the great loanes and imprests, which hee exacted from the people in those kingdoms: which gaue occasion that it was not long before that in Pulia, some towns and great men, began to mutin and to rebell against him: whereupon he put out the eyes of all the hostages, which he had sent into Germany; and sent Captains and soldiers to suppresse the Insurrections; and they by his commandement, inflicted cruell punishment vpon the offenders. Being in this prosperity, so as no man rebelled, or held vp his hand against him, his brother CONRADE Duke of Suenia died, at such time as he began to warre against BERTOLD Duke of Zeringe, which then, and before that time was, and had been, a great house in Germany: and his brother CONRADE being dead without issue, the Emperor gaue the Duchy of Suenia to his brother PHILIP, who (as I said) marryed the Emperors daughter of Constan.

After

Frederick the Emperors son being a child was chosen king of the Romanes.

After all these things, he sought by all meanes possible, that the Princes Electors should chuse his sonne FREDERICK (a child of little more then two yeers old) for King of the Romanes: and forasmuch as he was of great power, and much feared, they did so; notwithstanding that it seemed to them, to be a matter very vniust and vnreasonable.

At this time Pope CELESTINE very earnestly solicited the Princes of Christendome, and especially the Emperour (seeing that the time of the truce, made in the East by the King of England was expired; and that the great SALADINE was dead, but a little before, on whom depended the chiefest force of the Infidels) that they should not now forget the conquest of Ierusalem, seeing they had so fit an oportunitie. The Emperor (with the zeale of a Christian Prince, though a cruell one) seeing that he could not goe himselfe in person, by reason of his small assurance in his Kingdomes of Sicilia, and the tranquillitie of Germany: many Princes offering themselues to go that iourney voluntarily, and many souldiers and men of war, which he sent in his pay (at his own charges) prouided a very great and good Army: wherewith went the Archbishop of Mentz, the Bishop of Ratisbone, BERNARD Duke of Saxony, CONRADE Chauncellor of the Empire, LEOPOLD Duke of Austria, HARMAN Lantzgraue of Turinge, the Duke of Brabant and some other Marquesses, Earls, and men of estate; all which leauing their houses and countries, of meere deuotion, with valiant mindes, after long trauaile by land and sea (wherein they were much aided and relieued by ISACIVS Emperor of Constantinople) came to the coast of Palestina, to the citie of Tyre and Ptolomaida, which they called Acon; where they presently applied themselues to the warres; the truce graunted by the King of England being expired. In which time, GVIDO King of Cyprus, who before had been King of Ierusalem, deceased; and forasmuch as he had no sonne, his brother ALMERICVS had that kingdome: and it also happened, that at that same season, HENRY, who was called king of Ierusalem, by the marriage (as I said) of ISABEL sister to SIBIL, in his citie of Ptolomaida fell out of a very high terrasse or gallerie in his palace; and so died vnfortunately: and ALMERICVS king of Cyprus, sought to marrie with his wife, wherewith she was content; and so for a time he was called king of Cyprus and Ierusalem. But for as much as he was negligent, and of small experience in the warres, and in matters of gouernment, he afterwards lost the title of Ierusalem, which was giuen to IOHN DE BREGNA, a Frenchman, being a man of great worth and valour, who married the daughter of this ISABEL, which she had by her second husband CONRADE. The Germanes sent by the Emperor, ioyning with ALMERICVS his forces, became masters of the field; and marching forwards, besieged and assaulted some cities, took Berito, and reedified Ioppa, now called Iapha.

Another voyage to Ierusalem.

While the Armie did these things in the East, the Emperor HENRY setting all things in order in Germany, came with his wife and his young sonne into Italy, to visite his estate of Milan; and from thence went into Sicilia, the better to confirme himselfe in his new Dominion; and the better also to prouide for the warres and conquest of the Holy land, which was generally desired. He came into Sicilia, to the Citie of Messina, with his wife and his son, (who was alreadie called king of the Romanes) and gouerned the Empire and those Kingdomes in peace, enlarging the same more then the Pope would he should haue done, for he held from him the Marca de Ancona, and some places in Tuscane. But it pleased God to frustrate all his designs by death: for being much delighted in hunting; it hapned, that hunting vpon an extream hot day, in the moneth of August, he layd him downe one night to sleep in a greene field, neere to certain fresh springs of water: and awaking with the cold and the deaw of the night, he felt himselfe very ill, and was carried to Messina, where his infirmity increasing, he dyed; when he had reigned eight yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord 1198. hauing first recommended the protection and gouernment of his young sonne FREDERICK, who was called king of the Romanes, and of the two Sicilies, to his brother PHILIP Duke of Sueuia, vntill that he should come to age fit to rule; and wrot his Letters concerning the same to Pope INNOCENT the third, who succeeded CELESTINE the third, who died a little before him in the same yeer.

The death of the Emperor Henry the sixt.

This Emperour was a wise, a valiant, and a mighty Prince, but his ouer-much fiercenesse and cruelty blemished those vertues. All this while raigned ISACIVS in Constantinople, which he gouerned very wel for the space of eleuen or twelue yeeres in peace; after the death of the tyrant ANDRONICVS, as we haue set downe in the life of the Emperor FREDERICK.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Emperor Henry being dead, the Empire was diuided betwixt two competitors, which were Philip and Otho: and either of them marshalling the forces of his friends and assistants, many sore battailes were fought between them. They both were crowned: but Otho's coronation was ratified by the Pope, and Philip's reproued, and himselfe excommunicate: but he making slight account of the excommunication persisted in his attempt: and hauing in a bickering ouerthrown the Lantzgraue, became very mighty; and Otho's power daily grew weake; and he himselfe, in the end, was driuen to flie, and to goe into England. Philip afterwards sought to pacifie the Pope, and to be at peace with him: and the reconciliation being made, a Peace was procured with Otho, which was concluded by making him his sonne in law, and his successor in the Empire: but this ioy lasted not long. For, Otho being come to the Court, the Count Palatine of Witilispach, whom was Philip's secret enemy, vpon a day (with a resolution to kill him) came to his chamber, desiring to speake with him, and being let in; he took his sword from his Page, and therewith slew the Emperour, when he had raigned ten yeeres.

The death of great Princes cause great alterations.

IT is a common and vsuall thing through all the World, that after the death of great Kings and Princes, ensue great changes and alterations; which is verified by the death of HENRY the sixt, whose History we haue now ended: for by reason thereof, followed great innouations, and vnexpected accidents. First in the Army which he sent into the East, to the conquest of Ierusalem, and which had begun the warre with good successe, his death being published, the Princes and Prelates which went thither agreed together in all haste to returne home to their houses, and did so; nothing preuailing with them the counsell and entreaty of SIMON of Monferrato, a most excellent souldier, who came thither with certain troups of Frenchmen to their aide: and so they left the countrey abandoned, and in such necessity, as the Infidels taking the City of Iapha, destroyed the same, and laid it euen with the ground; and king ALMERICVS and the Christians were brought to such extremity, as they were driuen to sue to the Infidels for peace: so as it appeareth, that it was not Gods will that the warres and conquest of the Holy-land should euer haue any good successe.

In Germany followed the greatest tumults, wars and battails, touching the choise of an Emperor, that euer had been seene for the like cause. Pope INNOCENT began to recouer some places which the Emperor HENRY held from the Church. The Empresse presently sued to the Pope, for the confirmation of Sicilia to her and her sonne, which she hardly obtained, but with the losse of lands and dignities. So great effect worketh oftentimes the absence, or presence, of one man only: for PHILIP Duke of Sueuia, whose Hiſtory I now beginne to write, was interrupted by his brothers death in Italy, he going to viſite him; from whence, as ſoone as he vnderſtood thereof (for as ſome authors ſay he was not preſent when he died) he returned into Germany, and by the way paſt many dangers, with an intent (notwithſtanding that he had the rule of his Nephewes Protector) to get (if he might) the Empire for himſelfe: whereto, being comn into Germany, as well by meanes of his eſtate and authority, as alſo for that he was the brother and ſonne of an Emperor, he found great fauor, and great contradiction and reſiſtance alſo, by many Princes which were enemies to his houſe and family, and for ſome other reſpects. Principally, the Electors voyces being diuided into two, the one part named the ſame PHILIP for Emperour; for of his nephew, by reaſon of his infancy, and alſo for that he was King of Sicilia (notwithſtanding their promiſe made to his father) they made ſmall account: and the other party choſe OTHO, Earle or Duke of Bruinſwick, the ſonne of HENRY the Proud, who had been Duke of Saxony, and was diſpoſſeſſed (as we ſaid) by the Emperor FREDERICK, wherefore ſome authors call him Duke of Saxony: This OTHO's mother was ſiſter to the king of England, by whoſe meanes (as ſome ſay) he was called to the Empire.

Philip choſen Emperor.

Otho choſen Emperor.

Betweene theſe two was cruell and ſharpe warre and competency, hauing recourſe to their Arms: yet the Abbat WESPERG. ſaith, that BERTOLD Duke of Zeringe, before, or at the ſame time, was a third competitor, and was called Emperor: but Duke BERTOLD's challenge continued not long, for he ſoone agreed with PHILIP; and for that moſt authors write it not, I will paſſe it ouer, with the only remembrance thereof. PHILIP and OTHO being in Armes, each of them with his partakers and friends, began to warre, killing, robbing and impriſoning one another.

Bertold called Emperor.

OTHO was holpen and ſupported by the King of England as his Vncle and friend, and by the Lantzgraue of Turinge, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the Duke of Liconia, the Earle of Limburgh, the Archbiſhop of Colen, and his Prelates and Suffraganes, the Earle of Flanders and his friends, and ſome other princes and prelates: Pope INNOCENT alſo fauoured his cauſe, calling to minde that the anceſtors of this OTHO, Dukes of Saxony, had greatly aſſiſted and defended the Church of Rome: and to the contrary, PHILIP's predeceſſors Dukes of Sueuia, had perſecuted the ſame, cauſing ſchiſmes and diuiſions; as HENRY the fourth, FREDERICK the firſt, and his brother FREDERICK had alſo held many places in Tuſcane, and Ancona, belonging to the Church of Rome.

Thoſe which tooke part with PHILIP, were the King of France, the Archbiſhoppe of Mentz, the Dukes of Saxony, and of Auſtrich (who then came from the warres in the Eaſt) the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Bauiere, the Dukes of Lorraine, and of Brabant; and all the reſt of the Princes which took not part with OTHO (but yet the ſucceſſe changed theſe fauours) and PHILIP for his perſon was better beloued and more eſteemd then OTHO, for he was mild, of a noble diſpoſition, diſcreete, and liberall (wherby good will is principally got) very valiant, though but of a weake body, and of a meane ſtature; of a good countenance, and faire, white and red.

OTHO had not ſo good parts of a man in him; for he was held not very wiſe, raſh, and without meaſure audacious. PHILIP hauing aſſembled his friends in the City of Mentz, he was there annoynted and crowned Emperor by the Biſhop of Tarantaſia; the Biſhop of Sutrino, who was the Popes Ambaſſador and Legate, being there preſent, who came thither for another purpoſe; wherewith the Pope was extremely moued. OTHO and his friends, perceiuing that PHILIP was crowned, went to Aken, which PHILIP had already taken; and beſieging and ſcaling it, took the ſame vpon compoſition: and there ADOLPH Archbiſhop of Colen prepoſterouſly crowned him, and he therefore was held for right Emperor: which coronation was afterwards confirmed by Pope INNOCENT, who ſent GVIDO Cardinall of Preneſte, for his Legate to the Citie of Colen, for the ſame purpoſe, and to excommunicate PHILIP, and all his followers and abbetters. PHILIP (as a man of great ſpirit) ſought to fight with OTHO, and to that end entred his enemies countries, deſtroying the ſame with fire and ſword, and took ſome ſtrong Caſtles neer to Argentine, where between his and OTHO's troups, were many skirmiſhes and encounters, and many men were ſlaine of either ſide: and the next yeer following he came againſt the ſame Citie of Argentine, which held for OTHO; wich yeelded vpon compoſition, and he was therein receiued and obeyed.

OTHO in like manner with all his whole power came againſt PHILIP: and between the ſouldiers

ſouldiers of the one and other, were ſome battels and skirmiſhes; wherein PHILIP for the moſt part had the victory, which made ſome to come ouer to his ſide: but yet the coming of the Popes Legate at this time, and the publiſhing of the excommunication, did greatly hinder PHILIP's proceedings, and was a great help to OTHO, with the Prelats and eccleſiaſticall Perſonages. PHILIP hauing the greateſt quarell againſt the Lantzgraue of Turinge, for that by his meanes principally OTHO was choſen; he therefore reſolued to enter his Country, and to ſpoil it; and putting the ſame in execution, took one or two very ſtrong Towns of his. The Lantzgraue raiſing his power, and ſending for help to the Count Palatine of Rhine, and to OTHO CHARVS, King of Bohemia (who now joined with OTHO, by reaſon of the Popes excommunication) and to other his friends and kinſmen; leuied ſo great a number of good men of war, that PHILIP, not daring to fight with him, retired to a ſtrong Town, wherein they beſieged him: but he vſed ſuch means, that in the night he got out of the Town, and put himſelf in ſafety. And within few daies after cam OTHO to the aid of the Lantzgraue with his whole power, in hope to haue taken PHILIP; for, they had written to him, that he could not eſcape from the place wherein they held him beſieged. So as OTHO, being then Maſter of the field, ſummoned a Diet or Councell to be held in the City of Mersburgh, in the month of Auguſt, in the yeer of our Lord 1203: where, in the preſence of the before named Princes, and of his friends, he was the ſecond time crowned by the Popes Legat; and his firſt election was approued and confirmed, and many reuolted from PHILIP to him, by reaſon (as they pretended) of the Popes cenſures.

At this time the Empreſſe CONSTANCE, Tutreſſe of the yong FREDERICK King of Sicilia, dying, ſhe recommended the protection of the childe to Pope INNOCENT, who ſent certain Legats to gouern thoſe Countries in the behalf of the yong King; who afterwards was Emperor, as you ſhall hear. OTHO his fauourites & partakers being gone from this Diet or Councell with victory, the next yeer following their fortune altred: for, PHILIP with the aid of France, Saxony, Auſtria, Mentz, Wittembergh, Sueuia, Bauiere, and the reſt of thoſe which held with him, came vpon the Lantzgraue and his confederates; and entring his Countries (as he had done the yeer before) took certain Caſtles. The King of Bohemia & the Count Palatine came to ioin with the Lantzgraue, and ſo to fight with PHILIP: but PHILIP met and fought with them before they could ioin with the Lantzgraue, and obtained the victory, although bloudy; the Bohemians running away, and diſordring themſelues in the beginning, ſo as great ſlaughter was made of them in the chace. PHILIP through this victory won ſo great reputation, that many of thoſe which vntil then had been ſilent and neuters, came to ſerue him; and ſtont his enemy came not a few. And the Lantzgraue, ſeeing his ſuccours ouerthrowne and ſcattered, and his Countrey ſpoiled, ſought means to come to ſome compoſition with PHILIP, and to ſerue him: and PHILIP (as he was a milde and courteous Prince) admitted him into his fauour and friendſhip; and the Lantzgraue with great humility cam and yeelded himſelf into his power.

The Bohemians ouerthrowne.

After him came ADOLPH, Archbiſhop of Colen; who nothing fearing the Popes excommunications, againſt ſuch as took part with PHILIP, or defended his quarrell, compounded with him alſo, promiſing to bring the Dukes of Lorrain and of Brabant to his deuotion; a thing which PHILIP much deſired, and gaue him to effect the ſame a great ſumme of money: which was the cauſe that many others did the like. So as this party growing now to be ſtrongeſt, a meeting was appointed to be had in Aken: and for as much as PHILIP had not been crowned there by a generall aſſent, he was again with great ſolemnity crowned Emperor and King of the Romans by the hands of the ſaid Archbiſhop ADOLPH, who deſpiſed and contemned his Popes cenſures: whereupon Pope INNOCENT depriued and depoſed him from his Archbiſhoprick, and ſent commandement to his Legat, who then lay in Colen, to cauſe another to be choſen: and the Chanons aſſembling, made choice of one BRVNVS, a man of great account; and OTHO took ſuch order, that he was preſently conſecrated by two Biſhops that came from England: wherewith PHILIP was ſo much inraged, that he preſently went and ſet vpon the City of Colen; and not being able to take it by force, hee ſpoiled the fields, and put the depoſed Archbiſhoppe in the poſſeſſion of ſome Towns in the Marches and Territories of that City; in ſo much that neither the one nor the other party could rule or gouern that Church.

The like happened afterwards in many other Churches; ſome houlding of the one faction, and others of the other: and miſerable Germany at this time endured grieuous calamities; for, besides the great wars and battails, the Churches and Monasteries were robbed.

After all this, the next yeer following, which was the yeer 1205, PHILIP, with a great power of Princes and marshall men, came to make warre vpon OTHO, who with his friends and allies was in Colen; with whom, amongst such orhers as came thither, was GVIDO the Pope's Legate, and BRVNVS the Archbishop thereof. And with PHILIP came the deposed Bishop: but OTHO, hauing no sufficient forces to fight with him in field, held himself within the City, not daring to keep the field against him; which, PHILIP perceiuing, he sent for all the forces he could leuie, and besieged OTHO, and those which were with him in Colen: so as OTHO was in greater distresse than hee thought of in the beginning; and the siege was so sharp, that it was impossible for any man to get in or out without the leaue of the besiegers.

OTHO knowing that if he staied any longer there, besides the reputation which he lost, his person and life would be in great danger, resolued to make way through his enemies, or to dy in the action: and making choice of his best men, both of horse and foot, besides men of account, he one day suddenly salied and charged into his enemies Camp, and in the beginning made great slaughter of them; but being oppressed with the multitude, he vsed the means hee had propounded, and so escaped by flight: yet in the chace, many of those which salied with him were taken prisoners and slain. Among which, BRVNVS the new Archbishop was taken prisoner, whom PHILIP held in irons aboue one whole yeer after: and in this flight, OTHO neuer staied till he came into Saxony, where hee was harboured and protected by Duke BERNARD. PHILIP, thus preuailing, offered so honourable a composition to those of Colen, that they yeelded, and came all to his seruice; and restoring ADOLPH to his seat and Bishoprick, he wholly disannulled and made void the new election of BRVNVS, without any regard of the Pope's commandements.

OTHO perceiuing that PHILIP's power did daily more and more increase, and that hee had not any forces wherewith he might defend himself, took ship and sailed into England: and so for that time remained PHILIP peacefull Emperor, finding no man that in field made any resistance, but what the Pope did with his fulminations, whereof (as it seemeth) he made small account. And the better to assure to him self the loue of men (he naturally desiring to end matters by clemency) he gaue his eldest daughter in mariage to the King of Bohemia, and another daughter to the Duke of Brabant's eldest sonne: and so vpon other Princes he bestowed fauours and benefits; wherein (as saith the Abbat WESPERGENSIS) he spent his whole patrimony, giuing Towns and Castles, yea, Churches and their reuenues: for, so much do men desire to raign, that, to bring the same to effect, there is no law but they will break and violate; yea, and they think they may lawfully do it: which may well and sufficiently be prooued by such matters as passed in these times in the Empire of Constantinople; which, for that they make to our purpose and history, I will heer briefly recite, although so great accidents require a long relation: and so for a while we will leaue OTHO fled and banished into England, and PHILIP to inioy his victory.

In Constantinople then raigned ISAC or ISACIVS (of whom we haue made mention) as a iust Prince and good Gouernor; who with a great summe of monie redeemed a brother of his, a valiant and excellent Captain, called ALEXVS, who in the wars was taken prisoner by the Turks: to whom after his coming to his Court (besides the Lands & estate allowed him for his maintenance) he gaue so great authority and command in the gouernment, that all matters of greatest importance were ordered by his direction; and he being in this fauour, the diuell, ambition, and desire to raign, possessed him; so as, to bring his purpose to effect, hee resolued to break all lawes both diuine and humane, together with the bands wherein he stood bound to his soueraign Lord and brother: for, in requitall of the benefits receiued, with the help and assistance of such as himself, he apprehended his brother, and put out his eies, and seised vpon the Empire to his owne behoof: and a son of ISACIVS, called after his treacherous Vncles name, ALEXVS, fled, and came into Germany to the Emperor PHILIP, whose wife YRENE was this young mans sister: but as PHILIP was not so firmly seated in his Empire, as to be able to succour and relieue another, by reason of his wars with OTHO, so he could not then doo as he would haue done.

Noble-men in Venice.

At that time by chance (or else it was Gods will it should be so) were in Venice, BALDVVIN Earl of Flanders, and his brother HENRY; and BONIFACE Marqueese of Monferrat; LEVVES Earl of Sauoy; and other Noble Personages, with many souldiers and men of war; induced to meet there, by Pope INNOCANT, for the conquest of Ierusalem and the holy Land: where they staid for shipping to go on their voyage; whither came, recommended to them by the Emperor PHILIP, this young ALEXVS. Whereupon these Princes (by the consent of the Duke and Senate of Venice, and of the Pope) concluded to go against the Tyrant ALEXVS: whereto the Venecians gaue great aid, sending an Admirall with a great fleet. The league and accord being made with the Nephew ALEXVS; hee promised, that being restored, he would reduce the Greek Church to the obedience of the Latin; and many other matters in recompense: and so they departed with a good and prosperous winde. And omitting such accidents as befell them in their voyage (wherein they took the Ile of Creta, now called Candia, and other places) it was so, that they arriued neer to the City of Constantinople, where the Tyrant ALEXVS in a readinesse awaited their coming, with a very great number of souldiers; and they, setting their men on land, had a battell with THEODORE LASCARVS the Tyrant's sonne-in-law, who salied forth with an Armie to fight with them: and hee being ouerthrowne, they pursued him to the gates of the City, which they besieged both by sea and land.

At the end of eight daies which they had been there (wherein were many braue skirmishes and fierce encounters) the Tyrant ALEXVS, seeing that he could not preuail, fled out of the City by night; and after him followed the most part of his complices: and the next day, the Citizens opening the Ports, took the blinde Emperor ISACIVS out of prison, and with him went forth to the Camp; where very willingly they took the sonne to bee Emperor, together with the father: and hee was with great solemnity receiued into the City, and crowned in the Church of Saint SOPHIA, in the presence of all the Latine Captains; wherewith the blinde father was greatly recomforted; and it seemed that all went well, and to the contentment of all men: and the Knights and Commanders of the Latines, to auoid the scandals which might arise between their people and the citizens, went to their Tents in the Camp.

In the mean while that the new Emperor and his father made payment to the Venecians of what they had promised, and had accomplished the same, the Greeks greatly murmuring for the naturall hatred which they bare against the Latines, the blinde Emperor ISACIVS died; and then presently began new scandals and tumults in the City, they all exclaiming against the promises made by the young ALEXVS to the Latines; and alleaging that they ought not to be performed, put themselues in Arms against them: but yet the new Emperor desired to haue throughly accomplished the same. Yet some Authors lay this breach to his charge; saying, that he would not hould his word. Finally, the matter fell so out, that the tumult infinitely increasing, one MIRTILLVS, who had been a Fauourite of the Emperor ISACIVS (beeing the chief occasion of this mutiny, and whom the Greeks chose for their Generall, calling him Emperor) went to the Palace where the new Emperor ALEXVS was, and with his owne hand slue him, within one month after his coronation: and the new vpstart Traitor MIRTILLVS was set in his place, who presently studied how he might set the fleet of the Venecians, and of the Princes of the Latines, on fire, and to cut off all victuals from them, and by assaulting them in their lodgings, to haue ouerthrowne and defeated them; but the effect ensued after another manner: for, after many skirmishes, slaughters, and effusion of much bloud (which for breuity I omit) the Latines had the victory, the Tyrant fled, and they were Lords of the City, together with all the countrey round about it. And for asmuch as the Empire was without any lawfull successor, and that they had made a conquest thereof, by a generall consent they resolued to chuse an Emperor; and, making among themselues fifteen Electors, BALDVVIN Earle of Flanders was chosen and created Emperor; and for such was sworn, receiued and obeyed: and the Patriarch, THOMAS MOROSINI, a Venecian Gentleman, presently went vnto Rome, where his Prelacy, and the Emperor's election, and all the rest, was approued and confirmed by the Pope; and he with his owne hands inuested him, and gaue to him for the Emperor the Imperiall Ensignes.

This great attempt being atchieued by these Captains, according to their first agreement they diuided what they had gotten; and the Ilands of Creta, now Candia, and Eubœa now Negrepont, were giuen to the Venecians, which they haue held vnto this day: and for as much as the Ile of Candia was first giuen to BONIFACE, Marqueese of Monferrato; the Countrey of Thessalia, which is a Prouince of Macedonia, was giuen him, with the title of King; with other rewards and shares giuen to other Princes, aswell in the Ilands, as in the Maine; of which remained estates, and houses, which I omit: and so the Empire continued BALDVVIN's and his successors, for the space of more then 60. years; with such aduentures, as you shall heare hereafter: but Adrianople rebelling, defending it self all this while; THEODORE LASCARVS the Emperor ALEXVS son in law, who (as we said) salied out to fight with the Latins, being gotten into the same, The new Emperor, BALDVVIN, besieged that Citie, and died before it, and his brother HENRY succeeded him in the Empire: the rest you shall vnderstand when the turne commeth.

Now let vs returne to our storie of PHILIP Emperor of Germany, whom we left victorious; and to OTHO fled into England: yet let the Reader remember and abhorre the treasons of ALEXVS and MIRTILVS; whereof the one put out the eyes of his owne brother; and the other murthered his soueraigne Lord: and let him consider what ends they had, and therewith, how little stabilitie and assurance there is in the Empires and principalities of this world; and with how vniust titles they are oftentimes gotten and possessed; of all which, there hath been a sufficient and apparant example, in that which hath now been spoken of the Grecke Empire. The Emperor PHILIP hauing expelled OTHO out of Germany, he and his followers imagined that their aduersaries should not be able any more to molest him: neuertheless in regard of peace, he beeing in disgrace with the Church of Rome, by the aduice of the Princes which were assembled for that purpose, sent his Ambassadors to the Pope, excusing his doings, alleaging the equity of his cause, entreating him to establish som peace in the Empire, to absolue him, and to confirm his election, and therewith yeelded himselfe to his obedience. The Pope hearing the Ambassage, gaue also eare to the treaties, and sent, for his Ambassadors, Cardinals, Legates of great account, to the Emperour, to treate of a peace: which being come, and with much honour receiued; among other motions, one was, that the Emperour should marry a daughter which he had, to RICHARD the Popes Nephew; and should giue him therewith the estates of Spoleto in Tuscane, and the Marca de Ancona, which belonged to the Church of Rome, and were in the Emperors possession.

This motion (as saith ABBAS WESPERGENSIS) was made by the Emperor, by that meane to win the Popes grace and fauour: yet some attribute it to the Pope. These and many other matters were motioned, and there were many meetings of Princes; whither his competitor OTHO also sent his Ambassadors; and afterwards came out of England into Saxony in person. And of the one side and of the other, many demands and offers were made (the Cardinals Legates being vmpiers and mediators betweeh them) in the end, in a generall meeting which was held in a Towne on the borders of Saxony, OTHO being in a Castle neere vnto it, security being giuen by either party, a generall peace was concluded, vpon condition that OTHO should marrie with the daughter of the Emperor PHILIP, and be held for king of the Romans, and future Emperor after the decease of PHILIP: Which agreement was confirmed & sworn, and a general pardon was giuen by one to the other, and the Pope dispensed with their neer eneesse of blood; and all such as were excommunicate, were absolued by the Popes Legates: and so all was in peace and quiet, and OTHO remained the Emperors son in law, and heire apparant, and for such was presently sworne, and the Legates returned to Rome: All which passed in the yeere of our Lord 1207, wherewith all men were very glad and well contented, hoping that it would haue long continued; for PHILIP was an exceeding liberall and courteous Prince, and deerely beloued generally of all men. But it otherwise happened: for the yeere following, the Emperor being in the Towne of Bambergh, for the recouery of his health; OTHO Count Palatine Witilspach, who had been his deadly enemy (and was so still in secret) came to the Emperors court, shewing himselfe publikely to be his loyall seruant. His comming (as it afterwards appeared) was but to practice the Emperors death, and as a traytor to kill him, which PHILIP nothing suspected.

The Emperour being one day after dinner in his chamber reposing himselfe vpon his bed, for that he finding himself somewhat ill, had been let bloud that day; the Count Palatine called at his chamber doore, accompanied with some which were acquainted with his prerence: and the Emperor vnderstanding who he was, made the doore to be opened, notwithstanding that none were with him but his Chancellor the Bishop of Spire, and a page which waited on his Cup, called HENRY of Wilspurch, without any weapons: the Count Palatine at his entrance, imagining the time now fit for him to execute his diuelish intent and treason, at the dore tooke his sword from a page which carried the same; and suddenly drawing it, before that the Bishop or page could rescue him, wounded the Emperour in the throat: which wound, although it were not great, yet it was mortall, and he presently died thereof, the organe pipes being cut. The

The death of the Emperor Philip.

The Page, making a lowd outcrie, would haue shutte the doore, to the intent that the Count Palatine should not haue gotten forth: but he gaue him a sore wound ouer the face, and opening the door departed: and ioyning with the Bishop of Bambergh, and the Marquesse of Missia, which were his confederats in this treason, they al togither fled from the Court, vpon poast horses which they had layd for that purpose.

This murther was committed vpon the 22. day of Iune, in the yere of our Lord 1208. in the tenth yeere of this Emperors raigne. Great was the tumult which grew hereof, and the concourse of the people which ranne to the Emperors chamber: who finding him dead, made great moane and lamentation for him (for he was a Prince well beloued, for the noblenesse and liberalitie of his mind) all men abhorring the Count Palatines treason: for which he escaped not vnpunished; for he was slaine by the Emperors steward HENRY, in reuenge of his Lords death. The Emperor PHILIP had neuer any sonne, but foure daughters then married; one with OTHO the King of the Romanes, when the peace was made betweene them, which OTHO succeeded him: and another with the King of Bohemia, another with the Duke of Brabants eldest sonne, and the fourth with RICHARD Earle of Tuscane, nephew to Pope INNOCENT. In Constantinople raigned HENRY the brother of BALDVVIN, of whome we of late made mention.

THE LIFE OF OTHO, THE FIFT OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter the death of the Emperor Philip, Otho without any contradiction was taken for Emperor; and, notwithstanding that he was chosen for his successor in Philips time, it pleased the Electors to chuse him anew: and he being confirmed, was crowned by the Bishop of Colen. After the ceremonies were ended, he applied himself to persecute the murderers of Philip; and notwithstanding that hee was well pleased with his death, neuertheless he made this shew of reuenge. Hecame afterwards to be crowned in Rome: but a great tumult arising between his people and the citizens, he departed in choler with the Pope, and made warre vpon him; so as the Pope excommunicated him, and deprined him of the Empire. Whereupon, many Princes of Germany, denying him their obedience, chose another Emperor, which was Frederick, King of Sicilia: and although that Otho fought by many meanes to recouer the Empire; yet he could neuer attain thereto; and so died a priuate Lord in Saxony, when he had raigned fiue yeers.

BY how much PHILIP was a better Emperor then his competitor OTHO, it was not long before the same OTHO made it apparant; notwithstanding that in the beginning he gaue some signes to the contrarie: so as we may hold the old prouerbe to be true, which saith, that Authoritie will manifest a man. As soone as the violent death of PHILIP was published, the agreement being yet fresh in memorie, that OTHO should succeede him; by common consent he was held for Emperor: yet he held not the dignitie long, being cast downe by the Popes sentence which had raysed him: and notwithstanding that in the life time of PHILIP he had been twice crowned, neuertheless the princes, electors (according to the antient custome) met at Franckford; and he being there chosen sen againe went to Aken, and there was crowned by the Archbishop of Colen, although with some delay; for the Archbishop of Spire, who was Chauncellor to the late Emperor PHILIP, and was present (as we said) when he was slaine, had lodged himselfe in a very strong Castle, and would not deliuer the Sceptre, the Crosse, the Crowne, and the Imperiall ensignes, which remained in his custodie; except he were first confirmed in his office of Chauncellor: whereupon the new Emperor confirmed him; and so was crowned peaceably with great solemnitie: which being ended, Pope INNOCENT's Legates came to him (who had euer been his friend) to congratulate his election, and to approoue and confirme the same: the comming of which Legates, the Emperor attended in the citie of Hiperboli; and they deliuered their ambassade, and treated of other matters concerning the generall peace and publike good: and offered the Emperor in the behalfe of the Pope, that if he would come to Rome, the Pope would crowne him with his own hands, as his predecessors had done.

According to the Germane Emperours this Otho should be the fourth: but holding the ordinary course he was the Fift of that name.

OTHO hauing dispatched these Legates, he took his way towards Suevia, to take possession thereof, in the right of his wife the Emperor PHILIP's daughter; with whom, at the conclusion of the peace he was maried; and to whom (he said) that state did appertain: yet FREDERICK King of Sicilia, PHILIP's nephew, who afterwards was Emperour, was called Duke of Suevia; and was so afterwards. OTHO comming into Suevia (protesting his comming thither to be, to quiet the troubles, by suppressing robberies and violences committed in that countrie; much whereof he redressed) gaue so ill entertainment and countenance to the Earles, Barons, and Gentlemen of that great Duchie, that many of them abandoned the countrey; and he made himselfe to be generally ill beloued: yet there wanted not some, which to flatter him, commended his doings (a thing which maketh Kings and Princes most to erre, and to continue in their errors). And within few daies after he went to Augsburgh, which is in the same prouince; whither he summoned the Princes to come; and with their consent he proceeded against OTHO, Count Palatine of Wittilspach, (who murthered the Emperour PHILIP) and against such as were his complices in the murther: all which were condemned, being absent, as guiltie of high treason, and were depriued of all the dignities, goods and lands which they possessed; of which, some he bestowed vpon others, and part hee confisked to the chamber of the Empire. And notwithstanding that all men presumed that he was well pleased with the death of PHILIP, yet he inflicted this punishment; and outwardly made shew of much sorrow for the same: and some were of opinion that the Count Palatine murthered the Emperour PHILIP, in hope that his successor OTHO would haue rewarded him for the fact. But whatsoeuer any man thought, he did as I say, and well might he be pleased with his death; and displeased with the treason. By meanes of this punishment, and for righting some other wrongs, he began in many mens opinion to be reputed a good Emperour, and a great Iusticer: yet amongst men of the better sort he was blamed, for the oppression which he vsed, both in Suevia and in other places: but in the beginning hee was without contradiction obeyed of all men.

Few daies after this, in the moneth of March, in the yeere 1209, hee summoned a generall Parliament or Diet, to be held in the citie of Haguena; where the principall point that was handled, was but how to get aide and reliefe from the Princes and estates of the Empire, towards his iourney into Italy, to be crowned in Rome: and it was concluded, that he should doe so; and many offered him their seruice, and to accompanie him in that iourney: and so he, and they which were to go with him, leuied their forces, and put themselues in a readinesse, with such expedition that in the beginning of Iuly following, they all met in the citie of Augsburgh; from whence he took his way towards Italy: first leauing his wife the Empresse in Saxony, in the citie of Branschaiel, which was his inheritance; which, with other townes, he held and defended, being part of the estate of HENRY the proud, when he was deposed; and descending downe through the valleys of Trent, he went directly to Verona; where he was receiued and obeyed as their Lord: and from thence went to Milan, and by other cities of Lombardy, to Bologna; whither he summoned the cities of Lombardy, and all the townes and cities subiect to the Empire in Italy, to come to a Councel: wherein he was so fortunate, that all obeyed, and came at his summons peaceably, and furnished him with men and mony for his iourney: and many Earles and Barons accompanied him in person, in such sort, that he departed thence very strong towards Rome; where Pope INNOCENT attended his comming, and he and all his Nobles which came with him, were there receiued with great ioy, and he himselfe was crowned in S. PETER's Church by the Pope; who had much desired to see that day, perswading himself that he should haue haue had a great friend of him, seeing that he had euer procured his greatnes against the Emperor PHILIP: and the Emperor, after the accustomed manner, sware obedience to the Church of Rome, and to enlarge, and not to vsurpe the patrimonie thereof: which he afterwards hardly performed.

The same day, betweene his souldiers, which remained in his Camp neere to the walles of Rome (part whereof were come to see the citie) and the citizens, arose so great a tumult and bickering, that about a thousand of the Emperours men were slaine; wherewith hee was very much incensed; and so was the Pope, who indeede was his friend: And seeing that greater inconueniences were likely to haue ensued, he departed, and came directly to Milan with his Army, accusing and blaming the Pope for what had passed; and in Milan hee was receiued and obeyed, and lay there all the winter, which was very tempestuous. Leauing there his Imperiall ensignes (wherewith the Milanois held themselues greatly honoured) reinforcing his Army (for that he had discharged a great part thereof) he departed in the Spring, to make a conquest of the Church lands; first in the prouince of Tuscane, where he took many places: and thence he went into the Marca de Ancona, where he did the like, and could not be resisted: and from thence it was thought that he would haue made warre in the territorie of Rome, and haue besieged the citie. The Pope sent his Legates vnto him, putting him in mind of the fauours and good offices which he had done him; and to require and admonish him to desist from his enterprise: but the Emperour making no account thereof, leauing garrisons in those townes, marched towards the kingdome of Naples, and began to make warre against FREDERICK king of Sicilia: and took (the young King mistrusting no such matter) the citie of Capua, and many others in those quarters: wherewith the Pope was no lesse displeased then with the former, but rather more, for that he held those kingdomes as feodatorie to the Church of Rome; and also for that the Pope had the protection and gouernment of the young King: so that the Pope, seeing that all his Ambassages and admonitions preuailed not, resolued to vse a more violent course, proceeding against him by censures and excommunications, and by his Letters and messengers excommunicated him through all Italy and Germany: and he also excommunicated all such as followed him, or did him seruice: which excommunications some prelates obeyed, whereupon new troubles began. But the Emperour regarded it not, but was rather therewith the more incensed, and prospered well in the warre, taking all Pulia, and Calabria; and placing garrisons in the Castles and fortresses, made account to haue bin King thereof. Whereupon the Pope leuied souldiers, and fortified the citie of Rome, fearing to haue been besieged; and againe sent into Germany, to proclaime and publish the Emperour for deprined; and to release his subiects from the homage and faith which they ought him. CARION writes, that Pope INNOCENT the Third seeing that all Italy in a manner had yeelded voluntarily vnto OTHO, and fearing that the Popes power & command would be therby much shortned and restrained, for that he could not so sodenly repulse the victor by Armes, hee flew to the weapon of excommunication, in which alone (whileft that superstition swayed and ouerruled mens consciences) they reposed all their safetie. This, being fearefull to men grownded in superstition, not onely expelled, OTHO out of all Italy, but vtterly ouerthrew him and ruined him; the Princes of Germany being perswaded by the Archbishop of Mentz (who was the chief Instrument of the Popes tyrannie in Germany, and the executioner of his vniust decrees) to reiect OTHO, and to send for FREDERICK the sonne of HENRY, to whome they had promised the Empire being a child before PHILIP and OTHO. OTHO being aduertised hereof, and that the Archbishop of Mentz, the Lantzgraue of Turinge, and some others, claue to the Pope; and that there were both priuate and publike treaties and practices against him, with the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Austria, and other Princes, he was much afraid: and leauing garrisons in such places as he had taken, in great haste he left the kingdome of Naples, and marching by long iourneys, came into Germany, in the yeere of our Lord 1212, and called a Councell in the citie of Norimbergh; in which Councell it was decreed, that he should make warre against the Archbishop of Mentz, and the Lantzgraue of Turinge: and so the war began, and was very cruel.

The Emperor made warre against the Pope.

At this time died his wife the Empresse, daughter to the Emperor PHILIP. Notwithstanding all this, HARMAN Lantzgraue of Turinge, SIFRIDE Archbishop of Mentz, the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Austria, the Archbishop of Trenier, and others which resolued to take Armes with them, and to obey the Popes censures, and to denie their obedience to the Emperor; taking the Popes aduice in the matter, who in all interposed his authoritie, chose FREDERICK King of Sicilia for Emperor; who was but a youth, little more then eighteene yeeres old:

old: and sent their Ambassadours vnto him, with their authoritie, soliciting him to come into the Empire; alleaging that in right he was and ought to be Emperour, for that he was chosen and sworne King of the Romanes, in the time of his father HENRY the Sixt: the like reason they gaue to the other Princes in Germany: whereat Pope INNOCENT greatly reioyced, and in word and deed approued the same. OTHO herewith was very much troubled, and seeking meanes to defend his estate, made terrible warres against his aduersaries. The Germane Ambassadours were well receiued by the King of Sicilia, who was in great doubt to vndertake so great an enterprise; but being perswaded by them, and by the French Kings Letters (who was OTHO's enemy, for his strict allyance to the house of England) he consented thereto, and was called Emperor.

Frederick king of Sicilia chosen Emperor.

FREDERICK hauing in this manner accepted the Empire; he first applyed himself to recouer such townes as OTHO had taken from him in the Kingdom of Naples; which being done, with the greatest power he could raise, he tooke his way towards Germany; and in his iourney went to kisse the Popes foote, and to intreate him that he might be crowned Emperour of the Romanes, seeing that he was called and chosen: but the Pope resolued him that his request could not be graunted, for that thereby the auntient custome in the election and coronation of Emperours should be peruerted: and so incouraging him to proceede in his enterprise, he sent his Legat with him, to be present at his Coronation in Germany; and therein to vse his authority, and to proceede against such as were disobedient, or rebelled against him. Herewith the Emperor elect continued his iourney; wherein, the cities of Pauia and Cremona, and some other, ayded and assisted him; Milan and the rest being against him.

Finally, with much trouble and danger he arriued at the citie of Constance in Germany, whither many men of warre repaired to him, together with some Princes which were of his faction: which, OTHO vnderstanding, as he was very valiant, so with the greatest power he could leuie he went to that citie, thinking to haue been able to haue either slaine or ouerthrowne this new Emperor FREDERICK: but the men of warre which he brought with him, daily forsooke him and went ouer to FREDERICK; in such sort, that seeing himselfe abandoned, he retired into his countrie: and FREDERICK, very mightie, and accompanied with a great Army, marched along the riuer of Rhine, to the citie of Mentz; where many prelates and Princes were assembled; all forsaking OTHO, holding him for depriued, in performance of the Pope and his Legates commandement: amongst which, thither came the Archbishops and Bishops of Mentz, Treuier, Colen, Constance, Basil, Spire, Hiperbole, the King of Bohemia, the Lantzgraue of Turinge, the Count Palatine of Rhine, besides those which were already come with him; from whence, after the handling and concluding of many matters, FREDERICK departed towards Aken, where he was crowned with the first crowne, in the presence of the Popes Legate, who approoued and confirmed his election; and so he attained to the Empire: and for his better assurance in that estate, hee procured peace and a league with PHILIP, then King of France.

Frederick crowned with the first crowne in Aken.

The Emperour OTHO seeing himself in Saxony thus forsaken, got from England, and other parts, such forces as he could, and came into the countrie of Guelders, where hee made cruell warre, for that it held with FREDERICK; and from thence, together with the Earle of Flanders, who was of that faction (for that he married with IOANE daughter to BALDVVIN Earle of Flanders, which held the Empire of Constantinople, and at that time ioyned with England against France, and with the Earle of Bologna in France who had rebelled) they went to ioyne with the King of Englands forces, to fight with the French King (which OTHO did for the alliance betweene him and the house of England) thinking, by ouerthrowing the King of France, who was enemie to them both, he should be restored to his Empire. But his conceits deceiued him: for the King of France came and fought a battaile with them, neere to the citie of Tournay; which is recorded to haue been very bloudie and cruell, wherein the French king was in great daunger to haue been slaine by the Emperor OTHO, who dismounted him: but he being rescued, encouraging his people, obtained the victory; and OTHO escaped by flight, but the Earle of Flanders was taken prisoner, and some other principall men: and OTHO in the best manner that he could got into Saxony; voide of all hope to recouer the Empire, when he had bin Emperor the space of fiue yeeres, and they not fully expired; and there with sorow and anguish hee ended his daies. How long he liued after that he was deposed, authors write not: but true it is, that his raigne as Emperour, ended in the yeere of our Lord 1213.

In Constantinople (as writeth BLONDVS) the same day that OTHO was ouerthrown, HENRY (brother to the Greeke Emperor BALDVVIN) died; who being Earle of Flanders obtained that Empire; and hauing made warre with the Duke of Walachia (which is part of the antient Dacia) he made a peace with him, marrying himselfe with his daughter, and he gaue his owne daughter to PETER, Earle ALTISIODORENSIS: and he (as I said) dying at this time without any heire, the said Earle PETER had the Empire, and came afterwards to Rome, and was crowned by the Pope.

In the time of the Emperor OTHO (by whose aide, and the assistance of HENRY Emperour of Constantinople, an excellent French captain, called IOHN de Bregna, had the kingdome of the East, with the title of King of Ierusalem; being called thereto, onely for the valour of his person; marrying him with the daughter of ISABEL, to whom that kingdome appertained, as is aforesaid) the Captaines and masters of those parts denyed their obedience to ALMERGVS King of Cyprus, of whom particularmention hath bin made. And so IOHN de Bregna had that kingdom, of whom we must of necessitie speake hereafter: for which cause we remember him in this place.

THE LIFE OF FREDERICK THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THE HVNDRETH AND FIRST ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

FRederick hauing obtained the Empire, made a solemne vow to goe to the warres of the Holy Land; and comming to be crowned in Italy, was earnestly perswaded thereto by the Pope; whereupon he entred into the Croisade; and deferring his going, many Lords went into the East without him. In the meane time there grew discord between him and the Pope, for that he withheld certaine lands belonging to the Church, and for deposing certaine Bishops from their Bishopricks in Sicilia, and placing others at his pleasure; vpon which occasions the Pope proceeded against him with his pontificall Armes, and excommunicated him: But the King of Ierusalem comming afterwards into Italy, and giuing the Emperor his daughter to wife, he was absolued, and he againe promised to goe to the warres in the East: but delaying the time, and finding daily new occasions to deferre his going, he was in the end againe excommunicate; by reason whereof he resolued to goe: but being arriued in the East, he procured an agreement with the Soldan, and obtained the citie of Ierusalem, and therein was crowned: but this satisfied not the Pope, neither the Christian Princes; and then he returned into Europe with small reputation, and went into Germany, where his soune (through his Fathers absence) had taken vpon him very great authoritie, whereof grew some suspicions between them, which were soone ended; neuertheless, the Emperor comming into Italy (by reason of Lombardy) and finding that his sonne was his enemy, he causing him to be apprehended, made him to die in prison: and bending his forces against Lombardy, principally against Milan, he vsed such rigour, that the Pope became his open enemy; and calling a Councell to be held in Lions in France, he excommunicated him, and induced the electors to chuse a new Emperour: which was the Lantzgraue Henry, who liued but a while after; and then the Earle of Holland was chosen, against whom his sonne Conrade continually warred, although with no great successe. But

Frederick

Frederick being in Italie, seeking to be reuenged of certaine Cities which rebelled; and seeing that his enemies became daily more mighty, by reason of an Ouerthrow giuen him, he with drew himselfe with dishonour into Pulia, where falling sicke hee dyed (as it was thought) through the practice of his base sonne Manfrede, when hee had held the Empire, about fiue and thirty yeeres.

IN such manner as I haue declared, had this second FREDERICK the Empire, and therwith the Duchie of Suevia; hauing first been King of Naples, Sicilia and Sardinia, and held the same the space of thirty and odde yeers, with great reuolutions, warres, battails and troubles, as you shall hear: wherefore I must spend more time in writing the history of his life, than of some others. He was at no lesse variance with the Church of Rome, than the other FREDERICK his Grandfather was before him; and it now seemed to be an hereditary malady, through which the Emperours and the Popes neuer failed to bee at contention and discord; for the Popes would vphold their Supreme Authoritie, their Lands also and Patrimonie: whose only study and care was to make all old Italy which is diuided from Lombardy by the riuer of Rubicon, subject to the Citie of Rome, from whence they had excluded the Emperors; The Popes knowing that what they attempted, they should neuer attaine vnto, nor long maintaine the authority which they had gotten, vnlesse they should suppresse the Emperors growing power in Italy, neither could the warres be euer pacified, vntill they had gotten all they desired, or wrested away part: Neither did they as Popes doe in these daies, inrich their kinsfolks with the goods of the Church, but to settle and inlarge their dominion. This CARION writes, and this experience hath seen verified.

The Emperors after they had obtained the Empire, and were established in their thrones, pretending that all the jurisdiction and supreme power in temporall causes, both in Germany and in Italy appertained to them, could therefore endure no superiority; and there wanted not men of either side to perswade them that they had reason: and sometimes ambition and couetousnesse of eyther side were the occasions of the miseries before mentioned, and of such as we will relate.

Discord betwixt the Pope and the Emperor.

FREDERICK seeing himselfe freed from his aduersary OTHO; the better to justifie his title and raigne, caused a new assembly and meeting to be held of the Princes of the Empire, and of the deputies of the Imperiall Cities, and went to Aken, where he caused himselfe to be the second time crowned with great solemnitie; and then he made a publike solemne vowe, within a certaine time to goe in person to the warres and conquest of the Citie of Ierusalem, for the victory which God had giuen him: and in requitall of the ayde and fauour receiued from Pope INNOCENT, he gaue for euer to the Church of Rome the Citie and Countie of Fundi; with all which the Pope was very glad.

Frederick the second time crowned.

After this coronation, FREDERICK went through sundry prouinces, and making himselfe absolute Lord thereof, brought them to his obedience as to their Emperour. And for as much as HENRY Duke of Brabant had not yet done him homage, he with all the speede possible, with a great Army, marched into that prouince: and the Duke seeing himself in danger, sought his fauour, offering to obey, and to doe him seruice, and was admitted, he giuing his son and other Noble men of his house, for hostages and assurance thereof. Few daies after this (by the Emperors consent) Pope INNOCENT called a generall Councell in the Citie of Rome, whither came from all parts of Christendome, Greeke and Latine, the Patriarchs of Ierusalem and Constantinople, threescore and ten Archbishops Metropolitanes, foure hundred and twelue Bishops, eight hundred and odde Priors and Abbats couentuall; and Ambassadours from the Emperour FREDERICK and King of Sicilia, from the Emperour of Constantinople, from the Kings of France, England, Spaine, Arragon, Hungary, Cyprus and Ierusalem; and from other Kings and Princes: in which Councell were condemned certaine sects newly risen in France; but the chiefest matter that therein was handled, was for the warres and conquest of the Citie of Ierusalem, whereto they all gaue their consent, promising ayde and assistance. The Pope sent his Leters into all parts of Christendome, inciting all men to this holy war: graunting large Indulgences and Pardons to such as dyed in that action: and all such as gaue their names to goe to that warre,

A Councell held by the Pope in the city of Rome war, took for their deuice the signe of the Crosse of Ierusalem, which they ware vpon their garments, and were called Croisats. And so an infinite number of men, and many Princes tooke the same: amongst which in Germany the Emperor FREDERICK took it, and HENRY Duke of Brabant, the Duke of Morauia, the Duke of Iuliers, the Count Palatine of Tubingen, the Marquess of Baden, the Earl of Nassao, the Duke of Limburgh and other Princes; with the Archbishop of Mentz, and many other Bishops: and in France, were many which prepared and armed themselues for this expedition, which afterwards took no such effect as the preparation seemed to prognosticate. Amongst other matters, the great warres betweene the Pisans and the Genoayes (then two mighty common wealths by sea) was a great let and hinderance; wherefore the Councell being ended (which was one of the most famous that euer had been) the Pope went from Rome to Perugia, that by his authority he might settle some peace or truce between these two Common-wealths; where, within few daies, without concluding ought, he died, hauing gouerned the Church of Rome eighteen yeers and a half. He being dead, HONORIVS the Third was chosen, who in the beginning of his Papacy crowned PETER and his wife, Emperor of Constantinople; who (as I haue heertofore tould you) succeeded his father-in-law HENRY.

The death of Pope Innocent and the election of Honorius.

While these matters passed, the Emperour FREDERICK applyed himselfe to settle and confirme his estate in the Empire; and to prouide for his comming into Italy to be crowned in Rome, defering his iourney to Ierusalem vntill this were done. But Pope HONORIVS (hauing a prophecie reuealed vnto him, importing that in his time the Citie of Ierusalem, should be recouered) vsed all means possible to cause those which had vndertaken the same to depart into the East, and neuer ceased to vrge the Emperor FREDERICK to accomplish the vow which he had made; threatning him with censures if he performed not the same: but the Emperor delaying his going; by the Popes perswasion there went into the East, ANDREVV King of Hungary, the Dukes of Bauiere and Austria; and out of France, the Earl of Niuers, WALTER the Kings chamberlain, and other great men; and with them went IOHN de Columna the Popes Legate, with so many good men of warre, that it was hoped they would haue effected some great matter: who being arriued in Palestina in Asia, in the harbour of Ptolomaida, otherwise called Acon, after certain consultations, ioyning themselues with IOHN de Bregna, King of Ierusalem, and with the Masters of the Knights Templars, of S. IOHN, and the Dutch Orders, and all their forces, whose number was great; they departed thence with a prosperous winde to the City of Damietta, called in antient time Pelusium, on the coast of Egypt, in one of the mouthes of the riuer of Nilus where it falleth into the sea; which they besieged the space of eighteen months: in which time many accidents befell, which the Authors write, and I ouerpasse as nothing to my purpose. The Soldan of Egypt was heerwith so much put to his shifts, that he offred to giue vp the City of Ierusalem and the Territories thereof, vpon condition that they would raise their siege from before Damietta: and notwithstanding that there were sundry opinions between the Kings and Princes concerning the same, yet in the end it was concluded not to accept thereof; wherein they greatly erred, as by the sequell it appeared. In the mean time, the Soldans sonne CORDIRIVS, who was in Ierusalem, seeing what distresse Damietta was in, and that both he and his father were out of hope to defend Ierusalem, threw down and minated all the wals thereof. In the end, the Christians took the City of Damietta, and certain other Towns in that Quarter, and in all things had then good successe, although afterwards the contrary ensued.

At this time, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1220, the Emperor FREDERICK came into Italy; and by Letters and Ambassages vnderstanding the Popes mind, came to Rome, and was therein receiued and crowned, with the ceremonies accustomed, and there he againe vowed and bound himselfe, to make his voyage into the East, promising also great matters to the Pope: but being out of Rome, their friendship continued not long, for he presently seised certaine townes into his hands, pretending that they appertained vnto him. CARION writes, that FREDERICK coming into Italy certain Noble men of Tuscanie and Apulia with some Bishops falling from their alleagеance to the Emperor, by the Popes instigation inuaded both what belonged to the Empire and to FREDERICK by inheritance, whereof some places they took and held, others they spoiled and burnt: the Emperour being incensed with their perfidious trecherie, came to Arms; and hauing happily subdued his enemies he displaced the Bishops and subrogated others in their places. The rest which had fled vnto the Pope (the Author of the sedition) depriued both of dignity and estate he condemned to perpetuall banisſment. The Pope requiring to haue theſe reſtored, the Emperor in a graue Oration refuſed him, inueighing bitterly againſt the ambition, pride, fraude, and practices of Popes, whoſe ſpeech is yet extant. This bred a bitter hatred between them, which burſt forth into cruell wars.

Then the Emperor came into Lombardy, to ſettle that eſtate; and paſſing through Tuſcane, there aroſe ſome controuerſie between his ſouldiers and the inhabitants of that countrie: the like hapned afterwards in Lombardy, ſo as he began to grow odious, and ill beloued: and from thence he gaue a turne to viſite his kingdoms of Sicilia and Naples; where, beſides the taking of ſome towns and places from the Pope, he placed certain Biſhops, in ſome Churches diſplacing ſuch as the Pope had enſtalled therein; alleaging that the Kings of Sicilia had a priuilege to do ſo. Whereupon the Pope and he fell at open variance, and the Pope proceeded againſt him by his fulminations, commanding him particularly to accompliſh his vow, for the conqueſt of the Holy-land, and pronounced him for excommunicate, if within a preſixed time he reſtored not what he had taken; and performed not his vow: and ſo this contention continuing, he ſeiſing many townes into his hands (which he left garriſoned and fortified) returned into Germany.

Whileſt theſe matters paſſed in Italy, great diſcord and diſſenſion aroſe in the Army in the Eaſt, between the kings and princes, and the Popes Legate about the ſuperiority, and at what time, and in what manner the warre was to be made: but finally, the Chriſtians agreed to take the field, and to beſiege the great city of Babylon in Egypt, called Cair, and other Townes thereabouts, in the moneth of Iuly, in the yeer 1221, with an Army of threeſcore and ten thouſand excellent men of warre, foote and horſe, beſides groomes and horſe-boyes. And notwithſtanding that the Soldan had an exceeding huge Army, yet he durſt not, or would not fight with them, of purpoſe prolonging the warre, vntill that about two moneths after (the Chriſtians hauing not encamped themſelues in ſuch place and order, as was conuenient, and as they ought to haue done) the riuer Nilus ſwelled and ouerflowed, as it vſually doth in that countrey yeerly in Auguſt: Beſides which, the Soldan cauſed the dikes and bankes thereof to be broken and cut, which in antient time were made for a defence, and to keepe in the waters of that riuer: ſo as the Chriſtians Campe was enuironed with water, in ſuch ſort that they could not forrage or get any victuals: finally, they were ſo diſtreſſed, that they ſent to the Soldan (who lay not farre from them) offering to come to a compoſition with him: In concluſion (to be briefe, and to return to my Hiſtory) after many treaties between the Kings, the Legate, and the Soldan; a peace or truce was concluded for eight yeers, and that hee ſhould ſuffer them freely to depart; and that therewith they ſhould preſently render the City of Damietta, and ſuch other townes of leſſe importance, which they held in Egypt; and that all Captiues of either ſide ſhould haue liberty; and that the Chriſtians ſhould depart with their troups, to the Cities of Ptolomaida, Tyre, and ſuch other places as they held in Soria.

A peace between the chriſtians and the Soldan.

Theſe conditions being agreed vpon, the Soldan made prouiſion for them, and holp them vpon their way, vntill they came to Damietta; where the Chriſtans againe fell at variance amongſt themſelues, about giuing vp of the City: but in the end it was yeelded, and the Chriſtian army returned into Paleſtina, part by land and part by ſea. And from the port of Ptolomaida the king of Ieruſalem returned to his countrey; and the king of Hungary, and the other Dukes, into Europe, vnto theirs, with little contentment and leſſe ioy; extreme ſad and ſorrowfull for their ill ſucceſſe; hauing done little or nothing to any purpoſe: by reaſon whereof, there was great ſorrow and heauineſs through all Chriſtendome, and all men murmured againſt the Emperor FREDERICK, for that he went not that iourney. In the next yeere, which was in the yeer of our Lord 1222, the Emperor ſtiimoned a Councell to be held in the City of Hiperbull, where he procured the electors to make his yong ſon HENRY, of the age of fiue yeeres, king of the Romans; and ſo he cauſed him to be crowned in the City of Aken.

Preſently after this, Iohn de Bregna king of Ieruſalem, ſeeing the ſmall power of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt, reſolued to come in perſon to ſeek reliefe, leauing the beſt garriſons in the countrey that he could (notwithſtanding the truce) and came from Soria into Italie and went to Rome, where the Pope gaue him honorable entertainment, and he preſently vndertook to be a mediator between the Pope and the Emperor, who then was a widower; whereby a peace was made in this manner: The King of Ieruſalem gaue his onely daughter in mariage to the Emperour, with the right of inheritance to the kingdome of Ieruſalem: And the Pope abſolued him of his excommunication: Whereupon he promiſed preſently after the mariage to go goe with his whole power to the warres in the Eaſt, and to reforme all matters whereof the Pope accuſed him; and to reſtore ſuch lands as he held from his Church. Vpon this agreement he came from Germany to Rome, whither the kings daughter of Ieruſalem was brought; and the marriage was ſolemnized with great ioy and feaſting. By this title, and by the marriage of this Lady with the Emperour FREDERICK; CONRADE their ſonne, and thoſe which vntill this day haue ſucceeded in the kingdomes of Sicillia and Naples, haue been, and ſtill are, called Kings of Ieruſalem. This being ended, the king of Ieruſalem went into France, where he receiued a great ſumme of mony, which King PHILIP left him by his laſt will and teſtament, towards the warres: there he ſtaied certaine daies for the Emperor, whom all men beleeued (for that the inheritance of that country belonged to him, and for the great power and fit oportunity which he had, being King of Naples and Sicilia) would now haue performed his vow and promiſe. But departing from Rome, he went with his ſpouſe into the prouinces of Pulia and Calabria, viſiting his kingdomes, not caring to proceed on his iourney, in more then two yeeres ſpace: for which cauſe, and for that he had not fully performed the agreement with the Pope, they againe fell at variance.

After this, his eldeſt ſonne HENRY (who was in Germany) held a Councell in Franckford; vnder pretext to procure certaine Princes to goe with their power to the conqueſt of Ieruſalem; to which the Emperour ſent his Letters, certifying his ſpeedie comming into Germany, to the end to goe that iourney: wherefore many Princes gaue in their names, promiſing to goe with him. At this aſſemblie was HENRY King of the Romanes, the Emperours ſonne, married to MARGARET, daughter to the Duke of Auſtria. The yeere following, moſt of the cities in Lombardy made a league, and rebelling againſt the Emperor, denied him their obedience, alleaging the principall reaſon thereof to be, for that he was diſobedient to the Church: wherewith he was very much diſpleaſed; and many ambaſſages were ſent from the one to the other; and there were many tumults, and much leuying of men, which continued many daies; the Emperor pretending it to be the cauſe why he deferred his iourney.

At this time died Pope HONORIVS the Third, hauing bin Pope tenne yeeres and halfe; in the end of the yeere 1226. This Pope is held for a very good Pope. The greateſt reaſon why he is ſo eſteemed, is, for that he ſolemnely confirmed the orders of the Franciſcane and Dominicane Friers. After HONORIVS ſucceeded GREGORY the Ninth, an Italian borne, nephew to INNOCENT the Third. The firſt matter he took in hand, was to require the Emperor to reſtore what he detained from the Church of Rome, and to goe the iourney which hee had vowed to Ieruſalem; publiſhing him for excõmunicate, if within a certain time limited he did not put the ſame in execution; which he afterwards incurr'd: yet he preſently anſwered, he was content to go from Sicilia, where he then was, and ſent to his ſon to call a Councel in the Citie of Aken in Germany; where (through his perſwaſion and the Emperours letters) many Princes offered to go that iourney: and the Emperor ſent to them, that (with the greateſt expedition that might be) they ſhould repaire into Italie, to the Port of Brunduſium, which is in the remoteſt part thereof, whither he promiſed preſently to come: whither repaired many men of war, Princes and Prelates, attending the Emperors comming all the ſummer: but he came not, pretending that he was ſicke. Which (as moſt Authors affirme) was but fained: and as BLONDVS and others affirme, he treated vnder hand with the Soldan of Egypt, hoping to haue concluded ſome peace with him before his going out of Sicilia into Italie: ſo as by reaſon of the great heat of the ſummer, the moſt of the men of war at Brunduſium, and the Countrie thereabouts, attending his comming, dyed, together with many great Perſonages, amongſt which was the Lantzgraue of Turinge, a rich and mighty Prince: which when the Emperour vnderſtood, he came to Brunduſium, where he ſeiſed into his hands all the gold, ſiluer, Armes and other things which the Lantzgraue brought with him; and it was ſayd that the Emperour came thither for no other purpoſe. But the ſickneſs increaſing in the Army & Letters comming daily from the Pope; the Emperor, to performe his promiſe, departed with all his Army towards the Eaſt: but within few daies ſailing he returned, and arriued in Italie, alleaging that contrary winds had conſtrained him ſo to doe. But this was held but for fained, and he was therefore ill ſpoken of by all men: and Pope GREGORY holding himſelf to be abuſed by the Emperours promiſe (other diſcord and diſagreement remaining betwixt them) ſent to declare him excommunicate, and for ſuch proclaimed him throughout all Germanie and Italy. At this time dyed the Empreſſe, wife to the Emperor FREDERICK, and daughter to the King of Ieruſalem, who left behind her one ſonne, whoſe name was CONRADE.

The death of Pope Honory and Gregory choſen.

The Emperor Frederick the Second excommunicated by the Pope.

CARION writes, that the Emperor lay sick in Brundusium, when as the Lantzgraue and diuerse others died; and that contrary winds draue him back, being in the Streights of Peloponesus and Crete: yet the Pope began to thunder against him, taxing him with the crimes of perjury, adultery, cruelty to his wife, and with the losse of Damietta, for the which he did excommunicate him. He sent IOHN de Bregna, the Emperors father-in-law, into Romagnia, with the title of Exarch, and commanded the Earls of Tuscanie, with the Cities of Lombardy, to take arms.

These matters which we haue related being past; the Emperor, seeing himself in a streight by reason of the Popes censures on the one side, and the intreaty of many of his friends on the other; with the greatest power that he could make, and with a great number of ships, sette his course towards Soria, and landed in the City of Ptolomaida, otherwise called Acon: yet BLONDVS and some other say, that he first staid in the Ile of Cyprus, and from thence sent a Captain with the greatest part of his Army to Acon; who by his commandement began a treaty of peace with the Soldan, before that he himself came to the war. FREDERICK coming afterwards thither, the Masters and Knights of the Orders of S. IOHN and the Templars ill agreed with him: for, they surmised he had intelligence and treated of a peace and agreement with the Soldan. And in Italie he was in no better tearms with the Pope: for, RAINOLD, the Dukes son of Spoleto, whom he had left for Captain and Gouerner in the Kingdome of Naples, beganne to make war, and took certain places from the Church of Rome, in the Marca di Ancona and other parts. Whereupon, the Pope called to his aid IOHN de Bregna, King of Ierusalem, who then was ready to haue taken shipping, to haue gone to defend his countries in the East, and to haue holpen FREDERICK in the warres; which (it was thought) he would haue done: and so open war began between the Pope and the Emperors Captaines and Countries. I haue not read in any Author, in what manner hee began and continued the warre, during his abode in Palestina; onely they say, that prosecuting the treaty of peace begun with the Soldan, it was concluded, and that they came to an agreement; which was, that the Soldan should deliuer vp the Cities of Ierusalem, Nazareth, Iapha, and other places in that Kingdome; and should retain to himself certain fortresses of greatest importance, and that ther should be peace & truce betwixt them for ten yeers.

An agreement between the emperor and the Soldan.

Many daies were spent about this matter; and on Easter day, in the yeer of our Lord 1229, the Emperor entred Ierusalem, and made himself to be crowned therein, and was called King of Ierusalem. Then he presently sent an ambassage to Pope GREGORY, giuing him to vnderstand of all that had hapned; therewith requesting him, seeing that he had accomplished his vow, to declare him absolued à pœna et culpa, for his long delaying the same, and for som other matters. But when his Ambassador came, the Pope houlding the peace and agreement made by the Emperor, dishonourable (sith the Soldan should continue in the possession of the fortresses and strong houlds; presupposing, that as soon as the Emperor should haue left those countries, the Soldan would presently resume them into his hands, as he afterwards did) protested that the Emperor had done this but onely to make a shew to haue performed his vow: wherefore, and by reason of the wars which his Captains then and before that time had made against him; hee affirmd, that the Emperor had made no satisfaction, nor was freed from the excommunication: and so practising with the Emperors subiects in Pulia to renounce their obedience to their Soueraign, he recouered some Towns which had been taken from him; which when the Emperor vnderstood, with the greatest speed that he possibly could make, he imbarked himself, leuing part of his Army in Palestina, and the Towns fortified and garrisoned in the best manner he could; and with a fair gale of winde landed in Pulia, so as this enterprise of the Emperor FREDERICK the Second had no better successe than the rest.

Being arriued in Italy, those places which had rebelled and had held for the Pope, reuolted and held for him; and he sent for men into Germany and into Sicilia; and began to warre vpon the Popes townes, and took many of them: and notwithstanding that he seemed to haue sped well in the warre, yet he sought to be at peace with the Pope, by reason of some tumult and combustion in Germany. And by the intercession of the Master of the Order of the Knights and Friars, called Teutonici (which like the Knights of S. IOHN and the Templars, lay in the East) and the Archbishop of Messina, a peace was concluded betweene the Pope and him: LEOPOLD Duke of Austria, with other Princes and Prelates of Germany, being there present. CARION writes that those Prelates and Princes of Germany were a whole yeere before they could pacifie the Popes displeasure against the Emperour: but in the end his choler was appeased with a hundred and twentie thousand ounces of gold; and so hee was absolued and the townes townes were restored, and the Pope absoluing him, proclaymed him King of Ierusalem, Naples, and Sicilia; and they met at a place appointed, and with great shew of loue and good will dined together at one table, and so a peace was concluded betweene them for that time; wherein, and touching that which I haue already written, were sundry opinions, as the custome is in this world, some excusing the Emperor, and others imputing the fault to him, for what had passed: and others attributed the fault to the Pope, for practising against him in his absence. This peace being made, the Emperour returned into his Kingdome of Naples; and the Pope to pacifie matters in Perugia (where had been great tumults and contentions) went thither; what befel in Rome in the time of this his absence, I wil presently tel you; first, bringing in few words to minde, the estate and successe of the Empire of Constantinople, whereto I am also bound; for as the Emperour FREDERICK raigned long, it is not conuenient to leaue this, to make mention of another matter, wherein were great changes of Emperours, through the small time of their continuance: and thus it was.

By the death of HENRY Emperor of Græcia (as we haue aboue said) PETER had the Empire, for that he married his daughter IOLE; who returning crowned by Pope HONORIVS to his Empire, had warres with THEODORE LASCARVS; who holding the Citie of Adrianople, was called Emperour, for that he married the sister of the Emperour ALEXVS, who killed his owne Brother, as is before declared: and a peace was made between them, wherein PETER being circumuented and taken prisoner by LASCARVS, was afterwards put to death in prison, when he had raigned three yeeres onely: which when his wife IOLE vnderstoode, she making her sonne, called ROBERT, to be proclaimed Emperor, vndertooke the gouernment, vntill that he should come to Constantinople: (for hee was in Italy when his Father dyed) and he being com, was obeyed, and began to gouerne the Empire. Within few daies after this, dyed LASCARVS the Tirant of Adrianople, and left the vsurped name of Emperor to his sonne in law, IOHN de Plobatacio, who married his onely daughter, called YRENE; by whom he had already one Sonne, called THEODORE LASCARVS, as his Grandfather. ROBERT hauing made shew of a good Prince (by the diuels instigation) fell in loue with a faire young damsell, which was betrothed to a Burgonian Knight (a man of great fort, and which had serued the Emperor) and by the consent of her mother, brought her to his court, and married her, and made her to be honoured and held for Empresse: which did so much grieue the Burgonian that should haue been her husband, that after some dayes dissembling, he took a terrible reuenge, which was, that ioyning himself with his friends and kinsfolkes, together with many Greekes, which hated this ROBERT's gouernment; accompanied with them all, with armed hand he came one night into the Emperors Palace, to the Empresse which should haue been his wife, and cut off her nose: and her Mother which had been the causer of the marriage, he threw out at a window into the sea, wherein she was drowned: and hauing done this, he departed, and put himself and his friends into a place of safetie, so as the Emperor ROBERT could not punish the fact: who shortly after came to Rome to be crowned, and returning homewards, fell sicke in Macedonia, and dyed, leauing behinde him one Sonne, called BALDVVIN; others say, a Brother, who was presently receiued for Emperour and his successor. And for as much as he was very young, by a generall assent IOHN de Brégna King of Ierusalem was sent to be his gouernour and assistant in the Empire, who then was in the Popes seruice in Italy; and he with the Popes leaue and consent came into Græcia, and tooke vpon him the gouernment of the Empire of Constantinople; and betrothed a daughter which he had, to the young Emperor BALDVVIN; and gouerning that Empire whilest he liued (which was some six or seuen yeeres) he left it in peace to his sonne in lawe: but in what manner he lost the same, you shall know hereafter.

Peter Emperour of Constantinople put Lascarus the Tirant of Adrianople to death.

This comming of IOHN de Bregna to Constantinople, was about the same time that the peace was made betweene the Emperor FREDERICK the Second, and Pope GREGORY the Ninth: which being concluded, Pope GREGORY went to Perugia to pacifie the Citie and the marches thereof: and the Emperor went to his Kingdome of Naples. During the time that the Pope was absent from Rome, the gouernment of the Consuls being abolished, (which was so hatefull to the Popes) and now the gouernment of a Senatour being brought in, sometimes one, and sometime fiue, which gouerned the body of the Citie; a man of great power, called HANNIBAL, was aduanced to that dignity; who incensed the people against the Pope, he being absent: and the Pope comming to Rome at that time, many combustions ensued; but in the end, this HANNIBAL was depriued of his office, and one IOHN de Poli, a seditious fellow also succeeded him, who put the City in Armes against the Pope, and against such townes as held for him, and open warre began between them, yet the Pope by all meanes that could be imagined sought peace.

The Emperor FREDERICK being in Pulia, and aduertised hereof; offered to come to his aide, and came to speake with him (and as saith BLONDVS) gaue him for a pledge of his friendship a base son which he had, whose name was HENRY, whom he had made King of Sardinia, the Germans call him ENCIVS, and so do some authors; but the Emperor performed not what he had offered; for within few daies after, he departed for Germany; the Pope remaining in the heate of his troubles with the Romanes; wherewith he was much discontent, but yet not so as to breake the peace between them. But before the Emperors departure, the Pope with his money drew the Germane souldiers to his seruice, and with them recouered certain Townes which rebelled; and his Army ouerthrowing the Roman forces, he made quiet; yet for that time he could not safely come into Rome. The peace betweene the Pope and the Emperour lasted about eight yeeres, although there were little loue between them.

The Emperor being comn into Germany, from whence he had been long absent, where his eldest sonne HENRY King of the Romans commanded for his father, and had taken greater authority vpon him, than his father would he should haue done: there grew some suspicions and jealousies between his father and him, and many Princes held with the Sonne, against the Father: Vpon this occasion many Meetings and Councels were held; but in the end, FREDERICK forced his sonne to leaue the countrey, and to go as his Lieutenant and Viceroy, into Sicilia and those Countries.

After this, the Emperour being a widower, he married with the King of Englands sister. In this journey, the Emperour gaue to FREDERICK, Sonne to LEOPOLD Duke of Austria, the title of King, and that his eldest sonne and his posterity should so be called: but his successors haue not enjoyed this priuiledge, the cause whereof I thinke to be, for that this Duke FREDERICK died without issue that might succeede him; and there was great contention for his estate; but in the end, RODOLPH Earle of Habspurg enioyed it, who was afterwards Emperor, and gaue the estate of Austria to his eldest sonne ALBERT, as when time commeth shall be declared.

This being past, the Emperour made no long abode in Germany, but as soon as he could, leuied an Army and went into Italy: for many Cities in Lombardy rebelled, and some men waxing mighty, tirannized the same, and many of them maintained the old league and confederacy, which they held in the time of FREDERICK the first; as Milan, Brescia, Mantoa, Bologna, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Triuigi, and many others, which being assisted by the Venecians, made head against the Emperour: and for the Emperor, Cremona, Bergamo, Parma, Modena, and Reuna, continued in their obedience, and bound the one to the other. The Emperour being comn neere to Verona, after some skirmishes, the Towne was forced to yeeld, through the policy and power of one ENCELINVS, called by his surname ROMANVS; who was the mightiest man in all those parts, and by descent a Duch-man, Nephew to another of the same name, who came into those parts in the time of OTHO the Third. From Verona, the Emperor went into the territory of Mantoa, where he took and sacked two strong Townes, the one of which was called Marcaria, and the other Claro. From thence he went to Cremona, where he was joyfully receiued, and made his abode there the space of nine moneths: at the end of which, giuing it out, that he would go to besiege Mantoa; he sodainly returned and came before Vicenza, which he besieged: the inhabitants being taken vnawares and vnprouided, offered to yeeld vpon composition; and the Emperor gaue eare to this parle, giuing them good words; but vpon a sudden he commanded the City to be assaulted; and entring by force, he set it on fire, and did much harme, passing forwards and spoiling the fields and marches of Padoa: thinking to haue taken Triuigi, he besieged it, and put it to such distresse, that if from Padoa had not come relefe, he had entred, and ruined it.

The emperor Fredericks son, Henry conspireth against his Father.

As he lay before Triuigi, he had certain intelligence that his sonne HENRY, King of the Romans, whom (for that in Germany he had practised against him) he had made Gouerner of Sicilia, was confederate with the City of Milan, and the rest of that faction, and that some Princes of Germany were of that league, and that they leuied their forces to succour those Cities. The Emperor stood in such fear of this practice, that he resolued for his refuge to flee to Pope GREGORY (notwithstanding that he knew him to be displeased, for abandoning him when he had warre with his Citizens of Rome) and by Letters and Ambassadors complained to to the Pope of the perfidy and disloyalty of his son, humbly intreating him to grant his Letters against him, as against one that was disloyall and disobedient to his father: and the Pope, knowing that it was true, did so, thinking it a just request; or else for fear of the Emperour's power. He wrote his Letters to the Princes of Germany, commanding them vpon pain of excommunication not to ioin with HENRY, King of the Romans, against his father the Emperor, neither to obey his commandements. The Popes command was of such authority, that none durst come into Italy, as they promised; and the Emperor vsed such means, that hee apprehended his sonne, and sent him prisoner to a Castle in Pulia, where he afterwards died; some men were of opinion, that he was poysoned by his fathers commandement: and he injoyned the Dukes of Bohemia and of Bauiere, to make warre vpon FREDERICK Duke of Austria (whom he had made a King) for that he had conspired with his sonne against him.

The Emperor committed his son to prison, where he died.

Within few months after that HENRY King of the Romans was taken, his father the Emperor leauing the affairs of Lombardy in the best order that he could (notwithstanding that Milan and other Cities still continued disobedient) doubting of the estate of Germany, went thither; and making warre in Austria, took the City of Vienna, and many other Towns: so as, taming and punishing the Duke of Austria, he was much feared, and generally obeyed. And knowing that his sonne HENRY was dead (who left a lawfull sonne called CONRADIN, of whom heerafter much mention shall be made) he vsed the means to assemble the Princes Electors, and that they should chuse his sonne CONRADE (whom he had by his second wife IOLE, and whom he had already made Duke of Suevia) for King of the Romans; and notwithstanding that the Electors did it in his absence, yet for the better assurance of what was done, he and his sonne called a Councell in the City of Ratisbone, where what was already done was approued, and CONRADE was again chosen and crowned King of the Romans: from whence they both sent their Ambassadors to the Pope, for a confirmation of the title to the Kingdome of Ierusalem, which his father-in-law IOHN de Bregna had resigned vnto him. The Pope granted his request: for, the Emperor was of great power, and it was said that he would return into Italy; which put him in fear, notwithstanding that the speech went, that he came but against Milan, and the other Cities of that faction, with which he was much displeased, and resolued to bring them to subiection: but the Cities alleaged, that they were content to serue him according to the agreement made with the Emperor FREDERICK the First, called the peace of CONSTANCE, as we haue declared in his history; wherewith he held himself not satisfied: and so raising a very great power, he came again into Italy, leauing his son CONRADE, King of the Romans, in his place in Germany.

Vienna in Austria taken by the Emperor.

The Emperor, coming into Italy, took his way directly towards Padoa; and the Padoans, being induced thereto by ENCELINVS (who bare a great sway in Lombardy) receiued him into their City, assuring themselues, that the liberty and priuiledge which the Emperor FREDERICK the First had giuen them, should haue been maintained: but this FREDERICK was of another humour; for, when he was within the City, he prescribed them such lawes as pleased him, as to his vassals and subiects.

Pope GREGORY, hauing intelligence of the Emperors coming into Italie, sent a messenger to meet him, called GREGORY de Monte longo; by whom he both desiring and requiring him (in requitall of the benefits which he had receiued from the Church, as well in the peace and absolution granted him when he came from Ierusalem, as in the fauour which he had shewed him against his sonne, and in dispensing with his marriage in England) that his now comming might be for the good and peace of the countrey; and that he would maintain that peace and agreement which was granted by his Grandfather to Milan and to the other Cities, and which was confirmed by the authority of the Church. And after this hee sent three Cardinals with the same message: but to neither of them he gaue any good answer; so as they conceiued, that he was no good friend to the Pope; and they all feared that he came no lesse against him, than against Milan; so as without any conclusion they returned to Viterbo, where the Pope then lay. It is written, that FREDERICK and his sonne CONRADE did require the rights belonging to the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicilie; which, the Pope, contrary to couenants, vniustly detained from them: And the Pope, to arm himself with a faction, commanded the Emperor not to molest the confederate Cities of Lombardy, with whom he was in league: but the Emperor giuing him reasons why he could not do it vnlesse they would giue-ouer their conspiracies against the Empire, and return to their obedience; the Pope, fearing the event, bent all his forces to this common warre.

Isabel, daughter of John king of England, married to the emperor Frederick the second, died in childbed.

The Emperor, leauing Padoa garrisoned, marching through Lombardy, took his way towards the City of Brescia, which was of the league, and besieged a Town called Claramont; and taking it by assault (the more to terrifie the Brescians, and to make them to yeeld) he destroyed and burnt the same. But, the Brescians for all this were not dismaid, but made shew of greater obstinacy. FREDERICK at that time besieged not their City, but marched towards Milan, the Captain and Head of all the Rebels: and the Milanois (with the help of the Venecians, and of other Cities their friends) had an Army in a readinesse; whereof, PETER TEVPOLO, the Duke of Venice his sonne, was Generall, together with CHARROCHIO a principall citizen of Milan, and other prime men of other Cities: all which with great courage (for that not long before they had ouerthrowne his Grandfather FREDERICE) staied to fight with him in the field, and met with him neer to a place called Crotona, and he marched with as great a desire to fight with them; so as they fought a very cruell battell, the Armies being in number and in force (in a manner) equall: but, after they had fought many houres, the Milanois began to shrink, and the victory shewed it self on the Emperors side; and PETER TEVPOLO their Generall and other Captains were taken prisoners: all which, the Emperor commanded to bee put to a shamefull death. After this victory he came to Cremona, to refresh and reinforce his Army, hauing had some losse in the battell; where some cities which had rebelled, compounded, and yeelded their obedience.

A battell between the Emperor and the Milanois.

The Pope being aduertised of the calamity of the Milanois & of those of the league (whose cause he seemed to protect and defend) fearing the Emperors greatnes (whom he knew to hate him) made a league with the Venecians (which he knew to bee much grieued for the pitifull death of their Dukes sonne) and resolued to succour Milan and their confederates. And the better to bring this to passe, he made a kinde of peace and truce for ten yeers, between the Cities of Venice and Genoa, which at that time were at warres; and vsed such means, that he himself was receiued into Rome; hauing euer since the last troubles liued out of it. Being in Rome, hee sent out his Buls against the Emperor, which he published to all Christendome, and excommunicated both him and all such as took his part; who then from Cremona (where he had refreshed his Army after the battell) came to Pauia, leauing Milan, to make warre vpon the Venecians. And there he was aduertised of the Popes fulminations, and of the great preparation made by the Venecians against him, both by sea and land. Vpon this he raised new forces, and so with a great victorious Army (wherein many Moors of Africa, which they called Sarazins, serued him on horseback) he took the field, and ouerran the Territories of the Venecians, wasting and spoiling the same; and incamping himself by the waters side in the sight of Venice, the Venecians salied forth with a great number of Archers and others, in barks and boats, therwith to annoy his Camp as much as they could from the water.

The Emperor, seeing how little he profited by lying there, returned to Padoa, leauing ENCELINVS to warre against Triuigi and the country thereabout, carrying with him some principall men of Verona and Padoa, for hostages; giuing it out, that he went to besiege Mantoa: and passing by it, he went to Parma, and from thence to Luca, and from Luca to Pisa, with a resolution not to stay till he came to Rome.

At this time GREGORY de Monte longo (who was the Popes Legate in Milan) came to Bolonia, and from thence took the field with the troops which came to him from Milan and other parts: and ioyning with the Venecians, and others of the league (first taking Ferrara by force) euery where began a most cruell warre, which was the greatest that of long time, either before or after, had bin seen in Italy; some houlding for the Pope, others for the Emperor. This war was so great, and so many and so great accidents hapned, that if I should relate what I find written, I should spend a great part of this volume in this relation: wherefore I will onely write the summe thereof.

The Emperor being in Pisa, with a resolution to besiege Rome, then began the great and fatall factions in Italie, between the Guelphs and the Gebelins; the Guelphs houlding for the Pope, and the Gebelins for the Emperor: of the originall of which factions authors write so confusedly, that I will not enter into disputation concerning the same. Let their beginning be what it will: I thinke it was the inuention of some diuel, as it should seeme by the sequell: for within short space, these factions extended themselues so farre ouer all Italy, as no place was free from this infection (Venice except) wherein this pestilence took no hold: all the rest was diuided into these two names and factions, without any other foundation of loue or hatred, but only for the names sake: and there daily ensued scandals and slaughters; and in families and dinages nages it often happened that the father was against his sonnes, and brothers were against brothers; which fighting slue one another, ransacking townes, burning and ruinating houses; in worse sort then if they had been traytors, or Infidels, with so great rancor and hatred, as the like thereof before that time had neuer been seen nor heard of. And truly it was a strange thing and to be admired: these two factions were so contrary the one to the other, that they could not in any thing endure any conformity or resemblance: for they differed in their ensignes, in their colours, in the fashion of their apparell, in attiring themselues, in their disports, in their feasts, yea, euen vnto their very manner of going, speaking, feeding, riding, and in all things that mans wit could inuent.

The Emperor and his adherents were called Gebelins; and he proclaimed that all such as took part with him should be so called, which was performed throughout all Italie: and all the Guelphs held with the Pope. With this name the Emperour departed from Pisa towards Rome; wherein the fire of these factions was already kindled, and the greatest part of the people were Gebelins, who were ready to haue set vpon the Guelphs; and to haue spoiled and killed them, without any redemption. The Pope seeing himselfe in so great danger, tooke the heads of Saint PETER and Saint PAVL (as they say) and made a solemn procession, and therewith a long oration to the people; shewing them how vaine a thing it was for men to kill one another, for that they had only taken contrary names; and disswading them from their intent he perswaded them to defend his Church and their countrey against his enemy FREDERICK, who was comming thitherwards: and of his bountifull liberality he gaue to all such as in his quarrell would take Armes, and would beare the signe of the Crosse, plenary Indulgence, and absolution.

The factions of the Guelphs and Gebelins between the Emperor Frederick the second and Pope Gregory the ninth.

The people were herewith so much perswaded, that when the Emperor with his Army came before Rome, presupposing that the greatest part of the Citizens had been Gebelins, hee to the contrary found them all markt with the signe of the Crosse, in Armes against him: and comming with his people to the gates of the city, some companies salied to skirmish with him: and so some were slain of eyther side, which made him to vse extraordinary cruelty; for all those of the City which were taken with the signe of the Crosse, he caused to be slain: some of them had their heads clouen acrosse; and of some others hee made crosses in their foreheads with hote irons: and priests hee made to bee crossed vpon their crownes: and after three daies (despairing to take Rome by force, spoyling the countrie round about it) he went into Campania, and gaue a sudden turne and came to Beneuent, which he took and sacked, and commanded the same to be dismantelled and razed: and so marched through many parts of Italy, warring vpon the Popes Townes, and such as took his part; wherein he took Rauenna, and besieged Fauencia. And in Sicilia he confisked the goods of many Ecclesiasticall persons, and apprehended and put some Bishops to death: others he banished out of that countrie; and he particularly caused all places, which appertained to the order of the Knights Templars, to be sacked and spoyled; vsing herein the seruice of his horsemen, which were Moores of Affrica, which serued him in that war, to whom he gaue many preheminences and double paies; and the City of Nuceria in Pulia to inhabit, which they possessed many yeers after. Pope GREGORY seeing himselfe so distressed, sent his Legates to the kings of France, England and Spaine, bewailing his misery, and complaining of the Emperour, he implored succour, aide, and councell: whereto they gaue him gentle answeres; and by their consent he called a generall Councell, for the reformation and preseruation of the Church, and for a conquest to be made of the Holy land, which was now in greater distresse then euer.

The Emperour hauing intelligence that a generall Councell was summoned, and imagining that the chiefest intent thereof was against himselfe; he resolued by all meanes possible to disturbe it, by stopping the passages, and apprehending such as went to it; and sent his son ENCIVS (king of Sardinia) to Pisa (which then was of great power by sea) where he armed a great number of ships and gallies, to stay the comming of the Cardinals, the Popes Legates; which with many prelates of Spaine and France came to the Councel: they being vpon the sea, in a fleet of Genoaes of 40 Gallies, between Corsica and Pisa, within sight the one of the other, the Legates would haue fled, and so auoided the fight: But the Admirall who was a Genoais, would not alter his course, so as they fought a most cruell battaile, which lasted the greatest part of the day: But in the end, the King of Sardinia had the victory, and the Cardinals and Legates being taken prisoners, were carried into Pulia, except some which were slain or drowned.

The

The French Bishops and Abbats which were taken, the Emperor set at liberty, at the request of the French King: the rest lay long in prison; so as the Councel could not be held or begun as the Pope would haue had it: wherewith he was so much troubled, that with very rage and anger he fell sick and died; hauing been Pope aboue fourteen yeers, whereof the most part was in trouble and contention. He died in the yeer of our Lord 1241. This Pope in his life time first canonized S. FRANCIS and S. DOMINICK for Saints; and afterwards Saint ANTHONY, called Saint ANTHONY of Padoa, although a Portingall, and born in the City of Lisbon. He compiled also the Book of the Decretals, and instituted the singing of Salue Regina at certain times and houres, with the ringing of the sacring Bell; and that our Lady should bee praied vnto in the night, with Aue Maria, which should agree with the ringing of the Bell; and did many other things like a Pope.

Pope Gregory the Ninth died for anger.

Pope GREGORY being dead, by the generall consent of all the Cardinals which were in Rome, GAVNFREDE de Castilion, a Milanois born, was chosen Pope, and cald CELESTINE the Fourth, a good man and very learned, but old and sickly; who presently sought to bee at peace with the Emperor, and to that effect sent his Legates to his Camp, hee then lying before Fauencia: but this Pope could not tarry for an answer; for, he died the eighteenth day after his election.

CELESTINE being dead, the Cardinals could not agree about chusing him a successor: some say, that for fear of the Emperors threatnings, they durst not chuse whom they would haue chosen. PLATINA saith, that the Cardinals of Rome determined to chuse no Pope at all, vntill that the Emperor released those which he held prisoners. BLONDVS following his Author (who as he said was an ey-witnes) affirmeth the cause to be, for that the Cardinals who were prisoners, sent to require, and therewith protested, that no Pope should be chosen without their voices. So as vpon some of these occasions, or for all together, for the space of twenty months Rome was without a Pope. And in all this time the Emperor would not release those Cardinals which were his prisoners; neither would those of Rome chuse a Pope. In which time the Emperor took the City of Fauencia (which held out against him about one yeer) and came before Bolonia: but seeing that he could not take it, he spoiled the country, and transferred the Vniuersity from thence to Padoa; and afterwards went to Modena, and to Rezzo, which also stood vpon their guard, and took Townes appertaining to the Church of Rome; so as there were great wars in all parts of Italie, which cost many men their liues.

The original and successe of the Tartarians.

At the same time, when the Emperor thus warred in Italy against the faction of the Guelphs, the Tartarians inuaded Hungary. These Tartars are a barbarous Nation in the North, which came out of Scythia Asiatica (as some say; and VOLATERRANVS saith, out of Taurica Chersonesus in Europe) about the yeer of our Lord 1202, and made an irruption into Asia, and subdued some Prouinces therein, vnder the leading of their King and Captain, called CANGVISTA: and they afterwards so increased in the beginning of the Emperour FREDERICK'S Raign, about the yeer 1222, that they conquered Georgiana, Armenia the Lesse, and other prouinces in Asia, and suppressed the power of the Turks (which I for breuity sake passe ouer). And coming afterwards into Europe by the Caspian sea, crossing the mountains Riphei, became Masters of those countries, and made wars in Russia and in Polonia, and subdued a great part of Sarmacia, which at this day is called after them, Tartaria; and their King is called the Great CAN: they receiued the sect of MAHOMET, through their first conuersing with the Turks; and in such manner they made war, that they put the world in fear of them. And the Emperor now making warre in Italy against the Guelphs, the Tartars, vnder the leading of their King called BATVS, came into Hungary, and warred therein three yeers, and did much harm; VELA the Fourth being then King thereof: at the end of which time they returned to the countries which they before had gotten. And so Hungary, a Prouince of the Empire, indured as great misery as Italy.

Hungary inuaded by the Tartarians.

And it hapned also, that the Emperor of Constantinople liued not in peace in those daies: for, IOHN de Bregna, King of Ierusalem (who was Gouernour of the Greek Empire, with yoeng BALDVVIN who maried his daughter) being dead, the Empire remained in BALDVVIN: against whom IOHN LASCARVS (nephew to the other of that name, who was called Emperor in Adrianople) raised such power, and found so many friends, that he took Smirnia and Satilia, with other cities, towns and Ilands: so as the Emperor BALDVVIN, accompanied with the Earl of Tolousa (who had been with him in all his wars and troubles) came into Italy to sue for aid and relief against his enemies: and finding it in such estate as you haue heard (imagining that that in time of such confusion he should not get any) hee sought means to haue a Pope chosen, and so came directly to the Emperour; who hauing then taken the citie of Parma, and driuen the Guelphes out of it, went thence to Placencia. And BALDVVIN comming thither, and being well receiued and entertained, vsed such means to the Emperour FREDERICK, that at his request all the Cardinals were released and set at liberty, whom he had long detained prisoners in Melphi: and the Emperor of Constantinople with the good leaue of the Emperor FREDERICK, went to Bologna, where the Cardinals were, to treat with them concerning the election of such a new Pope, as might be acceptable to the Emperour FREDERICK, to the end that peace might be maintained between them. Where he was with great ioy honourably receiued; in Iune, in the yeer 1244. and they presently conferred about the election of a Pope, and one SINOBALDVS Cardinall of S. LAVRENCE borne in Genoa, was chosen, and called INNOCENT the Fourth; who was the Emperors greatest friend of all the Cardinals: which when the Emperors friends and seruants vnderstood, with all possible speede they gaue him to vnderstand thereof: when the newes was brought vnto him in the citie of Parma, it is reported that he presently said, (presaging what would follow) I haue exchaunged my best friend, being a Cardinall, for my greatest enemie, being Pope.

After the election, the new Pope, the Emperor of Constantinople, and all the Cardinals came together to Rome, where they consulted of a peace to be concluded with the Emperour FREDERICK, and Ambassadours were sent from the one to the other: but the Emperour in the time that the Papacie was void, was growne so great and so mighty a Lord in Italy, that he would not accept such conditions as were propounded; and so gaue ambiguous and vncertain answers, such as they knew not how to resolue: foure moneths being spent in this parle, the Pope was certified that the Emperor had secret intelligence with sundrie in Rome against him: the effect whereof was, that in a place called Castello amar, whither it was agreed that the Pope should come, to yeeld his resolution concerning the peace, and there expecting the Emperours comming, should be seized on.

This being discouered, and the Pope seeing how small power he had in Italie, speedily went to Hastia, and there embarking himself in certaine galleys of Genoa, which he had secretely caused to be brought thither for that purpose, went to Genoa, where hee fell sicke, and recouering health he there against shipped himself, and went into Prance; and arriuing at Aigues mortes, and comming vp the riuer Rodanus, the French King receiued and entertained him with great solemnitie: and then he went to the citie of Lions, where hee complained of the Emperour, and within some few daies after, proclaimed through all Christendome, a Councell to be held at Lions in Prance, in the beginning of the yeere 1246. whither he cited the Emperor to come and to make his personal apparance; and in many his sermons and orations which hee made to the people, he with a lowd voyce summoned him to appeare: and so prelates from all parts of Christendome repairing thither, the Councell began; and the Emperor sent his Ambassadors to make his excuse; and otherwise made many large offers. But the Pope would accept neither his offers nor excuses; but published, that if within a certain time limited hee appeared not, he would then pronounce Sentence against him; as is contained in the chapter Adapostolicam sedem, de re iudicata, libro sexto: wherein he condemned him in the losse and depriuation of the Empire, and of all the other kingdoms and dominions which hee enioyed, and presently proclaimed the same throughout all Christendom, and commanded the Princes Electors with all speed to chuse a new Emperor, releasing them from all allegeance and othes made to the Emperor FREDERICK whatsoeuer. At this time, BALDVVIN Emperor of Constantinople, vnderstanding that his enemy ROBERT LASCARVS was dead, returned, and had such successe as you shall hear.

Pope Innocent went into France, where he excommunicated the Empero, and released his subiects from their allegeance.

So great account was made of the Popes sentence pronounced against the Emperor in Germany (it being approued by the Councell) that the Electors began to treate of the chusing of a new Emperour: and notwithstanding that his sonne CONRADE King of the Romanes, was therewith much grieued, and by all meanes sought to haue preuented the same; yet they met at Hipersbole, and chose HENRY Lantzgraue of Turinge, Emperour: and he according to the accustomed manner went to Aken, where he was crowned: whereupon presently betweene him, and CONRADE the Emperors sonne, began a cruell warre; the end and successe whereof we will report hereafter, when we haue related what FREDERICK did when he vnderstood that he was deposed. As soone as he heard thereof, in extream choler he caused the houses of the Popes friends and kinsmen in Parma to be thrown downe, and their goods to be spoiled: and and wrote his Letters into Germany, excusing and iustifying his proceedings, and to animate his sonne. But conceiuing his estate to be in great hazard, he resolued to goe in person to the Councell at Lions in France; and to that effect he first made a league of friendship with the Duke of Burgondy; and had a safe conduct and assurance from the French King, for his going, aboad and returne. And leauing his son ENCIVS (King of Sardinia) in Parma, he commanded him not to salie out of that City, for that he held the same and the situation therof, to be of great importance: and so being accompanied with men both of peace and warre, he took his way towards France; and hauing past Turin, messengers ouertook him, which gaue him to vnderstand, that Parma (whereof he made so great account) was lost, through his sonnes ouersight: for he through a greedy desire to haue taken Brescia, which was of the contrary faction, by the aduice and procurement of those of Cremona, went from Parma with part of the garrison which lay therein; and in the meane time that he was about this exploit, the Popes friends and kindred, which liued in Placencia, hauing intelligence with some which were within Parma, came thither, & by surprise took it, but not without shedding of much blood. These ill newes touched the Emperor FREDERICK to the quick: and he fearing on the one side, his vnsafe going into France, and on the other side, that other Cities in Italy following the example of Parma (he being absent in a strange countrie) would also rebell, resolued therfore in great fury to return: and raised forces in Sicilia and Naples: and from Triuligi came his great friend ENCELINVS with a great troupe of men of warre; all which he sent against Parma, whither he himself marched with a full resolution to haue ruined the same, and to haue laid it waste, and vsed som speeches to the same effect: but he failed of his expectation; for GREGORY, de Monte longo, who from the time of GREGORY the ninth had been the Popes Legate in Milan, and in the other Cities of that faction in Lombardy, getting souldiers from Milan, and other Cities of the league, put himselfe with them into Parma: and furnished and prouided it with all things requisite to endure a siege.

It was not long before the Emperor came before it with his Army (wherein were threescore thousand men) and besieged it, with a full resolution not to rise from before it, vntill that he had taken the Citie; and so he began to assault it on euery side. But the besieged defended themselues so well, that they daily salied out and skirmished with their enemies, in such manner that it behoued the Emperor to withdraw his Campe a little further from the City; and the war continuing, he compassed the City round about with a wall: and as hee purposed wholly to haue ruinated Parma, so he caused a new Citie to be built in the same place where his Army lay; which he presently enuironed with walles, and made market places, Churches, and houses in it; and appointed lands for those of Parma, which would come thither to inhabit: so as within short space the city was built, and peopled, and he named it Victoria. And as the Emperor had lien about two yeers before Parma, and the news of this new City, and the distribution made by him was bruited abroad, many came thither from all parts to dwell; in so much that PLATINA affirmeth, that therein were as many faire gardens and orchards, with birds and beasts in them, and so great concourse of men and women, as in any the most peopled antient cities of Italy.

Victoria built by Frederick.

While the Emperor lay before Parma, his son CONRADE and the Lantzgraue HENRY, made cruell warres; which Lantzgraue through FREDERICK's depriuing, was chosen and called Emperor: and he raising the greatest power he could (therewith to make himselfe Lord of the Empire) he met with the Emperors sonne CONRADE, neere to Francksford, who had as great an Army as his; and there they two fought (as some authors write) one of the most cruell battailes that of long time had been seen, wherein CONRADE being ouerthrown, he fled into Suenia; and HENRY remaining master of the field, was held for Emperor. And for as much as he vnderstood, that the Emperors sonne CONRADE leuyed new forces, and gathered head in Suenia, he went thither with his Army, and besieged and tooke some cities; and continuing his course of victory, laid siege to the city of Vlme; and holding it very hardly besieged, at a time when he thought that nothing could haue offended him, or defended it selfe against him; an arrow shot at randome out of the city (which was thought to be poysoned) wounded the new Emperor HENRY, so as within few daies after he died thereof, within one yeer after his election: and the princes and men of war which were with him dispersed themselues, so as it presently appeared, that the party of the Emperour FREDERICK and his sonne CONRADE would againe preuaile. But yet the electors of the Empire, within few moneths after (by the procurement of the Cardinall of Saint GEORGE called called PETER Image of gold, whom the Pope (being aduertised of the death of HENRY) sent from Lions thither, the Emperors sonne CONRADE not being able to stay or hinder the same) they met at Waringen, and chose WILLIAM, Earl of Holland, for Emperor: who, accompanied with the Electors, and other Princes and Prelates, went to Francksford, and there was crowned. And for as much as he vnderstood that CONRADE leuied a power against him, he called a Councell in the City of Vtrecht: whither came the Archbishops of Mentz, Treuier and Colen, and other Prelates; and LEVVES, Count Palatine of Rhine, with many other Earls and Deputies from more than twenty seuerall Imperiall Cities in Germany, and from some Princes also; where they handled some matters concerning his confirmation in the Empire. But CONRADE, raising a great power in Suenia and in other parts, began to war against WILLIAM; and WILLIAM leuied an Army to do the like by him: in which warre we will leaue them for this time, to speak of the Emperor, and of what successe he had in Italy; and then afterwards, when time shall serue, we will again return to this subiect.

William, Earle of Holland, chosen Emperor.

Two yeers were now expired since that the Emperor FREDERICK came to lie in his new City Victoria, before Parma; daily expecting when it would haue yeelded (for, the Besieged endured extreme famine): by reason wherof, there was not so good guard held in the Camp as there was wont to be. And GREGORY de Monte longo, the Popes Legate, who had the command of the City, as he had valiantly defended it, so he neuer let slip any oportunity to do any notable seruice; who perceiuing, and being also aduertised, what maner guard was held in the new City (without attending any other forces to ioyn with him) he resolued to salie, and to attempt it; and laid such a plot, that he performed one of the strangest exploits that hath bin seen or heard of; which was in this manner:

Certain companies of Moors and Germanes, coming from the Camp, drew neer to the City, expecting that some would come forth to skirmish with them, as at other times they vsed to do. The Legate, perceiuing this, and thinking it now a fit time to put in execution what he before had proiected, with all possible speed made all his Troops to be armed; and setting them in order, when the skirmish in the field was most hot he commanded the Ports to bee opened, and salying suddenly, charged with such resolution, that without any great adoo or difficulty hee ouerthrew those Troops; that presently retiring they turned their backs and fled: and he pursuing them came to the new City (wherein was the Emperor FREDERICK in his palace disarmed, suspecting no such matter, and so was the greatest part of his Army) and charging with such fury that the Guard could not withstand them, entred the City, putting to the sword as many as they found to bear Arms against them: and so the fight began on euery side. But as the attempt was sudden and vnexpected, so great a fear surprised them, that without making any great resistance they all fled: and the Emperor, knowing no better course to be taken, took horse, and so escaped with such as could keep with him; and all those which remained, were either slain or taken: and the Legate and his people had one of the richest preies and booties that had been seen, as well of such things as were the Emperors and of the Army, as of the Inhabitants of the City; which they presently razed and made leuell with the ground, executing as much therin as the Emperor thought to haue done in Parma. And heer was slain IOHN TVRRIO, one of the heads of the faction in Milan, who kept with the Emperor: and with the Legate was one MATHEVV VISCOVNT, who was the other: for, these two, namely, Viscounts and Turrions, were the two factions, then in the City of Milan. As soon as the fame of the taking of Victoria was spred ouer Italie, those which held for the Pope were greatly encouraged.

The City of Victoria taken and destroyed by the Parmesans.

The Emperor in his flight staied not in any place vntill he came to Cremona; but hee trusted them not so well as to come into their city, notwithstanding that they earnestly intreated him: but raising men from all parts (besides that many of the Gibelins cam voluntarily to serue him) within a small time, as a valiant man, and as if he had had a great Armie, hee came to Placencia, but besieged it not, onely spoiling the Countrey. And leauing his sonne ENCIVS, King of Sardinia, for his Lieutenant in those Towns which held for him, hee went into Tuscane, in hope to haue taken Florence, which in that Prouince was against him. But as his faction was now but little regarded or feared; so the Florentines would in no wise receiue him; but agreed with him to put all the Guelphs, which were his enemies, out of the Town, wherewith he was contented: and staying in the Countrey neer Florence, in hope to haue leuied some new Troops, and so to haue recouered the honour which he lost, newes came how that his sonne ENCIVS, with the greatest power that hee could leuie, thinking to haue done some notable peece of seruice, went towards Bologna; and the Bolognois, being aduertised thereof, with the aide of their friends, sallied forth to fight with him; and ouerthrowing him, had taken him prisoner. Which when the Emperour vnderstood, he was extreamely grieued and offended; and seeing that in Lombardy his enemies were too hard for him, and that out of Germany he was out of hope that any succour could come, for that therein his sonne CONRAD made warre against WILLIAM, Earle of Holland, who was called Emperour; he therefore resolued to go into his kingdome of Naples, in hope there to reinforce his Army, and to take some other counsell. And comming into Pulia with greater wrath then honour, by reason of such aduentures as were befallen him; he made a base sonne of his, call MANFRED, Prince of Tarent, and gaue him many places in subiection.

The death of the Emperour Frederick the Second.

Within few dayes after, he fell grieuously sicke, and his disease held him long, whereof in the end he dyed: which Historiographers relate after sundrie manners, so as it seemeth that the truth can hardly be known. Some say, that his disease killed him: others say, that beginning to recouer health, he was poisoned: others say, that his sonne MANFRED practised his death, with desire to raigne; as it after appeared. Some write, that when he saw that not only his friends failed him, who commonly change their mindes with fortune, but that also fortune had abandoned him, which hitherto had fauoured him, and vnderstanding that there were practices to poyson him, hee resolued to returne into Sicilie: but vpon the way hee fell into a burning feuer through poyson, and ended his dayes in a certaine Castle of Apulia. Some affirme that his base son MANFRED (hearing that the Physicians had abated the force of the poyson, and that there was hope of his recouerie) smothered him with a pillow. But howsoeuer, he dyed at this time, which was in the yeere of our Lord one thousand two hundred and fiftie and in the six and thirtith yeere after his election. In the time also there is euer some difference; for there bee some authors which doo reckon, but from the time of his coronation, and not before.

He was when he dyed seuen and fifty yeeres olde, and left behinde him, three sonnes, two bastards, and one legitimate: his eldest sonne CONRAD he had by IOLE, daughter to the King of Ierusalem, who in his fathers time was King of the Romanes, and inherited the Kingdomes of Sicilia and Naples, and the Duchy of Suevia. And his bastard sonne ENCIVS, whom he made King of Sardinia, liued, and died prisoner in the power of the Bolognois: whom they would neuer set at liberty for any ransome. Some authors write, that he was prisoner there twenty and odde yeeres, very well vsed, and dyed in Bologna, and there was buried: and MANFRED, the afornamed Prince of Tarent; he also had two daughters, ANNE and CONSTANCE, which married with seueral Princes.

This Prince was adorned with sundry vertues, and excellent graces: and so likewise infected with dangerous vices: but he was very valiant, and of a strong constitution, able to endure trauell, very wise, and expert in the warre, desirous of glory and fame, very liberall, and enclined to learning, and skilfull in the tongues, and could speake Greeke, Latine, Arabick, French, and Dutch very well, and delighted much in the reading of Arts and Histories. But these vertues were greatly obscured, through his vnmeasurable desire of honour, and his ambition to command and to be Lord ouer all men, and through his cruelty vsed in many exploites in the wars; destroying and rasing townes, and in shedding bloud, for he was very vindicatiue and suddain: and, aboue all, was an enemy to the Popes, and scorned their command. Hee was likewise noted of incontinency: for, besides that he had sundry wiues, he kept many concubines, and accompanied other women; all which, in Princes deserue greater reprehension: for In the higher degree, the lesse liberty. What things followed after his death you shall knowe in the next.

In maxima fortuna minima licentia est.

CARION, writing of this Prince FREDERICK, saith, that he was of a noble and generous spirit, neuer deiected nor daunted in danger, constant and temperate in all fortunes, valiant and warie in battell, actiue both with hand and counsell, bountifull, and most free from cruelty. And when as the Popes by open force, secret fraud and treachery, had sought his death, yet he suppresst his indignation, and desire of reuenge, as much as might be, being Victor; and did moderate the offenders punishments. But his many crosses and homebred conspiracies in the end did much alter him, and made him bitter, when as he was depriued of the Empire, not finding any one among his owne whom he might trust: and being often vexed and vvounded to the very heart vvith the fear of his friends falling from him, and of new conspiracies, euery thing grew suspicious vnto him, and age did make him more apt to iealousie; insomuch that he spa-spared not those who were neerest and most faithfull vnto him. But as there is no humane vertue, how great and glorious soeuer, that is perpetuall and without some blemish, the which is more apparant in great Personages than in priuate men: so I will not deny but FREDERICK was subiect to some vices, whereof I may partly impute the cause to his afflictions; the which errors at his death he did much lament.

In Constantinople BALDVVIN was Emperor, who had great warres with MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS, who was called Emperor, and succeeded ROBERT LASCARVS before mentioned, who left him Tutor ouer his sonne IOHN: but hee took the Empire to himself, murdering the pupill, and warred to make himself absolute Lord ouer all. In France at this time raigned King LEVVIS, called Saint; who, vnderstanding that the City of Ierusalem, after that the Emperor FREDERICK had recouered it, was again lost, and that the Christians in the rest of the Cities were greatly distressed; prouiding a great Armie and Nauy, departed therewith in person, and sailed into Egypt to warre vpon the Soldan; and, taking land, besieged the City of Damietta before named, and after some skirmishes and conflicts took the same, and performed other worthy aduentures, in the yeer of our Lord one thousand, two hundreth, forty and nine. But, prosecuting the warre, it pleased God that in a battell hee was afterwards ouerthrowne, and by the Soldan taken prisoner, with two of his brethren; and, to recouer their liberty, he gaue vp the City of Damietta, and the rest of what he had gotten; and so returned to his Countrey, hauing effected as little as those which went before him. The Kings of Spaine, with equal courage to any of the other Princes (but with better fortune) reconquerd the countries which the Infidels held in Spain. At that time raigned King FERDINAND, who wonne Seuil and Cordoua, and many other Towns and Cities.

THE LIFE OF CONRADE, THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND SECOND ROMAN EMPEROR; AND OF THOSE WHICH WERE called Emperors till that RODVLPHVS was chosen Emperor.

THE ARGVMENT.

FRederick being dead, the Empire being diuided between two Emperors, was infested many yeers; each of vsing all meanes to suppresse the other. First, Conrade determined to go into Italy to take possession of the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia: and going with a mighty Army, hee took those Kingdomes by force. After which conquest he died, and William remained sole Emperor; who desiring to go into Italy to be crowned by the Pope, was hindred through a tumult raised by the Frisons: and going against them with an Army, he was by them vnfortunately slain. The death of William was the occasion that the seat of the Empire was void, and that the Electors were diuided, and could not agree among themselues: for, almost euery one of them would haue such an Emperor as was best to his liking; whereof ensued great trouble and much preiudice to the Country of Germany. In Italy also were great warres between Manfrede and the Pope, King Charles and Conradin, wherof in the end King Charles had the victory. And in Germany the Electors being a long time at variance, in the end agreed to chuse Rodulph Earl of Habspurgh, when as for a long time they could neuer agree vpon any other man.

HE greatest part of the Authors which wrote the liues of the Emperours, account all the time from the death of FREDERICK (whose life we haue now written) vntill that RODVLPH, Earl of Habspurgh, was chosen Emperor (which were 23 yeers, beginning in the yeer 1250, in which FREDERICK died; and ending in the yeer 1273, in which RODVLPH was chosen) for an interregnum and vacation of the Empire; accounting none of those for Emperors which in that time were chosen and so called, for that they were chosen in competency one against another, and were not crowned by the Popes; which were WILLIAM, who was Emperor in the time of FREDERICK, and FREDERICK'S son, CONRADE, who was King of the Romans; and RICHARD, brother to the King of England; and ALONSO, King of Castile, whom the Spaniards call the Wise: all which were chosen in contention, and were competitors; wherein (in my opinion) they haue no reason, especially in what concerns WILLIAM, sith he before FREDERICK'S death was in name and possession Emperor; and albeit he was not crowned by the Pope, yet his election was approued and confirmed by him: wherfore (to yeeld euery man his title and dignity, howsoeuer it were, as also to keep the course of our history) I haue determined to treat briefly of all in such matters as concern the Empire, which is the subject of my trauell. I will likewise in summe relate what past in Italie, that so the history following may be the better vnderstood. I say then, that the Emperor FREDERICK'S death was soon published (as that of Emperors and Kings is vsuall) and caused new accidents.

In Germany his son CONRAD, who in his fathers life time was Duke of Suenia, and King of the Romans, and his heir in the Kingdoms of Sicilia and Naples, and by his mother pretended title to the Kingdome of Ierusalem, took vpon him as Emperor against WILLIAM Earle of Holland, who by the Popes commandement was chosen against his father, and possessed the empire. WILLIAM, seeing that his competitor was dead, made account to haue defeated and supplanted CONRAD: whereto he was presently countenanced and encouraged by Letters from Pope INNOCENT, who all this while was in France, and was supported by many Princes of Germany; which, forasmuch as CONRAD was excommunicate (as well as his father FREDERICK) WILLIAM pretended that CONRAD had lost his right to the Empire, and was depriued thereof by the Pope, as indeed by the Popes Sentence he was. Neuertheless, CONRAD was still called Emperor. And so they were diuided into two factions: yet WILLIAM was the mightier, for he commanded (in a manner) all the cities in Germany.

In Sicilia and Naples, FREDERICK'S base sonne MANFRED, who (some say) smothered his father, had a conceit in time to make himselfe King of Naples and Sicilia: but being a bastard he knew that the lawfull inheritance appertained to his brother CONRAD, who was in Germany, in whose name (as gouernour for him, and to his vse) he possessed himselfe of those kingdomes, excepting Naples, Capua, and some other townes, which would not receiue him: whereupon he proclaimed them traytors and rebels, and began to warre against them. In other parts of Italy the warres ceased not, notwithstanding that the Emperor was dead: for malice and hatred had taken so deepe roote betweene the Guelphes and the Gibelins, that they were neuer without warres and troubles, murthering one another: and ENCELINVS (who as I said before was of great power in Lombardy, and a faithfull seruant to FREDERICK) took part with CONRAD, as with the Emperour, and so did some others: yet the contrarie part which held for the Pope was more mightie.

CONRAD seeing the affaires of the Empire to stand in this estate, and considering that it was doubtfull holding of Germany against WILLIAM; and that Naples and Sicilia was a good portion, & came to him by inheritance from his father, raising the greatest power that he could in Suenia, leauing garrisons therein, and in such other parts as he held of the Empire, with the aid of the Duke of Bauiere, with whose sister he was married, came to take possession of those Kingdomes, as most certain and assured; and with a very good Armie came to Verona, houlding still the name of Emperour, where he was receiued: and afterwards (beeing assisted and guided by ENCELINVS, Gouerner of Lombardy) he came to certain Harbours vpon the coast of the Venecian Sea; where he was shipped by the Venecians, and thence sailed into Pulia (for, from thence there was no safe passage for him by land) and taking land with his people, he was obeied by his brother, and receiued into the Towns of Naples and Sicilia. And notwithstanding that those of the Cities of Naples and of Capua alleaged, that in that they refused to be commanded by MANFREDE, it was not in respect that they had any meaning to haue rebelled against him, but for that they vnderstood that MANFREDE meant to becom a Tyrant; Yet MANFREDE carried the matter so cunningly, that his brother was perswaded to the contrary, and therefore highly offended: by reason whereof, the Neapolitanes and Capuans durst not put themselues into his hands, but stood vpon their guard; and CONRADE with great fury held Naples besieged the space of eight months: in the end whereof he took the same through famine, and executed cruell punishment therein; and thence went to Capua, where hee did the like, and in some other places which were of their confederacy: so as from thence forth, where-soeuer he went he found no resistance, neither by Cities, Princes nor Lords.. And those which he any way suspected, he banished, and then began to war against the Lands and friends of the Church of Rome.

After this (two yeers after his coming into Italy) he fell sick and died, being poysoned in his medicines (as it was then thought) by the practice of his brother MANFREDE, who did it of purpose to haue been King. NAVCLERVS and HENRICVS MVCIVS write, that the Emperor CONRADE before he died went into Germany, leauing garrisons in Sicilie; for that he vnderstood, the Emperor WILLIAM made himself strong, and was possessed of the whole Empire, by the means of the Legates which the Pope sent thither for that purpose; and that CONRADE, coming into Germanie, ioyned with the Duke of Bauiere, and with an Army entred the iurisdiction of Ratisbone, and afterwards took the city it self, where he committed great spoils; and that WILLIAM, vnderstanding thereof, leuied such forces, that CONRADE durst not giue him battell; and that he then abandoning Germany, went to Naples, where he died. Heerof other Authors make no mention: wherefore I am of opinion, that it was before CONRADE'S first coming to Naples, and that after his coming thither he returned no more into Germany. But whether he returned into Germany or no (for, it might be) he died in the Kingdome of Naples, and left his sonne CONRADINE (who was in Suenia, being very young, and whom he had by the Duke of Bauiers sister) for heir of his estate and Kingdomes; wherein also is difference between the Authors: for, some say, that he was his sonne (which is the most likely) and others say, that he was his nephew, and the son of his elder brother HENRY, who (as we said) died in prison in the time of his father FREDERICK. But I finde it written, that HENRY maried MARGARET the daughter of LEOPOLD the Glorious, Duke of Austria, by whom he left two sons, FREDERICK & HENRY, wherof one was poisoned by CONRADE; the other by MANFRED a bastard, as competitos to the kingdoms of Sicily & Naples.

The death of the Emperor Conrade the fourth.

His sonne CONRADINE remaining his heir, and not of age fit to gouern his Kingdomes, he left him vnder the tutele and protection of his mother, and of certain Dutch Princes. And MANFREDE (as some write) for certain daies space concealed his brothers will; and though as yet he durst not take vpon him as King, yet in his nephew CONRADINE'S name he sought by all meanes to possesse himself of the whole Country.

As soon as the death of CONRADE was published in Germany, all those which had taken his part, sought to be friends with WILLIAM; who being freed from his competitor, friendly receiued them, and sought (by force or policy) to draw them to him, to the end to haue made a generall peace. At this time Pope INNOCENT (who had made his abode in France for the space of nine yeers) vnderstanding that CONRADE was dead, came presently into Italie: And MANFREDE (as he knew him to haue bin an enemy to the Emperors, FREDERICK and CONRADE; and that he alleaged, that their wils and testaments were of none effect, seeing they were by him excommunicate and depriued; and that the Kingdomes of Sicilia and Naples belonged to the Church) fainedly took part with him in Otranto; purposing to exclude those which came to gouern for the childe CONRADINE, who remained in Suenia, and by fishing in troubled water, to get the Kingdome for himself.

Pope Innocent returned out of France into Italy

The Pope being ioyfully receiued into most of the Cities in Italy, with the greatest power that he could make, took his way towards Naples, where hee was receiued; and to that place came MANFREDE, and some other Princes and Gouernours of Cities, to yeeld their obedience, as fendatories to the Church of Rome: and he, excluding CONRADIN'S tutors, thought within short time to be Lord of the greatest part of the rest. And as this was his drift, so after that the Pope had confirmed him in his estate, and had bestowed other fauours vpon him; hee began to publish the discord openly, which he before had sowen in secret, and to shew himself enemie to the Pope: but before that it took any effect, the Pope died in Naples, hauing bin so eleuen yeeres and halfe, in the yeere of our Lord 1254.

The institution of the Cardinals Hats and robes, by Pope Clement, and riding vpon foote-cloathes.

This Pope gaue order that the Cardinals should ride on their foot-cloathes, and weare red Hats and Robes, which they vse at this day; to the end that as they did excell other men in dignitie and preheminence, so they should goe different in apparel, and thereby be knowne from other men. Presently vpon the death of Pope INNOCENT, MANFREDE publishing that his Nephew CONRADINE was dead, cladding himselfe in mourning attire, proclaimed himself King of Naples and Sicilia; and raising forces, drew the Africane Moores, which dwelt in Nuceria, to his seruice; and suddenly set vpon those places which held for the Pope: so as ALEXANDER succeeding INNOCENT the Fourth, sent a Cardinall whose name was OCTAVIVS to Naples, against MANFREDE, who proceeded so farre as to excommunicate him: but MANFREDE, who now was called King of both the Sicilies, took such order with the Legate that he constrained him to shut vp himselfe in Naples; and so was he Master of the field, and not onely in that prouince, but in all Italy sought to raise dissension and discord, shewing himselfe to be of the faction of the Gibelins, with whose aide he made himselfe mightie, and was principally assisted by the great tyrant ENCELINVS. In Florence, in Lombardy, and in other parts, happened many great accidents, which I haue no time to relate, being to returne to my History of the liues of the Emperours: neuertheless it shall be expedient to declare what end MANFREDE and his Nephew CONRADINE made; who was also called King of both the Sicilies; and at that time, by reason of his nonage, was in his mothers keeping in her estate of Sueuia; which gaue oportunitie to MANFREDE to rise, as he did, with the kingdome.

The Emperour WILLIAM, seing in what estate Italy stood, and being now Lord of all Germany in peace, desiring to come into Italy to visit the lands of the Empire, which had recouered liberty through the long absence of the Emperours; and likewise to be crowned by the hands of Pope ALEXANDER, he summoned a Councel to be held in the citie of Colen: and hauing therein determined of his iourney, he was aduertised that the prouince of Friseland was vp in Armes, and rebelled against him; and that not content therewith, they had inuaded Holland, where they had done great harme, by taking and carrying away whatsoeuer they found. WILLIAM, to suppresse this rebellion, resolued to goe in person to bring the Frisons to obedience, which were such men, and so many, that he otherwise knew not how to bridle them; and it seemed no sound course for him to goe into Italy, and to leaue Germany in an vprore. And so marching with his Army against the Frisons, which lay encamped not farre from him, as it was in the winter, and in that country are many Lakes and Moorish places, which then were frosen, the Emperour with one or two with him, or else alone on horsebacke, went to view his enemies Campe, or to view some ground where his own Army might lodge: and passing ouer a lake, his horse slipt, and fell with him, and the Ice breaking, his horse and himselfe were so pestred in the water, that they could not get out of it: which a company of Prisons (which lay vndiscouered in an ambush) perceiuing, sallied out, and vnknowne slew the Emperour, thinking that they had slaine but some meane horseman, without being perceiued by any man in his Camp, neither by them which were with him, or else they durst not reueale it: and so hee lay vnseene in the water, vntill that afterwards he was found and knowne by his enemies.

The Emperor William, Earle of Holland slaine and drowned.

This happened in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, two hundred, fiftie and six: in the eight and twentith yeere of his age, and the seuenth of his raigne. And as he was mist in his Campe, and no man knew what became of him, nor what was befalne him (men being of sundrie opinions) some imagining that he was gone, and had abandoned them, and others were of other opinions; at last they were certified of the trueth by their enemies. Whereupon the Army disbanded, and went euery man whither hee listed: in this manner ended the aspiring thoughts, life, and raigne of the Emperour WILLIAM, whom his sonne FLORIS, which then was a child, succeeded in the estate of Holland, and the rest: who afterwards made cruell warre against the Frisons, in reuenge of his fathers death; who vntill then lay in a poore Sepulture. In Sicilie and Naples MANFREDE grew daily more mightie, and was called King.

The discord and diuision, which (as we sayd) was in the Empire between FREDERICK and and WILLIAM, and afterwards between WILLIAM and CONRADE, FREDERICK'S sonne, and that which we will declare which hapned after his decease, was the beginning and originall cause why the Empire lost in those times great part of the authority, power and reputation, which it before inioied, and that some Cities in Italie recouered liberty, and were exempt from the Empire, and that others fell into the hands of Tyrants, as it afterwards ensued. For notwithstanding that there afterwards were valiant and mighty Emperours, yet all matters were so corrupt and out of order in the Empire, as it could not be reduced to the antient policie; neither did the Electours and Princes of Germany (in whom consisteth the chiefest strength of the Empire) yeeld such obedience and fealtie to them, as their ancestors had done, making themselues through these vacancies and dissensions, free, and of greater power, and the Emperours became poore, of lesse account, and were lesse respected by them. I say then, that as the Princes Electors of the Empire were certified of the death of the Emperour WILLIAM (which were as all men knowe) the Duke of Saxony, the Count Palatine of Rhine, the Marquesse of Brandenburgh, the Archbishops of Mentz, Colen and Trenier, and (when they cannot agree) the King of Bohemia, they began to consult about chusing of a new Emperour, first writing the one to the other, and afterwards meeting in Franckford, where they could not agree, for there were many Competitors, and the matter was carried by bribes, gifts and sinister meanes.

The cause of the declining of the Germane Empire.

Princes Electors.

Comming in the end with great difficulty to make the election, vpon Twelfth day, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, two hundred, fifty and seauen: the voices were diuided into two parts; the Duke of Saxony, the Archbishop of Trenier, and the Marquesse of Brandenburgh chose ALONSO King of Castile: and EBERARD Archbishop of Mentz, CONRADE Archbishop of Colen, and LEWES Count Palatine of the Rhine, gaue their voices to RICHARD Duke of Cornewall, brother to the King of England. In this manner they parted diuided, either party holding him for Emperor whom they had chosen: but most men affirmed that it was no election, for it seemeth not that the King of Bohemia gaue his voice, or was present at the election, or would ioine with either of the parties, but was singular in his voice, seeking to haue been Emperour himselfe. Those which chose ALONSO and held with him, sent him their Ambassadors (which were the Bishops of Spire and Constance) to giue him intelligence of his election, desiring him to prepare himselfe to come into the Empire: at their comming into Castile they were ioifully receiued by the King, who being very glad of their Ambassage, accepted the election: but he being busied in the warres against the Moores (from whom hee had a little before taken the Towne of Niebla and other places) hee could not then come into Germany: but writing his letters to the Princes Electors, he dispatched the Ambassadours (giuing them and sending to the rest many iewels and great rewards) and so they returned very well content. But King ALONSO his going into Germany, through many occasions which were offered in Castile, as well against the Moores (from whom he twice wan the Citie of Xeres, the Citie of Murcia and other places) as for that his brother PHILIP with-drew himselfe from his seruice, his iourney was a long time deferred. The other part of the Princes Electors, which had chosen the King of Englands Brother, sent him also a solemne Ambassage; and he came into Germany, and with the ayde of his Brother the King, came to Aken, and there was crowned by those which had chosen him, and he afterwards was possessed of some Townes and Cities vpon the Rhines side: and so began very great warres and troubles in Germany, some holding for RICHARD, and others for ALONSO; others (which were the greatest number) admitted neither the one nor the other, holding the Empire for voyde: and so miserable Germany was set on fire with cruell warre, which continued the space of fifteene or sixteene yeeres, in which time, RICHARD dyed out of possession of the Empire, and King ALONSO could neuer come thither, by reason of sundry accidents which happened in Castile, as in the Spanish Chronicles doth appeare.

At the same time BALDVVIN the Emperour of Constantinople being vnable to make his partie good, against MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS, (who by making away the two sonnes of THEODORE LASCARVS, gat the Empire to himself) fledde from Constantinople, and MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS had the Empire, and so it returned to the Greeke nation, hauing bin aboue seuenty yeeres gouerned by the Latins: the first that had the same was called BALDVVIN, and so was he which lost it, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1260.

At this time also came Ambassadours to Pope ALEXANDER, from CONRADINE Duke of Sueuia (who was called, and ought to haue been, King of Sicilia and Naples) entreating his his fauour in his behalfe against MANFREDE, who vsurped the said kingdomes; but it could take no effect at that time; for MANFREDE was now growne so mightie, that the Pope was not able to make head against him: and besides the kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia, he was Lord of Florence and other townes in Italy. Within few daies after this dyed Pope ALEXANDER, hauing held the chayre about seuen yeeres, with troubles and warres in little prosperitie. This Pope canonized Saint CLARE, of the order of Saint FRANCIS, for a Saint: and he being dead, the Patriarch of Ierusalem (a French man borne) was chosen Pope, and called VRBANE the Fourth; who considering what great power the Tirant MANFRED had got in Italy, (for what his father held therein, was at his douotion.) And seeing that there came no sufficient ayde from Germany, and moreouer hauing no meaning to approoue the succession of CONRADES son CONRADINE, for that his ancestors had bin antient enemies to the Church of Rome, but chiefly for that he had small confidence in his power, and for other occasions which I forbeare to write; by the aduice of his Cardinals he sent his Ambassadours to LEVVES the French King, desiring him to send his brother CHARLES Earle of Prouence and Aniow with an Army in reliefe of the Church, and to expell the Tirant MANFRED out of the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia, and that then he would giue the same to him in fee, as the Churches inheritance. The French King willingly gaue eare to the Popes Ambassage, and yeelding to his demaund, offred aide, and to send him into Italy: and so CHARLES began to prouide necessaries for his iourney, which Pope VRBANE could neuer see take effect, for he was intercepted by death in the citie of Perugia, in the third yeere of his papacy: in all which time (by reason of factions and partialities) he neuer came to Rome.

Pope Alexander canonized Saint Clare for a Saint.

Pope Vrbane the fourth, called the Duke of Aniow into Italie, to make warre in Naples and Sicillia.

This Pope instituted the feast of Corpus Christi, which is celebrated by the Church of Rome with great solemnity, vnto this day, being first inuented by the famous Doctor THOMAS of AQVINE, a Frier of the order of Saint DOMINICKE, who florished in those times. At that time also florished S. BONAVENTVRE, a Doctor and Frier of the order of Saint FRANCIS. VRBANE being dead, GVIDO Cardinall of Sulconia borne in Narbone in France, was chosen Pope, and called CLEMENT the Fourth; in whose time at his instant entreatie, the French Kings brother, or cosine germane, Earle of Aniow came into Italy with a great Army, to make a conquest of the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia from MANFRED, who was already called king of Naples and Sicilia; and there passed betweene them many conflicts and encounters, which I ouerpasse: CHARLES beeing assisted by the faction of the Guelphes, at length neere to the Citie of Beneuent, MANFRED and hee, with power against power fought a battaile, wherein MANFRED was ouerthrowne and slaine, after that hee had seene CHARLES cast to the earth, and his Army in a manner wholly ouerthrowne, but yet in the end CHARLES had the victorie; wherein he was much assisted by the counsell and help of Iohn de Rata, Earle of Caserta, who sought reuenge for that MANFRED had rauished his wife. Thus MANFRED lost his life with his kingdomes, the which he had gotten by fraud, treachery and parricide.

The feast of Corpus Christi instituted by pope Vrbane the fourth.

Manfrede king of both Sicilies, ouerthrown and slain by Charls duke of Aniow.

This ouerthrow and death of MANFRED caused a great alteration in Italie, for the faction of the Guelphes euery where preuailed (in a manner) in all the cities of Italie, being fauoured by the new king of Sicilia, against the Gebilins. And in short space king CHARLES was possessed of the kingdoms of Naples and Sicilia, being first crowned in Rome king of both the kingdoms; and in acknowledgment of the fee, he was bound to pay yeerly to the Church of Rome, threescore thousand duckats, or crowns of Gold. In this manner, the state of Prouence, whose head is the City of Marselles, was vnited to the kingdom Naples, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1266.

In the time of these alterations in Italie, Germany was still troubled about the election of an Emperour: and whereas the king of Englands brother RICHARD, who contended with ALONSO for the Empire, at this time died, if ALONSO had then come into Germany he might easily haue obtained the Empire, seeing his competitor was deceased: but by reason of ciuill warres against the Moores, he could neuer haue oportunity to come thither: and his brother PHILIP, and other great men of Castile, left his seruice, and ouerran his countrey. Germany being thus without an head, endured great misery, aswell for this cause, as through the great warres which the king of Hungary made against the king of Bohemia, and other Princes, vpon sundry occasions. CHARLES the new king of Sicilia liuing in this prosperity, all those which in Italie were of the faction of the Gibelins, sent to solicite CONRADINE Duke of Sueuia, who was also king of Naples and Sicilia, (as sonne of the Emperour CONRADE, and Nephew to to the Emperour FREDERICK) to come, and reconquer his kingdomes, and that they all would helpe and serue him in that action: whereto CONRADINE (as a courageous young man) soon agreed, and began to gather forces and to trie his friends, whereto he was also perswaded & encouraged by HENRY the king of Castiles brother, who was banished from his brother for some factions and confederacies which he had made against him; And at that time was gouernor, and a Senator of Rome, made by Pope CLEMENT; which dignity he obtained (after that he had wandred through England, France and Germany) at the request of king CHARLES of Naples, by reason of his affinity, and the Popes fauor, to whose court he came, lying then in Viterbo, and the Pope made him a Senator of Rome, which then was the highest dignity and command therein.

This HENRY was a man of so great valour, and therewith so politick, that he wholly commanded the City; and being so, he induced CONRADINE to come into Italy (for hee was his kinsman, and had found him his friend at his being in Germany) promising and putting him in hope, that he should not only haue the kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia (which were his by inheritance) but should also be Emperour of Rome; for he would receiue him into the Citie. Finally, CONRADINE moued by these Letters and messages, but reposing his chiefest confidence in the Gebelins, came into Italy with tenne thousand the most expert men of warre that hee could get; to whom many of the Gebelins reserted, and hee was receiued and lodged in Verona, whither the Sienois and Pisans sent their Ambassadours (and many other Cities wherein the Gebelins were masters) exhorting him to proceede.

Conradine his comming into Italy against the Duke of Aniow.

When King CHARLES was aduertised hereof, he went from Tuscane, where he then remained, into his kingdoms; leauing good garrisons in those townes which held for him; and a gouernour with the title of Marshall. And HENRY the Kings brother of Castile, who was then in Rome, whither CONRADINE was trauailing, openly shewed himselfe for him, being of power able to doe so, whether the Pope would or not; who fauoured CHARLES his party, as a King whom hee had made. But the factions in Italy made all poore, and inconstant. To be short, after other matters which befell CONRADINE by the way, he being come neere to the City of Arezzo, fought a battaile with the Marshall whom King CHARLES had left in those parts. And notwithstanding that the Marshall and his people fought valiantly, yet CONRADINE was Victor and the Marshall was slain in the battaile, and his party ouerthrown; whereby CONRADINE wonne so great credit and reputation, that if he would haue stayed in those quarters, many townes would haue yeelded vnto him: but being solicited by Letters, and messages from HENRY in Rome, he took his way thitherwards, passing neere by Viterbo, where Pope CLEMENT lay, who as an enemy to wars, and bearing of Armes, was very sory for what passed: and comming to Rome, he was solemnly receiued with all the ceremonies accustomed, and HENRY calling him Emperor, lodged him as one in the Capitoll.

After some few daies stay in Rome, he departed towards Naples, accompanied with the said HENRY, to finde out king CHARLES; and HENRY left in his place and office in Rome, one GVIDO FERRETANVS, a man whom he much trusted. King CHARLES hauing already intelligence of CONRADINES comming, and seeing that by delaies he daily lost more and more, notwithstanding that he had no equall forces, yet he resolued to end the controuersy by a battaile, which by CONRADINE (who presumed much vpon the multitude and valor of his souldiers) was chiefly desired, so as the one Army drawing neer the other, neer to Alua, CHARLES knowing how to take benefit of the ground where he was encampt, marshalled his troups in such manner that he might shadow the greatest part of his Army behinde a Hill, and so the fight beganne and continued aboue three houres: in the end whereof, CHARLES his troups being neer ouerthrown, he brake out of his Ambuscado, and charged with such fury, that he forced his enemies to turne their backs, and obtained the victory: And CONRADINE, HENRY and FREDERICK, who (I know not by what title) was called Duke of Austria, escaped by flight. But through sundry casualties they all three within few daies after fell into his hands, and he cruelly executing the law of Armes, made the heads of king CONRADINE, and of FREDERICK Duke of Austria to be striken off, contenting himselfe to hold HENRY prisoner for their neerenesse in blood.

A battaile betweene Charles of Aniow king of Sicilia, and Conradine duke of Suevia.

Conradine duke of Suevia and king of both the Sicilies put to death by Charles duke of Aniow.

Some Authors write, that when these Princes were brought before CHARLES; he not content with the glory of the victory (which had been the part of a noble and generous minde) insulted insulted proudly ouer them. Then by the barbarous and wicked cruelty of Pope CLEMENT the fourth, who being demanded his aduice touching the prisoners answered; The life of CONRADINE is the death of CHARLES, and the death of CONRADINE is the life of CHARLES: whereupon, by a neuer heard-of example of cruelty in the Christian world and vnworthy the name of a King, he put them to death, as hath been said; The Earle of Flanders telling him in vaine, that moderation and clemency did become a generous conqueror. So in the end by the execution of CONRADINE, a most generous and innocent yong Prince, the most antient and noble family of the Dukes of Suevia hauing managed the affaires of the Empire and their owne at home and abroad, both in peace and warre, wisely and valiantly, was by the practice of Popes extinct, when it had raigned in the Empire, one hundred and fifteen yeers, and held the realmes of Sicilia and Naples, 76.

By this meanes king CHARLES wonne great reputation, for he had ouerthrown and slain two kings, MANFRED and CONRADINE. And within short space all those townes which held for CONRADINE hearing of his death, reduced themselues to CHARLES his subjection: and so in Sicilia, Pulia, Calabria and in all Italy, the faction of the Guelphs recouered the vpper hand. So as poore CONRADINE in hope to haue gotten the kingdome of Naples, lost his life, and therewith his estate of Suevia, whereof he was assured: and in him ended the line of the house of Suevia, for he left no heire; and that state was lost, most of the Cities therein making themselues Imperiall: yet RODVLPH and his sonne IOHN were afterwards called Dukes of Suevia.

The victorious triumphant king CHARLES, with Pope CLEMENT's leaue and authority, went to Rome, to execute the office of Senator, which HENRY had lost, and to pacifie the factions which were in the City; and the Pope from Viterbo where he made his residence, neuer ceased to procure peace and concord between the Cities of Italy, and to pacifie king CHARLES: but his desire took no effect, for he was interrupted by death, which ouertook him in the end of the yeer 1278, hauing been Pope little more then 3 yeers, and was reconed amongst the Saints.

Pope CLEMENT the fourth being dead, the Cardinals agreed so ill about chusing him a successor, that for the space of two yeers there was no Pope. What hapned in the meane time, is too long to be written, wherefore I leaue it apart: amongst which Saint LEWES King of France went against the kingdom and Citie of Tunis, where he died of the Plague. His going thither was with an intent to haue gone from thence to the conquest of Ierusalem, whereto hee was induced by Pope CLEMENT before his death. Before the Popes death, EDVVARD King of England went to the same seruice with about two hundred thousand men, which from all parts of Christendome vowed to goe that voyage, but all was afterwards. Two yeers being past that the Cardinals could not agree, by their common consent in the yeer 1270, THEOBALD a Cardinall was chosen, and called GREGORY the tenth, who was a Legate with King EDVVARD in that enterprise: which EDVVARD performed as little in that action, as well by reason of King LEWES his long abode before Tunis, where he died, for whom King EDVVARD stayed; as also for that the Popes seate was voide the space of two yeeres, which put all out of order, and caused him and such as were with him, to endure great want and penury: and for that at this time also died the Patriarch of Ierusalem; by whose counsell he began and continued that warre, and in the end THEOBALD: who was the Apostolick Legate in this journey, came to be Pope, wherfore King EDVVARD also returned to his countrey, without effecting what he desired.

King Edward the first of England returned from the war in the Holy-land.

When THEOBALD, or P. GREGORY the tenth, being in Aken was aduertised of his election; with the aide of King EDVVARD, who furnished him with men and shipping, hee came into Italy, and was joyfully receiued and entertained by King CHARLES of Naples, through whose countrey he passed, who accompanied him some daies iourneys; and comming to Viterbo, where the Cardinals attended his comming, he was crowned after the accustomed manner: and he then presently summoned a generall Councell, First to procure the reformation and peace of the Church: Secondly, that an Emperour should be chosen; for Germany was brought to ruine through ciuill dissension and want of iustice: and Thirdly, to take order for the conquest of the Holy-land, appointing Lions in France to be the place where this Councel should be held; whither he presently went, first settling the best peace he could in Italy, principally between the Genoais and the Venecians, two mighty Common-wealths in those dayes who made most cruell warre. This being done he came to Lions, from whence he he sent to the Princes Electors, commanding them to meete, and to make choise of an Emperor. To this Councel at Lions, came PALEOLOGVS the Emperor of Constantinople, whom the Pope confirmed in his Empire, notwithstanding that he obtained the same by indirect meanes; and hee and the Prelates which came with him, in the name of the Greeke Church, submitted themselues to the Councell in certaine pointes, wherein the Greeks dissented from the Latines: but they obserued the same as little as at other times they had done.

The Princes Electors met at Franckford, to treate of the election of an Emperour; seeing how many yeers the Empire was voide, for now twenty yeers were fully expired since the death of FREDERICK, in all which time, Germany was neuer free from factions and partialities about the Empire, and thirteene or fourteene yeeres since the Emperor WILLIAM died, so that Germany lay abandoned without an head or soueraign Lord: for RICHARD brother to the King of England, and ALONSO King of Castile, were chosen in discord and dissent of voyces; and RICHARD within short space died, and King ALONSO could neuer come to enioy the Empire.

All the Princes Electors meeting, spent three yeeres before they could agree about the Election; for either of them would haue him to be Emperour in whom they thought to haue greatest interest: some alleaged that no election could be made, for that King ALONSO of Castile was chosen; and the same King sent his Proctors to protest that he prepared himselfe speedily to come vnto the Empire: there were others that hindred the election, for that they had vsurped the lands and possessions belonging to the Empire, and were in feare to lose the same: finally, the matter was very confused and out of order; but in the end they agreed: and notwithstanding that OTHO CARVS King of Bohemia, had won the most part of the Electors, and assured himselfe that he should haue been chosen in this great confused Anarchy during the vacancy, Italy being on fire with intestine combustions and seditions, and Germany tost with old hatreds and new alterations, when as all things threatned a fearefull ruine, then did the Electors chose RODVLPH Earle of Habspurgh and Hessia, who in line Masculine descended lineally from the father to the sonne, from PHAROMOND King of the Francons: others haue written (amongst which is VOLATERRANVS) that this RODVLPH was descended from the house and family of the PERLEONES, or LEONES in Rome, an antient house of Earles, and that one of them vpon certain occasion left his countrey, and went into Ergonia, and there built the Castle of Habspurgh, from whence descend the Earles of Habspurgh: which they say was in the yeer 1150. But it cannot be so, for the Towne and Castle of Habspurgh, from whence these Earles are descended, is not in Ergouia, but another much more antient, and farre distant from that, whereof long before the time that they speake of, the Earls of Habspurgh were Lords: And IOHN STABIVS setteth down a pedegree of nine Kings and fourteen Earles before this RODVLPH, of whom we now treate: who besides that he was chosen and crowned Emperor, and gouerned the Empire the space of eighteen yeeres, came (through want of Heires) to be Duke of Austria: and that house hath continued in that linage from that time vntill this day, and hath produced nine Empetors, and a great number of dukes: from which RODVLPH the First, is descended RODVLPH the Second now raigning in the yeere one thousand six hundred and foure. In Constantinople still raigned MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS.

THE ARGVMENT.

WHen Rodulph's election was published, all Germany reioyced, seeing an end of so many troubles: hee was according to the custome crowned in Aken, but would neuer go to be crowned in Italy, alleaging that all the Emperors which went thither, either died there, or returned with great losse. He had great warres with the King of Bohemia, who by his wifes perswasion, violating his faith, rebelled against the Emperor to whom he had sworn fealty and obedience. After this warre, the Emperor addicted himselfe to maintaine iustice; and taking no care to come into Italy, contenting himselfe with their tribute, he held all Germany in peace, a thing which no Emperor euer had done. Hee subdued all those which rebelled, and being old departed out of this life. Hee made alliance with many great Lords by meanes of his daughters, for in his sonnes hee was not very fortunate.

AS soon as it was published that RODVLPH was chosen, there was great ioy in all the towns and Cities of Germany, and by all men which desired peace and iustice, as well through the desire they had to haue an Emperor, as for that RODVLPH was a man much esteemed, and the hope they conceiued that he would proue a good Prince; for he was held to be a man of great iudgement and very valiant, whereof he had made great proofe both in peace and warre, in the seruice of FREDERICK the Second, who was his God-father, and afterwards in the warre against the King of Bohemia, But the Ambassadours of the King of ALONSO, and likewise of the King of Bohemia, departed very much discontented from Franckford, making first their protestations. Earle RODVLPH had little apprehension thereof when the newes was brought him of his Election, who at that time lay before the City of Basil, besieging the same, wherein were two factions of the Psitaci and the Stelleferi, whereof the one had driuen the other out of the City: and he tooke vpon him the charge to restore the banished to their houses; with whose ayde, and the ayde of his friends and subiects, he besieged that City: but being aduertised of his election, he came to the Citie of Aken, and there according to the accustomed manner was crowned; whither came Ambassadors from the Princes of Germany to congratulate his election: but neither the King

The Emperour Rodulph crowned in Aken.

King of Bohemia, nor the Duke of Bauiere would obey, or hold him for Emperour, as What ensued, you shall vnderstand hereafter. After the coronation, he and the Electors sent their Ambassadors to Pope GREGORY the Tenth, who then was at the Councell of Lions in France, who being very glad of his election, confirmed the same, and promised to giue him the Imperiall Crown, if he would come into Italie; but he would neuer go to be crowned in Rome, neither come into Italie: It is written that being demanded wherfore he would not go thither, for answere he recited one of Esops fables, saying that the Lyon as king of all other beasts being sick, would haue them all come to visite him, and they went & comforted him; but the Fox of purpose staying to be last, and being come to the mouth of the Caue wherein the Lion lay, would not enter; and the cause being demanded, answered, that the most part of the foot-steps which he saw, were of such as went in, but he could hardly perceiue that any of them came forth againe; whereby he knew that the most part of them remained foode for the sick Lion: wherfore he would not put his life in such hazard. After this manner said RODVLPH it befell the Emperors his predecessors, in their iourneys into Italy, for they either died there, or returned with great losse: wherefore vpon this consideration, he would neuer come into Italie to be crowned, which was the cause that many Cities exempted themselues, and became free.

A tale of a Lion

The cause why the Emperor Rodulph would not come into Italie.

The new Emperour through a desire to reform the estate of the Empire, summoned a Diet or Parliament to be held in the City of Norembergh, whither came all the Princes in person; or else such as could not come, sent their Agents or deputies, excepting the King of Bohemia, and the Duke of Bauiere, who neither came nor sent, neither would they acknowledge him for their Emperour: Whereupon RODVLPH by the consent of all those which were present, prescribed them a certaine time, within which they should restore and deliuer vp the Lands and possessions which they had vsurped in the time of the Empires vacancie, as well such as appertained to the Empire, as to other particular persons; and charged them to make their appearance within the time limited, in the Citie of Augsburgh. The time being expired, and the Emperour being comn thither, all came or sent their lawfull excuses: And notwithstanding that the Duke of Bauiere came not, yet he sent by his Agents, to yeeld his obedience to the Emperour; but in the behalfe of the King of Bohemia it was not so, for he sent his Ambassadours, amongst which was a Bishoppe, to whom publike audience being giuen, the Bishoppe began a long set Oration, wherein he sought to proue, that the election of RODVLPH was of no effect, and that the King of Bohemia was not bound to yeeld him obedience, neither to acknowledg him for his Lord: Wherewith he and the Princes present were so much displeased, that without permitting him to end his discourse, they commanded him presently to depart the Court and City; and so he and his associats departed. In that Councell the King of Bohemia was proclaimed a Rebell and disobedient, and as such, they were to proceed both against him and his estate: The Emperour presently sent the Burgraue of Norembergh, (which is a dignity in Germany) to require him to surrender the Duchy and states of Austria, Carinthia, Carniola, and Stiria, which he vsurped. But the King neither would, neither had any meaning to do so, and therefore tooke Arms to make resistance: And the Councell being ended, the Emperour likewise leuied an Army against him: What ensued, wee will tell you after that we shall haue related what end the King of Castile had in the Empire, which passed in this manner.

ALONSO King of Castile vnderstanding that RODVLPH of Habspurgh, was chosen Emperour, was very sory; and after many consultations held, and a peace established with the King of Granada, he departed from Spaine, purposing to haue been Emperour, and sent souldiers and other prouision before him, by sea and land to the City of Marselles; for he held the Kings of France and of Naples for his friends and kinsmen: and so departing from Castile, accompanied with his brother EMANVEL, and other great men in the moneth of March in the yeer 1275, leauing his eldest sonne HERNANDES Gouernour in his absence, he came into France, with an intent to haue proceeded on his iourney. What ensued, and how he passed, Histories record not: the effect is, that at the same time the Pope GREGORY hauing dissolued the generall Councell, and returning into Italie, met with King ALONSO, at a place called Bellocadoro; where the King shewed himselfe discontent, for that the Pope (to his preiudice) had consented to the election of an Emperor, he pretending to be already lawfully chosen: but the Pope so excused himselfe, and gaue the other so good counsell, that he perswaded him to giue ouer his challenge, and to returne to Castile, which was greatly furthered through the newes of the death of this valiant Sonne, and of the incursions made into his Countrey by the Moores, and of the practises of his second son called SANCHES, (who afterwards was King) who then took vpon him the gouernment of the Kingdom, and sought to haue succeeded by depriuing the sonnes of DON HERNANDO his late brother of those and other great difficulties (whereof the King was aduertised) he returned into Castile, where he afterwards liued in great trouble, for his son SANCHES rebelled with the Kingdom; only the Cities and Kingdoms of Seuil and Murcia were faithfull vnto him; till about 9 or 10 yeers after he died in Seuil, in the yeer 1284. and the said SANCHES succeeded him in the Kingdom. Pope GREGORY after his departure from king RODOLPH, trauailing through Italy towards Rome, died in Arezzo, and in his place was chosen PETER TARENTASIVS Cardinall of Hostia a Dominican frier, and was called INNOCENT the fift: in whose time the truce between the Venecians and Genoais being expired, cruell warre began between them: the Pope sought to make peace between them and the other citys in Tuscane, Pisa, Florence, Lucia, Siena, and the rest which were in armes; King CHARLES of Naples also interposing his authority. But before he could effect it he died, hauing been Pope 5 monoths and two daies only; to whom succeeded OTHO BONI a Cardinal, and was called ADRIAN the fift, who was Pope but forty daies: after him was chosen one PETER, born in Lisbon, and was called IOHN the 12, who was a great Physician, and wrote of Physick: and although he was a great clerk, yet was he nothing expert in gouerning his charge, so as if he had liued long, he would haue shewed his imperfections, but in the 8 moneth of his Papacy (he being in Viterbo) the roofe of a chamber fell vpon him: and although he was taken out aliue, yet he was so bruized, as he died within 7 daies. He being dead, Cardinal IOHN GAETANVS was chosen, and called NICHOLAS the third, with whom, and with all the rest, the Emperor held friendship, whom we left making preparation for his wars against the king of Bohemia, which he was constrained to defer for a space, for that LEWIS Count Palatine of the Rhine, and the Marquess of Baden, would not (within the time limited) surrender such lands and townes as they had taken, at what time the Empire was void: wherfore he went in person to recouer them by force with much trouble and danger. This being done, he marched first with his forces to make war against the D. of Bauiere, for that he performed not what he had sworn by his Ambassadors and Proctors, but aided and fauored the K. of Bohemia. The Emperor with a mighty Army entring his countrey, slew many of his people, and by force took and ruined some towns, so as he compelled the Duke to submit himself. The Emperor marching further, entred Austria, which OTHO CLARVS had taken, and therein had placed Bohemian garrisons: neuertheless some castles yeelded, and others were taken by force; and he afterwards besieged the city of Vienna, to the relief whereof, after the siege had lasted the space of 7 weeks, the King of Bohemia came with a great power, which he had leuied in his kingdom, and in Moravia and other countries: and to the Emperors campe came against him the King of Hungary, who was an enemy to the King of Bohemia, and had taken some towns from him: the two Armies being come, the one neer the other, and in a readiness to haue fought; certain Monks and Friers became mediators betwixt the King and the Emperor, who vsed such meanes, that a peace was concluded: and the Emperor pardoned the King, vpon condition that he should presently surrender the estates of Austria, Carinthia, Stiria, and Carniola to the Emperor; and to the King of Hungary, what he had taken from him; and that the Emperor should confirm vnto him the Kingdom of Bohemia, and Moravia, for which he should come in person to yeeld obedience, and to be sworne after the accustomed manner. All which the King (seeing no other remedy) yeelded to performe, being at the point to haue lost all the rest: but hee instantly requested, that he might doe his homage in some secret place, for as he was a very haughty minded man, so did it extremely grieue him to kneele to a man to whom he had giuen pay; and thinking that the Emperour would haue performed what hee requested, forasmuch as he stayed for him in a close Tent, hee came, and kneeling downe before the Emperour to doe him homage; the Tent was so artificially made, that it fell open, in such manner, as he was seene by the whole Army, wherewith he was much discontented.

This agreement being made, and the King returned into his countrey, he was by his wife the Queene very ill entertained; for being a vaine proud woman, she told him that hee was not worthy the name of a King, neither to weare a crown, since he had lost so great estates without the hazard of one battaile; and had humbled himselfe disarmed, before him who had been his seruant seruant; hauing an Army of so good men to take his part as he had: and since that he had made so shamefull a peace, he should now let her haue his Army, and she would by war recouer what he had lost by auoiding it. These his wiues speeches, and such like, which she vsed at other times, added to the sorrow for what he had lost, did so disquiet him, that he repented him of what he had done; and rebelling, meant to wipe away this reproach by Arms: Whereupon he drew his forces to an head, and such places as were not resigned, he repayred, and fortified; and went into Austria to recouer what he had already surrendred; which he did with such expedition, that he took many places there. When the Emperor vnderstood of the King of Bohemia's proceedings, he with no lesse expedition raised his forces, and with some Princes of the Empire came against him with a great power; who resolutely stayed in the field to giue him battel, which befell vpon the six and twentith day of August, in the yeer of our Lord, 1277: which battell was sharpe and cruel, and the king in the middest of the troupes, being deadly wounded by one BERTOLD a fauorite of the Emperors, fell from his horse: Which sudden accident, together with the enemies force, was the cause of his peoples ouerthrow, and that the Emperour being victorious was master of the field; and the King was afterwards found there, as naked as he was born of his Mother.

A Battaile betweene the Emperor and the king of Bohemia, wherein the Bohemians were ouerthrowne, and their King slaine.

The Emperor hauing obtained this notable victory, followed not the same with such rigor and cruelty as he might haue done; for the King leauing a sonne called WENCESLAVS, the Emperor married him to his daughter IVDITH, and inuested and confirmed him in the kingdomes of Bohemia and Moravia: and for as much as he was but a childe, he gaue the gouernment both of his person and estate, to the Marquesse of Brandenburgh: and so had RODOLPH the Duchy of Austria, and other estates thereto appertaining; which hee afterwards gaue to his eldest son ALBERT, who in processe of time came to be Emperor.

After the war of Bohemia, the Emperor sought to settle iustice, and to free the country from theeues and rebels, by reason of the late troubles; amongst which, one was so audacious that he shamed not to say that he was the Emperor FREDERICK the Second, who died in Italy; stoutely maintaining himselfe to be the same: the cause whereof was, for that the common people neuer certainly knowe what passeth; and some reported that the Emperour FREDERICK was not dead but lay hidden. This rumor was so generally diuulged and beleeued, that this man gathered so many vnto him, that he took some Cities, and so much troubled the Emperor, that he was constrained to leuie an Army against him, by which this counterfeit FREDERICK was ouerthrowne and taken prisoner; and afterwards burnt by the Emperors commandement, and the rest of his confederats were seuerely punished: and so he was generally obeyed.

A counterfeit Emperor.

But as for matters of Italy, he tooke no care to goe thither in person, but sought to gouerne by his Vicars and Lieutenants, euer maintaining peace with the Popes; contenting himselfe that some Cities in Lombardy, and others which acknowledged the Empire, repaired vnto him and paid their customes and tributes, whereof he was very greedy: for in truth, notwithstanding that this Prince was adorned with many great vertues, yet he was much noted and taxed for being couetous and greedy of money, as he afterwards shewed. And in regard of peace betweene him and Pope NICHOLAS, he freely granted to him Rauenna, and the other Townes of that gouernement, which the Pope challenged to be the Church inheritance; vniting thereto the City of Bolonia, which of later time held for the Empire. Pope NICHOLAS hauing the Emperors friendship, and for that he was a Romane borne, was of greater power then any of his predecessors had been; and took from CHARLES King of Naples the office of Senator, and made a Law, that from thenceforth no king or Kings sonne should be Senator: he also tooke from him the Lieutenantship for the Church in Tuscane, alleaging that it was not the Emperors pleasure that he should hold that dignity; and so iealousie and suspicion grew betweene them: for it was odious to the Pope to see that CHARLES was of such power; wherefore he procured PETER king of Arragon, to make challenge to the Kingdome of Naples and Sicilia; affirming that they appertained vnto him, by reason of his mariage with CONSTANCE daughter to MANFRED king of Sicilia. All this the Pope durst to doe, hauing the fauor and friendship of the Emperor RODVLPH, whom they knew to be of great power in Italie, and obeyed in Germany.

The Pope was author of all the warres between the French and Spanish for the kingdom of Naples.

About this time the Emperor sent one to be his Lieutenant in Italy, whom many Cities receiued and obeyed, and others would not. At this time also died Pope NICHOLAS, hauing held the sea foure yeers, sauing foure moneths; and vpon some occasion, that Sea was voide fiue moneths; and then was chosen SIMON Cardinall of S. Sicilie, a French-man borne, who was called MARTIN the Fourth. In those times, the Popes made their abode in Viterbo, but he would not be sacred there, but went for that purpose to Ciuita Vechia, whither came to see him CHARLES King of Naples, who (for that they both were French-men) was very ioyfully receiued, and afterwards much fauored: which was in the yeere of our Lord 1281. In the same yeer, the Emperor settled WENCESLAVS king of Bohemia (whom he had maried with his daughter IVDITH) in the gouernment of his kingdom; free from the tutorship of the Marqueese of Brandenburgh, to whom he had giuen the same. And the same yeer he had warre with the Gouernor of a people called Ethni, inhabiting a prouince in France about Lionois, who rebelled, and would haue made himselfe Lord of Burgondy, and of part of Sueuia; whither he went in person, obtained victory, and left the countrey in subiection. And returning from his iourney, he came into the prouince of Alsatia, where were many factions, and many great men rebelling, disobeyed his commandements: but with his presence all was still and in quiet: so as in all Germany he was both obeyed and feared, and raigned in prosperity. But as in this life no estate high or low is free from disasters and misfortunes, so a sonne of his whom he much loued whose name was HARMAN, passing the riuer of Rhine, in a boate, was drowned, together with certain other eminent men, and his wife the Empresse also died; and about three yeeres after he maried again, with the daughter of the Duke of Burgondy: and so he passed fiue or six yeeres without any accident worth the writing. In Italy, CHARLES, King of Sicilia and Prouence, being rich and of great power, through the fauor of Pope MARTIN, had a conceite to haue deposed MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS, and to haue restored BALDVVIN to the Empire of Constantinople; who marying his daughter, was deprined: and although hee pretended this title, yet it was thought that he would haue had the Empire for himselfe.

This being done, he thought to haue recouered the kingdome of Ierusalem, whereof he intituled himselfe King: whereupon he practised with the Pope, perswading him to excommunicate PALEOLOGVS, for that he had not obserued what was decreed in the Councell late held at Lions, whither he came to Pope GREGORY the Tenth, concerning the vniting of the Greeke Church with the Latine. He had also intelligence with certain Cities in Gracia which rebelled against PALEOLOGVS, and began to prouide men and gallies for that enterprise. But all these purposes were frustrate: for whilest he sought to depose another from his Empire, he within few daies lost great part of his owne: for all the Cities in Sicilia, vnable to endure the violence and oppression vsed by the French, rose and rebelled, and slew all the French-men which were in the Iland, in two houres space: hauing first had intelligence with PETER King of Arragon, who lay in waite for Sicilia (vnder this title, that he maried the daughter of King MANFRED) and came in great haste with a fleete of fifty gallies and ships, fayning that he had rigged the same, to haue passed ouer into Africa; and so became Lord of the whole Iland. Afterwards there were great wars between them both by sea and land, during which, King CHARLES falling sick, of an infirmity and of sorrow, died; leauing his eldest son CHARLES prisoner, in the power of PETER King of Arragon. Pope MARTIN sent his Legate to Naples, to hold that kingdom in subiection to CHARLES who was in prison, whom he proclaimed to be his fathers heire and successor: the French King sent also to the same effect. Fitally, at this time the Kingdom of Sicilia was diuided from the Kingdom of Naples, and the King of Arragon held the same; and afterwards followed other alterations. Returning to my History, I say that the Emperor RODVLPH, through the counsell of HONORIVS the Fourth, who succeeded Pope MARTIN, in the yeer of our Lord 1286, sent for his Lieutenant-generall, an Italian Earle called PINCINAGLIA di Fisco (a man very priuate with the Pope) who coming into Tuscane, Florence, and many other Cities which were of the faction of the Guelphs, would not obey him; and there passed many treaties and demands; but in the end, he hauing made his protestations, and condemned some cities, returned into Germany: and the Emperor sent thither another Lieutenant, who (hauing commission) gaue eare to certain cities, which offered to compound for money; and so by the Emperors consent, Florence, Luca, Pisa, and some others, bought their liberty, whereby the Emperor gat little honor; notwithstanding that in all the rest he was a good, a valint, and a prudent Prince: but the greedinesse of money, and his resolution not to come into Italy, made him to vse this basenesse.

The Frenchmen slaine in the Ile of Sicilie.

Florence, Luca, & Pisa bought their freedome of the Emperor Rodulph the first

In those daies, EBERARD Earle of Wittembergh, being assisted by some other Princes, rebelled: but the Emperour entring his countrie, besieged him in a strong Castle, and compelling him to sue for mercy; at the entreaty of the Archbishop of Mentz, he pardoned him: and although that he afterwards made some alterations, yet in the end he perseuered in his seruice. At

At this time died in Rome HONORIVS the Fourth, hauing been Pope two yeeres and one moneth, and after his death the chaire was void ten moneths; and then was chosen the Cardinall of Saint Sabina, a Frier, and Generall of S. FRANCIS Order, called NICHOLAS.

All this while the Emperour RODVLPH gouerned Germany in peace; yet in the prouince of Turinge, many insolencies and robberies were committed, by reason of the factions and controuersies, betweene the Lords of the Castles there: wherefore the Emperour called a Diet to be held in the citie of Erfordia; and by the consent of the Princes, made threescore Castles in that prouince to be throwne downe, and laid leuell with the earth, whereby he brought all Germany into quiet subiection; which continued so, vntil his death, which was within a little while after. So as it cannot be denied, but that this Emperour was a good Prince, and a prudent gouernour, both in peace and in warre, and in all things (wherein hee would intermeddle, which was but in Germany onely) desiring as a wise Prince to rule and gouerne the same well, rather then to seeke to subdue Italy, and other countries, and so to lose both the one and the other; and to auoid contention with the Popes, which in Italy he could not eschue. One thing made his raigne infortunate, which was the losse of the Holy land; the Christians losing all the cities which they held in Soria, and Palestina: for the Souldan of Egypt being Lord of Ierusalem, seeing the warres betweene the cities of Italy, and the Christian Kings of Arragon, and of Naples; and also betweene the Kings of England and of France; came with a great Army of foote and horse, and besieging the citie of Tripoli in Soria, took the same by force: and presently did the like by the cities of Tyre, Sidon, and Brito, with their confines; which he destroying, slew and captiuated an infinit number of people. The Christians which escaped, retyring themselues by sea and land to the citie of Ptolomaida, whither came the King of Cyprus, the Masters and Knights Templars, of S. IOHN, and of the Duch order, together with the Patriarch of Ierusalem; they fell there at variance amongst themselues, who should be Gouernour, and haue the command: which the Soldan vnderstanding, and a certaine truce which he had graunted them being expired, he came with 150000 men before the citie; and taking and destroying all the countrie round about it, sent his sonne with his whole power to besiege the citie: who continued the siege, notwithstanding that his father died in the meane season.

The losse of the Holy land.

After sundrie accidents which happened, the greatest part of those which were in the citie, abandoning the same, fled by sea; and neere to the coast of Cyprus were ouertaken with such a tempest, that the greatest part of them were cast away and drowned: and the next day, the Soldan entring the citie (some few which had no meanes to depart, being left to defend the same) commanded first all those which he found therein, to be slaine; and then the citie to be ruined, leauing no house or wall standing: and so the Christians were wholly expelled out of all which GODFREY of Buillon and other Christian Princes had gotten 196 yeeres before: which was in the yeere of our Lord 1290: for which as soone as it was published in Europe, the Emperor, the Pope, and generally al the Princes Christian were very sorie; knowing that by reason of the wars betweene them, those countries could not be relieued.

The next yeere after this, the Emperour falling sore sicke, was carried to the citie of Spire, accompanied with the Empresse and his sonne in law, the King of Bohemia and his Queene, the Duke of Bauiere, and many other Princes: and dyed the same day that hee came to the citie. This Prince may well bee accounted for one of the most valiant and excellent of the world; for that being but a meane Lord, and finding the Empire diuided, rent, and tyrannized, without an Emperour, and at libertie, for many yeers space, he pacified and brought the same fully into subiection and obedience, and maintaining iustice and equitie therein, left the same in peace. His house and estate he so much encreased, that he left to his sonne ALBERT, the Duchies of Austrich, and Carniola. He was twice married: first with a Countesse of Sueuia called ANNE: the second time with the Duke of Burgondies daughter, called YNES: by the first onely he had children. About the number of his children authors varie: but when he died, it seemeth that he had but two sonnes; the one was ALBERT afore named, and the other RODVLPH, whom he made Lord of part of Sueuia, who was father to IOHN the paricide, who slew his vncle, as hereafter you shall vnderstand. He had also (as writeth IOHN CVSPINIAN) seuen daughters, which he married to mightie Princes: the first was EVPHEMIA, which was a Nunne; the second was IVDITH, married to WENCESLAVS King of Bohemia; the third was MAVD, married to the Count Palatine of Rhine; the fourth was YNES, married to the Duke of Saxony; the fift was KATHERINE, married to HARMAN Marquis of Brandenburgh; the sixt was ANNE, married with OTHO Duke of Bauiere; the seuenth and last was called CLEMENCE, and was married to CHARLES the Second, King of Naples; from which issued great Kings and Princes.

The same yeere that the Emperor RODVLPH died, MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS Emperour of Constantinople died also, and his sonne ANDRONICVS had the Empire: and the next yeere following died Pope NICHOLAS, having bin so foure yeeres, and through discord betweene the Cardinals, that Sea was voide two yeeres and three moneths.

THE LIFE OF ADVLPH, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THE HVNDRETH AND FOVRTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

ALL men thought, after the death of the Emperor Rodulph, that the Electors would haue chosen his sonne Albert: but, through the cunning of the Bishop of Mentz, Adulph Earle of Nassaw was chosen; which, Albert disdaining (with the aid of the French King) bare Armes against him, purposing to depose him. Heere to the Electors consented; and repenting that they had chosen him, deprined him of the Empire, and chose Albert; who, going to be crowned in Aken, came to a battel with Adulph, and slue him.

THE Empire, through the death of the Emperour RODVLPH, being void, all men were of opinion that his sonne ALBERT Duke of Austria should haue succeeded him: and (in a manner) all the Princes Electors desired the same. But GERARD, Archbishop of Mentz (which was one of them) vsed such policy, that at the Princes meeting at Franckford, he (cunningly) got their voices, and made ADVLPH, Earle of Nassaw, who was his neer kinsman to be chosen. The mean which he vsed was this: Hee hauing already gotten to this effect the Archbishop of Colens voice, vsed the same policy in obtaining the rest of their voices. First, conferring with the Duke of Saxony, he told him that he had some of the Electors voices to chuse the Duke of Bruinswick (who was his great enemy) but yet he would forbear to do it, if he would giue him his voice. The Duke fearing that this had been true (for, he had heard that the Bishop of Colen, and the Marquesse of Brandenburgh, had granted their voices to the Bishop of Mentz) perswaded him not to consent thereto; for if he did, it would be his ruine if he were chosen: so as whosoeuer were chosen (were it not the Duke of Bruinswick) he should haue his voice presently.

A policy vsed by the Archbishop of Mentz.

The Duke of Saxony being thus deceiued, with the like wile he gat the voyces of the Archbishop of Trenier, and of the Count Palatine of Rhine; propounding in secret, to the Count Palatine, the King of Bohemia, and to the Bishop of Treuier, the Duke of Gueldres; whereto each of them answered him, that if he were not chosen whom hee named vnto them, they would giue him their voyces: this they did, supposing that he would haue chosen ALBERT the Duke of Austria, for so hee made shew in outward appearance: so as by this device hee gat all all their voyces, the one not knowing what the other had done: and the Marquis of Brandenburgh promised him his voice also, for that he had fauoured him in the controuersie betweene the vncle, and the nephew, Marquises, whether of them should be Elector: so as the day of the election being come, they all referring their opinions to the Archbishop of Mentz, by common consent the Earle of Nassaw was chosen; whereat they all marueiled, as well for that they expected that ALBERT should haue bin chosen, as also for that ADVLPH was a man of meane estate, and of too poore a reuenue to maintaine the imperiall dignitie; notwithstanding that for his owne person hee was valiant, greatly esteemed, and held for an excellent man of warre: but as his reuenewes were small, he presently began to be held in contempt, especially by the Duke of Austria and his adherents.

Adulph Earle of Nassaw chosen Emperour.

ADVLPH being thus chosen, by means of the Bishop of Mentz, and of his other friends and kindred, went to Aken, and there was crowned with great solemnitie; and then called a Councell to be held in a citie in Suevia: and from thence, (for that there were then great wars betweene the Kings of England and of France) hee sent to offer his ayd to the king of England against the French King; and the King of England sent him a great summe of money, to the end that with an Army he should in person haue come to his ayd; wherewith the Princes of the Empire seemed to be much grieued, alleaging that it was a great dishonour to the Empire, that the Emperour should take pay of any forraine Prince: and the Duke of Austria said, that seeing the Emperor receiued pay of the king of England, he might as well take pay of the French king. The Emperour hauing receiued this money, and knowing that the Lantzgraue of Turinges sons made war vpon their Father, hee went in person to ayd the Lantzgraue; who to obtaine his fauour, and for the hatred which he bare against his sonnes, sold to him the Earledome of Turingia, for part of the money which the King of England had giuen him. It seemes the Author was not truly informed of this historie: and therfore (for that it is a memorable action) I will borrow so much liberty as to set it downe as I finde it in an approoued Author. ALBERT Lantzgraue of Turinge, married MARGVERIT daughter to the Emperour FREDERICK the Second, a very vertuous Lady, by whom he had two sonnes FREDERICK and TICHMAN: ALBERT fell so passionately in loue with a strumpet, as he sought his wiues death, who being aduised by her wife and faithful frends to flie the furie of her wicked husband, retyred by night out of his Castle, and got to Franckford, where spending some yeeres in mourning and deuotion in a Nonnerie, she dyed. Soon after the Mothers escape, DITERIE Marquis of Missnia, brother to ALBERT, a wise and a iust Prince, called the two sons to his Court, lest they should be spectators of their fathers villanie, and also to free them from daunger, breeding them vp vertuously in the feare of God. This Marquis had one son who dyed, and therefore beeing loth his brother should succeede him, and fearing that he would chase away his children, for that he more respected a base son, as also for that he hated his conditions, he made his wil, by the which he adopted his brothers sons, and made them heires of Missnia: and calling together the principall men of the prouince, hee acquainted them with his testament and the reasons thereof, requiring them to protect his heires, which they promised, and not to receiue any other Lord.

The Emperor Adulph offered to serue the King of England in his warres against the French.

DITERIE being dead and the heires in possession and much beloued of their subiects for their vertues, the father ALBERT challenged the estate, as his brothers next heir: but the estates of the countrie would not accept of him, saying that they had allowed of DITERIE's pietie and the reasons of his last will, and that they would defend them who were recommended to their protection. ALBERT flies to armes, and in the beginning took his eldest son FREDERICK whom he kept in prison a yeere: but his kepers pittying the young mans estate, assisted him in his escape.

The Emperour RODVLPH being dead, who had inioyned them to peace, ADOLPH succeeding, ALBERT takes Armes againe, and to ingage him in this warre, he sels him Turinge, to depriue his heires: so as the warres grew hot in Missnia both during the six yeeres raigne of ADVLPH, and in the time of ALBERT. of Austria his successor, but God protected the brethren and expelled the Emperours Army both out of Turingia and Missnia.

The Emperour ALBERT put FREDERICK in hope of peace, but finding Missnia and Turingia fitt for him to make warres against the Bohemian, he deceiued FREDERICK and entred the Countrie with an Armie. They write that FREDERICK was called to a counterfet treatie; where being inuited to a banket by the Emperor, a souldier stept forth with his sword drawne to strike FREDERICK; but a Citizen of Friberge, being among the guard, receiued the blow that he might escape. The Emperour excused himselfe: yet all men thought that he had suborned the murtherer.

TICEMAN the younger brother was soon after treacherously wounded in a Church at Lipsie, on Christmas eue at night being at his deuotion, and died within two daies after; It was thought that PHILIP of Nassau had imployed this murtherer, of whom FREDERICK vowed to be reuenged, and meeting him in a battaile, he slew him with his owne hand.

ALBERT the father a breaker of wedlock, cruell to his wife and children, who furiously drew ruine vpon himselfe and his Countrie, suffered bitter punishment by the Iustice of God, dying in extreame want and contempt in the yeare 1315.

The Emperor spent two yeers in those warres, desiring to aduance his house, and to enlarge his possessions, as he did: and this time being expired, he desiring to satisfie the King of England, and being vnable to perform the same (for, the Princes were much discontented for that hee gaue them no part of the gold which the King of England sent him) open enmity brake out between him and the Duke of Austria: and the Duke practised with the other Princes to depose him from the Empire, by the consent of the same Archbishop of Mentz who had chosen him; so as the Emperor ADVLPH was of no such power or authority as was his Predecessor: and men began to stand in fear of what afterwards ensued. While these matters passed in Germany, which were of great moment, I will tell you what passed in Italy, touching the Papacy: which was in this manner;

At the end of two yeeres and three months after the death of Pope NICHOLAS the Fourth, in all which time he had no successor; in Perugia (whither the Cardinals repayred to make their election) was chosen a very zealous man, who was both a Monke and an Hermite, called PETER MVRRON; who thinking himselfe to haue bin called of God accepted the Popedom, and was named CELESTINE the Fift: in his beginning (as it was written) he was so highly honoured, that vpon the day of his sacring, there came to Perugia (as to see a wonder) 200000. persons: but as this man had wholly secluded himself from the world, and giuen himself to contemplation and prayer; so the world could not well like of him, nor of his fashions; neither knew he how to deale in the world, for his small vnderstanding, and lesse experience in worldly matters; which was the occasion that he gaue credit to what was told him; by meanes whereof he did sometimes one thing contrary to another: whereupon some of the Cardinals cunningly counselled and perswaded him to renounce the Papacie; whereto this good man willingly agreed, accounting himselfe incapable of that charge, and so oftentimes protested, and in conclusion (notwithstanding that CHARLES King of Naples would haue hindred him, and to that end induced him to come to Naples) did so, and in a solemne act renounced the Popedome; fiue moneths after that he had accepted the same: and vpon his renunciation, was chosen Cardinal BENEDICT, who was called BONIFACE the Eight, who was the man which chiefly perswaded CELESTIN to renounce the Papacy: and this deuout man being about to returne to his hermitage, BONIFACE fearing that the people would againe haue restored him, made him to be apprehended and detained in prison vntill he dyed, which was within short space after: whose successor BONIFACE was farre vnlike vnto him, for he was ambitious, proud, factious, and a great persecutor of the Gibelins, yet very learned, politique, subtill, and of great experience; whose end was such as hereafter wee will tell you.

Pope Celestine the Fift renounced the Papacy.

Returning to the Emperour ADVLPH, vnderstanding that the Duke of Austria practized against him, and sought to depriue him of the Empire, he made warre against him, to whom the French king vnder hand gaue secret ayd, to the end that the Emperour should not be able to ioyne with the King of England against him, as he purposed to haue done.

Vpon this occasion all Germany was in combustion, some holding with one partie, and some with the other: and ADVLPH's friends daily forsooke him, through his vnequall cariage towards them, for in his fauours he was partiall, a thing which maketh Princes to be hated: by meanes whereof ALBERT's party became so strong, that the Princes Electors (excepting the Archbishop of Treuier, and the Count Palatine of Rhine who would not be there) met in the citie of Mentz, where alleaging such reasons as they thought good (which in my iudgement were very insufficient) they depriued ADVLPH of the Empire, and chose his enemie ALBERT; who with the greatest and most florishing power that he could procure, of his owne, and of his friends, went to be crowned in Aken: whom ADVLPH (who was not a coward, or any way pusillanimous, notwithstanding that his power was vnequal) went to meet: and the two Armyes ioyning neere the citie of Wormes, in the moneth of Iuly in the yeere of our Lord 1298, there began betweene them a most cruell and bloudy battaile; the despaire wherewith ADVLPH and those of his party fought, making their inequalitie equall. The battaile continued aboue six houres, either party fighting most cruelly, before that it could be perceiued whether Army should haue the victorie; and each General hauing lost great part of his people: ADVLPH fighting with his face against the sunne (which did greatly annoy him) in the middest of the throng where the fight was most cruell, was in a great charge ouerthrowne from his horse, whither (by chance) came his enemy ALBERT, who (before that he could be able to auoid his thrust) with the point of his sword gaue him so great a wound in the face, that it bereaued him of his senses, so that he was slaine in the place. Some write, that whilest that he was in this fight, ALBERT cried vnto him alowd; Here ADVLPH shalt thou lose the Empire; whereto he answered, This (O ALBERT) is in the hand of God.

A battaile betweene the Emperour Adulph and Albert Duke of Austrich.

The Emperour Adulph slaine.

As soone as the Emperour was slaine, and being perceiued by his souldiers, they (without making any more resistance) were ouerthrowne, and ALBERT remained victor, although it cost him deere, for a great number of his men were slaine and wounded. In this manner was this Emperour murthered by the hands of a Prince subiect to the Empire; in the seuenth yeere of his raigne: whether the cause mouing him thereto were right or wrong, I leaue to God, who is the righteous iudge: but the reasons which they alleaged, were that he took pay of the King of England, wherewith he was grown so proud, that he caused a Masse priest to be beheaded, that he had caused false money to be coyned, and had degraded certaine Ecclesiasticall persons: that he had forced certaine damsels: and such others which they alleaged: which whether they were true or false, it pleased GOD that hee dyed in this manner. Some authors write that all those which conspired against him, and were accessarie to his death, had euill endes: how ALBERT sped, I will tell you hereafter.

Of ADVLPH's sonnes small mention is made, excepting one who with many Earles was taken prisoner in the Battaile; and the Duke of Bauiere escaped by flight; other men of great account in this cruell battaile were slaine. In Constantinople, ANDRONICVS, sonne to MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS, was Emperor.

THE ARGVMENT.

ALbert would not accept of his first election: but Adulph being dead, he caused it to be renewed, and was confirmed by the Pope, who was easily drawne to confirme him, to the end he should make warre vpon the French King: which he would not doe, neither euer came into Italy. Germany then enioyed peace, and in twelue seuerall battailes he euer had the victory, by reason whereof he was called Albertus Triumphans. Many notable matters happened in his time, as the translating of the pontificall seate from Rome

Rome to Auinion, the subuersion of the Knights called Templars, the beginning of the house of the Ottomans in Turkey, and many other things worth the reading. He died infortunately through the conspiracie of a nephew of his who slew him neere to the Rhine, in the tenth yeere of his raigne.

S the chief right to Kingdoms and Empires many times consisteth in Arms: so ALBERT (who was, as it hath been often recited, sonne to the Emperor RODVLPH, Duke of Austria, and Lord of other estates) remaining Victor; and the Emperor ADVLPH (who was his riuall) beeing dead, he finding no man in field to make head against him, remained sole Emperor. But forasmuch as his election was made in the time of the Emperor ADVLPH, in discord (many contradicting the same) hee sought to legitimate and assure his estate. For which cause (accompanied with many Princes) he went vnto the City of Franckford: where, in the presence of the Princes Electors assembled, he renouncing his first election, and holding the Empire for void, was the second time by common consent chosen Emperor; and from thence went to Aken to be crowned, together with his wife ISABEL, daughter to the Earl of Tirol and of Carinthia, by whom he had many children, whose brother married ALBERT's sister. Which Coronation was performed with so great solemnity, and so many repaired thither to see the same, that vpon the coronation day there was so great a throng and preasse of people, that the Duke of Saxony (who married another of the Emperors sisters) and many others were smothered to death, and no man could rescue them; which was a great disgrace to the Feast.

Albert Duke of Austria the second time chosen Emperor.

After this Coronation, a Diet or Councell was held in Norembergh, wherein he took order for such matters as appertained to the Empire: and thence sending his Ambassadors to Pope BONIFACE, he gaue him to vnderstand of his election, and intreated him to confirme the same; which the Pope at that time would not grant, but like a proud priest (as it is written) answered, that he was not worthy the Empire who had murdered the Emperor. But hee shortly after confirmed him: for, as this Pope was of an high minde and presumptuous, so vpon some occasion which hapned (which I haue no time to relate) he fell at such oddes with PHILIP the French King, that the King apprehended a Bishop which was his Ambassador: and such other matters passed between them, that the Pope summoned a Councell to proceed against the King of France; who would not permit any his subiects to sue to the Court of Rome, neither to carry or send any rents or reuenues to the same. Whereupon the Pope, meaning to vse the Emperors aid against the French King, very willingly confirmed his election; and perswading him to take vpon him the title of King of France, he promised to depriue the King, and to giue him the Kingdom: about which matters were many treaties, and in the end the Pope pronounced Sentence against the French King; whereby he depriued him of his Kingdome, and gaue the same to the Emperor. Heerin is great difference between the Historiographers: for, they report this after sundry manners. But the truth is, that the Emperor was the Kings friend, and had married his eldest sonne RODVLPH, whom he had made Duke of Austria, to the Kings daughter BLANCH: for which cause, or for some other (for, many are alleaged) he accepted not the title to the Crown of France; but was contented with his confirmation in the Empire, wherein (following his fathers counsell) he raigned in prosperity, without any desire to go into Italy; and so neuer went thither.

The Pope depriued the King of France by his censures, and gaue his kingdome to the Emperor.

The hatred betwixt the Pope and the King so much increased, that the King, deadly hating the Pope, practised with a Noble-man of Rome, whose name was SARRA, of the house and family of the COLVMNOIS (who was Lord of many Towns and Castles, and was of the faction of the Gibelins) whom the Pope had banished: for this cause hee abode in France, and was highly fauoured in the French Court. The conclusion was, that this Lord should apprehend the Pope; which he vndertook, vsing such means as you shall hear. This Lord SARRA COLVMNA, hauing many friends of the faction of the Gibelins in Alnania, where the Pope was then resident (for, it was his natiue Countrey) departed France disguised, hauing first agreed with a Captain called NOGARET, to lodge himself with two hundred souldiers in a place which he had appointed; and he himself went into Alnania, where hauing secret conference with with his friends, he shewed them the French Kings Letters and fauours; and so carried the matter, that one day he assaulted the Popes Palace, and took him prisoner, and presently took his way with him towards Rome; which he entred with the aid of the Gibelins, and of his owne family of the COLVMNOIS which liued there. But the Pope within fiue and thirty dayes after died, hauing been Pope the space of eight yeers and nine months, which was in the yeer of our Lord 1302.

Pope Boniface apprehended by Sarra Columna.

In this manner ended the high designes of Pope BONIFACE; who wrote the first book of the Decretals. What the Lord SARRA meant to haue done with him, is vnknowne; yet it is written that he purposed to haue carried him into France, which hee then could not, or durst not put in execution. After that BONIFACE was dead, NICHOLAS Cardinall of Hostia was chosen, and was called BENEDICT the Eleuenth, who was born in Treuigi, and was a Dominican Frier.

While these matters passed in Italy and France, ALBERT raigned happily in Germany: but in Hungary were great combustions about the title to that Kingdome: for, ANDREW their King dying without issue, VENCESLAVS, son to the King of Bohemia, aspired to that Kingdome; and afterwards, OTHO Duke of Bauiere, and CHARLES, sonne to the King of Naples: but in the end CHARLES was King; and VENCESLAVS inherited Bohemia, which was his fathers inheritance, who was of the same name: but hee prooued to be so wicked (notwithstanding that he was but a yong man) that his subiects, conspiring against him, slue him in a City of Morania. And forasmuch as he also had no issue, the like controuersie arose in Bohemia, as was in Hungary, notwithstanding that he left a sister whose name was ISABEL; which the Emperor ALBERT vnderstanding, he resolued to procure her for his sonne RODVLPH, by reason of a certain couenant and agreement made between the houses of Austria and Bohemia; which was, that the one wanting heirs, the heirs of the other should succeed in the estate. But the greatest part of the Bohemians resolued to chuse a Lord of their owne nation for their king, whose name was HENRY, who was Earl of Carinthia and of Tirol, and was the Emperors brother-in-law: neuertheless there was euer some dislike and discord between them; and HENRY, desiring to raign, without any intermission hasted into Bohemia, and there was receiued and obeyed for King. But the Emperor, presently leuying an Army, entred the Countrey with so great power, that HENRY durst not abide his coming: and he put his sonne RODVLPH in possession (who was a widower, hauing buried the French Kings daughter); and the better to assure him, and to make him the more acceptable to the Bohemians, he married him to the widow ISABEL, late wife to VENCESLAVS deceased: which took such effect, that he was presently obeyed by all men, and began to raign in peace. But it pleased not God that he should long enioy that Kingdom: for, within fewe months after, when he was freed from all his enemies, he died suddenly in the yeer of our Lord 1306. By reason whereof, the old discord and contention was renewed, some desiring to haue the deposed HENRY, Earl of Carinthia, and others would haue FREDERICK, the Emperors second sonne, to bee their King. But the Earl HENRY's party being the stronger, he was receiued and established in the Kingdome: which the Bohemians did so willingly, that the Emperor (within few daies after) coming thither in person with a mighty Army to haue preferred his sonne FREDERICK, they all so resolutely serued their new King, that, after much harm done in the Country, the Emperour was forced to return without effecting what he came for, seeing how constantly the Bohemians stood to their defense. In which warres and others, which he first had with the Emperour ADVLPH and other Princes, it is written, that he fought in person twelue seuerall times, and in them all had the victory, and therefore was called ALBERTVS Triumphans.

The death of the King of Bohemia

In the time of this Emperor ALBERT, Pope CLEMENT the Fift, leauing three Cardinals to gouern Rome, remoued his seat from thence to Auinion in France, where he and his successors made their abode for the space of seuenty and odde yeers, whereof ensued many inconueniences. In the beginning of the Emperor ALBERT's Raign, in Asia the lesse began the Empire and dominion of the great Turk, which is now so mighty and powerfull: the head and founder of which Empire was one OTTOMAN, of the same nation; a man of base parentage, but of a great spirit, and very politick; who of a small beginning grew to bee so mighty, and brought so many nations to his seruice and subiection, that he conquered many Countries, and made himself a King, and laid the foundation of that Empire, which his successors haue from time to time inlarged, and brought to that estate wherein we see it at this day: and from him is descended in line masculine, to the great Turk now raigning, in the yeer of our Lord 1604.

The Pope remoued his seat from Rome to Auinion in France. The beginning of the Turkish Empire, anno 1307.

In the tenth yeer of the Emperor ALBERT's Raigne, which was in the yeer 1307, the Knights of the Order of S. IOHN took the Ile of Rhodes from the Infidels, where they made their seat and principall residence, and therefore were afterwards called Knights of the Rhodes; and performed many maruels in Arms both by sea and land, vntill (in our time) that Iland was taken by SOLIMAN the great Turk, who conquered the same.

The Knights of the Rhodes.

In the time of the Emperor ALBERT, in Lombardy neer to Nouarra, began a sect of Heretickes, which vnder colour of religion and charity, made all things common: and women in like manner moued men to carnall conjunction, alleaging it to bee a deed of charity; and did many other things. This error dispersed it self into sundry parts, and many thousands of people followed the same. But the Pope and other Princes vsed such diligence in punishing these Heretickes, that in the end it was suppressed, yet not without great difficulty.

The beginning of the Cantons of the Swissers.

In the time of the Emperor ALBERT's Raign, the Heluecians (now called Swissers) began to be famous: all which ioyning together, made a league to enfranchise themselues, and to defend their liberty, and gouerned and ruled their state by their Heads or Cantons; which they haue maintained vntill this day, and haue done many singular feats of Arms against the Dukes of Austria and other Princes; and from that time hitherto haue been accounted for a very valiant Nation.

The order of the Knights-templers dissolued and condemned. The Ile of Sardinia taken by the Moors.

Towards the end of this Emperors Raign, Pope CLEMENT, by the counsell and consent of the King of France, dissolued the whole Order of the Knights Templars, and condemning their bodies, confisked their goods; which were of so great value throughout all Christendom, that what was taken from them, was sufficient to haue enriched many Princes, and the other Orders of Knights whereunto they were applied. In his time also Sardinia was taken by the Moors: which Iland Pope CLEMENT bestowed vpon the King of Sicilia, to the end that hee should recouer the same.

The death of the Emperor Albert the First, murdered by his nephew.

About the end of the tenth yeer of this Emperors Raign, hee hauing leuied great forces to haue gone into Bohemia, with an intent to haue made his sonne FREDERICK King, wherein then raigned HENRY, Earl of Carinthia; a nephew of his, beeing his brother RODVLPH's sonne, whose name was IOHN, through secret hatred which he conceiued against him for not giuing him any estate (he withholding from him in Sueuia, what to him by inheritance from his father appertained) resolued to kill him: and vpon this occasion, conspiring with other Barons, which were RODVLPH, VLRICH and WALTER, in the month of April, in the yeer 1308, the Emperor being in Austria, purposing the next day to haue passed the Riuer of Rhine; he after dinner for his pleasure taking horse, and riding ouer the ploughed fields between two little riuers called Risa and Arula, neer to the Rhine, accompanied onely by these conspirators, who were his great Familiars; his nephew IOHN with his confederates, and others which followed him for the same purpose, getting before him, RODVLPH laid hand vpon his horses bridle: his nephew IOHN stabd him in the throte; and VLRICH with a blowe claue his head; and the rest wounded him, some with blowes, some with thrusts, so as he was soon slain: and the murderers, setting spurres to their horses, left the miserable Emperor dead in the place; in which, his sonne the Duke of Austria afterwards built a stately Monastery: his body was carried to Spire. The conspirators were sought out by his sonnes, and most of them found and put to death. This death was reputed to happen in this manner to him through the iust iudgement of God, for killing his Predecessor the Emperor ADVLPH: the truth is knowne vnto God onely, who orders all things according to his good pleasure. All that I can say, is, that the highest estates are in least safety, and most subiect to danger both bodily and ghostly. What appertaineth to the soule is hard to be proued, for that it is secret, whereof God onely can iudge: but, as it appeareth, in great estates liberty to sin maketh it doubtfull, and mens weaknes is alike as well in the great as in the small; which is an argument of the greater danger, as our Sauiour plainly expresseth in the Gospell; wherein he sheweth how hardly rich men inherit the Kingdom of heauen: wherefore great Princes ought to be circumspect concerning bodily dangers. I will not wearie the Reader with other examples: those shall suffice which I haue written of Emperors; on whom (as I haue declared) there is no kinde of death that hath not befaln. And, to the contrary, in many mean estates we finde not any that in many yeers space haue died of a violent death, but that most men of mean fortune haue died naturally: but pride and ambition do so blinde mens eyes, that what is most hatefull is most desired; and we euer seek to attain to that wherein is greatest danger: yet some haue been of so good an vnderstanding, that they would not accept, but haue refused Empires and dominions when they haue been offred them, although the number be but small. But returning to the Emperor ALBERT, he had by ELIZABETH his wife one and twenty children, sonnes and daughters, whereof tenne died in their infancie: and his eldest sonne RODVLPH died in his time King of Bohemia; so as when the Emperour ALBERT died, he left fiue sons, and as many daughters: his daughters names were ELIZABETH, ANNE, GVTTA, KATHARINE and INES, all which were married to sundry Princes: his sons names were FREDERICK, LEOPOLD, HENRY, ALBERT and OTHO, which OTHO married the Ducheſſe of Bauiere; all which (after the Germane manner) were called Dukes of Austria, which causeth a great confusion in historics; but the house of Austria rested in ALBERT, who (for that he had the gowt) was called the lame; and was the stem & original of the house of Austria, from whom are descended his successors.

At what time as the Emperor ALBERT was slaine, ANDRONICVS was Emperour of Constantinople: of whom I finde little written, and therefore make no particular relation of him.

Pope CLEMENT the Fift making his aboad in Auinion, gouerned Rome and his estates of Italy, by his Legates; by reason whereof, and of the Emperours long absence, many cities in Italy took for their Lords, the heads and leaders of their factions, which they possessed a long time, and to this day some remaine, which of tyrants, haue in processe of time made themselues absolute Lords; as in Verona, those of the house of SCALA, in Ferrara, the house of ESTE, extending it selfe afterwards to MODENA, whose descendents at this day enioy that estate; in Padoa those of CARRARA; in Mantoa the PASSERINI were expelled by the GONZAGHI, who afterwards were, and to this day are, great Lords: and others in other parts.

THE LIFE OF HENRIE, THE SEVENTH OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND SIXT ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

HEnry being chosen by the Electors was confirmed by the Pope, with an iniunction that hee should come into Italie, by reason of much discord which was there: the French King was greatly displeased with his election, for that he pretended to haue been Emperour. The first enterprise he took in hand was against the King of Bohemia, and against the Earle of Wittenbergh, against both which he had good successe: he came afterwards into Italy, as well to satisfie the Pope, as to visit the Countries vnder his iurisdiction: hauing past the Alpes he found no great resistance by reason of the factions in Rome, where he was crowned with more solemnitie then ioy; the Citie beeing diuided betweene the Colonnesi and the Vrsini, who daily fought together. The Florentines would not yeeld vnto him, nor lose their liberty: and hauing endured a long siege, in conclusion they defended themselues bravely, so as the Emperour changing his minde went to the conquest of Naples, and while he made preparation for the same he was poisoned, and dyed in Buon Conuento; leauing Italy in greater combustion then before. Hee reigned seuen yeers.

TRuly I coniecture, that in writing the life of the Emperour ALBERT, I haue made too long a digression, by reason of the recitall of other matters which happened in his time: but yet neuertheless I did it, for that I was briefe in writing his life; holding it necessary, to the end the rest may be the better vnderstood, and to explaine what is already sayd: and also for that the accidents were notable, it was not fit to passe them ouer in silence. The Emperour ALBERT being slaine through the treason of his Nephew IOHN, and his death being generally published, his sons sought reuenge, and to get his goods and estates, and some of them to haue the Empire.

The princes Electors, to make choice of a new Emperour, retired themselues (according to custome) custom) to the city of Franckford. By the translation of the Popes seate from Rome to Auignon, the French conceiued no small hope to obtaine the Empire, as the Councels of PHILIP the father, the French King, and CHARLES of Vallois his brother did discouer. For, hauing him in their power, who did arrogate vnto himselfe a right to giue the Empire to whom he pleased, they perswaded themselues that they should recouer it by him without any opposition: Wherfore, when as they were to go to an Election after the murther of ALBERT, CHARLES of Vallois by his brothers aduice drawes an Army together, that he might wrest away the Empire, euen in spight of the Pope; who although he were no enemy to the King, yet foreseeing that this alteration would be fatall to Italie, and to the Roman Hierarchie, he would not suffer it, but preuent the French.

The Pope being secretly aduertised of his purpose (and being, together with the greatest part of his Cardinals, of opinion, that if the French King were Emperour, he would by that meane make himselfe Lord of all Italy, and so his patrimony should be oppressed, and brought to subiection, and that many other inconueniences would haue ensued) by his Letters and Bulls enioyned the Electors presently without any delay to chuse an Emperor, such a one as should be most fit for the state and common good: and they knowing his minde (notwithstanding that they were solicited and vrged to the contrary by the French King) by common consent chose HENRY Earle of Luxenburgh, vpon the first day of November, in the yeer of our Lord 1308: Wherein his brother BALDVVIN Bishop of Treuiere, and one of the Electors did greatly assist him. When his Election was published, and notice giuen to the French King, he was much discontented (for he assured himself to haue been Emperor) and much more after that he vnderstood that the Pope had hastened the Electors, and had authorised them to make the Election; for which, afterwards grew some discord between them. The new chosen Emperor, well accompanied, went to the city of Aken, where with great solemnity hee was crowned; and thence sent his Ambassadors to the Pope, entreating him to confirme his Election: which the Pope gladly performed, inioyning him within the terme of two yeers to come to Rome, there to be crowned by his Legates.

Henry Earle of Luxenburgh chosen Emperor

This the Pope did to the end that the Emperor should haue endeuoured to make peace in Italy, for there were then many factions and tyrannies. HENRY accepting these conditions, resolued to come into Italy, and began to prouide for his iourney, which neither RODVLPH, ADVLPH, nor ALBERT, his predecessors would doe; and to this effect called a Diet to be held in Spire, whither came (in a manner) all the Princes. At the same time new cares and troubles arose, besides his iourney for Italy: the first was, that vnderstanding that HENRY Earle of Carinthia, was king of Bohemia, and that the same Earle was in possession of the kingdome, the new Emperor (wanting none to incite him thereto) resolued to depose the said Earle, and to make one of his own sonnes King: whereupon he caused the daughter of WENCESLAVS king of Bohemia, and of the Emperor RODVLPH's sister, to be brought to Spire; and notwithstanding that she was foure yeers elder then his sonne IOHN, yet he married him vnto her, and with this title leuied an Army and sent him to the conquest of Bohemia, whither he was solicited to come by many of that Kingdome. At the same time also a second occasion of care was offered, which was, to leuie an Army and to send the same against EBERARD Earle of Wittembergh, who being discontent with HENRIE's election refused to come to his obedience, and being countenanced by the French King, took many townes in the Empire. The enterprise of Bohemia had good successe: for the said Earle hauing (as writeth HENRICVS MVCIVS) raised a power to fight with the Emperor; and the two armies being encamped the one neere to the other, between them many notable skirmishes were maintained; but in the end the Earle of Carinthia, who was called King, was constrained to retire, and the Emperors sonne assaulted the City of Prague, which is the head of that kingdom, and taking the same, was therein crowned by PETER the Archbishop of Mentz; and his power presently so much encreased, that the Earle of Carinthia abandoning the Kingdom, went home into his own countrey; and the Emperours sonne IOHN remained King of Bohemia. If he sped well in Bohemia, the Army had no lesse good fortune, which he sent against EBERARD Earl of Wittembergh, for the greatest part of his castles were taken, which (as saith NAVCLERVS) were fourescore: and in the end hee himselfe in the best manner that hee could, was constrained to compound, not without great losse of his estate; which notwithstanding after the Emperor was dead, he recouered againe.

The Emperor Henry made his son Iohn K. of Bohemia.

During the time of these troubles, the Emperour forgat not within the time limited by the

the Pope to prepare for his iourney into Italy: where, when his comming was certainly known, it caused so great feare, as though it had been a matter the like whereof had neuer been seene; for threescore yeers were now expired since that any Emperor had beene there, euen from the time that FREDERICK the Second died there, who also was King of Naples: that time being spent in contention and discord in the Empire, by reason of the death of the said FREDERICK: and afterwards in the time of the Emperours ADVLPH and ALBERT, neither of them would euer come into Italy. The Emperor HENRY being in a readinesse to march with his Army, he first sent his Ambassadors to the Cities in Italy, and to their Gouernours, giuing them to vnderstand of his coming, and of his Army; exhorting them to peace, and to lay down their Arms, for to that purpose he principally addressed his iourney into that countrey; and he further required them to receiue him and his Army into their Townes and Cities. His Ambassadors were very honorably receiued, and answered generally by them all: for as there were many factions and partialities, each party desired to win the Emperors fauor: onely the Florentines holding themselues for free (hauing bought their liberty of the Emperour RODVLPH, and being then very mighty, hauing at that time made a league with ROBERT King of Naples, and lying then encamped before Arezzo) answered the Emperor that they marualled, that so wise a Prince as he was, would come into Italie with so great a number of barbarous people, as it was said he brought with him, seeing that the Emperors office and dutie was to take care to purge that country of barbarous nations, and not to bring them thither. And whereas he said that they should leaue to make war against the Aretines; they answered, that it also was against his Imperiall office, for it was his part to right wrongs, and to redresse iniuries: and whereas those of Arezzo had banished the Guelphs from their houses, he ought to command them to be restored: and as for receiuing him into their City, they would be aduised and consider what ought to be done, and in time would answere him accordingly. The Emperor took this answer in very ill part: BLONDVS, PLATINA, and others write, that DANTE an excellent learned Poet in that time, vnderstanding of his countrey-mens answere in his absence, said, that the Florentins were blind and saw not the present estate, seeing they had giuen such an answere.

The Florentines answere to the Emperor Henry the 7.

The Emperor hauing past the Alps, the Earl of Sauoy and the Marquess of Monferrato came to receiue him, and went with him to Turin; where he and his wife the Empresse were quietly receiued: with him also came RODVLPH Duke of Bauiere, and LEOPOLD sonne to the Emperour ALBERT, who (as were his brethren FREDERICK, ALBERT, and HENRY) was called Duke of Austria: and the Archbishop of Treuier, with other Princes, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1312. At that time Pope CLEMENT called a generall Councell to be held in the citie of Vienne in France, whither came three hundred Bishops, besides many other prelates, wherein the Begardes were condemned for heretikes. From Turin the Emperor came to Aste, whither came vnto him some principall heads and Lords of cities, offring him their seruice and to receiue him into their gouernments. And so came to him PHILIP who was called Earle of Pauia; SIMON COLLVVIANO of Bercelli; ANTHONY VISCRAGO from Lodi; to all which cities, and to Turin and Aste, the Emperor sent his Lieutenants to gouerne in his name, who were receiued.

The Emperor Henries comming into Italy.

From Aste he went to Milan (the head and strength of all Lombardy) wherein were two houses & factions of great power: viz. the Visconti from whom descended the Dukes of Milan; and the Turriones which were of the faction of the Guelphs; and as these two were then of chiefest authoritie, so they sought to hinder the Emperours comming into their citie: so as there was a great tumult about the matter: but either party fearing that their aduersaries would ioyne with the Emperour, they both receiued him into Milan, and he made many of the Viscounts which were expelled by the Turriones, to come in with him: and the Emperour to content both parties, and to make them friends, to GVIDO TVRRIO, he gaue the citie of Bercelli; and made GALEAZO Viscount, his Constable of the citie; and left LEOPOLD of Austria with certaine companies of Germanes to keepe the citie in peace. CARION writes, that before the Emperour came to Milan, he reconciled the Iurioni, and the Visconti, inioyning them to liue with equall rights in their countrey which was now restored to their aatient liberty, and to be content with their patrimonies: but when at the Emperors entring into Milan, MATHEVV VISCONTI went on the right hand, and GVIDO TVRRIONI being commanded to go on the left, he grew discontented; and fearing the losse of his authority, and that his faction would be expelled, he flew to turbulent courses, causing a tumult in the City after the coronation of HENRY, so as the Emperor was in no small danger, but the losse fell vpon the Author.

The other cities of Lombardy vnderstanding that the Emperour was possessed of Milan, sent their deputies vnto him to offer him their obedience, and receiued such Lieutenants as he sent them: and so did those of the contrarie faction, excepting Alexandria and those which were further off, as Padoa, Ferrara, and Bolonia, which being of the faction of the Guelphes, and in league with the Florentines, sent not to him. The Emperor within few daies after was crowned with the iron Crowne in Milan, which was wont to be done in Monza: for which and for other occasions, a certaine contribution of mony was leuied in the citie, which (as they thought which paid it) was too excessiue: by reason whereof and of the Germanes ill behauiour, the people murmuring, took Armes against the Imperialists and fought with them; and the Emperor sending for his souldiers into the citie, GALEAZZO Viscount, head of that faction, vsed a notable (though doubtful and dangerous) stratagem; which was, that he leauing his father in his house, together with the greatest part of his adherents, went to LEOPOLD of Austria (who was with the Imperialists) and told him that GVIDO TVRIONI and his adherents had caused that tumult, to make themselues Lords of the citie, as they already were: but as for him and his friends, they were still ready to doe the Emperor seruice in ought they should be commaunded. It was an easie matter to perswade him, who had all men in suspicion, to giue credit hereto: and so LEOPOLD and the Imperialists ioyning with GALEAZZO, set vpon GVIDO and the Turriones, who suspected no such matter, (yet armed and in order, expecting the issue of that tumult) and wounding and killing many of them, they draue them from the place which they had taken: and GVIDO TVRRIONI surmising what the matter might be (seeing the Imperialists ioyned with his aduersaries against him) abandoned the citie, and in the best manner he could, with the greatest part of his faction, retired to Bercelli: in this manner were the Turriones (who were of the faction of the Guelphs) driuen out of Milan: wherefore as soone as this was knowne, some other cities which were of that faction, forsooke the Emperours seruice, amongst which were Crema, and Cremona, which presently by force thrust out the Emperours Lieutenants, together with the faction of the Gibelins: the like was also done in Brescia and in Parma. The Emperor leauing Milan vnder the gouernment and guard of the Viscounts, which (as he thought) had done him loyall seruice, marched with his Army against Crema and Cremona: but as soone as those of Cremona vnderstood that hee was entred their confines, without making any resistance they submitted, and yeelded themselues and their citie, and the Emperor receiued them to mercie. But those of Crema suffering themselues to be besieged, were taken by force, and had the walles of their citie rased and dismantelled, and the Emperor otherwise punished them for an example: whereupon Parma fearing the like, sued to him for pardon. But the Brescians trusting in the strength of their citie, chose rather to hazard themselues like those of Crema, then to follow the example of Cremona, and so had the like successe: the Emperour besieged them long, and many were slaine both of the besiegers and besieged, but in the end the citie was yeelded to the Emperour; who commaunded their gates and the most of their Bulwarkes to be thrown downe. By these two enterprises the Emperor wanne so great reputation, that the cities of Verona, Vicenza, Padoa and Treuigi, sent their Ambassadors, and entreating for peace, offered him their seruice, and to receiue any garrison that he should send them. His Ambassadours also which he had sent to Venice, returned, certifying him that the Venecians were willing to do what he required of them, which was, to furnish him with shipping to conuey his Army (if he pleased) to Rome.

The Turriones driuen out of Milan.

The Emperor hauing taken order for the affaires of Lombardy, desired to see the citie of Genoa, and being there his wife the Empresse fell sicke and died; and thither came to him Ambassadours from ROBERT King of Naples, and from FREDERICK King of Sicilia; both to desire peace and his friendship: but the request of the King of Naples was held for counterfeit for that he maintained three thousand horse in Tuscane, in fauour of the Florentines & of Luca, who pleading liberty rebelled against him; and to the end also to relieue Bolonia and Ferrara if need required. The Emperour dispatched them, some with fained, and others with vnfained kind speeches of loue and good will, according to their ambassages; and within few daies after departed from Genoa by sea, and sent his Army by land, which making great spoyle in the territorie of Luca, came to Pisa, a citie at that time very friendly and much deuoted to the Emperors seruice, wherein hee was receiued with great ioy, and continued there aboue two moneths. There hee was aduertised of the estate of Rome, and how that therein were great factions and combustions, some desiring his comming, and others seeking to hinder the same. Those which sought to let his comming were the Lord IOHN, who was brother to the King of of Naples, who came thither with some troupes; and with him came all the faction of the Vrsins, and were seised of the Castle S. Angelo, the Capitoll, the Vaticane, and other Holds, and of all Rome beyond Tiber: against whom the Colonois and their faction held the rest of the citie; between whom was daily skirmishing and slaughter of either side: for which, Pope CLEMENT, by whose counsell and instigation the Emperor came into Italy, was much blamed: for it appeared that where he thought to haue established peace, he kindled warre.

The Emperour departing from Pisa towards Rome, and (for that he would not be pestered with the Florentines) taking his way neere to the sea side, sent the Earle of Sauoy before with part of his horse troupes: finally, after some daies stay in Viterbo he came to Rome, where by the Cardinals Legates, and the Colonois, he was receiued with great solemnitie; the Kings brother of Naples together with the whole faction of the Vrsins hauing fortified themselues in such places as they had taken. The Emperour being entred Rome, how long he remained there, and what befell him, is not distinctly written: some say that he staied there three moneths, in all which time were daily skirmishings, the king of Naples sending galleys and souldiers vp the riuer of Tiber to relieue his brother, who with the Vrsins, held the Vaticane, and the Castle S. Angelo: and that the Coronation was deferred vntill they might send to the Pope to appoint the place wherein it should be solemnized, for it could not be done in S. PETER'S Church (for that it was held by the enemie) and that the Pope was in doubt to giue order for the Emperors coronation, for that many of his friends and seruants were of a contrary opinion. Others set lesse time, and write not that the Pope stood in any such doubt: but they all agree that the Emperor (for that he could not get into S. PETERS Church) was crowned by the three Cardinals which were the Popes Legates in Rome, in S. IOHN de Lateran; and that during the time hee continued there, his people fought daily with the Neapolitans and Vrsins, not onely in the streetes, but euen in the houses also wherein they dwelt: during the time of which skirmishings he left Rome.

The Emperor crowned in Rome.

The Emperor being highly displeased with ROBERT King of Naples; leauing Rome went to Arezzo, which being at his deuotion was enemie to the Florentines and Lucois; whither all the Gibelins which were expelled Florence, Luca, Siena, and other cities in Tuscane, repaired vnto him, and from thence he went to besiege Florence, in which siege many notable aduentures passed: but the citie was with their owne people (together with the Sienois and Lucois which came to their aide) so well fortified and manned, that it sufficiently defended it selfe: whereupon the Emperor hauing lien six weekes before it, raised his siege, hauing first built a fortresse on a mountaine neere to the citie, wherein, and in other Castles and places of greatest importance, he left munition and garrisons to ouerrunne the Florentines countrie, and to make warre vpon them; and so marching vp and downe their countrey for the space of two moneths, in the end he went to Pisa: where vsing more then ordinarie authoritie of an Emperor, he summoned ROBERT King of Naples to make his appearance before him, as before his Emperour and soueraigne Lord, and to answere to such matters as should be obiected against him, for that hee meant to proceed against him, and to cause him, for such matters as he had attempted and done against him, aswell in Rome, as in other parts of Italy, to be indited of treason. But King ROBERT making no account of this summons; the Emperour (lying at the siege of Florence) procured FREDERICK King of Sicilia (with whose sonne he purposed to marry his daughter) to make warre against him in Pulia: which FREDERICK putting in execution rigged a fleet, wherein he sent great forces, which began the warre. And in the meane time the Emperour left not to prosecute the warre against the Florentines and the other cities of their faction; and the Florentines seeing in what distresse they were, and fearing that the Emperour would the next Spring in person againe returne to the warre against them, sent to yeeld themselues subiect to the king of Naples (reseruing certain preheminences and exemptions) vpon condition that he in person, or some other either his sonne or his brother should come to relieue them.

Florence besieged.

The Emperor summoned the king of Naples to appeare before him in Pisa.

The Emperor hauing made his aboad in Pisa, many daies, in the middest of sommer (as writeth S. ANTHONY) departed thence very ill at ease; and passing through the territory of Siena (wherein he did much harme) he went to the citie of Arezzo; whither being come, and the time limited to the King of Naples expired, he pronounced sentence against him, whereby he deprined him of his kingdome of Naples, and released his subiects from the homage and allegeance which they ought him; and gaue authoritie to his enemy FREDERICK King of Sicilia, to make a conquest thereof for his sonne, and sonne in law, which should be, to the Emperour: which sentence, as soone as Pope CLEMENT vnderstood, he presently protested the same same to be of no effect, alleaging that the Emperor neither could, or had any authoritie to condemne King ROBERT; for that kingdome was neither subiect nor feudatorie to any but to the Church of Rome; as appeareth in the Clementines, in the chapter, Pastoralis de Sententia & re Iudicata, and made other protestations contained in that chapter. With what leuitie the Pope did it, and with what impudencie he doth make other Kingdomes of the christian world subiect to the Romane Hierarchie, the forme of the decree doth shew.

The Emperor departing from Arezzo, with a resolution to haue besieged Siena, imagining that the Florentines seeing themselues on euery side oppressed, would haue come to som composition: and being by the way aduertised, that in Naples and in other parts of that kingdom after the publication of his Sentence pronounced against the King, were some Commotions and Insurrections against him: he thereupon with a desire to haue been reuenged of king ROBERT, and to haue made a conquest of that kingdome, resolued to goe thither with all his whole power; and comming within three miles of Siena, he lodged his Army in a place called Monte aperto: where feeling himself ill at ease, (by the aduice of his Physicians) he went thence to the Bathes of Macerata, and then (feeling no amendement) went to Buonconuento, directing his iourney towards Naples, whereon he had settled his thoughts: all which, together with his other deseigns were made fruitrate by his death, which thorough his infirmitie ouertooke him in the same place; which happened upon the day of the Assumption of our Lady, he hauing the same day receiued the holie Sacrament of our Lords Supper; wherein (as some say) hee was poysoned by a Frier of the Order of S. DOMINICK, called BERNARDIN, and died thereof the same day: which was so wicked and so odious a fact, that a man would thinke that no Christian would haue committed, much lesse a religious man. The same Historians write, that the Pope vnderstanding that a religious man was accused thereof, wrote his Letters and Buls by which he published him for innocent and not guiltie.

The death of the Emperour Henry the Seuenth, who was poysoned in the Host by a Frier.

This Emperour died in the yeere of our Lord 1313. in the seuenth yeere of his raigne. Most authors which write of him, say, that he was a louer of iustice and equity, of a pleasing conuersation, amiable, valiant, expert in the wars, of an honest life, a deuout Christian and one that feared God: yet BLONDVS taxeth him of indiscretion, and couetousnes. He had by his wife the Empresse one son and three daughters; his sonnes name was IOHN, whom he had already made King of Bohemia, and was likewise by inheritance from his father, Duke of Lutzenburgh. The eldest of his daughters called BEATRICE was maried to CHARLES King of Hungary, brother to ROBERT King of Naples, who within one yeere died in childbed: the second was MARY, and she was married to CHARLES King of France, who also died in childbed: the third was maried to RODVLPH Count Palatine of the Rhine. His body was carried to Pisa, and there with great lamentation solemnly entombed. The Emperor being dead there ensued a great alteration in all Italy, his Army was dispersed and came to nothing: and great and cruel wars ensued between the Florentines and Pisans.

There is so little written of the Emperors of Constantinople in these times, that it is hard to accord one Historie with another: what I can gather out of the authors is, that the Emperour ANDRONICVS, of whom we haue before made mention, by reason of his great age, made his sonne MICHAEL his companion in the Empire, who presently dyed, and left one sonne called ANDRONICVS, after the name of his Grand-father, who rebelling against the olde ANDRONICVS after six yeers warre bereaued him of the Empire; cauing him his life, and the Title of Emperor. This ANDRONICVS was called the yonger, and was a great warriour, and very valiant. He that will know more of this Emperour, let him reade GEORGE MERVLA in his seuenth and eighth books of the Historie of Milan, and LEONARD ARETIN in his fourth book of his Historie of Florence.

THE

THE LIFE OF LEVVES, THE FIFT OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND SEVENTH

Roman Emperor; And of his Competitor,

FREDERICK.

THE ARGVMENT.

HEnry being dead, and much time spent before the Princes electors did meete, in the end they were diuided, and chose two Emperors, and each endeauoured to defend and maintaine his party by Armes. They both were Crowned, and all Germany was diuided into two factions; Frederick was fauoured by the Pope, yet he would not confirme any of them. This diuision increased the troubles in Italy, wherein were long and cruell warres, and no lesse in Germany betweene the two Emperors, which fought a battail continuing 12 houres; at the end whereof Lewes was Victor and Frederick taken prisoner. Lewes being sole Emperor he warred against the Pope, who excommunicated him: so that he was constrained to set Frederick at liberty; who together with his brother Leopold dyed shortly after. So as he remained without any ryuall, and without suspicion; but not without griefe, for that he was constrained to come into Italy, called thither by those of his faction, where insued many Innouations, by reason of the factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins. After many accidents hee came to Rome, where he was crowned by Stephen Colonna, hauing an intent to haue gone to Naples against his enemy Robert. Vpon certain occasions he made a new Pope in Rome by whom he was absolued: which the other Pope in France vnderstanding, excommunicated him againe with greater vehemency; and the new Pope after the returne of the Emperor into Germany fell into the old Popes hands, and this Emperor could neuer agree with the Popes, neither could be absolued from the Popes curse, so much were they incensed against him. And so the Electors fearing the Popes fulminations chose another Emperor, which was the occasion that Germany was again diuided. So as this Emperours raigne was in the beginning and ending after one manner: and he in these troubles, ouercome with griefe, dyed suddenly, when hee had raigned in company and alone thirty three yeeres.

AFter the decease of the Emperor HENRY (who died in Buonconuento and was buried in Pisa) the Princes of Germany which were with him, returned home with some part of his Army, for the most of his souldiers remained in Italy to get pay and entertainment in the warres, which were already begun, and as it seemed would neuer haue been ended; the rest were dispersed into sundry parts. But it was one whole yeer after his decease before the electors chose him any successor, by reason that it was long before they met, and also for that they could not agree in their election; so as (the Empire being without an head) there was in all things a great confusion, and the worst of all was, that in all their treaties and negociations, they could neuer agree (as reason required) but were still diuided: at length meeting, it seemeth most of them made choice of FREDERICK Duke of Austria, for HENRY Archb.

of Colein. ALBERT duke of Saxony, and VALDEMAR Marq. of Brandenburgh, though absent, by his Agent, tooke his part; all which were his cosins-germans, his fathers sisters sonnes and Nephews to the Emperour RODVLPH; and RODVLPH Duke of Bauiere and Count Palatine of Rhine, had promised him his voice: but IOHN King of Bohemia, PETER Archbishop of Mentz, and BALDVVIN Archbishop of Treuiere, were so contrary vnto him, that thinking to get the voyce of RODVLPH Duke of Bauiere & Count Palatine on their side (procuring also the voice of the Marquesse of Brandeburghs deputy to that effect) they resolued by all meanes possible to make LEVVES Duke of Bauaria, Emperor: and eyther party was so obstinate in their resolution, that making their election with the accustomed solemnities, vpon S. LVKE's day, which was in the yeer of our Lord 1314, in steed of one Emperor, they chose 2. The K. of Bohemia, the Archb. of Treuiere & of Mentz & NICHOLAS de Booc (who was deputy for the Marquesse of Brandenburgh) chose LEVVES Duke of Bauiere: And the Archbishop of Colen, the Duke of Saxony, and RODVLPH Count Palatine of Rhine and Duke of Bauiere, to hold his word (notwithstanding that LEVVES was his owne Brother) chose FREDERICK of Austria; and so there was a diuision in the election; and either party maintained that he whom they had chosen, was and ought to be Emperor. LEVVES his party alleaged that he was chosen by most voices, for of seuen he had foure. FREDERICK and his friends pretended that the Marquess of Brandenburghs proctor had falsified his authority, who bringing in writing the hand of the Marquesse for FREDERICK, rased it out, and wrote LEVVES in the place; wherefore hee was the man that was chosen: So as all Germany, the Princes and Cities, was diuided into two factions, the one holding for the one party, and the other for the other: and from contrariety of opinions, they came to blowes; and the warre continued betweene them for the space of eight or nine yeers, vntill it ended in such manner as hereafter you shall heare.

Lewes Duke of Bauiere, and Frederick duke of Austrich both chosen Emperors by the Electors.

LEVVES departing from Franckford with the aide of those which tooke his part; went to the City of Aken, where he was crowned by the Archbishop of Colen: but for as much as FREDERICK could not get into it, (which was the right place) he was crowned in another Citie. The solemnity of the Coronations being ended, they could not send to the Pope for that the Sea had been voide aboue two yeeres, through the death of CLEMENT the Fift; but eyther of them sent to the Princes, Cities, and Potentates, signifying by their Letters and messengers, the equity of their causes, and to iustifie their election. And some being persuaded by the one party and others by the other, the most part of the Cities of the lower Germany as farre as Colen, held for LEVVES; and so did (in a manner) all Sueuia, excepting the City of Vlme, and some Townes which were of the contrary faction: and in high Germany and in Swisserland, almost all the Cities held FREDERICK for Emperour; and either of the Princes Electors took his part whom they had chosen, and so they were diuided: yet the greatest part fauored LEVVES more then FREDERICK; but his brethren ALBERT and LEOPOLD did so assist him, that leuying an Army and taking the field, he besieged Smina in Sueuia, and brought it to such extremitie that the inhabitants sent to LEVVES for relefe; who raised his whole power, and with the aide of the King of Bohemia, and the Archbishop of Treuiere, came to free the City: FREDERICK being aduertised of his comming, went to meete him, and neer to the Riuer of Nechar, ioyned battail, where both the Emperours fought in their owne persons: and the battaile was so furious that it lasted the greatest part of the day; so as the darke night parted them without any apperance of victory; yet HENRICVS MVCIVS saith, that LEVVES lost more men then FREDERICK: and so FREDERICK returning to the siege which he had begun, LEVVES went to the City of Strausburgh which held for FREDERICK, and was receiued into it by meanes of the great priuiledges and exemptions which he gaue and promised them; which FREDERICK's brother LEOPOLD vnderstanding, hee raised a great power of his subiects and friends, and came to make warre against such as held for LEVVES, and encamped himselfe before Spire; whereof as soone as LEVVES was certified, he departed from Strausburgh and with his greatest forces went to seeke LEOPOLD, with a desire to haue fought with him before he ioyned with his brother; but FREDERICK made such speede that he ioyned with LEOPOLD before they could meete: Whereupon LEVVES not daring to fight with them both together retired, with some losse both of his people and reputation, resoluing to make warre after another manner without hazarding any battaile, and so tooke his way into Bauiere, to warre against his owne brother, for that he hauing chosen FREDERICK took his part, who, being expelled Germany, fled into England, where after some yeers

A battell betweene Frederick & Lewes

yeers he died in banishment. His wife MECHTILDA, daughter to the Emperor ADVLPH, remained in Austria with her sons, where she also died. Soon after, LEVVES called home his brothers sons, and restored vnto them Heidelberg, with some other Townes so as, according to the custome in ciuill discords, the beginning of the warre was the expulsion of his brother.

This hapned in the yeer of our Lord 1315: and in the same yeer Pope IOHN the three and twentith was chosen at Lions in France, after two yeers and odde months that the seat had been void; who, presently coming to Auinion, fauoured the party of FREDERICK of Austria: but for that time he confirmed neither. The warre between these two Emperors (notwithstanding that in the space of foure or fiue yeers the one sought not to giue the other battell) was so cruell and generall through all the Countrey, and between the Cities and some Princes, as the like had not been seen; whereof ensued many violencies and robberies by the high-wayes: insomuch that for redresse thereof, the Cities of Strausbourgh, Spire, Worms, Mentz, and others, made a league, and agreed to raise certain companies of foot and horse to guard and assure the wales and passages for merchants and trauellers, whithersoeuer they went. And so was Germany afflicted with combustions and misery, without any battell or exploit of Armes worth the writing between the two Emperors, vntill the yeer 1323; in which time what hapned in Italie, from the time of the Emperor HENRY the Seuenth vntill then, we will briefly relate; especially in Lombardy, being a matter concerning the Empire.

When the Emperor HENRY died, the Viscounts (from whom descended the Dukes of Milan) were so absolute Lords thereof, that they being no longer content with that City, MATHEVV Viscount, GALEAZZO and the rest, took Pauia and other cities; which they might easily effect, hauing the aid of the Germanes, which had been left there by the Emperor; they also taking part with the Emperor LEVVES: and as the Empire was diuided and in strife, LEVVES, to haue of his side so puissant a people and family, sent him Ambassadors and verie kinde and friendly Letters. But Pope IOHN being of the contrary faction, as soon as he was chosen, perswaded FREDERICK to send his brother HENRY into Italy; who, in hope that the Pope would haue confirmed his election, did so. But his going was to small effect, for hee came but neer to the City of Pauia, and from thence returned: for, as the Imperialists euer maintained the faction of the Gibelins, and the Pope the Guelphs; so he, for that he could not hold with both parties, returned into Austria: by reason whereof, the Gibelins preuailed in Lombardy against the Pope, and against King ROBERT of Naples, who were of the contrarie faction; insomuch that MATHEVV Viscount of Milan, being of the Gibelins, with the aid of CANNIS SCALIGER, Gouernor of Verona, purposed to haue taken Genoa, vnder colour to haue restored the SPINOLAS and the DORIAS, who were banished thence for that they were Gibelins (the Guelphs being of greatest power in that City) and sent his sonne MARK Viscount thither with an Army, who besieged the City; and aid coming to either side, the war was very sharp, and the siege was one of the most cruell that hath been seen; insomuch that the Genoais, to obtain aid and succour, became subiect to the King of Naples for ten yeers. Before and after which siege there was cruell warre between the Pisans and the Florentines; the King of Naples assisting the Florentines; and other Princes and Cities, the Pisans: a matter too long to be related.

The power of the Viscounts daily increasing in Lombardy, the Pope, who was their enemy, sought a means to draw the French King to send his nephew PHILIP with an Army into Italy; which he did: and coming into Lombardy, many things hapned which I haue no time to relate; but the conclusion is, that he returned again into France, without doing any thing worthy memory. The siege of Genoa continuing, MATHEVV Viscount besieged Bercelli, and took it, expelling the Turriones, who were his antient enemies: so as at this time the Viscounts were Lords and in possession of the Cities of Milan, Pauia, Placencia, Lodi, Cremonia, Bergamo, Nouarra, Bercelli, Terdona and Alexandria, besides others which were his confederates; as, Luca; and CASTRVCHO the Gouerner thereof, the Cities of Pisa and Arezzo, and the Marquesse of Ferrara, a City belonging to the Church; and SCALIGER of Verona: against whom ROBERT King of Naples, the Florentines, the Pope, and all those which were of the faction of the Guelphs, waged warre. The siege of Genoa continued fiue yeers, wherein many accidents befell both by sea and land; whither the King of Naples and the Pope sent threescore gallies to the relief thereof: and in the end the City was not taken, but the siege was raised, and many matters befell which I cannot write, for that I am to return to my history of LEVVES and FREDERICK;

RICK; both which were called, and pretended to be Emperors.

The eighth yeer being now expired since these two made warre, and FREDERICK pretending to make a conquest of the Country of Bauiere, whereof the Emperor LEVVES was called Duke, and was in possession (as Protector to his nephew, through the death of his brother RODVLPH) he leuied 2200 armed pikes, and a great number of other footmen which were his subiects, and of the King of Hungary, and other his friends: and therewith (being accompanied with his brother HENRY, and other Princes and great men, daily expecting the coming of his brother LEOPOLD out of Sueuia to ioyn with him, with eight hundred men at Arms, and a great number of foot) he departed from Austria, and entred Bauiere, wherein hee took Towns and Castles.

Being there for a time master of the field, his enemy LEVVES in the mean time was not idle: but of his owne forces, the Kings of Bohemia, the Archbishops of Treuier, and other of his friends which being absent sent their aid, he leuied an Army containing aboue thirty thousand foot, and about two thousand men at Arms. With these forces he went to seek his enemy, with a resolution to giue him battell before that his brother LEOPOLD should ioyn with him; which FREDERICK purposed to haue deferred vntill his brothers coming: but LEVVES came so neer him, and gaue him so many occasions, that, contrary to the opinion of most of his friends, he resolued to hazard a battell; and so vpon a morning, in the moneth of September, in the yeer of our Lord 1323, each of these competitors marshalling his squadrons, and both the one and the other assuming himself that in the victory consisted the possession of the Empire, with equall power and courage most valiantly beginning the fight, they maintained the same with great fury vntill it was dark night; that Author which setteth down least time, saith, that the battell lasted twelue houres: and in the end LEVVES hauing the victory, FREDERICK and his brother HENRY valiantly fighting were taken prisoners, and many others of great account were taken and slain.

A battell betwixt the Emperors Lewes and Frederick, wherein Frederick was ouerthrowne and taken

It is written, that in this battell were slain foure thousand horsemen, and so great a multitude of foot, that they number them not: so as the victors receiued no lesse losse than the vanquisht. After this notable victory, the most of the Cities and Princes which held with FREDERICK (conforming themselues with the time) yeelded obedience to LEVVES: and so he remained sole Emperor, whom all men imagined would haue put FREDERICK to death; but he, receiuing him to mercy, sent him prisoner to the Castle of Trifnir. FREDERICK's brother LEOPOLD (who as I said came to ioyn with him) vnderstanding that his brother was ouerthrowne and taken, was wonderfully grieued; and the more, when he knew that if he had forborn to fight vntill his coming, he might haue obtained the victory. This passion continuing in him, hee neuer left to molest the Emperor LEVVES during his life; first procuring his brothers liberty, and afterwards in reuenge to execute the wrath and displeasure which he had conceiued.

In this manner LEVVES, by the ouerthrowe and imprisonment of his enemy FREDERICK, remained sole Emperor: but he was not therefore free from troubles and warres; for, as he was chosen in discord and controuersie, so his Raign (though of long continuance) was euer vnquiet and full of crosses and troubles: wherefore the history of his time will be longer than ordinarily of others. When he had obtained this victory, he sent an Ambassador to Pope IOHN the 23 (who then lay in Auinion) and desiring him to confirm his election, yeelded apparant reason for the same. Pope IOHN, who had euer been his aduersary, would not grant his request, whereof FREDERICK's brother LEOPOLD was the principall occasion; who leauing his estate of Austria to his brothers OTHO and ALBERT, came into France to the Pope to incense him against the Emperor LEVVES, and to intreat him to command him to resigne the Empire, and to release his brother: and thence he went to the French King to procure the like; in both which places hee found good entertainment and fauour: and they sent their Letters and Ambassadors to the Emperor, requesting and requiring him to release FREDERICK, and presently to set him at liberty: but he, making his excuses, would not perform what they required; and knowing that the Pope was his enemy, he wrote his Letters of fauor, and sent authority to MATHEVV Viscount, and to his son GALEAZZO, Gouerners of Milan and of other Cities in Italy, to gouern the same for him; and he sent souldiers to them, and to others of the Gibelins.

The Pope being heerof aduertised (assembling many Bishops in Auinion, together with his Consistory of Cardinals, by the consent of the French King, and through LEOPOLD's entreaty, treaty, which solicited the same) excommunicated the Emperor, and alleaged for his reason, that he fauoured such as were enemies to his Church in Lombardy and in Italy; and therewith assigned him the term of three moneths; within which, he renouncing the election which was made of him, should appear before him, to answer to what should be obiected; and should recall the forces which he had sent to the Viscounts in Italy, and other enemies to his Church. The Emperor LEVVES answered modestly, that he had sworn at his election to maintain iustice, and therefore he had assisted Galeace in a iust cause. Moreouer, by the same oath hee was bound, that being chosen he should perform the office of an Emperor. Therefore the election was made, that he should be a true defender of iustice, and maintainer of peace in all his dominions; the defense whereof was recommended to the Emperor, and euery Power was bound by the word of God to do that which belonged to his office. Neither was the power to vse try the sword, giuen by the Pope, but by God: wherefore he maintained, that hee neither could nor would renounce the Empire which was giuen him from God; and if this answer would not satisfie the Pope, he would appeal to a lawfull Councell: and then he published his reasons and excuses through all Italy; where at that time were most cruell warres made by the Popes Legates and Captains, and the King of Naples, against the Viscounts, the Pisans, the Lucois, and other Cities and Princes Gibelins, whom the Emperor LEVVIS fauoured and assisted; whereof GEORGE MERVLA, LEONARD ARETIN, ANTHONY and MACHIAVEL, haue written at large.

The hatred between the Emperor and the Pope so much increased through the instigation of LEOPOLD of Austria, for that he would not release his brother FREDERICK, that the Pope, meeting the French King, consulted with him how he might depose the Emperor, and giue the Empire to the King of France: but the Emperor LEVVIS was of so great power in Germany, that this parley took small effect; neuertheless, to pacifie LEOPOLD, and FREDERICK's other kinsmen and friends (taking FREDERICK's oath, and such other security as he could giue him, that he would no more take vpon him the name of Emperor, neither practise or procure the same) he released him out of prison, and suffred him to go at liberty into his Country of Austria, where he after for a small space liued in peace and sorrow. Some write, that after three yeers imprisonment he was released vpon these conditions, that it should bee lawfull for him to bear the name of Emperor whil'st he liued, but not to vsurp any authority or iurisdiction. HENRY his brother, who was taken prisoner with him, freed himself by the restoring of certain Towns and Castles in Morauia, which the Austrians had in this warre taken from the Bohemians: and LEOPOLD, notwithstanding that he saw his brother at liberty, neuer desisted from molesting LEVVIS, but yet could doo little for the small time hee liued; and both of them dying without issue to succeed them, with their death the controuersie ceased.

The Emperor Frederick set at liberty by the Emperor Lewis

LEVVES being freed from this quarell with FREDERICK and LEOPOLD, and Letters coming daily to him from the Gibelins which took his part in Italie (soliciting him to com thither) and from the City of Rome it self, hee with a desire to rule and command, and to bee crowned there, resolued to go: wherefore, causing a Diet to be held in Spire, he gaue the Princes of Germany to vnderstand of his resolution; who, moued with his reasons, consented to his going, and some offred to serue and accompany him; and all, to aid him with men and money. And so leuying an Army he departed out of Germany, carrying with him his second wife called MARGARET, daughter to the Earl of Holland, and came to the City of Trent (in the yeer of our Lord 1327, and in the thirteenth of his Raign, reckoning from the beginning of him and FREDERICK) where he staied: for, thither he had appointed all the Cities which were at his deuotion to send their Agents, to treat of what was to be done. Thither came Ambassadors from GALEAZZO Viscount of Milan, and from his brothers, IOHN, MARK, LVCHIN and STEVEN (for, their father MATHEVV was dead) and from the Marquesse of Mantua, and from him of Verona, and the cities of Pisa and Lucca, and the rest within Lombardy which were in league with Milan, and from many others; who, making great offers to aid and assist him with men and money, counselled him presently to march forwards; and he did so, and came directly to Brescia, and thence to Milan, and there was crowned with the Crown of iron: where he staied aboue thirty daies after his coronation. And from thence, as some say, sending to entreat the Pope to confirm his election, and to absolue him of his excommunication, hee staied there longer than he thought to haue done, to get money to pay his souldiers: by reason whereof a greater contribution was to be leuied in Milan, and in other cities of the league, than they wil-willingly would haue paid: and GALEAS Viscount, sometimes by entreaty, and sometimes by counsel, sought to haue auoided the tribute which was to be leuied vpon his country: whereupon the Emperor made him, his sonnes and brothers, to be apprehended, and deposed them from the gouernment of the City; and, to win the good will of the people, and to shew that he gaue them liberty, he granted that they should chuse among themselues 28 Citizens and one President, which should haue the gouernment thereof. With this bait hee obtained what hee desired, and the tax which he had laid vpon them: which deed (although it is written after sundry manners) was the cause of great alterations; and that the Emperor was noted of ingratitude and exceſſiue cruelty, so to deal with those who had called him into the country, although it cannot be denied but that they were Tyrants.

Hauing dispatched his businesse in Lombardy, he took his way through Tuscane towards Rome, by the procurement of CASTRVCHO, who was one of the most valiant Captains of his time; and commanding in Luca, maintained the warre against the Florentines, and against CHARLS the sonne of ROBERT King of Naples, who with a great garrison defended that City by his fathers direction, to whom it was becom subiect: and he carried with him GALEAZZO Viscount and his brethren, prisoners.

The Emperor, being comn to Luca, was by CASTRVCHO receiued with very great ioy and solemnity: and from thence desiring to go to Pisa, the Pisans were in doubt whether they should receiue him or no; but in the end he was entertained, and made his abode there about two months. During which time, CHARLS of Naples being with great forces in Florence, the Emperor resolued to hould on his iourney without troubling himself with him; and beeing in Pisa, released GALEAS Viscount of Milan, and his sonnes, AZZO and MARK, vpon their oaths; and at CASTRVCHO his intreaty, whose authority (gotten by his valour in Armes) was then very great: who afterwards were released from all, in such manner as you shall hear. The Emperor going from Pisa, accompanied by CASTRVCHO with 1500 horse of his own, went along the sea coast towards Rome, purposing (as some write) after his coronation to haue gone against the King of Naples, who was his great enemy: whereupon, as soon as the Emperor was comn neer to Rome, CHARLS departing from Florence towards Naples to the aid of his father, left an excellent Captain called PHILIP CARNOSENSE, in Florence: and within short space after, this CHARLS dying (his father hauing no more sonnes) left two daughters.

The Emperor coming being knowne in Rome, caused great dissension and tumults; but as the greatest part was willing to receiue him, and the rest to the contrary, in the end he was solemnly receiued: but his coronation, and who crowned him, where, and vpon what day, is diuerſly written; which often happens among those which are present, much more among Historiographers: the truth is, that LEVVES was crowned in Rome by the hands of STEPHEN COLONNA, who at that time was Vicar of Rome (an office and gouernment then newly erected) yet LEONARD ARETIN and ANTHONY say, that his son SARRA COLONNA crowned him, and that he was crowned against the will of the Pope or his Legates, yet with great applause of the people both secular and regular.

The Emperor Lewes the Fift crowned in Rome.

It is written, that being in Rome, the Emperor would not be crowned before hee had deliuered vnto the Cardinals and Bishops, and then vnto the Senate consisting of many worthy men, the iniuries which Pope IOHN the 23 had done him, and had vnderstood that they approued his cause and affection to the Common-weal; referring the businesse to them, and promising to obserue what soeuer they should decree. He affirmed, that he did constantly beleeue the doctrine of the Catholick Church, and did alwaies wish a generall peace; whereto both the clergy and Senate answered, that they held that Pope IOHN the 22 had not done rightly, for that he had made decrees in so great a businesse without a Synod, or knowledge of the cause, and had followed them with excommunications, and therefore (knowing he was free from all false opinions) they would ioyn with him.

LEVVES being crowned, together with his Empresse, he was called Emperor and Semper Augustus; and the newes being dispersed ouer Italy, there repaired to him many chief men of the Gibelins: and he being very puissant, and accompanied by the valiant CASTRVCHO (of whom next to the Emperor was made chiefe that count) to iustifie his coronation and his other actions in the iudgement of the people, maintaining, that Pope IOHN the three and twentith, who then was in Auinion, neither was, neither ought to be held for Pope, hee of his owne authority created one PETER de Coruaria, a Franciscane Frier, Pope; which Frier (as writeth PLATINA) had been a married man, and in his wiues time took that habite: and he hee, accepting the Papacy, was called NICHOLAS, and made Cardinals and Bishops, and held a pontificall Court; and the Emperor gaue him the obedience and honour, as to a Pope; and being absolued of his excommunication, was confirmed in his Empire, and had else what he would desire: which was done against the will of many Priests & other regular persons, who therefore left Rome; yet there were others which, approuing the same, took part of the benefit.

The Pope excommunicated the Emperor.

When these newes were brought to Pope IOHN, he aggrauating his censures and excommunications, proclaimed him for no Emperor, but a Tyrant and an Vsurper of the Empire. The Emperor being in Rome, the Empresse bare him a sonne, called LVDOVICVS ROMANVS; and making preparation to go in person against the King of Naples, hee practised with FREDERICK King of Sicilia to do the like: but, staying longer in Rome than was expedient, it hapned that the Captain whom CHARLES of Naples had left with the garrison in Florence, together with the Florentines, surprised the City of Pistoia, which was at CASTRVCHO his deuotion, and in league with Pisa and Luca: whereof when CASTRVCHO (being then with the Emperor in Rome) was aduertised, he for fear to loſe the rest, presently departed, and comming thither, found great resistance; but in the end hee valiantly recouered the City. CASTRVCHO his departure from the Emperor made him so to alter his resolution, that, giuing ouer the enterprise of Naples, he departed with his Pope from Rome (wherein he left the best order that he could for his purpose, first establishing two Gouerners, one of the family of the Vrsins, and the other of the Colonnois, which were called the Emperors Vicars) and then hee took his way towards Florence; where when it was knowne that he was coming, all men were of opinion that he would haue taken that City by force, holding it not possible to bee defended, since that CASTRVCHO was in his seruice, against whom alone the Florentines could hardly make their party good: but it pleased God to dispose thereof after another manner; for, CASTRVCHO (in whom he reposed his chiefest trust) died, and his death caused so great an alteration, that the Emperor by his death, and through the losse of many of his people, and also for that others mutined, resolued to return into Germanie, first placing his Lieutenants in Pistoia and in Luca, out of which he put the sonnes and kinsfolks of CASTRVCHO: such are the rewards which ingratefull Princes vse to bestowe vpon the children of those which haue done them good and faithfull seruice. At the same time also died in Pisa, GALEAS Viscount (tyrant of Milan) depriued of that dominion; and the Emperor for a great summe of mony, gaue leaue to his sonne AZZO to return to Milan, which he promised the Emperor towards the paiment of his souldiers before his departure, and left his brother MARK in pawn for the same. Coming to Milan, he was receiued with great affection, into the same place and authority his father held; and recouerd in Milan the mony promised, and deliuered the same to the Germans, sent by the Emperor; who, forgetting to come therewith to Pisa, returned to their houses.

The Emperor leauing Pisa, resoluing to continue his journy into Germany, left his Pope there behinde him; who after, by the practice of one BONIFACE of Pisa, was taken and brought to Auinion, and coming in a priuate habit before the Pope, dyed in his power a prisoner. The Emperor passing through Lombardy into Germany, AZZO Viscount would not receiue him into the City, nor was the Emperor able to assault it. And so, leauing Italy, he left neither the peace nor the good gouernment which he found there: but the City of Pisa, and others which had held for him, when he was gon, cast out his Lieutenants and Gouerners; and the former tyrants therein, took mo Towns and Cities, most of which were Gibelins: and those of the house of GONZAGA then made themselues absolute lords of Mantoua, which they hold till this day.

It seems that the long continuance of their possession hath made their title iust & lawfull, adding thereto the confirmations made afterwards by Emperors & Popes after sundry sorts: and some Captains also had tyrannized: as, GALEOTTO MALATESTA in Ariminо; MANFREDO PIO in Carpi; RICHARD MANFREDI in Faenecia, and others in many other places. But for all this, the factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins was so rooted in Italie, that all the Gibelins which took his part presently solicited the Emperor for his speedy return: for, by his absence, the Guelphs, with the aid of the Florentins, the K. of Naples and the Pope, warred vpon them: but the Emperor, being otherwise busied in Germany, could not return, though hee desired the same. But IOHN K. of Bohemia by his direction leuied an Army and came into Italy; who past many aduentures which for breuity I omit: in fine, he thinking to please both parties, was cald Italies peace-maker: and hee procuring many parlies with the Popes Legates, thereby displeased both the one and other party, as it ordinarily happens to those who seek to pacifie two contrary factions, and fell into suspicion with the Emperour, but much more with the Lords of Italy: whereupon, AZZO Viscount Lord of Milan, MASTINO de la Scala, Lord of Verona, PHILIP GONZAGA Marqueſſe of Mantoa, VBERTINO di Carrara Lord of Padoa, the Marqueſſe of Ferrara, and ſome others, as ROBERT King of Naples, and the Florentines which vntill then had been their enemies, joyned together in a league and confederacy, promiſing that they would protect and defend the one the other againſt the whole world: for the which not onely the Emperor, but the Pope alſo was very much diſcontented; and there enſued great changes & alterations in all matters and affairs in Italy, which I haue no time to relate.

The Emperor ſeeing himſelf excommunicate, and that the Pope deſiſted not from proceeding againſt him, perſwaded all men that he was vniuſtly accuſed; and fearing ſome alteration, with fair words, large gifts, and good entertainment, ſatisfied the Lords and Princes of Germany, ſeeking otherwiſe to be abſolued, and ſome means of reconciliation, which was a matter almoſt impoſſible to be effected: for, the King of France, in whoſe countrey and (as we may ſay) power the Pope and his Cardinals then were, notwithſtanding that the Pope would, yet hee would not conſent thereto; and ſo the matter continued till the death of Pope IOHN, which was in the yeer of our Lord one thouſand, three hundred, thirty and foure, hauing been Pope 19 yeers and foure months: at which time the States of Carinthia and Tirol came to be vnited to the houſe of Auſtria.

Matters being in ſuch confuſion as we haue declared, and Pope IOHN being dead, the Cardinall of Saint Priſca, whoſe name was IACOB, born in Tholouſe in France, was choſen Pope; who was a Monk of the Order of CISTEAVX, and was called BENEDICT the Twelfth. Being inſtalled, he ratified and renewed the Sentence pronounced by his Predeceſſor againſt the Emperor; which he did ſo ſpeedily, that it was thought to haue been done through the inſtigation of the French King: but within fewe daies after, the King deſiring the Pope to make him his Vicar or Lieutenant Generall in Italy, and to giue him the tenth part of the Church reuenues and firſt fruits throughout all Chriſtendom (therewith to make a conqueſt of Ieruſalem) he ſo much troubled the Pope with that requeſt, that he made ſhew to be much diſcontented therewith; and began in ſecret to giue ear to the Emperors party: whereof he being aduertiſed, ſent him a ſolemn Ambaſſage, praying and intreating him to abſolue him, and to approue his election; whereto the Pope made a pleaſing anſwer, and the matter was at the point to haue been concluded: but the Kings of France and of Naples (enemies to the Emperor) ſo terrified the Pope and his Cardinals, that he durſt not perform it; ſo as the Emperors Ambaſſadors returned with good words of no effect: and the like hapned to the Ambaſſadors ſent by the Princes and Cities of the Empire, the next yeer following. Whereupon, foraſmuch as at that time there were great warres between EDVVARD King of England, and PHILIP the French king, about the ſucceſſion and right to the Crown of France, the Emperor entred into league with the King of England; ſo as there was great trouble and diſſenſion betwixt the one & other party: but in the end the French King, ſeeking the Emperors friendſhip, promiſed to cauſe the Pope to abſolue him, to the end that he ſhould ſtand his friend; ſo as the Emperor, through the great deſire he had to be confirmed in the Empire by the Pope, came to a compoſition with him. With this confidence in the French King, the Emperor ſent his Ambaſſadors into France; the which, together with the Kings Ambaſſadors, went to Auinion to treat of the matter: but the Pope with diuerſe reaſons ſo prolonged the concluſion, that it plainly appeard that it would take no good effect; which made the Emperor to ſuſpect the King: for, it was held for certain, that the Pope would therein haue ſatisfied the King, as in many other matters he had done, euen againſt his owne will; which was ſo euer as long as the Court of Rome remained in France, and is the reaſon why the Germane Hiſtorians, treating of the Emperors affairs, ſay, that the King of France made ſhew to deſire that which he would not haue, and the Pope to haue that which he deſired not.

The Emperors iniunction made againſt the pope.

The Emperor deſpairing to come to any agreement with the Pope, ſeeing that his Ambaſſadors returned without any ſuch end or concluſion as he expected, returned to his former rigour: and aſſembling a generall Diet or Councell, he ſought out learned men to pen his reſolution; and finding ſuch as were for his purpoſe (as Princes neuer want) after many matters treated of, he ſeeking to get the good will of the Princes, cauſed an iniunction to be diſpatched, wherein he affirmed the Sentence pronounced againſt him by Pope IOHN to bee vniuſt and of none effect, and that his excommunication did no way binde him: wherefore hee commanded, vpon great penalties, that no man ſhould obey his interdictions and cenſures in that behalf, alleaging other matters contained in the ſaid injunction, which the Popes friends would not ſhould be reuealed in any publike hiſtory: which injunction (being publiſhed, and commanded to be obſerued) cauſed great alterations in Germany, eſpecially amongſt the Clergy; ſome holding with the Emperor, others with the Pope. But DANTE, a man at that time, of a moſt excellent wit and profoundly learned, wrote a Book called The Monarchy, wherein hee ſeemed to fauour the Emperor; for which he was afterwards condemned, and his Book held for hereſie: and other great men wrote Books and Treatiſes defending the Popes ſupreme authority, alleaging the ſame to be aboue all principalities and powers; which (beſides other reaſons) they ſought to proue by hiſtories: as, how that Pope ADRIAN tranſlated the Eaſterne Empire into the Weſt, in the perſon of CHARLES the Great; and after, in proceſſe of time, the Popes remoued the ſame out of France into Germany, in the perſon of OTHO the Firſt; and how that many Emperors were excommunicated by them, yea and depriued of their Empires; and how that the manner and authority to chuſe them, was giuen by the Popes, and from them was deriu'd the power and authority of the Princes Electors; and that the Emperors were confirmed and crowned by the Popes. Yet there wanted not ſome which defended the Emperors cauſe; and ſo the Popes curſes and excommunications were contemned and rejected: but hee, knowing that the Emperor had publiſhed the ſaid Letter againſt him, renewed the ſame; and imploying his whole power, alleaged the Empire to be void, and that the gouernment thereof belonged vnto him vntill that a new Emperor were choſen, according to the declaration made by CLEMENT the Fift in the Councell of Vienne. And vnderſtanding that the Emperor purpoſed to come into Italy, he did one thing which then was held for a point of wiſdome, but experience teacheth, that it was very prejudiciall to his eſtate; which was, that he made thoſe Tyrants or Princes which in Italy held the Towns of the Empire, his Vicars or Lieutenants in the ſame Towns they held; to the end they ſhould be reſolute enemies to the Emperor; and, commanding that they ſhould neither receiue or obey the Emperor, gaue them power and authority to defend and maintain the ſame, as Lieutenants to the Church: which were, LVCHINO Viſcount, Tyrant or Gouerner of Milan, and other Cities; MASTINO SCALA in Verona and Vicenza; PHILIP GONZAGA in Mantoa and Reggio; ALBERTINO di Carra in Padoa & other places; ORIZO da Eſte in Ferrara and Modena: and foraſmuch as theſe were the Churchlands, he enjoined them to pay him yeerly ten thouſand Ducats of gold; with which title they were the more ſtrongly poſſeſſed of thoſe eſtates.

The Emperor excommunicate, and depriued by the Popes cenſures.

This contention continuing between the Emperor and the Pope, there failed not ſome who vſurped the Popes Towns: to which, or to the moſt part of them, in requitall of what the Pope had done to him, and to binde them to do him the better ſeruice, and the more to incenſe them againſt the Pope, the Emperor gaue and ſent titles and charters, making them Lieutenants for the Empire in the cities and lands appertaining to the Church of Rome: which they accepted and held, and the of-ſpring of many of them haue continued therein vntill this day. Amongſt which was GALEOTTO MALATESTA in Arimino; ANTHONY FERETRANO in the City of Vrbin; GENTIL VARANO in Camerino; GVIDO POLENTA in Rauenna; IOHN MANFREDO in Fauencia; ISMADETIO in Sanſeuerino; and NICHOLAS BOSCARETO in Eſſo: and in like manner others had the gouernment of, and continued by ſucceſſion in, other Towns and Cities.

These matters paſſing in this manner in Germany and Italy, Pope BENEDICT being dead (who had held that ſea the ſpace of ſeuen yeers and three months) in his place was choſen in Auinion, in the moneth of May, in the yeer of our Lord 1342, Pope CLEMENT the Sixt, in whoſe time were great alterations as well in the Cities of Lombardy as of Tuſcane. The Emperor ſought to come to ſome compoſition with the new Pope (as the Germane Authors write) but there was no peace to be expected: for, the Pope alleaged, that the Emperor ſued not for peace in ſuch humble and ſubmiſſiue manner as he ought to haue done. But CVSPINIAN, NAVCLERVS and MVCIVS write, that by means of the French King, who fained to be a good mediator between them, the Emperor ſent his Agents to Pope CLEMENT with full authority, to accept of any condition of peace that he would propound vnto them: to which the Pope gaue a certain note in writing, wherein they in the name of the Emperor were enjoined to confeſſe the Emperor to haue erred, and to haue been a ſchiſmatick, and diſobedient to the Church; and moreouer, that the Emperor ſhould preſently renounce his right to the Empire, together with the poſſeſſion thereof; and that he ſhould not intermeddle therein without the Popes permiſſion; and that the Emperors perſon, together with his ſonnes, ſhould be at the

The intolerable pride of Pope Clement the Sixt.

Popes disposing: all which Articles the Emperors Ambassadors accepted and granted in his name; whereat the Pope wondred.

These rigorous and terrible Articles and conditions being brought to the Emperor, he holding them for vniust and intolerable, sent the copy of them to the Princes and Cities of the Empire; and therewith summoned a generall Diet or Parliament to bee held in Franckford, where with a graue speech hee complained of the Pope, and shewed what his Ambassadours without his knowledge or consent had yeelded vnto; alleaging these demands to be made but onely to ruinate the state of the Empire, with other matters which hee thought might cause greater indignation against the Pope, and moue the Princes the more to fauor his proceedings. And his words wrought such effect, and the Popes demands seemed so dishonest and intolerable, that they adiudging the same to be reiected and not to be allowed, made great offers to the Emperor for the defense of his person and estate: yet some were of a contrary opinion, who affirmed that the Pope ought to be obeyed, and that the matter ought to be referred to him, as it was sworn and promised. Hee which held this opinion, was IOHN King of Bohemia, and his sonne CHARLES, who were discontent with the Emperour for some other causes: but the Councell resolued to send Ambassadors to Pope CLEMENT, to shew him that the conditions ought not bee performed, and so Ambassadours went: what ensewed wee will soone tell you; which was, that the Pope holding himselfe for deluded, was so enraged, that hee againe proceeding against the Emperor, sent to all parts copies of the fulminations and censures giuen by Pope IOHN, with a relation of his offenses, including the same within the compasse of heresie; and also that he had chosen and installed another Pope, and that he was not according to due order chosen Emperor, but by deceit and bribery; and that he neuer was Emperor, neither ought to be so called; and that he gaue Bishopricks and Prelacies at his pleasure, placing such as pleased him, and displacing such as were preferred by the Pope; and that he making marriages, dispensed like a Pope with such as were married within prohibited degrees of consanguinity, as he had done by his sonne LEVVES and the Countesse of Tirol, being allied vnto her within an vnlawfull degree; and she hauing an husband aliue, which was the sonne of the king of Bohemia: for which cause the Pope, sending his generall edicts against him, enioyned the Electors, vpon pain of excommunication, to meet and chuse a new Emperor; excommunicating all such as followed the Emperor LEVVES, or obeyed him. So as the Popes edicts, and the Emperors contradictions caused many insolencies and combustions in Italy and Germany. As the King of Bohemia and his sonne were his aduersaries, so they procuring the good will of the Duke of Saxony, and of the Archbishop of Colen, by bribes and large promises, sought to procure a meeting, and so to elect and chuse an Emperour. At the same time there were two which pretended to be Archbishops of Mentz, the one called HENRY de Vierner (whom the Pope condemned and depriued, for that he defended the Emperors cause) the other was by name called GERLASSE of Nassaw, whom the Pope had appointed to enioy the others place.

This GERLASSE, to shew his authority, and to accomplish the Popes commandement, summoned the Princes Electors to meet in the City of Rens, in the yeer 1346: where met the Duke of Saxony, the King of Bohemia, the Archbishops of Mentz, Treuier, and Colen: and so by reason of the Popes decree, alleaging the Empire to be void, they chose the King of Bohemia's sonne CHARLES for Emperor; LEVVES being then in Bauiere, busie in leuying forces to stay the same. The new elect CHARLES would presently haue gone to haue been crowned in Aken, but could not: for, that City held for the Emperor LEVVES, and was sufficiently fortified. Pope CLEMENT beeing aduertised of the election of CHARLES (as a thing done by his commandement, and against LEVVIS) presently confirmed and approoued the same, and procured the French King to aid and assist him, which he promised to do with all his power: but in the mean time befell a strange accident which marred all; which was, that shortly after, EDVVARD the Third, King of England, came into France with a mighty Army: and PHILIP the French King raised his whole power to fight with him; whereof the King of Bohemia and his son CHARLES (newly chosen Emperor) hauing intelligence, they with more haste than good speed with all their forces came in person to his aid, the more to binde him to perform his promise to them against the Emperor: and they ioyning in battell against the English (which, as all Writers affirm, was very cruell and bloudy, and continued fully six houres) the King of England in the end had the victory, and many great Personages of the vanquished were slaine. Amongst which was IOHN King of Bohemia; and the French King, and the new elect elect Emperor CHARLES escaped by flight. Through the losse of this battaile, the French King had so much to do to defend his owne countrey, that he could yeeld CHARLES no reliefe or succor at all against the Emperor LEVVES, which made his case the more doubtfull: but as he had the Popes fauor and the fauor of those which chose him, so was Germany diuided, some holding with him, others with the Emperor LEVVES: so as LEVVES his raigne ended as it began, with competencies and factions. But yet he forgat not to raise forces and to seek aid and friends, which with his life lasted but a while: but before we declare his end, I will briefly relate a strange accident that hapned in the city of Rome, which shall neither be impertinent, nor vnworthy to be related, which was this.

Rome at that time being gouerned in the Popes absence by two Senatours, as the Popes Vicars or Lieutenants; one of which was of the family of the Colonnois, the other of the Vrsins; a certain man born in Rome of meane parentage, whose name was NICHOLAS RENZO, who being of a great courage and high minde, yet of no greater calling then a Notary publike, in such manner wonne the good will of the people, which repaired vnto him, that he perswaded them to recouer the antient liberty of Rome, which (as a man well read in Histories) he laid open vnto them, and was not ashamed to tell them that it was requisite, for the good of the common-wealth, to alter the manner of the gouernement, and to reforme and reduce the same to the antient estate, rule and order: for seeing Rome was a free City and Lady of the whole world, they ought and were bound in duty to recouer her liberty. To theese speeches together with many other to the like effect, the common people (as light of beliefe, and desirous of nouelties) willingly gaue eare: and he found such fauor and good liking amongst them, as gathering a head, he seised on the Capitoll, and without that any man durst make head against him, he deposed the Popes Vicars or Lieutenants from the gouernment, and intituling himself NICHOLAVS SEVERVS (the fauourable Tribune of peace, liberty and Iustice, the noble redeemer and restorer of the sacred Roman common-wealth) he made and ordained Senators, and settled the gouernment of Rome in such manner as it was in the time of the antient Romanes, with so great obedience in all men, as if he had come from heauen for the same purpose. And he presently established such peace and iustice in the City, and made the same to be obserued in such manner, as the like had not been seen in Rome in 500 yeers before.

The fame whereof was presently spred into many parts, and all the Towns neere to Rome became obedient vnto him, and so did many other that were farre off: and all the tyrants and Princes hearing of so strange an accident, and of the title, and the enterprise which this man vndertook, sent Ambassadors to him; and making great offers, sought his fauor and friendshippe. And the matter was so carried in the beginning, as it seemed that in short space Rome would againe haue become Lady of a great part of the world. And as the report of such accidents is euer greater then the effect, so these news being carried out of Italie, such feare was generally that many altred their resolutions: And this NICHOLAS as a proud vaine man (nothing considering that vpon so weake and feeble a foundation he could not possibly build any great edifice) making Rome to be the head and Lady of all the World, he wrote his Letters with the aforesaid proud titles, to the Pope, requiring him to make his residence in Rome; and to the Emperour LEVVES and his competitor CHARLES, commanding them within a certaine prefixed time to make their appearance before him and the Romane Senate, and to shewe by what Title they held the Empire: The like hee wrote to the Princes Electors and to other Princes.

These Letters being seen and read (notwithstanding that they were held for vaine and friuolous) did put the Pope in a great perplexitie, seeing that Rome and the territory thereof in his time was vsurped. But this vanity continued not aboue seuen or eight moneths: for as it was grounded but vpon the fauor of the common people, so it soone waxing cold, and they repenting of what they had done, began to murmur and so to forsake him: whereupon he foreseeing his fall, departed from Rome, and went to CHARLES, the Emperors competitor: thinking to haue found fauor, and to haue made some league with him; but he caused him to be apprehended, and sent him to Auinion to the Pope, who commanded him to be detained prisoner: what end he had we will tell you, which truly is a pleasant discourse, as you shall see in the end, and so haue all the vanities of the world; although some last longer then others. What I haue spoken is written by BLONDVS, PLATINA, NAVCLERVS, and all the Historiographers. PETRARCH, in some of his Epistles affirmeth, that all the time that this man commanded, there was such peace and quietnes, and iustice was so duly executed in Rome and in part of Italie, that it seemed the Golden-age was come againe: wherupon hee made that excellent Sonnet which beginneth, Spirto gentil che quella membra reggi.

But now to returne to our History: Germany being thus diuided, some holding for the Emperour LEVVES, and others for the new chosen CHARLES, who was already King of Bohemia, this controuersie betweene these two was ended, through the sudden death of LEVVES, which happened vpon the seuen and twentith day of September, in the yeere of our Lord 1347, in this manner: He riding that day ouer the fields on hunting, was taken with so cruell an Apoplexie, that he fell from his horse and died suddenly, when he had raigned 33 yeeres, the first nine in contention and competency with FREDERICK, who was called Emperour: it was also suspected that he was poysoned by the widow of ALBERT of Austria, with whom he had been familiar. This Emperor hauing bin twice married, had six sonnes, and one daughter, which from their father inherited sundry Lordships and estates. At this time the Genowaics and the Venecians made most cruell warre one against another; the like did the English and the French. The Kings of Spaine wholly applied themselues to warre against the Moores.

In Constantinople raigned IOHN PALEOLOGVS, called CALOIOANNES, son of ANDRONICVS the younger, who had much to doe with CATACVZENVS (whom his father left for his tutor) about the Empire; sometime the one preuailing, and sometimes the other: by reason whereof they both are accounted Emperors; but in the end CALOIOANNES PALEOLOGVS was sole Emperour, as hereafter shall be declared.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES, THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND EIGHTTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

CHARLES hauing no Competitor, went to subdue those Countries which held with LEWES. Many were of opinion that the Empire was voyde: wherefore some of the Electours met at Vranckford, and chose successiuely two Emperours, which would not accept thereof. In the time of this CHARLES, was that memorable pestilence through all Europe, in Anno Domini, 1348. and the slaughter of an infinite number of Iewes. Afterwards the Electors chose one Gunther for Emperour, who comming against Charles died before any battaile. Charles hauing made an accord with the Electors which were his enemies, was freed from all his competitors; and came afterwards into Italie to be crowned, where he behaued himselfe with such humanitie, as there was no Lord or Common-wealth that did not acknowledge him for their Emperour: and contented to pay his Souldiers, he giuing priuiledges to sundrie Cities in Italy, hee returned into Germany: wherein he maintaining peace and iustice, hee sued to make his eldest sonne Wenceslaus King of the Romanes, which he obtained for money. After all these things falling sicke hee dyed, when he had valiantly raigned two and thirty yeeres.

WHen the Emperour LEVVES died, his Competitor CHARLES (who in his life time was called Emperour) was in his kingdome of Bohemia; and as soone as he was certified of his death, with the greatest power he could raise left his kingdome, to make himselfe Lord of such townes as held for the deceased Emperour LEVVES: and comming to Ratisbone he was there without any contradiction receiued as Emperor; and thence went to Nuremberg, and had there the like reception, and generally in all the other cities whither he came; for he released all the actions which he had against them, and promised to procure the Pope to absolue all those which had continued in the seruice of LEVVES: but he afterwards comming to Basil, they would not receiue him, except he first obtained for them the Popes pardon, and a release from all the curses pronounced against their citie, for that it held for the late Emperour: and while as they treated hereof, there came a Legate from the Pope, who hearing that LEVVES was dead, sent him to CHARLES with authoritie to absolue them and all the rest. And although that in this citie and in others theie was great contention, about the oth and the forme of the confession which the Pope had commanded to be made before they should be absolued; yet in the end absolution was giuen, and the Emperour with great solemnitie was receiued into the citie, and into some other places. And notwithstanding that in the beginning he had so good successe with some cities and Princes, yet with many of the rest he sped not so well: for those which had continued firme and loyall to the Emperor LEVVES, and had been enemies and made warre against CHARLES, would not accept him for Emperour; but holding the Empire voide, pretended a new election to be made; especially those Electors which consented not to his election; which were HENRY Archbishop of Mentz, (whom the Pope had deprined, and in his place set GERLAS of Nassaw) LEVVES Marques of Brandenburgh, ROBERT Count Palatine of Rhine and Duke of Bauiere; al which pretended that CHARLES his election was neither lawfull, nor of any validitie, for that it was not made in Franckford; and also for that the estates were not assembled by the Count Palatine, neither were they present, or sent their Agents or Proctors: all which things (they said) were requisite in a lawfull election: and HENRY the new Duke of Saxony and some cities ioyning with them, alleaged also that those which chose him were corrupted with mony by CHARLES and his father IOHN King of Bohemia; and also that he was not crowned in Aken as hee ought to haue been. For which causes (although in my opinion the greatest was the splene and hatred which they bare him) in the beginning of the yeere 1348, the aforesaid Princes met in the citie of Franckford (notwithstanding that CHARLES vsed all his power and policie to haue preuented the same) where declaring the Empire to be voide (the Bishops of Colen, Treuier and the other Bishop of Mentz being absent) by the common consent of those which were present, they chose the king of England (for that he was descended from the Germane bloud) for Emperor, to whom they presently sent their Ambassadours to the same effect: but after that hee had well considered of the matter, refusing their offer, he sent to them, desiring to be held excused: And they seeing themselues frustrate of their hope, chose FREDERICK Marquesse of Misnia, who was a man of great iudgement and very valiant; who standing in doubt whether he should accept it or no, and considering well thereof (for CHARLES being thereof aduertised, to the end that hee should not accept the election, sent him a great summe of gold and siluer, and therewith gaue him to vnderstand of the inconueniences that would ensue) made the like answere as did the King of England: so as for that time without agreeing vpon any other, these Princes stil continuing disobedient to the Emperor CHARLES, departed from Franckford not chusing any Emperour at all.

Edward the 3. King of England being chosen, refused to be Emperor.

The chiefest cause of their departure was the plague in that countrey, which in that time was so great and so vniuersall through all parts of Europe, that the like thereof before that time had neuer beene seene nor heard of: for Historiographers affirme that it continued aboue one whole yeere, Generall plague through all Europe.

yeere, beginning in the yeer one thousand three hundred forty eight, and ending in Anno 1350; which raged in such extreme manner, that where it did least harme, the tenth person escaped not.

BLONDVS saith, that he heard his grandfather GASPAR BLONDVS affirme with an oath, that many townes in Italy were therewith so dispeopled, that not any one remained therin aliue. During the time of this calamity, there was a generall peace, so as not any could or durst make warre against other, except a little which was made against the Synagogues of the Iewes: for the common people took a conceit, and it was firmly beleeued, that the Iewes had poysoned the waters, and caused this plague; whereupon (the Princes and gouernors being no way able to preuent the same) the Iewes were euery where torne in peeces, and an infinite number of them were by the Christians sacked and robbed, in France, Italie, Germany and Spaine. At this time also the French King gat the Countrey of Daulphine, and the City of Vienne the head thereof; which doe now belong to the Princes of France; which was giuen him by HVMBERT, Daulphin of Vienne, hauing no heire to succeede him; vpon condition that the eldest sonne of France should bee called Daulphine of Viennois.

In the yeere 1350. our Lord mitigating his ire, and the plague ceasing, Pope CLEMENT this yeere by the consent of his Cardinals ordained that the Iubile which Pope BONIFACE the 8. had granted to bee held in Rome euery hundredth yeere, should he held that yeere; and thenceforth euery fiftith yeere, considering the shortnes of mans life; so as an infinite number of people repaired to Rome to the Iubile. After the daunger of the plague was past, men presently being free from the feare thereof, returned to their wars and defension, principally the aforenamed foure Princes Electors, HENRY Archbishop of Mentz, LEWES Marques of Brandenburgh, RODVLPH Duke of Bauiere and Count Palatine of Rhine, and HENRY Duke of Saxony: all which rebelled against the the Emperour CHARLES, and stood vpon their guard; and the one aiding and assisting the other, they againe met at Frankford, and after many consultations, chose GVNTHER Earle of Swarzemburgh, who was an excellent and very valiant man of warre. This man with the aid of those that chose him, and of his friends and kinsfolks, with a great number of very good men of warre, came to Frankford; where attending his enemies comming, hee kept the field the space of sixe weekes (for so they write was then the manner of the new chosen Emperors). That time being expired, he was receiued into the city, and sworne and obeyed for Emperor. And notwithstanding that the Emperor CHARLES had lenyed a very great power, yet being vnwilling to hazard his whole fortune in one battaile, he would not fight with GVNTHER: but all the Princes of his faction, meeting in the City of Spire, it was concluded that he should employ his whole power to make head against GVNTHER, and by force of Armes defeate him.

Gunther Earle of Swarzemburgh chosen Emperor against Charles King of Bohemia.

With this resolution the Emperor CHARLES with his Army took his way towards Mentz; and the one drawing neere the other, the war began between them, which men thought would haue proued very terrible and cruell: but through the death of GVNTHER, peace ensued: before which time some write it was concluded; for as soone as GVNTHER fell sick, some vnpassionate Princes sought to reconcile them: the conditions of the peace were, that GVNTHER should renounce the Empire to CHARLES, and that CHARLS should giue him two walled Cities in Turinge, together with their confines. But in the time of this treaty (as most writers affirme) GVNTHER died, poysoned by his Physician; who being to giue him a purging potion, and taking but the assay of it, died together with GVNTHER the next morrow; which made men to thinke, that without the knowledge of the poore Physician, poyson was put into the decoction; so as, GVNTHER dying in the time of the parle of peace, CHARLS remained sole Emperour, and in good sort compounded with those which were his aduersaries, who being weary of choosing Emperors, the controuersy ended, to the contentment of all men. And for as much as the plague was in Aken, he was with great solemnity crowned in another city; and going afterwards in his progresse, he visited many Cities, to which he gaue sundry priuiledges.

In time of this prosperity he had a sonne whose name was WENCESLAVS, of whom we shall haue cause to speake hereafter: and he applying himself with great care to maintain peace and justice, there yet rested for him to goe to be crowned in Italy; whereof Pope CLEMENT the sixt was very desirous: but in his time it could not be, for he died within few daies after. At this time the Viscounts hauing made themselues Lords of Milan, were of great power in many other Cities, the chiefest of which was IOHN Viscount Archbishop of Milan, a man feared through through all Italy; who by the Popes permission vnder the title of his Vicar, or Lieutenant, made himself Lord of Bologna, for which he was to pay yeerely 12000 ducats of gold. Pope CLEMENT being dead, INNOCENT the sixt was chosen; This Pope sent for Legate into Italy the valiant Cardinal Giles, a Spaniard borne, who was called Don GIL CARILLO ALBORNOZ, who by his great witt and valour, comming twise into Italy recouered all the Cities and lands of the Church which had been vsurped by tyrants: in the beginning of whose Papacie was fought the memorable battaile by sea betweene threescore galleys of the Genowaies, vnder the command of PAGAMO DORIA; and fourescore of the Venecians, the Kings of Arragon, and the Emperours of Constantinople, who were in league togerher against them; which battaile was fought in the streight of Constantinople, and lasted from the break of day vntill the euening, in which the Genowaies had the victory, but with losse of many of their people: and the yeere following which was in the yeere 1354, the Venecians and Catalonians repairing their fleete, againe fought with the Genowaies, neere to the Ile of Corsica, wherein the Genowaies were so pitifully ouerthrowne and with so great losse, that one and fortie of their galleys, with all the men in them, were sunke in the sea; by meanes of which ouerthrow their power was so much weakned, that they became subiect to IOHN Viscount Archbishop of Milan, vpon condition that he should protect them; yet there ensuing other alterations, they afterwards committed themselues to the protection of the French King.

A nauall battaile between the Genowaies and the Venecians.

At this time also was a treaty betweene the Emperour and the Pope, concerning the Emperours comming into Italy to be crowned in Rome, he making preparation for the same. There befell in Rome also another great accident, although not so much spoken of as that of NICHOLAS RENZO who would haue raised Rome to her auncient state and dignitie, and was called the Enfranchiser of Rome: which was, that another Notary called FRANCIS VARONCELLO, imitating the said NICHOLAS, incensed the people, and with the same title of Romane Tribune, deposed the two Senatours, IOHN VRSINO, and PETER de Colonna, who gouerned as the Popes Vicars: whereof the Pope being aduertised, and fearing that the matter would haue growne of importance; to auoid a further inconuenience, he thought it best to release NICHOLAS RENZO, whom his predecessor CLEMENT had left in prison; and thinking (as we say) to driue out one naile with another, sent him to Rome against FRANCIS; who vsed such meanes, through the helpe of the Romane Nobilitie, that by force hee expelled FRANCIS VARONCELLO out of the Capitoll and slew him in fight: but after this victory, the said NICHOLAS with a desire to vsurpe, persecuting the Colonnois fell at variance with the principall men of Rome, and in the end was slaine; and so Rome was deliuered from both the one and the other: and then one GVIDO IORDAN (by the Popes consent) was made Gouernor, and afterwards there were two.

While these matters were in hand, it was agreed between the Pope and the Emperour (as write the Italian authors) that as soon as the Emperour should be crowned in Rome by Cardinals, without making any longer stay, he should returne into Germany. The Emperour and Empresse accompanied with many Princes and a great Army, in the yeere 1355 came into Italy, with intent onely to be crowned, and to fauour and further the Popes proceedings, which hee did accordingly, which made his iourney easie: for being come into Italy and seene to vse no violence, or to oppresse any man, neither to depriue or dispossesse any man of his goods or lands, he was very honorably receiued by the Lords of CARRARA in Padoa, and afterwards by the GONZAGAS in Montoa, and by those of the house of ESTE in Ferrara, and by the Viscounts in Milan, and by the most of the Lords of Italy, which did him homage, and acknowledged him for their Emperour; and he left them in their lands and estates: and comming to the city of Milan he was crowned there with the Iron Crown, and from Milan went to Pisa; whither came Comissioners to him from Florence, and from many other cities, who acknowledging him for their Emperour, and suing for peace and his fauour, furnished him with money for the paiment of his souldiers; and so departing from Pisa, he went peaceably to Rome, where they attended his comming, and was solemnely receiued by the Cardinals Legats which came to crowne him, together with the Senators, the Popes Vicars, and with all the Clergy and Romane people: and on Easter day, which was the morrow after his comming, hee together with his wife the Empresse, was after the accustomed manner by the aforesaid Cardinals crowned with great pompe. His coronation being ended, as he came in peace and quietly, without offending or grieuing any man, so he departed from Rome, contenting himselfe with their seruice and the money which they had giuen him, which (some write) amounted to a very great summe; and so so he returned into his countrie, more peaceably and with lesse tumult, then euer any Emperor that came into Italy before him had done. Being in Italy he fauoured Don Giles Cardinal of Albornoz who recouered the patrimonie of the Church.

At this time King IOHN of France being in a battaile taken prisoner by the King of England, after foure yeeres imprisonment, was vpon certaine conditions of peace set at liberty. This King had by inheritance the Duchie and County of Burgundy, which after his decease he gaue to his second sonne PHILIP, whose offspring enioyed the same; from whom lineally descended the Emperour CHARLES the Fift, by his grandmother, who was Lady of that estate. What ensued after the Emperours returne into Germany is briefly and confusedly written, and the Annales of Germany treate of some matters of small importance, and that very preposterously; wherefore I will write onely what shall seeme most agreeable, vntill we come to the end of his life. First, this Prince is commended for his wit and humanitie, and to haue been discreete and iust in administring iustice, and to haue been learned in the tongues, and wel seene in history, and indifferently well in other Arts and Sciences, whereof he made no small benefit in his actions. CARION writes, that after the Emperors returne out of Italy, he called a famous assembly of Princes in the Cities of Mentz; where the matter being wisely discust with the cheefe orders of the Empire, for the contracting into one, and reducing into order, the antient and moderne institutions concerning the Maiestie and honor of the Empire, and of euery one in particular, he made a law which is famous by the name of the golden Bull, comprehending certain orders to be obserued in the Emperors election, and prouiding for the power, authority, and dignitie of all orders: which worke of his was very commendable; for that hath been a firme bond of publike peace. By this law he did strengthen the Maiestie of the Empire, and did cut off all occasions of dissension in the election; by this he did so bind the Emperour and Princes, as no man durst attempt any thing to the preiudice of the Common-wealth or Emperor. And as he was much affected to his countrey of Bohemia, so (as Pope PIVS QVINTVS and other authors write) in Prage he erected sundry stately edifices; and made the Church and Archbishoprick of that citie a Metropolitane, exempting it from the Church of Mentz, and erected an Vniuersitie in that citie, wherein Arts and Sciences were read; and all his whole life time he had so great a care to adorne that citie and kingdome, that the rest of Germany murmured against him for it, and so doe the Historiographers which write thereof. In those daies some sedition and tumults arose in the citie of Nuremburgh, which in the end he pacified, although with some difficultie. It happened also that EBERARD Earle of Wittembergh made an Insurrection against this Emperour, and had a great Army and many followers; but all was pacified, and CHARLES raigned peaceably. In the yeere following, which was in the yeere 1362, died Pope INNOCENT the Sixt, and in his place was chosen Cardinall WILLIAM of S. Victor, a Monke of S. BENNET's order, and was called VRBANE the Fift.

The golden Bull made by Charles.

This Pope hauing resolued to come into Italy, the better to secure and settle his estate he sent to entreate the Emperor to doe the like: which he chiefly did, for feare of the Viscounti Lords of Milan, and of the greatest part of Lombardy, which the Emperor at his entreatie performed: at which his comming I finde it not written that he came by Milan, for that BARNABY and GALEAS Visconti were not his friends; but he took his waie by Padoa, and from Padoa to Bologna, and thence to Pisa, and so to Rome, where he found the Pope: what they did there, I finde not written, either through negligence or for that it little imported; one thing BLONDVS, PLATINA, and others report, that it was vnknowne what was become of the heads of S. PETER and S. PAVL, and that the Pope and the Emperour made great search for them, and at last found them and set them where they stand (as they say) this day. After this, the Emperor hauing been but three moneths in Italy, returned into Germany, and after his departure the Pope went to Marselles in Prouence in France, and thence to Auinion where he died; after whose decease PETER de Belfort Cardinal of S. MARY the new was chosen, and called GREGORY the Eleuenth.

The Emperor in the same yeere summoned a Diet to be held in the citie of Franckford, where after many practices, he entreated the Princes Electors to make his sonne WENCESLAVS, King of the Romanes, and his successor; which was not onely solicited by entreatie, but by great gifts and large promises; which were so excessiue, that (as PIVS QVINTVS writeth) he promised an hundred thousand Ducats to euery Elector: and as the summe was greater then he was able to pay, he gaue in pawne for the same many townes and lands of the Empire, which they hold vntill this day. This they write to be the cause of the weakning of the Emperours power power which were his successors; which ALBERT CRANTZ also confirmeth in his History of Saxony, alleaging that this Emperor morgaged sixteen Imperiall townes in Sueuia to the neighbour Princes, which, together with the imbecillity and baseness of his son WENCESLAVS who succeeded him in the Empire, so decayed and weakened the power of the Emperors in Germany, that they neuer recouered their former vigour: this was imputed to haue been a great ouersight in so wise a Prince, notwithstanding that in all his other actions he gouerned with great policy and wisedome. Yet many imperiall cities, through sundry accidents which hapned, without his commandement or leaue, made war vpon the Earle of Wittembergh, which war continued many daies, and many were slain of either party: wherewith the Emperor being much displeased, and fauoring and assisting the Earle, he besieged the city of Vlme, where he punished some for examples sake.

In this meane time, some cities in Italy belonging to the Church of Rome, discontent with the gouernment of the Popes Vicars or Lieutenants, rebelled against him: Whereupon, the Pope knowing the great preiudice which his Church receiued through his absence, resolued to returne with his court to Rome: for which purpose (vnder another pretext) in the yeere one thousand three hundred seuenty six, he caused certain gallies to be rigged and armed in the riuer Rodanus, wherein embarking himselfe he sailed into Italie: and so the Papall court after it had continued in France the space of threescore and ten yeers and somwhat more, and the most part of that time in the city of Auinion, returned to Rome.

The Emperour hauing raigned now 32 yeers, and being busie in pacifying the cities in Germany which warred against the Earle of Wittembergh, was in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand three hundred seuenty eight, taken with an infirmity, whereof he dying, left two sonnes legitimate; the eldest of which was called WENCESLAVS, who was already King of the Romans, and succeeded his father in the kingdome of Bohemia by inheritance, and in the Empire by election: the others name was SIGISMVND, who afterwards by the right of his wife was king of Hungary, and in processe of time came to be Emperor.

Some Authors write of the Emperour CHARLES, that he had been worthy of praise, if he had not more affected Bohemia and France then the Empire, if he had not been more carefull of his owne priuate interest then of the publike; and to aduance his posterity, then to enlarge the Empire; if he had not been more greedy of money, then to do what was right and iust, and if he had not both in Germany and Italie, diminished the dignity and wealth of the Empire, alienating kingdoms and the publike reuenues, selling Immunities, and granting liberties: wherefore the Empire being spoiled of many ornaments, his posterity did not raigne long, but was vnfortunate, and in the end fell; but yet he may not be depriued of his due commendation, for the constitution which he made, which was very beneficiall to the common-wealth.

Touching the Emperors of Constantinople (of whom I am bound to make some mention) I finde so great confusion in the Histories of those times, as there was in that Empire; wherein were factions and warres: but in summe, in the time of CHARLES the Fourth in Germany, the discord in Constantinople between IOHN PALEOLOGVS CALOIOANNES, and his father in law IOHN CATACVZENVS (both which were called Emperors) was the cause that AMVRATH King of the Turks (hauing taken all that the Christians held in Asia) vnder color to help and succor CATACVZENVS, passing Hellespont, came into Europe, and took Gallipoli, and other cities in that coast, and afterwards the city of Adrianople: and he passing forewards, there came against him LAZARVS DISPOTE of Seruia (which in antient time was called the vpper Misia) and MARKE DISPOTE of Bulgaria (which is part of the antient lower Misia) and many other Princes; which in a battaile about the yeer of our Lord 1363 being ouerthrown, AMVRATH became Lord of a great part of the Christians lands in Europe; and his sonne BAIAZETH succeeding him conquered more; and so the Empire of Constantinople daily decreased. And afterwards in the time of the Emperour WENCESLAVS, CALOIOANNES being now old, and hauing dispossessed CATACVZENVS, dying, a son of his called EMANVEL PALEOLOGVS succeeded him.

THE LIFE OF WENCESLAVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND NINTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

IT seldome hapneth that the sonnes imitate their fathers goodnesse, chiefly among Princes, But Wenceslaus would verifie this rule in himselfe: for being without any contradiction chosen Emperor, he prooued so vnlike his father in goodnesse, that he left of himselfe as much infamy, as his father did glory: Neither did he pacifie the wars which in Germany were kindled in his fathers time, but suffered them to proceede; which was the cause of much misery in that countrey. In his time began the great schisme which continued forty yeers. The Turks in his time made great conquests vpon the Christians: and Iohn Galeas made himselfe in his time Lord of Lombardy. The Electors seeing the small care that this Emperor took to be crowned for the defence of Christendome, to set his hand to the good gouernment of the Empire, especially in the affaires of Germany, and that he led a base and a licentious life, deposed him, as vnprofitable and of no worth. When he had vnworthily raigned Emperor two and twenty yeers, he afterwards died a priuate Lord.

ALthough that the desire to come to an end of this History (being neer thereunto) doth incite me to make haste; yet there are so many matters to be written of, and modern Historiographers haue so copiously set down the same, as I am constrained (euen against my will) to prosecute the remainder more at large; wherein I presume to be held excused, for the pleasure and profit which the Reader shall receiue thereby: wherefore to auoide prolixity, I say, that WENCESLAVS King of Bohemia, and eldest sonne to the Emperor CHARLES the Fourth, succeeded his father in the Empire; who proued very vnlike to his father; for hee grew to be vicious, and of little worth. It is written of him, that he had nothing in him like vnto a man, but the forme; and that was crooked and deformed, more like to THERSITES then a Prince. He was dull witted, basely inclined, affecting nothing but pleasures, not caring for the Commonweale nor any honesty; A coward and very cruell; Of a lazy body, fit for nothing but the pleasures of gluttony and filthy lusts, if they may be called pleasures: But yet in the beginning, as he was yong, and men were in good hope of him; being chosen in his fathers time King of the Romanes, he was presently without any great contradiction obeyed for Emperor, and was so two and twenty yeers, and in the end lost it, as you shall heare.

His brother SIGISMVND being of more spirit, and fifteen yeers yonger then WENCESLAVS, LEVVES king of Hungary married him to his daughter (who was also by his mother ther King of Poland) and thereby SIGILMVND came afterwards to be King of Hungary, as we will declare, of whom in the History of WENCESLAVS we shall make especiall mention, for in processe of time he came to be Emperour; for by reason of the insufficiency of WENCESLAVS, little is to be written of him: so as of these two and twenty yeeres that he held the name of Emperor, the least that is to be said, is of him; but yet neuertheless passing it vnder his name, we will briefly relate what passed in the countries subiect to the Empire in his time, wherein he should haue borne the greatest sway, if he had not been so base and negligent; for although it seeme little to the purpose, yet it shall be expedient for the knowledge of such matters as follow.

First, for the warre betweene the cities of Germany, and the Earle of Wittembergh, which his father before his decease sought to haue extinguished, his sonne had no such care: for in his time it encreased; and Germany from the beginning of his raigne, vntill the end thereof, endured want both of peace and iustice. In his time also hapned a schisme in the Church of Rome: for in the same yeer that the Emperor CHARLES the Fourth died in Germany, in Rome died Pope GREGORY the eleuenth, who as I said returned the Papall court to Rome: and after his decease the Cardinals assembling themselues in the Conclaue to choose a successor, of which, thirteene were French-men, and foure Italians, whither all the Romane people running, desired them to choose an Italian, and no French-man; and the French Cardinals vsed all meanes to haue had a French-man, and the rest an Italian: And notwithstanding that the greatest number were French, yet disagreeing amongst themselues, one BARTHOLMEVV a Neapolitan, and Archbishop of Barri was chosen Pope, who tooke for his name VRBANE the sixt. The French Cardinals presently repenting, alleaged that what they had done was for feare of the Roman people; whereupon some of them departed from Rome: yet VRBANE notwithstanding was consecrated, and generally obeyed; and those which had absented themselues returned, and so they continued three moneths: which being expired, through some discontentments which they conceiued against him (and as PLATINA writeth, for that he shewed himselfe seuere and rigorous against the abuses and pride of the Clergy) eight of the French Cardinals, faining that they left Rome by reason of the heate, went to Fundi,; where being fauoured by Queene IOANE of Naples which sold the City of Auinion to the Pope, they pretending and publishing the election of VRBANE to haue been made by violence, that he was no Pope, and that the Sea was voide; they amongst themselues in Fundi chose a new Pope and called him CLEMENT the seuenth; whom Queene IOANE and all the kingdom of Naples obeyed and held for Pope; and so began the schisme, which lasted forty yeers. Through the warres and dissension betweene Princes, Christendome was diuided into two factions; for besides Queene IOANE and her kingdome of Naples, the French king fauoured Pope CLEMENT, and perswaded the King of Castile to doe the like. All Italie (excepting Naples) obeyed Pope VRBANE; so did the Emperor WENCESLAVS, Germany England and Portugall; and the one and the other alleaged such reasons, and so great and so worthy personages took part with the one and the other, as it made the matter very doubtfull.

This schisme (as I say) continued long, notwithstanding that those which were chosen died, for the Cardinals of either party chose a successor, and held the chaire for voide, as hereafter shall appeare. Pope CLEMENT went into France, where with the aide of the French King, and of the Queene of Naples and of Prouence, he held his court in Auinion, and VRBANE remained in Rome; and they two making warre, either of them by all meanes possible sought the others destruction. Pope VRBANE sent his Ambassadours to complaine to the Emperour WENCESLAVS, of what had happened, and to perswade him to come into Italie in fauor of him, against the Queene of Naples, who then was the widow of LEVVES Duke of Tarent, after that she had murthered her first husband: But he giuing them good words took little care for the matter, but yet he and his brother SIGISMVND sent to Pope CLEMENT at Auinion, admonishing him to leaue the name of Pope, and to submit himselfe to Pope VRBANE.

Pope VRBAN finding himself much grieued against Queeene IOANE, for that through her assistance the schisme began (that Kingdom being subiect and held of the Church of Rome) sent to treate with CHARLES, Nephew to LEVVES King of Hungary (who as some say) was the sonne of her husband ANDREVV King of Naples, whom she had made away) to come into Italie with an Army; promising him (as a schismatick and disobedient to his Church) to depriue Queene IOANE, and to make him King of Naples, whereto CHARLES and his Vncle

LEVVES King of Hungary willingly gaue ear, which LEVVES was father-in-law to SIGISMVND the Emperors brother; who, being very glad thereof, gaue him his aid and counsell. CHARLES, when as he was called to the Kingdome of Naples, made warre against the Venecians: for he and his Vncle, the King of Hungary and Poland, fauoured the Genowaies; betweene which and the Venecians in those daies were very great and cruell warres, many Princes assisting both the one and the other party: in which war many great exploits were performed, chiefly by sea; sometimes the one party preuailing, and sometimes the other. But at this time the Genowaies had the Venecians at such an aduantage, that with a mighty fleet of Gallies by sea they besieged the City of Venice, and their partakers and friends made very sharp warre against them by land; so as the City was in danger to haue been taken and ruined. We may say, this was the most cruell warre that vntill that time euer was seen in the world: for, therein was artillery first of all vsed by the Venecians; which was about the yeer of our Lord one thousand three hundred, eighty two, or a little while after. The inuention of this pestilent scourge of mankinde was attributed to the Germanes: some say that a Monk, who was a great Philosopher, found out the same; not to that purpose to haue killed and slain men therewith, but with a desire to haue experimented the quality and naturall force of things. Others are of opinion, that it was one PETER, a great Magician: but it importeth little to knowe who it was; for, besides the ordinary Historiographers which I follow in this place, ther be many others write thereof.

Artillery first vsed in the warr.

Venice escaping from being taken in this warre, and many other matters succeeding; the Duke of Sauoy treated, and set downe articles of peace between those two Common-wealths, which peace was concluded. So as to return to my discourse, CHARLS being called to the kingdom of Naples, he went into Hungary: where being furnished with men and other fauors by his Vncle King LEVVES, and the Emperor WENCESLAVS, he came into Italy, and to be briefe (leauing what befell him vpon the way) he went to Rome, and was very honorably receiued by the Pope, and thence took his way towards the kingdom of Naples; and comming to blowes with Queen IOANS Army, he ouerthrew and scattered the same; and then marching to the City of Naples tooke it: and the Queene retiring to Castel nouo was therein besieged, and so CHARLES in short space made himselfe Lord of the whole kingdom, which was in the yeer of our Lord one thousand, three hundred, eighty two. Queen IOAN, being besieged, sent to the French King, to her Countrey of Prouence, and to Pope CLEMENT, for relief; and forasmuch as she had no issue, she adopted LEVVES Duke of Aniow, Vncle to the French King, for her heir: which LEVVES, with a puissant Army of French-men, and with all the fauour that Pope CLEMENT and the Countrey of Prouence could yeeld him, went to relieue her; which was so great, that what is written thereof seems incredible: for they write, that he came with aboue thirty thousand horse. Being comn into the Territory of Bologna in Italie, warring vpon such as were his aduersaries, and giuing it out that he came to set Queen IOAN at liberty, to supplant Pope VRBAN, and to place Pope CLEMENT (of which, both the one & the other in any mans iudgement was easie to haue bin done) in the midst of his iourny (which was very long by reason of the great number of people which came with him, and being hindred by King CHARLES of Naples, and Pope VRBAN) hee was taken with so vehement a sicknes, that within very fewe dayes it depriued him of life; and his Army, without a Leader being diuided and dispersed, returned to their Countrey: and so was King CHARLES freed from this fear; who, hauing by sundry practices gotten Queen IOAN into his power, commanded her secretly to be drowned: and so she dying, suffred punishment for the death of her husband; and CHARLES remained King and absolute Lord of Naples, with whom the Pope fell at variance, and other matters followed.

The death of Lewes Duke of Aniow.

While these things passed in Italy, there was neither peace nor quietnes in Germany, through the negligence and little care of the Emperor WENCESLAVS; who, making his abode in his Kingdome of Bohemia, gaue himself wholly ouer to his pleasure. About this time died the Earl of Flanders; and PHILIP Duke of Burgundy, son to King IOHN of France, inheriting his estate, the houses of Flanders and Burgundy were vnited. It hapned at that time also, which was in the yeer of our Lord one thousand, three hundred, eighty three, that LEVVES King of Hungary and Poland dying, left onely two daughters; of which, one who was called MARY was maried to the Emperors brother SIGISMVND, who by her inherited the Kingdome of Hungary: and the other was maried to the Duke of Austria, with the title of the Kingdome of Poland.

King

King LEVVES being dead; and SIGISMVND being but fifteen yeers old, after that he and his wife were crowned, his mother in law Queene ISABEL had the gouernment of the kingdome: who following the counsell of the Earle of Gara (a fauorite of hers) gouerned with such rigor and seuerity, that the greatest part of the subiects murmuring against her, rose and rebelled; and as SIGISMVND was but a childe, and she a woman, and the Emperor vnable to relieue them, the rebellion could not be pacified: whereupon the principall men of that kingdome, sent for CHARLES king of Naples, alleaging that the inheritance of the kingdom of Hungary appertained vnto him, and to no other; for that he was a man, and neerest of blood vnto King LEVVES deceased. King CHARLS thirsting after another kingdom, and hoping of the like good successe in Hungary as he had in Naples, accepted the offer; and making preparation for his iourney, leauing the gouernement of Naples to his wife; with the greatest prouision of men and money that he could make (for that he would not compasse Italy about) sailed along by the Adriatick Sea (now called the Gulph of Venice) and landing at a place in Slauonia, subiect to the kingdom of Hungary, was there so well receiued, and in like manner by all those of that kingdom, that the yong King SIGISMVND, doubting of the power of his friends which held with him, leauing his wife and his mother in law the widow Queen in Hungary, fled to his brother the Emperor, who then was in Bohemia: and the Queene mother being a subtle woman, sent a messenger to welcome king CHARLS into the countrey, and to tell him that she reposing her trust in his goodnes, would yeeld her selfe and her daughter into his power, for that she assured her selfe his comming to be for the good of that Kingdom. King CHARLS gaue such credit to her speeches, that he came to the place where she was; and holding himselfe for absolute Lord, and taking vpon him the gouernment of the kingdom, was not so carefull for the safety of his person, as reason required; for one day comming to the Queens lodging, he was there by the Queenes direction and some of her fauorites traitrously slaine by the hands of one BLASE de Forback: so as this King, not contented with the kingdom of Naples, came to lose his life for the kingdom of Hungary: and the two Queens, mother and daughter hauing made away their enemy, wrote to the Emperor, to send his brother SIGISMVND into that Kingdom; and they in the meane time had the gouernment; for as it seemeth, there was then no open contradiction.

K Charles of Naples murthered in Hungary.

The Queene being more confident then she ought to haue been considering what she had done, went from the place where she made her abode, to goe in progresse into the countrie, carrying her daughter with her; and passing one day carelesly with a small guard; a great Lord of Hungary, called IOHN BAN de Horubach (who had been of the aduerse party) meeting her vpon the way, apprehended the two Queenes, mother and daughter, and so many as were with them; and there in her presence slew BLASE FORBAC, who murthered King CHARLES; and made the old Queene and others of her company to be drowned in a lake of water which was thereby: and hauing thus cruelly reuenged the death of king CHARLS, he carried the sorrowfull yong Queene MARY prisoner to a Castle. When King SIGISMVND was certified of this great and strange disaster, moued with iust sorrow for his mother in law and his wife, with the aide of his brother the Emperor, he entred Hungary, where, by the most part hee was receiued and obeyed; moued therto with compassion to see his wife imprisoned: which when IOHN HORVBACH, the cruell reuenger of King CHARLES his death vnderstood; repenting of what he had done, or fearing to be brought to ruine for the same, he so practised with the Queene, whom he held prisoner, that she promised and sware to obtaine his pardon of her husband, whereupon she being set at liberty went presently to Buda, where her husband was, and there they both were again crowned, and receiued for King and Queene, which happened in the yeer of our Lord, one thousand three hundred eighty and six. But SIGISMVND notwithstanding his wiues oathes and promises, in such manner persecuted IOHN de Horubach, that after many conflicts hauing gotten him into his power, he commanded him to be slain: and so he remained King of Hungary, wherein he raigned many yeers after the chances and changes of fortune before recited, in that Kingdom, and in Naples; such as if they haue been read with attention, are as strange as most that haue passed in the world; yet afterwards ensued other as great or greater, as shall appeare.

The Queene of Hungary drowned.

SIGISMVND hauing brought that kingdom to subiection, and throughly seated himselfe therein; in reuenge of matters past, he at a Parliament held at Buda (as writeth PIVS QVINTVS, who before was called ÆNEAS SYLVIVS) who beheaded two and thirty of the chiefest Lordes of that Kingdome, who had beene his enemies and made warre against him: which truly was cruell and seuere iustice, notwithstanding that they had deserued it: for which cause, the kinsfolke and friends of those which were executed did euer after so much hate him, that they brought him into many difficulties and extremities; for it is a farre more safe course to pardon, and to vse moderate iustice, with clemency: then to extend the rigor and extremity of the laws. In the kingdom of Naples raigned LADISLAVS son to king CHARLES, although not without trouble by those which held for LEWES Duke of Aniow (sonne to that LEWES which died in that action as is before declared) who challenged the kingdom of Naples, and Queen IOANE's other dominions.

Summum ius, summa iniuria

IOHN GALEAS Viscount, sonne to GALEAS, in those daies made himselfe Lord of all Lombardy, by putting his Vncle BARNABY to death by treason, with whom he had in his fathers time diuided the Countrey, in this manner. BARNABY held Placencia, Cremona, Parma, Lodi, Brescia, Bergamo and other places thereto appertaining: and his Nephew IOHN held Pauia, Vercelli, Nouarra, Tortona, and the rest between that and the Alps; the City of Milan was for them both, conditionally that they should peaceably gouern the same. But as soueraignty can endure no company or equality: so IOHN GALEAS, to make himselfe Lord of the whole, found a meanes in a Castle to seize vpon his Vncle, and father in law, who trusted him as his own sonne, wherein either of poyson or other infirmity he died prisoner: and he made himself Lord of Milan, and the other cities, notwithstanding that BARNABY had one sonne called ASTROGIO, and another called CHARLES Viscount, who afterwards troubled his kinsman all that he might. But the ambition and power of IOHN GALEAS rested not here; for as at that time there were warres between ANTHONY de la Scala Lord of Verona and Vicenza, and FRANCIS CARRARA, Lord of Padoa and other towns; he in such manner fauored the party of FRANCIS CARRARA, that expelling ANTHONY de la Scala, GALEAS took those Townes to himselfe, and possessed the same: and after that he had subuerted the enemy, he bent his Armes against his friend, and besieged FRANCIS CARRARA in Padoa: and entring it by force, he took the poore old man prisoner; and so for that time made himselfe Lord of those Cities, and was the most mighty and redoubted man in all Italie: so as this was the right and title of the first Dukes of Milan: yet vntill that time they were not called Dukes, for this GALEAS was called Earle of Vertues, vntill that the Emperor WENCESLAVS gaue him the title of Duke, as hereafter we will declare.

The Lords which were thus deposed, left sonnes behinde them, with whom he afterwards had warres, and many accidents happened, which I must of force relate, for the better vnderstanding of my principall intent: but this for the present shall suffice, to bring that to light whereof we purpose to discourse, which is of the raigne of the Emperour WENCESLAVS, for that it concerneth the state of the Imperiall townes and lands of the Empire in Germany, and Italy, whereof the Emperour took not such care as he ought to haue done, and cared not to be crowned in Rome, neither to come into Italy. And as for Germany, hee gouerned it with so little order, that the warres betweene the cities of the Empire, and the Dukes of Wittembergh ceased not; sundrie Princes fauouring both the one and the other partie, and all the rest was out of order: whereupon they began to consult of deposing him from the Empire, which was afterwards effected; and the Bohemians, which were his owne subiects being much discontented with his gouernment, held him for the space of seuenteene weekes prisoner; and hee being afterwards vpon certaine conditions released, fell to his old manner of liuing; at the end whereof, viz. in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, three hundred, eightie and nine, Pope VRBANE the Sixt died in Rome, hauing been so eleuen yeeres, and Cardinall PETER TONACELLOA Neapolitane, was by the Romane Cardinals chosen for his successor, and called BONIFACE the ninth: yet in Auinion, CLEMENT the seuenth was held and obeyed for Pope in all France.

This BONIFACE vsed such policy, that getting the absolute gouernment of Rome, he suppressed the power and liberty of the people; and making officers at his pleasure, fortified the Castle Saint Angelo with a garrison, which of long time had lien desert, an habitacle for Goates and other beasts: otherwise he was not greatly commended, for the contention between these two Popes opened the gate to Symony and many other abuses. And Pope BONIFACE afterwards sent a Cardinall Legate to crowne LADISLAVS, King of Naples, sonne to King CHARLES who was slaine in Hungary: and Pope CLEMENT in Auinion a little before gaue the same title to LEWES Duke of Aniow, son to the other LEWES his fathers riuall; so as many things passed between these two Princes, which I omit: but King LADIS-

LADISLAVS preuailing in the yeere following Pope BONIFACE his election, Pope CLEMENT died in Auinion: and the Cardinals which followed him, chose one PETER de Luna a Spanyard to be his successor, a very excellent learned man, if he could haue been restrained from the ambition to haue bin Pope, who was called BENEDICT the thirteenth.

IOHN GALEAS Viscount being of great power, sent the Archbishop of Milan for his Ambassadour, to entreate the Emperor to giue him the title of Duke of Milan, and to approoue his right thereto: which the Emperor without the consent of the Princes of the Empire graunted, more for the desire of the money, which was presented him, then for any right or reason that might induce him thereto: and all things happened to IOHN GALEAS so well according to his desire, that he came to be one of the most puissant and redoubted Princes in Christendome.

The schisme betweene the two Popes, and the warres in Italy and Germany in those daies, together with the Emperors basenes and insufficiencie, were the cause why the Emperour and Empire of Constantinople could not be relieued or succoured, which at that time were mightily oppressed by BAIAZETH the fourth King of the Turkes; who with a puissant Army comming into Europe, ouercame and slew in battaile MARKE DESPOTE of Bulgaria, and ouerranne all his countrey: and within three yeeres after, returning into the prouinces of Grecia, took and conquered cities and prouinces: and passing forwards marched through all Walachia, which in auntient time was called Dacia; and so came into Hungary, whence he returned with great spoyle, remaining Lord (besides what he held before) of the prouinces of Macedonia, of the greatest part of Thracia, of Thessalia, of the prouince of the auntient Athens and other countries; and comming victorious hee besieged the Impeiall citie of Constantinople: whereupon SIGISMVND King of Hungary, with the aide of his brother the Emperour (but with much more and farre better from sundrie other Christian Princes; chiefly from England, and France, whither he sent to sue for the same, and also from the Emperour of Constantinople) came to seeke the great Turke, with 100000. men, whereof twentie thousand were horsemen: whereof BAIAZETH being aduertised, raised his siege from before Constantinople, and with three hundred thousand men came to meete him; and the two Armies vpon Michaelmas day in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, three hundred, ninety and seuen, fought a bloudy and cruell battaile; wherein the King of Hungary, and the other Princes and Nobles which were with him were ouerthrowne, and as it is written a very great slaughter was made of the Christians, through the fault of the French, which charged before their time; and the King of Hungary, and the Master of the Order of the Knights of the Rhodes escaping by flight, the greatest part of the French were either slain or taken prisoners. After this victory, BAIAZETH returned to the siege of Constantinople: at which time if the great TAMORLAN (who was one of the most mighty and most victorious Captains that euer was in the world) had not risen in Asia, he had taken the citie, and at that time had wholly subdued the Empire: wherefore hee leauing in Europe the best garrisons he could, went to the defense of Asia, wherein he was in a battell ouerthrowne and taken, and in TAMORLAN's power died prisoner; which (for that time) brought some rest to Christendome. King SIGISMVND, escaping from this infortunate battell, came vnto Constantinople; and from thence sailing vnto the Ile of Rhodes, hee came into Dalmatia or Slauonia.

Baiazeth king of the Turkes came into Europe.

A battaile betweene the King of Hungary and the Turke, wherein the Christians were ouerthrowne.

The great Turke ouerthrowne and taken by the mighty Tamorlan.

In the time of this his peregrination, many of his kingdome of Hungary publishing him to be either dead or taken prisoner, aduanced the Colours of LADISLAVS king of Naples, proclaiming him king by the right of his father CHARLES, of whom we made mention, and of his death being slaine after his comming into Hungary, for which purpose his son was now sent for: but SIGISMVND afterwards appearing, with the aid of the Archbishop of Strigonium, and other his friends, recouered his Kingdome; although that afterwards hee was againe imprisoned, and fell into great troubles; the occasion whereof was the malice and hatred which many of his Kingdome bare him, for the cruell execution done in the beginning of his raigne, as then was expressed.

These matters being past, and other which for that they concerne not the history of the Emperors, I ouerpasse; the Princes Electors of the Empire, and the rest, seeing the insufficiencie and little care the Emperour took to suppresse and pacifie the warres and controuersies betweene the cities amongst themselues, and among the Princes; and that he gaue himselfe to his pleasure and vaine delights, by reason whereof hee was little regarded; resolued to meete, and to depose him, as dangerous, and vnprofitable for the Empire; and to chuse another Emperor; alleaging him to be altogether vnfit for the gouernment; that he desired not, neither sought to be crowned; that he had without reason, order, or equitie giuen the title of Duke to IOHN GALEAS the tyrant of Milan; that he had put many men of Sacerdotal order to death, and some prelates; that he was vicious, and no good Christian; that he tooke no care to resist the Turkes; and finally, that he was a man vnprofitable for the Christian Common-wealth; with many other matters which they laid to his charge; and putting their resolution in effect, they met for that purpose in the citie of Franckford, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, foure hundred, Pope BONIFACE being the chiefest author thereof, who published him for depriued and vnworthy of the Empire, in the 22. yeere of his raigne. During the raigne of this Emperor WENCESLAVS, they began to discusse against the vanitie of the Popes indulgences in the Vniuersity of Prague which then flourished. IOHN HVSS a Bohemian, who then was very famous for his learning and pietie, did much oppugne them, saying, that they were meer Impostures. He inueighed against the Popes tyrannie, as the cheef cause thereof, and blamed the auarice, luxurie and pride of the Clergie, reiecting their vowes, impure Celibate superstitions, fictions and all their monasticall life, and whatsoeuer did not agree with the Analogie of faith. These matters were formerly brought in question in England by WICKLIFFE about the yeere of our Lord 1372.

But the chiefest cause was for that he fauored the doctrine of Iohn Husse and Ierome of Prage, which then began to take root in Bohemia.

Here is some difference betweene the authors: for some write that ROBERT whom some call RVPERT, Count Palatine of Rhine and Duke of Bauiere, was chosen in his place; without making mention of IODOCVS Marques of Morauia cosin germane to the Emperor WENCESLAVS (being his fathers brothers sonne) who some say, was chosen before ROBERT, and liued but a little while after: others (which I rather beleeue) say that there was controuersie betweene the Electors; some chusing IODOCVS, and others ROBERT, and that IODOCVS dying, the contention ended. Howsoeuer it was, it is true that IODOCVS lined but six moneths after this election; and of him nothing is written worthie to be recited. So as (according to all writers) ROBERT by common consent, after the decease of IODOCVS, remained sole Emperor; and his election was ratified by Pope BONIFACE. CARION writes, that IODOCVS soone after his election to the Empire, went to visit WENCESLAVS King of Bohemia, his cosin germane; who bringing him into a priuate Chamber said vnto him: Although I know that it is not for my dignitie that the Electors haue degraded me, yet it is my comfort that our family hath not lost this honour. I willingly and gladly accept you for my successor. And when as IODOCVS amazed with these words kneeled vnto the King, desiring him not to impute any thing vnto him; Feare not saith he, for neither doe I vnwillingly leaue the Empire, neither would I violate the rights of bloud and consanguinity, if I had a desire to hold it. Be therefore of good cheere and enioy the Empire which is giuen thee; Bohemia is sufficient for me; make vse of the power, Armes and wealth of my Kingdome as thine owne, and so he dismist his cosin with ioy. CVSPINIAN in this place maketh mention of one FREDERICK Duke of Brunswick, who (as he saith) was also chosen before ROBERT, and was slaine before that he could be crownd, through the treason of a certaine Earle, by the counsell and procurement of the Archbishop of Mentz; and that ROBERT was chosen afterwards. I know not what authors he followed therein, for I finde it written by him onely. It sufficeth, that ROBERT, whom the Germanes call RVPERT (WENCESLAVS being deposed) remained Emperor: whereof WENCESLAVS made no great account, for in truth hee that took small care to preserue it, it is no maruell though it grieued him little to lose it; for he contented himselfe with his Kingdome of Bohemia, which he enioyed a long time after, and gouerned the same so retchlesly, that his brother SIGISMVND King of Hungary, by the consent of his subiects took him once, and another time, and they themselues apprehending him, deliuered him to the custody of ALBERT Duke of Austria, who held him for a space prisoner in Vienna: whence being afterwards released, he returned to his Kingdome, in possession wherof he afterwards liued nineteene yeeres, and died being of the age of seauen and fiftie (as writeth Pope PIVS QVINTVS, otherwise called ÆNEAS SYLVIVS) without leauing either son or daughter by two wiues to which he was married. And he raigning in Bohemia, the religion began to spring, whereof hereafter mention shall be made, which was the ground of that which at this day is professed in Germany, and in the greatest part of Christendome, which (as it seemeth) this King fauoured. This was the end of the Emperor WENCESLAVS his Empire.

The Emperor Wencelaus deposed from the Empire.

All this while IOHN PALEOLOGVS raigned in Constantinople, who was also called CALOIOANNES; yet BLONDVS is of opinion, that ANDRONICVS, the sonne of this CALOIOANNES, raigned at this time; wherein (as I coniecture) he is deceiued: for the authors which particularly write the liues of the Grecke Emperors, make no mention of ANDRONICVS in this place, but of IOHN CANTACVZENVS, with whom CALOIOANNES contended for the Empire. A little after the depriuing of WENCESLAVS, EMANVEL PALEOLOGVS succeeding his father CALOIOANNES, the Empire of Constantinople decayed & came to ruine; for BAIAZETH the great Turke took many prouinces and countries thereof, as we haue already declared: yet it had some rest in those daies, by reason of the calamitie brought vpon the Turkes by the great TAMORLAN; but it continued not long; for TAMORLAN being dead, CALAPIN the son of BAIAZETH, recouered and reformed the Kingdome and Empire of the Turkes, and againe molested and persecuted the Empire of Greece, and the Kings of Hungary.

THE LIFE OF ROBERT, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND TENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

ROBERT, being in the time of Wenceslaus made Emperor, took speedy order to make it knowne to the world, that the dignity was not giuen him for nought, and therefore he caused himself to be crowned: and hauing suppressed the troubles of Germany, he went to be crowned in Italie, and to protect the Florentines against the Duke of Milan; but his coming was no lesse dishonourable than vnprofitable, neither were the Florentine warres, with the Duke of Milan ended, but through the death of the said Duke: for, the Emperor departing without hauing defended them, or without putting their aduersary in any fear, applied himself to the affairs of Germany, wherein he was much troubled about the schisme in the Church of Rome; and desiring to assemble a Councell, the Popes not consenting thereto, he was a long time in doubt: but in the end, resoluing to haue a Councell held in such a place whither both the Popes without suspicion might come, he fell sick and died, in the tenth yeer of his Raign.

THE Emperor WENCESLAVS being in such manner as I said deprined, ROBERT Duke of Bauiere, and Count Palatine, was chosen in his place. He was a man of a quick apprehension, little of stature, but of a great spirit, very careful and studious of the Maiesty of the Empire and of the publique affairs, famous for his integrity and iustice, and well practised in Arms. Coming to Aix to be crowned, they would not receiue him into the City, pretending that they were yet bound by their oath to WENCESLAVS: wherefore the new Emperor elect, accompanied by the Electors and some other Princes, went to the City of Colen, and there was crowned by the Archbishop thereof; and his election and coronation was confirmed and ratified by Pope BONIFACE: and so through all Germany he was held and obeyed for Emperor, but not with such obedience and reuerence as some of his Predecessors had been: for, the remisse behauiour and little worth of WENCESLAVS, and the morgages and sales made by his father CHARLS, had giuen such liberty and exemptions in the territories of the Empire, that the Empire scarcely retained the authority and reputation in the Imperiall countries, and with the Princes of Germany, which ought to haue been giuen it. But as ROBERT was a wise and prudent Prince, and of himself very mighty and of great power, so in the tenne yeers which he raigned, he made a great reformation in all matters, and settled the best order that was possible, aswell in the controuersies and warres which were in Germany, as in the execution of iustice and good gouernment.

Italie was then on fier with warre and factions; in the kingdom of Naples LADISLAVS the sonne of CHARLES before named, with the aide of Pope BONIFACE, warred against those which held for LEVVES Duke of Aniow, soone to the other LEVVES who held some Cities and Townes in that kingdome, with the title which he inherited from his father, and from Queene IOANE, being inuested in that kingdome by CLEMENT 7. who in Auinion was called Pope: And LADISLAVS his power encreasing, hee in the end preuailed.

The most powerfull man in all the rest of Italie, was IOHN GALEAS Viscount Duke of Milan, who (as I said) was an haughty minded man; who not contented to be Duke and Lord of so great estates, and of so many Cities as he was, thought to haue been a King, yea an Emperour and Lord of all Italie; and at that time made cruell warre against the Florentines, who only durst and were able to make head against him, they being assisted by the sonnes of BARNABY who had been tyrant of Milan; and by the sonnes of those which had beene tyrannes or Gouernours of Padoa, whom hee had deposed, and others which hee had wronged and dispossessed; and by many others which did stand in feare to bee dealt withall in the like manner.

Matters standing in these tearmes, and the Election and Coronation of the Emperor ROBERT being published, the Florentines sent Ambassadors to entreate and to perswade him (for seeing he was Emperour he was bound thereto) to come into Italie, to free the Countrey from so cruell and pernicious a tyrant, as was Duke IOHN of Milan (who had vsurped so many townes of the Empire, and of the Church) and therewith offered to giue him towards his charges the summe of two hundred thousand Florines, whereof one hundred thousand presently in hand, and the rest the first day that he should enter into the Tyrant Dukes countrey with his Army; wherein they would assist him with the greatest power they were able to make both of foote and horse. These Ambassadors being arriued in Germany, they were very well entertained by the Emperor, who presently accepting their offer and seruice, promised to come into Italie, aswel for the enterprise of Milan, as to be crowned in Rome: and he therupon presently began to prouide all things necessary for his iourney.

The Duke of Milan hauing intelligence hereof, little regarded the deuices and policies which his predecessors had vsed with former Emperors, seeking by their Ambassadors to procure peace with them, and to obtain their grace and fauour, to beare themselues as their vassails and subiects; but he as a mighty absolute Lord, with great resolution mustered vp his men, and prouided armour and Artillery (which then was in vse) and all things else needefull for the warre: so that great preparation was made of both sides; and all Italy and Germany were very attentiue to see the euent of this great action. The Emperor stayed longer then he, of those which expected his comming, thought he would haue done: for hauing resolued to come in the beginning of the yeere 1401, he came to Trent (which is at the entry into Italy) in the end of haruest following, accompanied by the Duke of Austria, the Archbishop of Colein, and some other Princes, with many Captaines of Germany and Italy. And to performe the conditions made with the Florentines, he came with his Army within sight of Brescia, which held for the Duke of Milan: but the Duke had in that City, and the marches thereof, so many good men of warre to make head against him, that they feared not to offer him battaile; and the Dukes Cauallerie were such excellent good horse-men, that in all skirmishes and encounters whersoeuer they met, they had the aduantage of the Germanes, and slew many of them: and they one day comming to ioyne with their whole forces in a battaile, the Emperour and his Army were ouerthrown, neere to the Lake of Benaco, now called Garda: and being thus broken, hee retired to Trent, where he stood in great doubt and perplexity, to thinke whither he should returne into Germany, or reinforce his Army to returne into Italie; where the Duke of Austria and the Archbishop of Colein leauing him returned home, wherewith the Emperor was so grieued as he was ready to haue done the like; but perswaded by FRANCIS CARRARA, the sonne of CAR-he Emperor obert ouer- rown in Italy the Duke of ilan.

RARA the tyrant of Padoa, and by other Italian Captaines: and thinking it a shame for him to returne without further tryall of his fortune, he went with his Army (which he had reinforced) as farre as Trinigi, and thence to Padoa; where by meanes of CARRARA he was receiued; whither came to him foure Ambassadours from the Florentins, being of the chiefe of the City: who also sent two Captaines with certain troupes of horse and foote; one of which (as saith BLONDVS) was SFORZA ATENDVLO, who afterwards was an excellent and very famous captain, and was father to that FRANCIS SFORZA which was one of the best captains in the world, and afterwards duke of Milan.

This SSORZA ATENDVLO was borne in a village called Catiniola, of meane parentage and very poore. With these Ambassadors ROBERT had long treaties, concluding that the Duke of Milan was of such power, that neither he nor they had forces sufficient to ruine him, or to expell him out of his estate: wherefore he held it best for him to return, and that they should seek new aid and relief: besides this he demanded so great a sum of money for the payment of his souldiers, that it seemed not to be raised.

The Florentines fearing their ruine if the Emperour should abandon them and returne, they left no meanes to detaine him: wherefore two of the Ambassadours returned in post to Florence, to conferre with their citizens about this matter; and the other two remained with the Emperour: who for that it was winter, and no fit time to make warre (hauing a great desire to see that citie) went to Venice, where he was most sumptuously entertained. The Florentines in the meane time hauing heard their Ambassadours, resoluing what answere they would make to the Emperour, determined to procure the friendship of the Venecians, and to make a league with them, and with the Pope, and to giue the Emperour great aide of men and money: herewith the Ambassadours returned to Venice, relating to him the resolution of their citizens. The Emperour complained of them to the Venecians, for that they had not giuen him that money which they had promised: and they excusing themselues, alleaged that he came not with such power as was requisite, neither had entred the territorie of Milan. Finally, many treaties and speeches passed, as well with the Emperor as the Duke of Milans Ambassadours, who came thither to defend their cause before the Venecians; the Florentines still insisting to stay the Emperour in Italy; who giuing them sometimes hope, and sometimes making the matter doubtfull, came from Venice to Padoa, where he lay all the rest of the winter: and the moneth of Aprill being come, in the yeere of our Lord 1402, in the third yeere of his raigne, he perceiuing that the Venecians would be but lookers on, and newters, and would not helpe the Florentines; and that LADISLAVS King of Naples had enough to doe with LEVVES of Aniow, and that Pope BONIFACE (notwithstanding that the Duke of Milan had taken many townes from him) durst not attempt ought against him; he resolued with himself to returne into Germany, and did so, although with losse of reputation: whereby it appeared that the Empire was not of such power as in former times; whereat the Florentines were much grieued, and vsed all possible meanes to haue staied him. And although I shall make some digression, yet I will declare what end the war betweene the Duke of Milan and the Florentines had, and how it was interrupted by the death of the said Duke.

The Emperour being departed out of Italy; the Duke of Milan resolued presently to effect his desires, and to make himselfe Lord of Florence; sending his Generall, called ALBERICO Earle of Cuno, with all the force which hee had leuied to make head against the Emperour, to assault Bologna, which was gouerned by IOHN BENTIVOGLIO, a friend and confederate with the Florentines. And with the Dukes Army went the Marquess of Montoa, his friend and confederate, and PANDOLPHO MALATESTA Lord of Arimino. The Florentines to the reliefe of BENTIVOGLIO, sent their best Captaines and men of warre, amongst which was FRANCIS CARRARA the son of FRANCIS CARRARA Lord of Padoa. BENTIVOGLIO herewith and with his owne forces tooke the field, with a resolution to fight with the Duke of Milans power, which refused not the same: wherein, IOHN BENTIVOGLIO and his partakers being ouerthrowne, he escaped by flight, and the CARRARI were taken prisoners: and ALBERICO presently besieging the citie of Bologna, and battering it in many parts, by one of which some of his men, by the permission of some within the citie began to enter; but BENTIVOGLIO resoluing to die honourably Lord of Bologna, charged those which were entred, and fought with such obstinacie, that being vnknowne hee was there slaine, and cut in pieces. Being knowne that he was dead, the citie without any more resistance was entred, and so the Duke of Milan had that citie.

Bologna taken by the Duke of Milan.

This

This victory ſtrake ſuch a feare into the Florentines, that they holding themſelues for loſt, would haue accepted any conditions of peace, had they been neuer ſo hard; and ſent to deſire the Venecians to purchaſe the ſame for them: but the Duke of Milan, which now aſſured himſelf to be Lord of Florence, refuſing to hear them, commanded his Army to march forwards: and being in the height of his greatnes, that God which onely is able, and vſeth to abate mens pride, meaſured his ambitious thoughts; for, hee was ſuddenly taken with a peſtilent Feuer, whereof within fewe daies after he died: and notwithſtanding that his death was kept ſecret, yet it was ſoon diſcouered, and the Florentines were freed from the great fear of the ſeruitude which they expected. I knowe well that I haue ſpent much time about this man: but I doo it for that it is a notable matter to ſee to what great power this Duke tyrannically, in deſpight of Kings and Emperors which were his aduerſaries, attained; and for as much as hee was a ſubject of the Empire, whereof this Hiſtory is, it may bee ſaid to be of the ſubſtance of the ſame Hiſtory.

This Prince IOHN GALEAS Viſcount, Duke of Milan, was tall of ſtature, of a faire and comely aſpect, indifferently well ſeen in the liberall Arts and Sciences, very well ſpoken, of a quick and ſharp wit, hardy and valiant in Arms, and therewith very politick and ſubtile in his actions: but he was ſo ambitious and deſirous to raign and command, that to attain thereto, he ſetting aſide the feare of God, made no queſtion to attempt any means, juſt or vniuſt whatſoeuer, ſo he might obtain his purpoſes; which were ſo many and ſuch, that I cannot deſcribe them. It is certain that he acquired much of what he deſired: for, before his death hee was Lord of nine and twenty Cities in Italy; which were, Milan, Pauia, Monſrigal, Nouarra, Bercelli, Alba, Aqui, Alexandria, Tortona, Drobio, Placencia, Parma, Rezzo, Bologna, Piſa, Siena, Maſſa, Groſſeto, Cluſio, Perugia, Aſti, Nocera, Lodi, Feltro, Vicenza, Verona, Breſcia, Bergamo, Como, Cremona and Crema, beſides the Towns and Caſtles ſubiect and appertaining to theſe Cities, which were very many. He died in the month of Nouember, in the yeer of our Lord one thouſand, foure hundred and two.

Cities ſubiect to the Duke of Milan.

The death of Iohn Galeas Viſcount, duke of Milan.

This mighty Duke left two ſonnes behinde him, the eldeſt of which was called IOHN MARIA Viſcount; and the other, PHILIP MARIA Viſcount: to the elder he left by his Teſtament the title of Duke, and the City of Milan, with all the Towns and Cities within the iuriſdiction thereof; and out of it the Cities of Bologna, Siena, Perugia and Aſti. To his ſecond ſon PHILIP he left the Cities of Pauia, Verona, Vicenza, and other places: and to a baſtard ſonne, whoſe name was GABRIEL, he left the City of Piſa. Which diuiſion made to his ſons was imputed vnto him for a great ouerſight, and was after very preiudiciall to that eſtate: for, the two brothers diſagreeing, it came to decay and ruine; for they were ſo yong, that the eldeſt of them was but fifteen yeers old; ſo as there preſently beganne factions and partakings between them and the widow Ducheſſe their mother-in-law, and their kinred and fauourites, about the gouernment and command. Finally (for that it would bee long to relate) the matter grew to that iſſue, that as ſoon as the diſcord was knowne to be between the heads, all the members became ſo out of order, as the greateſt part of the Cities roſe and rebelled againſt the Duke; ſome with thoſe which firſt held them, and others with the new Captains and Tyrants: ſo as what in the time of the Duke was held for the greateſt euill (which was, To bee ſubiect to one) ſeemed afterwards to be the leaſt, by reaſon of the multitude of Tyrants, and the warre and great diſcord which enſued: for, in Cremona aroſe VGOLINO CAVALCABO, and PANDVLPHO MALATESTA with Breſcia and Berga; PHILIP ARCELLANO in Placencia; PAVLO GVITTIGI with Luca; FACINO CANE with Vercelli, Alexandria, and other places; the SVARDI in Bergamo; FOGLIANO RISCONE in Como; GIANINO VENATESE in Lodi; GEORGE BENZONE in Crema; OTHO VITALE in Parma: and others ſought to do the like in other places; as, the CARRARESI & thoſe of Scala ſought to make themſelues Lords of Verona and Padoa: in ſuch ſort, that the ſtate of IOHN MARIA, the new Duke of Milan, was in great combuſtion and danger; and what did moſt hurt, was his owne tyrannicall condition: for he (as a proud cruell boy) beheaded ſundry of the chief men of that Country. He alſo apprehended his mother, and committed many other inſolencies, which in the end coſt him his life: whereof being reprehended by a ſeruant and fauourite of his, which told him that he was vnlike to his Anceſtors, he yeelded a reaſon anſwerable to his actions, willing him to let him alone; for, that houſe or family could not be accounted excellent or famous which produced not men of all conditions. Thus, what the father had gotten by his valour and policy, the ſonne loſt by his weaknes and cruelty: for, beſides the aboue-named Townes which which were vſurped by other Lords, the Pope recouered Bolonia, Aſſiſia and Perugia: the Florentines bought Piſa. They of Sienna hauing ſlaine CORREGIO their Gouernour, recouered their liberty, being ſubiect to cruell ſeditions. Neither did the Venecians forget themſelues in theſe combuſtions; but extended their power as farre as Friuli and Iſtria. NOVVEL CARARIVS the ſon of FRANCIS who had fled into Bauaria when his father was taken, hauing now recouered Padoua with the aſſiſtance of the Venecians; being vnmindfull of their fauours, he ſought to ſupplant them: and hauing perſwaded WILLIAM SCALIGER to ſeize vpon Verona, being his familiar friend, and one who had aſſiſted him both with counſell and Armes, he poiſoned him to get Verona, and afterwards cauſed his ſons ANTHONY and BRVNO to be trecherouſly murthered. He alſo attempted Vincentia: but they hating his tyrannie craued protection from the Venecians, who imbracing this occaſion, tooke Armes againſt him, beſieged him in Padoua, and in the end forced him to yeeld; ſo as he with two of his ſons were ſtrangled by the Venecians. By this victory they got Padoua, Verona, Vincentia, with other Townes.

But PHILIP, his ſucceſſor, reuenged his brothers death and expelled ſome of the tyrants, he recouered Bergamo and Breſcia; hauing chaſed away MALATESTA, and Lodi, by the taking and hanging of VENATESE. He got Placentia and ſlew ſome of the ARCELANI and baniſhed the reſt. He caſt FRANCHINO RVSCA out of Como: with a promiſe of reward, he got Cremona hauing taken GAB. FVNDVLI, neglecting thoſe which lay farther off. Let this ſuffice for his eſtate, and now to our purpoſe.

The Emperour ROBERT going into Germany (as is before ſaid) applied himſelf to the pacifying thereof: for beſides the antient controuerſies betweene the cities (as before is ſpecified) in thoſe daies many great men in Hungary through the old harred which they long before had conceiued againſt SIGISMVND their King, for the cruell execution which he cauſed to be done in the beginning of his raigne, rebelled againſt him, and they apprehending him committed him in a Caſtle to the cuſtodie of a widow and her two ſonnes, whoſe father he had put to death. SIGISMVND being thus priſoner, they ſent to LADISLAVS King of Naples to come and take poſſeſſion of that Kingdome, to whom it belonged: who although hee was not throughly confirmed in the Kingdome of Naples, yet moued with an ambitious deſire to raigne and to commaund, he made the greateſt haſte thither that he could; and leauing Naples he came into Slauonia, where, in a citie ſubiect to the Kingdome of Hungary, he was crowned and proclaimed King: but in the meane time SIGISMVND vſed ſuch meanes with the widow and her ſonnes, that they releaſed him out of priſon; and being at liberty, with the aide of his friends and many others which he reduced to his ſeruice, he recouered his Kingdom: and LADISLAVS being thereof aduertiſed, without proceeding any further (his hope and purpoſe failing him) returned to his Kingdome of Naples: but before his departure, in requitall of his good entertainment, he ſold to the Venecians that citie wherein he was harboured. For all theſe matters (as it appeareth by the hiſtories) his brother WENCESLAVS King of Bohemia and depoſed Emperour, took little care; for he had enough to doe to hold himſelfe in his Kingdome; and as little is written of what the Emperour ROBERT did herein, or in the cruell warres betweene the Swiſſers and the Duke of Auſtria, the originall and iſſue whereof were long to be related. It ſeems he was otherwiſe buſied in the Empires affairs; whereof, ſeeing it was in peace, no notable matter is written; and matters of ſmall importance are not worth reading: for certainely although it be the bleſſing of God to liue in peaceable times, and vnder the rule of good kings and princes for the time preſent, yet the hiſtories of them after their death are nothing delightful: and commonly men take more pleaſure in reading of battailes, alterations of kingdoms, the falles of Kings and their eſtates, then in hiſtories of peace, iuſtice, and quiet times: and this is the reaſon why bookes of lies and fables are read with ſuch delight, for that they are full of ſuch fained accidents and aduentures. True it is that thoſe times were not without matters worthie to be related: but foraſmuch as they concerne not the Emperour, I am not to write them in this hiſtory.

The Emperour ROBERT raigning in peace in Germany, in the fift yeere of his raigne Pope BONIFACE died in Rome, in the yeere of our Lord 1404: and he being dead the Cardinall of S. Croſs was choſen & called INNOCENT the Seuenth, who before was called COSMO; BENEDICT the Thirteenth liuing ſtill in Auinion. Before that INNOCENT was choſen, all the Cardinals ſware and promiſed, that whether ſoeuer of them ſhould happen to be made Pope, he ſhould doe his beſt endeuour to end the ſchiſme in the Church; and this INNOCENTIVS ſware the ſame: but after that he was Pope, he vſed no ſuch care therein as was expected.

The

The Emperor ROBERT, for that he was otherwiſe buſied in Germanie, or elſe through want of men or money, or both, could not or would not come into Italy at that time: whereto if he had had means, occaſion was offred him to haue recouered to the Empire the Cities which the Duke of Milan and others had vſurped, by reaſon of the warres and great troubles which were among them in thoſe daies: but (as I haue already ſaid) the power and authority of the Emperors (for the cauſes before mentioned) was ſo much weakned, that they could not prouide for all parts; but the Venecians, taking the benefit of the time, made themſelues Lords of Padoa, Verona and Vicenza, with their confines; who before that time held not any City of importance in the main Land of Italy: and ſo they wholly extinguiſhed the houſes and eſtates of the CARRARI and of Scala, which of long time had been Lords of Padoa, Verona, and other Townes. The Florentines at this time bought the City of Piſa, of GABRIEL the baſe ſonne of Duke GALEAS of Milan; who, after that he had been Lord thereof the ſpace of three yeers, being vnable to hould it, ſould the ſame: and the Piſans to defend their liberty, and for the hatred which they bare to the Florentines, reſolued (although in vain) to ſhake off the yoke of ſubiection. Whereupon, the Florentines beſieging them, through famine, and by the treaſon of one IOHN SHORTLEG, took the City, which in former time had been of very great power, and was now made a ſlaue and ſubiect to the Florentines, as it is at this day: ſuch is the weaknes and inſtability of the power and eſtates of this world.

Piſa taken by the Florentines.

Pope INNOCENT the Seuenth being dead, all the Cardinals, before the election of a new Pope, made a ſolemn vow, that he which ſhould be choſen ſhould endeauour to cauſe BENEDICT the Thirteenth, who was in Auinion, to renounce the Papacy; and that BENEDICT doing ſo, he that was choſen ſhould do the like, to the end that the ſchiſm in the Church might ceaſe, and that another ſhould be choſen: this was held the fitteſt mean to end the ſchiſm. After this ſolemn oath, one ANGELO CORARIA, Cardinall of Saint MARK, a Venecian, was choſen, and called GREGORY the Twelfth; who, as ſoon as he was choſen, confirmed the oath which he before had made: whereupon a meeting was procured to bee had between theſe two Popes, to the end that they both together ſhould haue renounced the Papacy, and that another might be choſen; and many Letters & meſſengers were ſent, and they both made ſhew to be willing thereto. But they could not agree vpon the place of meeting: yet in the end Sauona was appointed; and one Pope came from Rome to Luca, and the other from Auinion to Genoa: but they alleaging many friuolous reaſons, neither of them came to Sauona; whereby it plainely appeared that they had no meaning by their reconciliation to end the ſchiſme. The Cardinals of either ſide lying neere together, and perceiuing that neither of theſe two Popes had any meaning to renounce the Papacie, or to performe what they both had ſworne, by Letters and meſſages paſſing betweene them agreed to meete together, to call a general Councell, to denie obedience to them both, and to chuſe a new Pope.

The affairs of the Church being in this confuſion, the power and authoritiy of both Popes decreaſed, eſpecially of BENEDICT the Antipope, France denying him obedience; who, finding no ſafety in Auignon, went into Arragon, where he was obeyed: and afterwards he retired himſelf vnto Buiſcaie, where he continued in his hardnes of heart vntill he died; GREGORY alſo going from Rome, and the Cardinals repairing to the Councell. LADISLAVS king of Naples had an intent during this diſcord to make himſelf Lord of Rome; and with ſuch forces as he could draw together, he went thither and ſeiſed thereon, with the help and fauour of the Colonneſi; the which he held certain daies: during the which there were skirmiſhes and murders; but the Vrſini being in the end the ſtronger, he retired into his Kingdome.

A councell held at Piſa.

27 Cardinals meeting altogether in Piſa, after many diſputations a Councel was aſſembled, wherein met three Patriarches and 180. Archbiſhops and Biſhops: the concluſion was, that the two Popes were cited to come to this Councell: whereto BENEDICT who was in Auinion, anſwered, that the queſtion was between him and Pope GREGORY, whether of them two ſhould be Pope: wherefore they could not, neither did it appertaine to them to determine the cauſe; and that he marueiled at their preſumption in attempting the ſame. Pope GREGORY alſo ſent them word that they well knew him to be right Pope and canonically choſen; and therefore they neither could nor ought to call a Councell without his authority, for it appertained vnto him, and that he would not haue it held in Piſa, but in ſome other place; and that they were bound to go to that place which he ſhould appoint, which was to Aquileia, whither hee went. About this controuerſie the Emperor ROBERT ſummoned a Diet to be held in Frankford; whither came a Cardinall from Pope GREGORY, and another from the Councel held in in Piſa, each defending his cauſe; and Pope GREGORIE deſired that ſome other place might be appointed, but not Piſa. Finally, after many conteſtations, the Emperour yeelding to the opinion of many learned men, and holding with Pope GREGORY, affirmed that he onely had authoritie to call the Councell, and to appoint the place: But notwithſtanding the Emperours opinion, the Councell of Piſa, holding neither GREGORY nor BENEDICT for Popes, choſe a Franciſcan Frier called PETER, Cardinal and Archbiſhop of Milan, who took to name ALEXANDER the Fift. This being done, thither came LEWES Duke of Aniow and Earle of Prouence (riuall and competitor with LADISLAVS King of Naples) who acknowledging ALEXANDER for Pope, was by him inueſted: and ALEXANDER gaue him the title to the Kingdom of Naples againſt LADISLAVS, who took Pope GREGORIE's part. The ſchiſme for all this ceaſed not, but encreaſed: for in lieu of two Popes now there were three, and each of them held his court apart, and had Cardinals, and many followers; but the new choſen Pope had the greateſt and ſtrongeſt partie: and Pope GREGORY wandring vp and downe remained for a ſpace in Gaeta, (for LADISLAVS King of Naples was his friend) but in the end he came to Arimino, where CHARLES MALATESTA Lord of that citie harboured him; he there continuing vntill the Councell of Conſtance. Pope ALEXANDER went to Bologna; but within eight moneths after his election he died in the ſame citie; and the Cardinals which were with him aſſembling in their Conclaue in the ſame citie, choſe BALTHASAR COSSA, a Neapolitane and Cardinall of S. Euſtace, who was called IOHN the 24. which Election was by ſome held for violent and forced; for this BALTHASAR being a Captaine in the warres, and Gouernour of Bologna, had the commaund of men of warre and was of great power: but yet in the end he was by the greateſt part of Italy held for Pope; and ſo were GREGORY and BENEDICT alſo in the places where they liued; by reaſon whereof all Chriſtendome was diuided into three factions. The Emperour ROBERT being herewith diſcontent, and deſiring a redreſſe, procured that a generall Councell might be held by the conſent and authoritie of all thoſe three which were called Popes; which afterwards in the time of his ſucceſſor SIGISMVND was accompliſhed. But he hauing begun this worke was within few daies after ſurpriſed by death, in the tenth yeere of his raigne, in the yeere of our Lord 1410, leauing the ſchiſme and diuiſion in the Church as before. This Emperour had ſix ſonnes, the eldeſt of which, ROBERT and FREDERICK died before their father, ſo as when he died there remained IOHN, LEWES, STEPHEN, and OTHO, which had diuers titles, and poſſeſſed ſundrie eſtates.

The death of the Emperor Robert.

EMANVEL held the Empire of Conſtantinople in little proſperitie, aſwell by meanes of the warres with the Turkes, as other troubles and diſorders in that Empire. In his time MAHVMET ſonne of CALAPIN was king of the Turkes: who in the beginning, and before that EMANVEL was Emperor, came into Europe and warred in Walachia; but the reſt of his time he ſpent in Aſia in recouering that which TAMORLAN had taken from his grandfather BAIAZETH.

In his time IOHN HVSSE began to be of ſuch credit and reputation in Bohemia, that hee drawing many to be of his opinion, threw down the Images in Churches, denied Purgatorie, the ſacrament of Confeſſion, the Popes power, his Indulgences and pardons, Dirges and praying for the dead; praying to our Lady and to Saints; and held many other opinions which at this day are maintained in the greateſt part of Chriſtendome.

THE LIFE OF SIGISMVND, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND ELEVENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

Sigismund King of Hungary, after the decease of the Emperour Robert, was chosen Emperour, whose election was very gratefull, for that he was a man of great expectation. He being confirmed, procured a Councell to be held in Constance, to cease the Schisme which had continued many yeeres: but it behoued him to deferre it for a time, by reason of the warres betweene the Pope and the King of Naples, who had taken Rome. But Ladislaus being dead, the Councell was assembled, whither the Emperour himselfe came in person: in which Councell Iohn Husse and Jerome of Prague were condemned and burned. The two Popes Gregory and Iohn renounced the Papacie, but the third (which was Benedict*) would not, so as the Emperour going in person to procure him to renounce it, could not prevaile; for* Benedict was resolued to dye with that title, notwithstanding that hee was deprived by the Councell; and that all the Princes Christian, together with his best friend the King of Arragon (seeing his obstinacie) reiected him. The Councell being dissolued, the Emperour went to pacifie the troubles in Bohemia, and to suppresse the followers of Iohn Husse; but he neither by peace nor war could effect the same: and the Papists being (as all times memorably ouerthrowne, the Bohemians could neuer be subdued by force of Armes. But in the end Sigismund was receiued as King of Bohemia: and the Councell of Basil hauing decreed, concerning the opinions of the Bohemians, the Emperour vpon the way going into Hungarie died in Zenopa; when he had raigned 37. yeeres.

THe Emperour Robert being dead and buried, the Princes Electors (according to their custome) met to chuse a new Emperor in the citie of Franckford: which being made knowne to Pope Iohn, he (with a desire to shew the authoritie of a Pope, to corie fauour, and to get aide against king Ladislavs, who would haue made himselfe Lord of Rome) sent his Legate to entreate them to make choise of Sigismvnd king of Hungary: truly his request was reasonable, for he was a prince in that time, for his wisdome and valour besides his other gifts of nature much esteemed: for he was tall of stature, very well proportioned, of a milde aspect, very discreet and aduised, of a pleasing conuersation, and aboue all most bountifull: and in conclusion such a one as was needfull for the present time. The Ambassadours from Iohn who was called Pope, were ioyfully heard by the Electors; and all Germany fixed their eyes vpon Sigismvnd, as well for his merits, as for that he was a mighty King, and son to the Emperour Charles the Fourth; so as by common consent he was chosen Emperour; and comming from Hungary to Aken, he was there crowned with the accustomed solemnity: and his raigne was afterwards very long, and so shall I be in writing his historie.

Sigismund chosen Emperour.

When

When Pope Gregory in Arimino, and Pope Iohn in Bologna were aduertised of his Election, they sent him their Ambassages and approbations, either of them attributing the authority to himselfe: but Sigismvnd by reason of particular former friendship, seeming to incline to Pope Iohn more then to any of the others, presently began by messengers to treate with him concerning the calling of a generall Councell, for the suppressing of the Schisme: touching the appointing of the place, there was some question, but the Emperor appointed the city of Constance, whither (as all men thought) all those which were called Popes, were bound to goe, there to make their renunciations. And for as much as the most of the Townes and Cities in Italy held Iohn for Pope; and also for that Ladislavs King of Naples sought to haue vsurped Rome, and all the Church lands and goods, and in effect, though not in name, vnder colour of taking Pope Gregories part, to make himselfe Emperor; Pope Iohn departing from Rome, sent against him Levves Duke of Anion, called king of Naples, Pavl Vrsim, Sforza, and other Captains and souldiers, with the aide of the Florentines which were his friends. These joyning in battaile with Ladislavs, ouerthrew him: but they following not the victory, Ladislavs gathered his men together, and leuied so many others, that Pope Iohn (being then in Rome) was glad to make peace with him; and Ladislavs sent to yeeld him obedience: but as it appeareth fainedly, for within few daies after he came vnder color of other occasions with an Army into the territory of Rome, and entred the City by force; and Pope Iohn hauing no power to make head against him, fled to Florence; so as the King was lodged in Rome with as great state as if he had been Lord thereof, which strake a great feare into the Florentines and their confederats. To Pope Iohn being then in Florence, the Emperor sent another Ambassage about the generall Councell; and the Pope sent two Cardinals Legats to the Emperor, concluding the Councel should be held in Constance, and begin the first of November, An. 1402: which for some occasion was deferred, but yet the Emperor neuer left to procure the same.

The State of Milan and Lombardy was not in peace in those daies, for there were great wars between the tyrants which were therein, of which I haue named some; but Facino Cane was of greatest power, for hee held Alexandria, Bercelli, Tortona, and Nouarra, and found the meanes vnder the title and name of Gouernor to Philip Viscount brother to the Duke of Milan, to get into Pauia; and being possessed of that City, he kept yong Philip in poore estate in the Forresse: vnder the same pretext he afterwards made cruell warres against the other tyrants and cities which were his aduersaries. At the same time the Emperour Sigismvnd sent a Captain with a good number of souldiers to make warre vpon the Venecians, wherein (as saith Sabellicvs) hapned many notable aduentures: but for as much as he sheweth not the cause of this warre, I hold it fit to come to matters of greater importance, concerning the Emperors comming into Italie; before which, in the yeer 1412, Facino Cane dying, he left neither son nor daughter to succeede him but his wife, who was his heire. At that time, Iohn Maria Duke of Milan, by reason of his cruelties and bad conditions was slaine by his own seruants and familiars: and those which slew him taking the City, made Astrogio Viscount, son to Barnaby Viscount, whom the mighty Iohn Galeas father of this Iohn Maria, to haue the dominion of Milan, put to death by treason (being his Vncle) as is before declared: which the other brother Philip (who was in Pauia, and now of age and of power to execute any great attempt) vnderstanding, he by the counsell of his friends tooke the widow of Facino Cane to wife, notwithstanding that she was much older then himself: by which marriage, besides Pauia which was his own, he made himselfe Lord of those Towns which Facino Cane had possessed. His power and courage herewith encreasing, he resolued to see if he could get Milan and the rest, which his father and his brother had enioyed, and thereupon went presently thither; Astrogio not hauing yet gotten the Forresse, for it defended it selfe against him: so as hauing intelligence with some within the City, and assisted by certain captains which had serued Facino Cane, he entred Milan, and expelling Astrogio, suddenly made himselfe Duke; and in processe of time hauing good successe was a great and very redoubted prince, of whom we will sometimes make mention.

John Maria Duke of Milan slaine.

These matters before spoken of, together with the tyranny & power of king Ladislavs of Naples (Italy being out of order) were the causes why the Councell appointed to be held in Constance took not such effect as the Emperor Sigismvnd desired: for Pope Iohn, who had appointed the same, durst not goe out of Italie, leauing his competitor Gregorie and the King of Naples with such power behind him: wherfore the Emperor resolued to come thither, to make some conclusion with Pope IOHN concerning the Councell, and to assist him against the king of Naples, to the end that the Councel might be the more commodiously held, which he presently put in execution: and as the countrie was diuided into factions and partialities, some were glad of his comming, and some were sorie. The Pope being certified thereof came from Florence to Bologna, and thence to Placentia, whither came the Emperour, where they two met and staied a moneth. But what forces the Emperour brought with him, in what manner they were receiued into those cities, or what happened in peace or war, is not distinctly written, but that he was in Lodi and in Cremona, and afterwards in Manton; where the Marques gaue him most sumptuous entertainement. In these places they treated of the recouerie of the citie of Rome, and other places which were vsurped by the King of Naples; which seemed very expedient to be done, to the end the Councell might be held: and on the other side it seemed that the matter ought to be deferred, considering the Kings great power, with whom the Florentines at that time (more for feare then for any good will) had made peace, and (to the end that he should draw his forces out of their frontiers) were to giue him a great summe of money: for which Pope IOHN was very sorie, for this made his warre more doubtfull. But that feare was soone ouer-past: for LADISLAVS feeling himselfe sick, went to Naples, and there died Lord of Rome and of all the territorie thereof, besides his kingdome of Naples. When he died, he left neither son nor daughter, and but one sister whose name was IOANE, which presently succeeded him in his Kingdome: in whose little time, and after her death in that kingdome, were great wars and combustions about the succession. LADISLAVS being dead, the citizens of Rome, crying Libertie, submitted themselues to Pope IOHN, and so did the most part of the other townes; and he sent his Legates to them; for Pope GREGORY although he had a better title, yet he had not so great power to doe it: for hee with his Cardinals liued poorely in Arimino: yet some Princes and people acknowledged him.

A parle betwixt the Pope and the Emperor.

Pope IOHN, hauing taken the best order for his busines that he could in Italy, resolued to go to the Councell in Germany, whither the Emperour to make prouision of all things necessary (hauing already proclaimed the Councel in all parts of Christendome) was already gone: so as after the comming of Pope IOHN and the Bishops, Prelates, and Ambassadours from Christian Princes, into Germany, the generall Councell (according to the appointment) began in Constance, vpon the first day of Nouember in the yere 1414. Yet in the beginning of the Councell there came no Ambassadours from IOHN King of Castile nor from FERDINAND king of Arragon, for that they obeyed BENEDICT, who was gone from Auignon into Arragon: yet afterwards they sent their Ambassadors. The first Session thereof was vpon the sixteenth day of Nouember the same yeere: and so began this Councell, which continued three yeeres, and was one of the greatest and most solemne, and wherein were the greatest number of Princes, Ambassadours and Prelates, that euer was held by the Church of Rome: for writers affirme that with the Emperor, and with the other Princes, Prelates, and Ambassadours, there came 40000. persons. What matters passed, and what was decreed and done in that Councel, plainly appeareth in an Instrument which at this day is extant; the summe of that (which is to our purpose) is this;

The Councell of Constance.

That vpon Christmas euen ensuing after the Councell began, the Emperor accompanied by the Dukes of Saxony and of Wittembergh, and other Princes, came to Constance, where he was solemnly receiued; and afterwards in Imperial pompe and habit was present at the Sessions of the Councell. After New-yeeres day came the Duke of Bauiere, and then the Countie Palatine of Rhine, and the Duke of Silesia. Thither also came Cardinals Ambassadors from Pope GREGORY the 12. Arimino, who with authority from him approued the Councel: but BENEDICT who was in Arragon, would neither come nor send. The Councell being solemnised and ordained in this manner, Pope IOHN in the second Session, which was the second of March the same yeere, promised and solemnly sware to renounce the Papacie, in case that GREGORY and BENEDICT would doe the like: this he did to purchase grace and fauour with the Emperour, to the end that he might continue Pope still; whereof (as all writers affirme) he was vnworthy, for his great vices and Insolencies, which were made manifest to the whole Councell. And he standing in feare of what after ensued (his owne conscience accusing him) fled in disguised attire into the Duke of Austria's Country who fauoured him & took his part. Whereupon many Ambassadours were sent from the Emperour and the Councell to Pope IOHN, and from him to them. The Emperour and the Councell proceeded against the Duke of Austria, for that hee was of counsell with the Popes flight, and had (notwithstanding their their prohibitions and warnings to the contrary) harbored and protected him: and the Emperour confisking his goods, the Swissers took certaine places from him. Whereupon the same Duke which had assisted him, now perswaded Pope IOHN to depart and to returne to the Councel; where after many Citations made and signified vnto him, he submitting himselfe to the Councell, and approouing what by them was or should be determined, as it appeareth in the twelfth Session, was by their Sentence pronoūced non Pontifex: and the Duke conducted him to Constance: where he voluntarily renouncing the Papacie, was apprehended, and committed to the Count Palatine, in whose custodie he liued miserably the space of three yeeres; what befell him afterwards you shall vnderstand.

After this, CHARLES MALATESTA Lord of Arimino, where Pope GREGORY lay, came to the Councell with sufficient authority from him to renounce his right to the Papacie: by vertue whereof he publikely renounced the same in the 14. Session, saying, that Pope GREGORY in the commission which he gaue him said, that for the vnion and vniuersall reformation of the Church, and for redresse of the schisme, it was requisite and expedient that he and the rest which pretended to be Popes, should renounce the Popedome, and that the Councel there assembled should chuse such a one as might be for the good of the Christian common-wealth: and notwithstanding that he was the right Pope and canonically chosen, yet he now, as he euer before had offered to doe, did renounce and there resigne the Papacie into the hands of the Councell, approuing what therein by them should be done, or what they had done already. Pope GREGORIE's renunciation was highly esteemed, and he therefore much commended: whereupon the Councell holding the Papall seate for voide, made him a Legate and gouernot of the Marca de Ancona; which office he enioyed but a little while, for he shortly after died, as some say of sorrow, to see himself deposed from his pontificall seate; and the Councell admitted and receiued those Cardinals which had serued him, and were made by him, and had confirmed to them the reuenues which he had giuen them. What appertained to Pope IOHN and Pope GREGORY being ended, it yet rested to deale with BENEDICT who was in Arragon, to whom many ambassages and admonitions had been sent, that he should either come or send to the Councell, for that no Pope should be chosen vntill the schisme were throughly ended: what was done therein we will presently declare. But first I will shew you that amongst other matters which in this Councel were decreed and determined, a famous Bohemian whose name was IOHN HVSSE, was therein for certaine opinions which he held, condemned and burnt by the decree and Sentence of the Councel; and after him IEROME of Prague, who was a follower of his. Sentence being giuen against IOHN HVSSE, being depriued of his priestly Orders, he was deliuered to the Ciuill Magistrate to be burnt, and was brought to the place of execution with a Bishops mitre of paper on his head, whereon were diuells painted with this Inscription, This is an Arch-heretik. It is sayd, that before his death hee did presage, with a prophetical spirit, the declyning of the Popes Kingdome, saying that there would a goose rise out of his ashes which they should not be able to burne, for in the Bohemian tongue HVSSE signifies a goose. He also vttered these words, After a hundred yeeres you shall make answere to God and to me. And the euent afterwards did verifie and make good the truth of that his prophecie.

The burning of John Husse and Ierome of Prague.

This being past, the Councell sent to BENEDICT in Arragon and to the King thereof, to treate with them, to the end that BENEDICT should renounce the Papacie; and besides this, to treate of a meeting to be had at Nizza betweene the Emperour and the King, where they might conferre of the matter: in the end, in the sixteenth and seuententh Session it was concluded that the Emperour in person should with the Ambassadours, from the Councell, take the paines to goe to Pope BENEDICT, to the end to procure him to renounce the Papacie.

Whereupon he resoluing to put their determination in effect, departed from Constance in the moneth of Iuly, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, foure hundred, and fifteene. And forasmuch as at that time there were very great warres betweene the kings of England and of France, the Emperour going in person to each of them, sought to haue reconciled them: but he failing of his purpose, concluded with them, to request and require Pope BENEDICT in Arragon to renounce the Papacie; which if he refused to doe, that then through all their dominions they should command that none of their Subiects should obey him. And passing forwards (for that the King of Arragon, by reason of his infirmitie, could not goe out of his Kingdom to meet him in Nizza, or in Narbone) he was content to goe to Perpinian, whither the King of Arragon and Pope BENEDICT were already come, where he and the Ambassadors which came from the Councell were by the King very honorably receiued: and after that the Emperor had visited the King and conferred with him about the matter, he went to see Pope BENEDICT, whom with the best speeches and reasons he could deuise, he perswaded to yeeld to the Councels determination.

To the first, BENEDICT gaue very good words, but generall without any conclusion, and did the like to what the Councels Ambassadors propounded. Afterwards there were other meetings between these Princes and this Pope about the same matter, but to no effect; for BENEDICT notwithstanding the King of Arragons entreaty, and the Ambassadors from the King of France, for the same purpose deferring the conclusion with delaies, departing from Perpinian, went to Colibre: where imbarking himselfe in a Galley, without any stay (notwithstanding that the King and the Emperor by their Letters desired the contrary) he went thence by Sea to Pemiscola, which is a little Towne (but very strong) in the countrey of Valencia in Spaine, vpon the Sea coast; whither both the Emperor and king of Arragon sent vnto him: but he persisting obstinate, the king vpon the fift of Ianuary, in the yeer of our Lord, 1416, reiecting him, denyed him to bee Pope.

This being published, the Emperor and the Ambassadors took their way towards Constance: and in his returne (as I guesse) was his iourney to the Kings of England and of France, concerning Pope BENEDICT: for by the Histories it appereth not when it was, but it seemeth to be at his returne, for he came not to Constance vntill the beginning of the yeere of our Lord, one thousand foure hundred and seuenteene, hauing spent one whole yeer vpon the way betweene Spaine and Constance; being one yeer and a halfe after his departure from the Councell to goe this iourney. Those which write that he spent three yeers therein are to be excused, for he took part of all three yeers, to wit, 1415, 1416, and 1417. The Emperor and the Ambassadors being returned, and the Councell hauing at large heard their relation, they resolued to proceede against Pope BENEDICT, as against a rebell, and one whom they neuer had held for Pope; and his accusation was signified vnto him, with a new charge to renounce: but he (persisting in his obstinacy) was denounced for no Pope, but an Heretick, a schismatick, and a scandalous perturber of the vnity and vniuersall peace of the Christian Church and Common-wealth: And the Kingdoms of Castile, Nauarre, and Portugall, which vntill then had been at his deuotion, reiected him.

The Councell (by reason of the renunciations made by IOHN and GREGORY, and BENEDICT being deprived) holding the Papacy for voide, determined to chuse a new Pope: and appointing fiue Prelates of fiue seuerall nations, to wit, French, English, Spanish, Italian and Dutch, to these, together with the Patriarch of Constaninople, and to the Cardinals which had chosen the other Popes, the Councell gaue order to choose a Pope; all which agreeing together, chose Cardinall OTHO de Colunna, and he was called MARTIN the fift. This MARTIN being chosen (to auoide all occasion of scruple) ordayned that euery tenth yeer a Councell should be held, and that the first should begin at the end of fiue yeers, and that all the benefices giuen by the three Popes before that IOHN and GREGORY renounced, and BENEDICT was deprived, should be confirmed. After this, in the fiue and fortith Session, in the moneth of Aprill, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand foure hundred and eighteene, three yeeres and a halfe after the beginning of this Councell, it was dissolued, and the Pope tooke his way towards Rome, and all the rest towards their Countries. At this time the Emperour made the Earles of Cleues and of Sauoy, Dukes, and so haue their successors continued euer since.

The Emperor hauing newly redeemed the Marquisate of Brandenburgh, from WILLIAM Lantzgraue of Turinge; to whom IODOCVS, Marquesse of Moravia, his cosen germane, had pawned it when he aspired to the Empire, the same with the Electorall dignity he sold to FREDERICK Burgraue of Norembergh, a Prince of knowne wisdome, magnanimity, loyaltie and authority, hauing deserued well both of the Emperor and Common-wealth, for foure hundred thousand Crowns; with this condition, that if the Emperor should haue a sonne, it should then be lawfull for him to redeem it. And yet in this sale the price was not so much regarded, as the reward of FREDERICK's vertues and merits, who had done SIGISMVND great services, and vndergone many dangers for him. There is one memorable thing written of this FREDERICK; who, making his Will, called his foure sonnes vnto him, speaking to IOHN the eldest after this manner: I first got this septentrionall dignity when I was familiar with the Emperor SIGISMVND; and now that I am cald out of this life, my care is, that such an honor should not grow contemptible in our family; Thou I see art wholly inclined to a quiet and contemplative course of life: In this Septentrionall charge thou shalt finde nothing but cares and continuall toyle; wherefore if I might, with your liking, I would giue this charge by my will to FREDERICK your second brother, who seemes to be more fit for action: To whom IOHN answered, I did alwaies thinke that FREDERICK had been more deere vnto you then my selfe, which did somewhat grieue me; but now deere father, I will change my opinion, and will honor and loue you, who by your last will bequeath rest to me and cares to him. A notable example in old FREDERICK, not of fatherly affection, but of wisedome, prouiding for the publike: and of modesty in IOHN the sonne, yeelding to his fathers iudgement touching the succession, without any froward opposition.

This being ended, the Emperor went to pacifie the troubles in Bohemia, where the followers of IOHN HVSSE and IEROM of Prague which were burnt at the Councell of Constance, were of such power that they pulled down some Churches and Monasteries, which did more abound in Bohemia then in any kingdome in all Christendom; the King hauing little meanes to redresse the same. I say King, for WENCESLAVS who had been Emperor, liued vntill this time, who holding not himselfe to be in safety in the City of Prague, retired himselfe to a most strong Castle, about fiue miles from thence, and being there the Hussites rose and committed many insolencies: Which King WENCESLAVS perceiuing, he sent to his brother the Emperor (as at other times he had done) for aide, about the time that the Councell brake vp at Constance: but he was so resolued to go to the warres against the Turkes which annoyed him in Hungary, or peraduenture in hope to be reuenged for the battaile which he lost against them before that he was Emperor, which I write not for that it maketh nothing to my purpose: the which he did contrary to his duty, and therein had ill successe, and in Bohemia worse, for presently after this, King WENCESLAVS dying without leauing any successor but his wife the Queene, the Emperour was sent for to take possession of that Kingdom: but desirous to renew the warre against the Turks, wherein most commonly he had ill successe, hee would not come; thinking to entertaine the matter by Gouernors which he sent thither: wherein he erred, for that occasion being lost, the troubles encreased; and there arose one IOHN CISCA, a man of a noble house and very expert in the warres, whom the Hussites made their Captaine, to whom out of Prague and other parts thereto adjoyning, came 40000 of the Hussites; who not content with the subuerting of Monasteries and pulling down of Images, possessed themselues of the fortresses of that City, and being masters of the field, took the towne of Relezzina, and other towns and castles.

Cisca Captaine of the Hussites in Bohemia.

CISCA before the comming of the Emperors Gouernors, was grown so mighty, that they were constrained to make peace with him and with the Hussites, to the end that they should giue vp Prague and other Castles, which they desired to haue vntill the Emperours comming, which was shortly after; wherwith far greater accidents ensued, when peace and quietnes was hoped for; as we will declare after that we haue made some relation of the state of the Empire in Italie, wherein they now knew no Emperor but in name only; and likewise of the comming, and successe of the new Pope.

The Councell being dissolued, Pope MARTIN notwithstanding that he was diuersly counselled, (by some, that he should continue in Germany, and by others, in Ffrance) remained firme in his resolution to goe into Italy and to Rome, alleaging that he which gouerneth the ship, ought to sit at the Helme, and not in the Prow, neither in the mid-ship. In conclusion, he departed from Germany the same yeer that he was chosen, and came directly to Milan; for Duke PHILIP (who by his policy and valour was grown very mighty) was his friend. At that time PHILIP was busied in the warres against PANDVLPH MALATESTA, who withheld Bergamo and Brescia from him, and against GABRINO FONDVLO, who held Cremona; and against other Lords which held other places which had been his fathers, the mighty IOHN GALEAS; and were lost in the time of his brother IOHN MARIA; in which warres PHILIP had so good successe, that he recouered all those estates, and was afterwardes one of the most puissant princes of the world, and was Lord also of Genoa. He possessed the state of Milan vntill he died, which were two and thirty yeers, in which time he had great wars with the Venecians and Florentines, and with other Princes; wherfore of necessity we must sometimes make mention of him.

From Milan the Pope came to Florence, but could not goe to Rome, for that one BRACCIO

MONTONIO (an excellent Captain, and of very great power) in the time of Sede vacante, and of the Councell, had taken the City of Perugia, and the Territory thereof, and many other Towns in the iurisdiction of Rome: and many others of his condition ioyned with him; so as there was no safe passage for the Pope to Rome, wherein the said BRACCIO MONTONIO had a strong party. But at the intercession of the Florentines, which were mediators between them, BRACCIO MONTONIO afterwards submitted himself to the Pope, and rendered some Towns which he had taken; and the Pope made him his Generall against Bologna which rebelled: which by him, and by GABRIEL Cardinall of Saint CLEMENT, was reduced to the Popes obedience.

In those daies (but somewhat before this time) BALTHASAR COSSA, which had been Pope IOHN (who renounced his Papacy in the Councell of Constance, of whom Pope MARTIN stood in no small fear that he would haue attempted some alteration by taking vpon him as Pope, and would haue renewed the schism) came into Italy, and finding fauor and entertainment among some of his friends, would not intermeddle in any matter; but of his owne accord without any safe conduct or other agreement, at such time as no man thought thereof, came voluntarily to Florence where the Pope lay; and comming into his Palace, kist his foot, and acknowledged him for Pope, Saint PETER's Successor, and CHRIST's Vicar; whereupon, Pope MARTIN made him a Bishop and a Cardinall: but he, within few months after dying, was in Florence most solemnly buried, by the procurement (principally) of COSMO de Medicis, a rich and noble Citizen therof, and chief of the house and family of the Medici's, whose beginning (as it is written) was through the treasure and riches which hee inherited from this BALTHASAR COSSA, otherwise called Pope IOHN.

Pope MARTIN, knowing what troubles were in the Kingdome of Bohemia, sought by his Buls to haue pacified the matter: but seeing it was comn to blowes, the friendship betwixt him and the Emperor SIGISMVND was soon after broken. In those daies came to Rome LEWES, Duke of Aniow and Earl of Prouence, son to the other LEWES deceased, to receiue from the Pope the title and inuestiture of the Kingdome of Naples, against Queen IOAN, sister and heir to King LADISLAVS; being called thither by the Pope for the same purpose, through her ill gouernment and tyranny, but chiefly for that she ioyned with BRACCIO MONTONIO, and made warre vpon him, and for other matters too long to relate. The Pope proceeding against her, and holding her vnworthy to enioy the feudatory lands of the Church, sent for Duke LEWES, offering him the Kingdome of Naples: but Queen IOAN, being thereof aduertised, adopted ALONZO King of Arragon (who was also King of Sicilia) whom shee called to her aid, and to the succession in that Kingdome; who came accordingly. The Queen afterwards (according to her naturall condition) falling at oddes with him, and reuoking the adoption which she had made of ALONZO, adopted the same LEWES whom the Pope had called. Heerof grew the wars betwen LEWES and ALONZO for the Kingdome of Naples; and, after the decease of LEWES, with his brother RENE, which wars continued many yeers: but in the end, ALONZO hauing the victory, obtained the soueraignty of that Kingdome.

Warres for the Kingdom of Naples.

These things passed in Italy, where the Emperors were now of small power: and in Germany, the warres which the Turk made in Hungary being assiwaged, the Emperor resolued (though late) to come into Bohemia, to take possession of that Kingdome; whither if hee had presently comn, it is very likely that the troubles there had been pacified: for, at his comming to Bruna, which is in Morauia, Ambassadors came to him from Prague to submit themselues, and to sue for pardon; which he entertained and heard; and proponing certain tolerable conditions, granted them a generall pardon: the newes whereof were very ioyfull to the Inhabitants of that City and Kingdome; to the Hussites, to see themselues pardoned of their offences; and to the rest, in hope to liue in peace. But all this was croft, for that the King came not presently to take possession of that City which is the head of that Kingdome, where they peaceably attended his coming; but he would first go to Vratislaue, the chief City of Silesia, a prouince to the East of Bohemia. There, as well as in Prague (in time of the insurrection of the people) the Gouernours which were left there by WENCESLAVS were slain; and the Emperour, to punish the offence, did iustice vpon the principall heads of that rebellion.

As the newes thereof was published in Prague, and as their offenses were equall or greater, this vnseasonable punishment strake such a terror into the people, that they fearing the like rigour, without any further consideration rose vp in Arms; and resoluing to refuse him for their King, wrote wrote their Letters, thereby inciting the rest through all the kingdom to doe the like; publishing that he had resolued to commit great cruelty amongst them. This tooke such effect, that in the greatest and best part of the kingdom, the people took Armes: and as the greatest part of those of Prague were Hussites (the rest ioyning with them) they altogether sent for a Captaine of the Hussites, a man of great power, whose name was CISCA, whom they put into Prague for defence thereof against the Emperor, who was comming against it. Hee of ensued in that City and Kingdome many encounters, skirmishes, battailes and bloodshed by fire and sword, such as neuer was seen or heard of, and such as I am not able to relate: the most effectual wherof may be seen in the third book of ÆNEAS SYLVIVS, afterwards cald PIVS QVINTVS, in his History of Bohemia: for my part I will rest satisfied, briefly mentioning the most notable accidents which happened. The Emperor accompanied by the Duke of Saxony, the Marquesse of Brandenburgh, and the Duke of Austria, with many other souldiers both of Foote and Horse, came neere to the City of Prague: Whereof the Fortresse called Vicengrade was at his deuotion.

CISCA and his people very resolutely battered the same, but their chiefest hope was to take it by famine. The Emperor comming thither relieued the Fortresse, and entring it, was therein crowned King of Bohemia: the Fortresse being victualled and garrisoned, he presently besieged the City; which siege continued six weekes; in which time in all the skirmishes and encounters which happened, it pleased God that CISCA and his followers had still the better: the like issue befell in a manner in all parts of the kingdome, betweene the Hussites and the Imperialists. Whereupon the Emperor raising his siege from before Prague, came to Cutna: and CISSA leauing the City, ioyned with the Taborites, so called after the name of a City founded by them and so called: And being victorious and not contented to make defensiue warres only, taking the field, he likewise tooke some Townes and Castles from his aduersaries.

The Emperor making warre Against the Hussites, besiegd the City of Prage

Many other conflicts after this ensued, which I omit: and the matter came to this issue, that the Emperor with his whole power came to a strong Monastery which held for CISCA, with a resolution to batter and to take it; and if CISCA came to the relefe thereof, to fight with him: for his army was such, that he doubted nothing of the victory. But there befell a strange accident: which was, that CISCA resoluing to come to the relefe of that Castle, and so to fight with the Emperor, and being come to the point to haue ioyned, the Emperors troups but at sight of their enemies, making no resistance, or shewing the mindes or courage of men, so dainely ranne away, and the Emperor was driuen to do the like, not daring to stay in any part of all Bohemia: So as CISCA and his people being masters of the field, besieged many strong holds and Castles, which he took by force. At the assault of one of which, as he had but one eye, that one was shot out with an arrow; but his credit and reputation was so great, that he continued in the gouernment and command of the Army, which was led by a blinde Christian: a thing neuer seen nor read in any History; for notwithstanding that he was blinde, yet he still prosecuted the wars.

The Emp. coming to fight with the Hussites at the sight of them, his people fled without blow striken.

The Emperor (notwithstanding these disasters) was not dismaid: but leuying his whole power he sent for the Princes of the Empire, whom he appointed to enter Bohemia by the West; and he with his Hungars would enter it by the East. Thither came with great troups the Duke of Saxony, the Count Palatine of Rhine, the Marquesse of Brandenburgh, the Archbishoppe of Mentz, and some other Princes and Prelates, who began the warre, and besieged and tooke some townes. The Emperor stayed longer then he had appointed, but comming with his Army, he began on his side, and notwithstanding that CISCA was blinde yet he took the field against him; and comming to ioyne in battaile, the Emperors men were strken with such feare of CISCA and of the Hussites, that they were presently ouerthrown, and many principall men of them were slaine; and the Emperor in fortunate in the warres, being driuen to flie, CISCA followed the execution of the victory.

The Emp. ouerthrown the 2 time by the Hussites, and their blinde Captaine Cisca.

Matters standing in this estate, the Nobles and principals of Prague and of all Bohemia desiring to haue a King, that might oppose himselfe against SIGISMVND, were resolued themselues and their kingdom to VITOLD Duke of Lituania; for which CISCA was sorry. The Duke desirous to be a King, accepting their offer, sent a Captain called TOKYNA with his power, who being gladly receiued into the City, began to shew the power of a new King, and to batter such castles and Fortresses as were his aduersaries. But this Duke within short space after, at the entreaty of the King of Poland, comming to a composition with the Emperor, gaue ouer his his enterprise and title to the Crown of Bohemia. It followed, that the Emperor gaue the Prouince of Morauia to ALBERT his son-in-law, one of the Dukes of Austria, to the end that hee should defend the same: and he returning to the war against the Hussites, there hapned betwixt CISCA and the Imperialists another great battell; wherin CISCA hauing the victory, nine thousand of the Imperialists were slain.

A third battell wherin the emperor was ouerthowne, and 9000 of his people slain by the Hussites.

The Emperor, seeing the power of CISCA to bee so great, that without his good will hee could not be King of Bohemia, sought to be at peace with him; and to that end made him many large promises and offers: at the time of the parley, being at a point to haue made a conclusion, CISCA died of the plague; after whose death the Hussites were diuided into seueral factions, of which some were called Hussites, and some Taborites; so as they were at variance and contention amongst themselues: but warring against the Imperialists, they euer ioyned and were friends.

After many other accidents, Pope MARTIN sending his Legate into Germany, commanded the Emperor to renew the warre against the Bohemians: and the Duke of Saxony entering the Countrey vpon the one side, and the Marquesse of Brandenburgh vpon another side, and at another place the Archbishop of Treuier, either of them with the greatest power they were able to leuie; all which, meeting together in Bohemia, and beginning the war, and knowing that the Hussites came to fight with them (a matter seeming incredible, yet true although strange and shamefull) they were stricken with such fear, that without seeing or hearing any enemie, both Captains and Souldiers setting all shame apart, abandoning the field, ranne away in such manner, that neither entreaty nor authority was able to stay them; and the Hussites, pursuing them, took all their baggage and artillery; and not content therewith, salying forth of their Kingdome, warred in other parts; out of which, in consideration of a great summe of money, they returned home again.

At a fourth inuasion the Imperialists ranne before they saw any enemy.

The Pope, vnderstanding in what estate the affairs of Bohemia stood, resolued to giue a Croisade, and to send a new Legate against the Bohemians, notwithstanding that in Italy there was as little quietnes, but great wars, as well in the Kingdome of Naples, as in Lombardy and in other parts. And to that effect he sent IVLIAN, Cardinall of S. Angelo, to be his Legate against the Hussites, and that (the time being expired) he might sit in his place in the Councell appointed to be held in Basill. This Cardinall coming to the Emperor, it was decreed, that a new Armie, and new forces, to a greater number than before, should be leuied against the Hussites; whither came FREDERICK, Marquesse of Brandenburgh (who was chosen Generall) and the Dukes of Bauier and of Saxony, the Archbishops of Mentz, Treuier and Colen, and many Bishops, Prelates and Princes, together with the companies of the Cities, and so many others, that they amounted to the number of forty thousand horse, but not so many foot (for, it seems they were not so requisite for that war); who with this power entred the Kingdome of Bohemia, the Cardinall Legate going with the Army. But the Hussites were so accustomed to the bearing of Armes, and were therewith so courageous, that they drew themselues to one head, with a resolution to fight with the Imperialists: and the one Army beeing opposite to the other, so as no man doubted but that the Imperialists (considering their multitude, and the goodnes of their Captains and Souldiers) would haue had the victory; there hapned the strangest accident that euer was seen, whether through treason or practice in the Army, or through some vain & cowardly fear or imagination, or through the secret iudgement of God who was not pleased that the matter should be decided by Arms, there fell a sudden fear in the Camp, and a rumor that they were not to stay there: whereupon they all beganne presently to march, leauing behinde them all they brought; and many, their Armes and furnitures; and the whole Army (no admonitions, threatning or intreaty, made by the Princes and Commanders, being able to preuaile with them) fled; and they did the like, without seeing or fighting with any enemy: and so they fleeing out of the Countrey, the Hussites made great booty of what their enemies left, and could not carry with them.

A wonderfull discomfiture.

So great an Army being so shamefully ouerthrowne, the Emperor intended not (for that time) to raise any other: but the time being expired that the Councell should begin, the Cardinall Legate went to Basil; and the Emperor, by reason of the aid and assistance promised him by PHILIP Duke of Milan, resolued to go into Italy to be crowned in Rome. At this time died Pope MARTIN, and after his decease, a Cardinall called GABRIEL CONDYLMERO, a Gentleman of Venice, was in March in the yeer 1431 chosen, and called EVGENIVS the Fourth: in the beginning of whose Papacy many insolencies (as saith PLATINA and other Writers) were committed in Rome between the Pope and the Colonnois. EVGENIVS, approuing the Councell appointed by Pope MARTIN, commanded it to be begunne in Basil; where, the Cardinall of Saint Angelo being President, the first Session was held vpon Friday, the seuenth of December: whereof before that we make any relation, which shall be but little (notwithstanding that it continued long, and that therein was much controuersie and contention with the Pope) we wil describe the iourney SIGISMVND made to his coronation, which was in this manner:

Vpon assurance of the promises and offers made by the Duke of Milan, SIGISMVND with small troops of Germans and Hungars came into Italie; and coming to Milan, the Duke being not there, he was by the Dukes commandement very honourably receiued by a Captain of his called NICHOLAS PICHININO, and other principall men, and there according to the custome was crowned with the Crown of Iron: but the Duke came not to see him; yet hee afterwards by Letters and delaies temporized with him many daies in Parma and in Placencia, yet not furnishing him with such things as he had promised against the Florentines; who, as enemies to the Duke, stopped his passage to Rome, and to that effect maintained an Armie in field: and moreouer they perswaded the Pope to prohibit his coming to Rome, assuring him, that by the instigation of Duke PHILIP he came against him. The Emperor, without speaking with the Duke, in the best manner that he could came to Luca; and notwithstanding that the Pope and the Florentines sought to stay him, yet he, after some accidents which hapned between the souldiers of the one and other side, came to Siena, where he staied six moneths: in which time he came to a composition with the Pope, many ambassages passing between them in the mean season; so as he peaceably departing towards Rome, was therein solemnly receiued, and with great solemnity crowned by the hands of the Pope, vpon the last day of May in the yeer of our Lord 1432; and after some treaties he took his leaue to return into Germany. By the way he was entertained in Ferrara and Mantoa, by their Lords and Dukes (the warres continuing in Italy, as before) wherein passed many great matters: the principals were the Florentines and Venecians which made war against the Duke of Milan, who now was becom Lord of Genoa, the which hee tooke by meanes of the dissension and discord that grew betweene the Inhabitants.

The Emperour Sigismund crowned in Rome by the Pope.

Whil'st the Emperor was in Italy, in the Councell at Basil many matters were treated of, but had not yet taken such effect as they desired: for, the Hussites persisting constant in their opinions, the Councell sent thither certain learned men, such as well knew the Country, who by flattery and fair means sought to haue seduced the Bohemians; in whom they somtimes found hope of peace, and at other times signes of warre: and so the case continuing as doubtfull as before, it pleased God that by secret means vnknowne to man, there grew some suspicion & iealousie between the Nobility of that Kingdome (whereof one MENANDER was the chiefe) and the Taborites and the Hussites (notwithstanding that some of the Nobles were Hussites); but in the end it grieued them all to be gouerned by PROCOPIVS, a man of base parentage, who being Generall of the Taborites, commanded all; and by another PROCOPIVS call'd the yonger, Captain of the Hussites. After that they had long murmured at the matter, they summoned a Parliament to be held by all the estates of the Realm, vnder pretext to set some order in the gouernment: for they were discontented with the violences and insolencies daily committed. Finally, the Parliament was assembled, and a Noble-man and nobly descended, although of mean estate, whose name was ALCION, was nominated and made their Gouernor, and he presently vndertook the gouernment. And although he had the title and outward shew, yet all was done by the order and direction of MENANDER the chief of the Nobility. Heerwith the Hussites and the Procopii were so much discontent, that the matter came to blowes. I cannot describe all that passed; for there were many notable accidents: but I wil tell you the euent thereof.

When the Emperor, coming out of Italy into Germany, was vpon his way towards Basil, hee vnderstood that between the Pope and the Councell there was great discord: for, the Pope perceiuing that the Councell began to treat of many matters against his authority and dignity, commanded it to be dissolued, and to be transferred to Bologna; and the Councell, reiecting his commandements, would not accomplish what he required, but made other acts and statutes to his disgrace. Whereupon many matters passed, and the Emperor came to the Councell, and there hearing the matter debated, made a reconciliation between them: and the Pope against ratified the Councell; yet they afterwards fell further at variance, as you shall hear: for, those of

of the Councell, refusing to make an end, continued the Councell a long time in despite of the Pope: but the Emperor by his authority in the best manner that he could took vp the matter; and vnderstanding of the warres between the Nobility and the Hussites in Bohemia, holding the same for the most assured meanes for him to recouer that Kingdom, went from Basil to Vlm, where he was aduertised of a battell fought between them, wherein the Lords had the victory; and therein were both the Procopii (Captaines of the Hussites and Taborites) slaine, with many thousands of others; and a great number were taken prisoners: and they found the meanes afterwards to kill or burn all those which were taken, or escaped from the battell. The Emperor, vnderstanding heerof, sent his Ambassadors into Bohemia, to perswade the Nobility to obey and receiue him for their King, for that of right it appertained to him, as to the sonne and brother to the Kings of Bohemia. And it pleased God to work such an alteration in the hearts of the Bohemians, that they sent their Ambassadors to Ratisbone, whither the Emperor was gon from Vlme, to whom they gaue order to receiue him for their King and soueraign Lord: and they agreed with him concerning his coming into Bohemia; and he there ratified the conditions concluded by those of the Councell with the Bohemians, concerning points of religion; which in summe was, that that the Bohemians wholly submitted themselues to the Church of Rome, and that they, beleeuing as it did, forsook all matters in question, except communicating vnder both kindes of bread and wine; which was granted them vpon this condition, that the matter should be referred to the determination of the Councell: and all other matters concerning Church-rents and goods, and other ecclesiasticall benefices, were concluded and agreed vpon.

These matters being ended, the Emperor within fewe daies after peaceably entring Bohemia, was with feasting and great solemnity, vpon the fourth day of August, in the yeer of our Lord 1436, receiued into the City of Prague: he had been there but a fewe daies space, but ther was so great an alteration, that it seemed a new world, and another kinde of people: for, notwithstanding that there remained some of the sect of the Hussites, yet the greatest and most common were Papists. The Temples which had been spoiled and ruinated were new built, and those which were defaced were repaired, and the Altars were decked with Images and Reliques, and the Monks and Friers returned to their Couents and Cloisters: finally, all was restored to the former order. Of the pretended Hereticks, which would not be conuerted, some fled for feare of imprisonment, and to others a time was limited wherin they should recant; and against such as persisted constant, the Emperor proceeded: for his successe heerin, Pope EVGENIVS sent him a Rose of gold, who at that time commanded the Councell at Basil to bee dissolued, and a generall Councell to be held at Ferrara; where they expected the Emperour of Constantinople: but the Councell of Basil, holding themselues to be aboue the Pope, would not obey him, neither be dissolued.

The Emperor being now threescore and ten yeers old, and tired with warres and troubles both before and after he was Emperor (which were more than I haue written) began to wax feeble and sickly; and perceiuing death to approach, he was aduertised that his wife (considering that he was old, and could not liue long, and that he had but one daughter which was married to ALBERT of Austria) sought, as soon as he should be dead, to marry with the King of Poland; and that the Bohemians should take him and her for King and Queen. For redresse heerof, and being somewhat iealous of the Bohemians for matters past, he sent for the Noble-men of Hungary which came with him into Bohemia; to whom in secret (aduertising them of what passed) he recommended his daughter and son-in-law, and made them to promise to take them for their King and Queen after his decease. And notwithstanding that he was very sick, yet hee caused himself to be carried out of Prague towards Hungary, where he desired to die: but being vnable to reach thither, he was carried to his daughter and son-in-law in Morauia, who by his gift, possessed that Prouince, which came to meet him in the City of Zenomia; whither also came his wife the Empresse, who there by his commandement was apprehended. The Emperor within fewe daies after, in the 37 yeer of his Raign, vpon the day of the conception of our Lady, in the yeer of our Lord 1437, died. And so ended this Prince both his life and troubles; who although he had vnfortunate successe, especially in Arms and warres, yet he failed in nothing that belonged to a wise and valiant Knight. This Emperor might well be paralleld with the antient OTHOES and CHARLES, for the excellency of his wit, piety, wisedome, greatnes of minde, industry, dexterity of counsell, and patience in labor, if fortune had been answerable to his wise resolutions and commendable attempts, and that God had not denyed successe to his iust and necessary Arms against the Turk. He returned no more to these Turkish wars.

wars, being hindred with intestine combustions, and terrified (as I conceiue) with the remembrance of two ouerthrowes: and although he desired to be reuenged of these cruell and barbarous enemies, yet he durst not make triall of a third battell. He delighted much in the reading of Histories. He had alwaies this Saying in his mouth, He knowes not how to raign, that cannot dissemble; meaning, that he must not do all things according to his owne will. He hated a flatterer as the plague: but when as a slander by did blame the Emperor, saying that hee was gouerned by flatterers; he answered, So it fals out in Courts: those whom wee hate most and seek to shun, we are forced to obey. Speaking of gouernment, he was wont to say, that all men refused to practise any Art which they had not learnd; but no man refused to command, which is the most difficult of all Arts. Blessed were Kings on earth, if hauing excluded proud men from all gouernment, they drew into their Courts such as are milde and graue. And when as his Courtiers did blame the railing of the German multitude, who commonly spake ill of their Princes; smiling he answered, Do you think it strange that they speak ill, when as we doo ill? In his youth he was vindicatiue; but age and experience tempered this heat: wherefore one expostulating with him, that he not onely pardoned his enemies, but also fauoured and aduanced them; Thou, said he, thinkest it a benefit to kill an enemy, for that there is not any danger in a dead man: but I kill an enemie when I spare him; and I make him my friend when I aduance him. He was twice married, first to MARY daughter to the King of Hungary, by whom he had that Kingdome; the second time with BARBARA, daughter to the Earle of Cilia, by whom he had his daughter ISABEL which was his heir, and married to ALBERT one of the Dukes of Austria, who then was Lord and Marquesse of Morauia. His wife after his death was set at liberty: but spending her daies infamously, in the end she died of the plague.

The state of Italy when SIGISMVND died was so confused and out of order, that except I should relate the whole, I cannot expresse the same in such sort as it may be vnderstood. Duke PHILIP of Milan, being an enemy to Pope EVGENIVS, fauoured the Councell of Basil: and the Florentines and Venecians supported the Pope against him. There were other warres among them; wherein the most famous Captains were, FRANCIS SFORCE before named, and NICHOLAS PICHININO. ALONSO King of Arragon (Queen IOANE and LEWES being dead) contended with RENE, LEWES his brother, about the Kingdom of Naples. A little before that LEWES died, K. ALONSO and his brother the King of Nauarre being taken in a battell by sea, and with them many other Lords by the fleet of the Genoais, were carried prisoners to Duke PHILIP of Milan, who then was Lord of Genoa; who, shewing his magnificence, released them, and set them at liberty: which the Genoais took in so ill part, that they reuolting made themselues free from the Duke.

In those daies were cruell wars between the Kings of England and France; and amongst the French was a woman which bare Arms like a souldier, and afterwards (as a Captain) wrought wonders, and defended and recouered many Castles for the French: this woman was called IEANNE la Pucelle.

After the decease of EMANVEL Emperor of Constantinople, his son IOHN PALEOLOGVS raigned, who was already vpon the way to come to the Councell in Italy.

THE ARGVMENT.

SIgismund being dead, his son-in law Albert was peaceably chosen; who was in some doubt to accept the Empire, by reason of the Kingdome of Hungary: which being past, he accepted the gouernment. For that he liued not long, he could not effect so great matters as he proiected. Hee had warres with some rebels, which hee luckily ended. But he could not make any peace or vnion between the Councels which were held in his time, one in Basil without the Pope, the other in Ferrara where the Pope was in person; which Councell was afterwards ended in Florence. He took Armes against Amurath King of the Turks, in the behalf of the Dispote of Seruia: but, being in a little village vpon his way, he died of Dysenteria, hauing raigned but a small time. His death was much lamented, by reason of the great hope conceiued of his vertue.

THE same day that the Emperor SIGISMVND died, his sonne-in-law ALBERT Duke of Austria was by all the principall Lords of both those Kingdomes which were there with him, together with his wife SIGISMVND'S daughter, to whom in right those Kingdoms appertained, hailed King of Hungary and Bohemia; who from that City of Zenomia which is in Morauia, sent Ambassadors into Bohemia, with SIGISMVND'S Will and Testament, and by his authority to take possession of that Kingdome: and he with his wife, carrying with them the dead body of the Emperor, and the widow Empresse prisoner, departed towards Hungary; where they were without any contradiction receiued and obeyed, and afterwards with great solemnity, vpon the first day of Ianuary, in the yeer of our Lord 1438, crowned; hauing first performed the Imperiall funerals and obsequies.

In the meantime, his Ambassadors which were in Bohemia, assembling the principall Lords of that Realm in the City of Prague, shewed the Testament of the deceased Emperor and their King; and alleaging many effectuall reasons, perswaded them to chuse ALBERT, as well for that he had married the onely daughter and heir of their King, as also for that hee was of the house of Austria; between which and Bohemia there was an antient couenant, that whensoeuer there failed an heir in any one of these houses, one should be chosen out of the other. Finally, the Ambassadors vsed so good means, that the Assembly concluded, that ALBERT and his wife should be their King and Queen; and so in their absence they were sworn vnto, and receiued for such, notwithstauding that some of the principall Barons were against the same: among which many were the Empresse kinsmen; of which the chiefest were TASCON and ALCIOSTERREMBERGH, which were consenting to the practice which we spake of when the Emperor died. These men, requiring certain conditions which might not bee granted, departed from ALBERT'S seruice and obedience: which, calling and inuiting others to ioyne with them them, chose for their King, CASIMIRE brother to the King of Poland; and they sending for him to come and take possession of the Kingdome, offred him their aid and seruice in the action.

In this mean time, the Electors of the Empire being certified of the death of the Emperour SIGISMVND, met in Francfort to chuse a new Emperor; where ALBERT, King of Hungary and Bohemia, and Duke of Austria, was vpon the twentith day of March, in the yeer 1438, chosen; and being by the same Princes aduertised of his election, very gladly gaue eare to their Ambassage, but yet could not presently accept the gouernment, for that when he was sworn in Hungary, he promised the Hungars, notwithstanding he were chosen, hee would not accept the Empire, because it was not held expedient for that Kingdome, that the King thereof should be Lord of any other Countries, but should make his abode in Hungary onely; producing the Emperor SIGISMVND for example, whose absence was the occasion of many inconueniences in that Country. But notwithstanding all this, new Ambassages daily arriuing, hee caused the principall Lords and the Burgesses of Cities in Hungary to meet in the City of Viena in Austria, wherein he found some contradiction: but in the end the Humors being intreated and perswaded by FREDERICK, Duke also of Austria, they consented to his election, and ALBERT accepted thereof; and presently went to be crowned at Aken, which was acceptable to all Germany: for, he was held for a wise and valorous Prince, and shewed the same in the small time that he enioyed the Empire.

Albert Duke of Austria chosen Emperor.

Albert crowned Emperor in Aken.

ALBERT, knowing that CASIMIRE brother to the King of Poland had accepted the Kingdome of Bohemia, and that with the aid of his brother he leuied forces for that enterprise, sent his Ambassadors to the King, desiring him, that si h he well knew him to be the right King of Bohemia, he would not suffer their iust friendship for any vniust cause to be broken: whereto the King of Poland answered, that he could not let his brother to accept that Kingdome which by the naturall subiects thereof was offred him, together with other excuses such as he thought good. Within fewe daies after, the Emperor entred Bohemia, notwithstanding that TASCON and the rest of his faction sent (with certain protestations) to require him that he should not do it: but he, holding on his iourney, was in the month of May, in the yeer 1438, crowned in the City of Prague. And TASCON, and such others as took CASIMIRE'S part, ioyning themselues with the men of warre which came out of Poland, raised an Army; and taking the field, and fortifying such Towns as were at their deuotion, warred vpon the rest: and the Emperour with the Troops which he brought with him, and others which came to his aid, did the like. And notwithstanding that others were expected to come to him out of Austria and from other parts, yet he would not stay, but went to seek his enemies and to fight with them: but TASCON and the Polacres not daring to giue him battell, retiring, encamped themselues neer to the City of Tabor, which was inhabited by pretended Hereticks; whither the Emperor pursuing them, had in his Army CHRISTOPER Duke of Bauiere, FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, and ALBERT Marquesse of Brandenburgh: which there pitching their Tents, daily skirmishes passed between them; wherein the Polacres and Bohemians were so hardly bested, that they disbanding, part of them put themselues into Tabor, which is a most strong impregnable Town; and ALBERT, knowing it to be such, returned to Prague: and the Polacres (fewer in number than they came into that Countrey) returned to their houses; so as the Emperour, finding no resistance, discharged his souldiers which were strangers: and some Princes which came to his aid, returned to their Countries; yet between the one and the other Kingdomes some roads and incursions continued: but shortly after a truce was taken between them. And forasmuch as there came tidings of the coming of AMVRATH the great Turk with a great power into Hungary, ALBERT was constrained to leaue Gouerners in Bohemia, and to take his way thitherward, with a determination to leuie forces and to fight with the Turks, notwithstanding that he was counselled by many to the contrary, being feared with the infortunate battell fought by the Emperor SIGISMVND. But notwithstanding all their admonitions and perswasions, nothing could diuert the Emperor, so great a desire had he to fight: and that which more increased his resolution, was, that the Dispote of Seruia, fleeing from AMVRATH, came into Hungary to implore aid and succor to relieue and vnset his sonne which was besieged in the City of Sinderouia, situate vpon the side of the riuer Danubius, which the Turk held besieged, and put it to great distresse: wherefore the Emperor resolued to raise his forces for that iourney, which was in the yeer of our Lord 1439.

At this time the discord and contention between the Councell of Basil and the Pope grew more violent: for, notwithstanding the Popes commandements to dissolue (it hauing now con-continued eight or nine yeeres since it first began) they held, and refusing to be dissolued, cited the Pope to make his personall appearance before them. In this Councell they disputed long of the authority and power of the Pope: and in the end they decreed that the authority of the Councell was aboue the Pope, and that they might displace the Pope; and that not onely Bishops, but other learned and godly men should haue their voices. Hereupon EVGENIVS finding that this Decree would shake the Popes authority, and that the Councell would arrogate more liberty then he thought fit, he resolued to dissolue it.

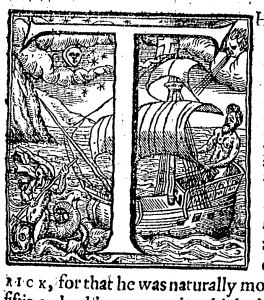
The Pope hereupon summoned a generall Councell to be held in Ferrara, which was the yeere before (by his commandement) begun by the Cardinall S. Croſſe, whither the Pope himself came in person. Here was that which had neuer beene seene (a schisme of Councels) for those of Basil would not giue ouer, yet many which had been there came to Ferrara. In the Councel of Basil were many disputations and arguments concerning this matter. To the Councell of Ferrara came IOHN PALEOLOGVS, Emperor of Constantinople, with a great number of Greeke Prelates, notwithstanding that those of Basil sought to haue induced him to come thither: but a great plague falling amongst them at Ferrara, the Pope remoued the Councell to Florence; where the Greeks and their Emperour submitted themselues to the Latines, touching the proceeding of the Holy Ghost, the third person of the Trinitie, which they held to haue proceeded but from the Father onely: and other matters were there handled, which ANTONINVS Archbishop of Florence in his histories, and PLATINA and others write at large. But this notwithstanding, those of Basil proceeded in their Councel against the Pope; and although the Emperour sought to bring them to vnity, yet his other affaires were so great (considering the small time he ragined) that he could not effect it; and now worst of all, for he had raised his whole power, and was marching with his Army against the Turk, to free the citie of Sinderonia.

Being past Buda, and encamped betweene the riuers Ticius and Danubius, he was certified that the Turk had taken the said citie & had put out the DISPOTE'S sons eyes: and AMVRATH being aduertised of his comming, retiring with his Army towards Thessalonica, a famous citie in Macedonia, took afterwards many cities in Epire and Thessalia. The Emperor seeing that he could not recouer the citie, and that the Turke was retired, returned to Buda, where he discharged his Army: and being come thither, what with the scorching of the Sunne, and with the heate of Summer (and as some say, by eating of more Cucumers then did him good) he was taken with a flux; wherewith growing very weake, departing from Buda with a desire to go to Vienna, he died by the way, in a little village called Langstraet, vpon the 27. day of October, in the yeere of our Lord 1439, before that two yeeres were fully expired, since that he was first chosen Emperor: his death was much lamented for the great hope conceiued of him, that he would haue proued a good Prince. The Emperour ALBERT left two daughters, one of which was married to the Duke of Saxony, and the other afterwards to the king of Poland; and his wife the Empresse he left great with childe of a son, which in time came to be king of Hungary, and of Bohemia: but first there ensued much discord betweene the two kingdomes, as hereafter shal be declared.

The death of the Emperor Albert the second.

The schisme & contention betweene the Pope and the Councel of Basil grew to be so great, at what time the Emperour ALBERT died, that they chose for Pope AMADEVS, whom many called BASILISKE, for that he was chosen at Basil, who was now called FELIX: he had been Duke of Sauoy, and married and had children, he took religious orders (as many write) to the end to be made Pope: he was father in law to PHILIP Duke of Milan, to whom was imputed the principall cause of his election: for he being the Popes enemy, procured that the Councell in Basil should make choise of him, and he himselfe made cruell warre against the Pope, against the Florentines, and the Venecians, PICHININO being General of his Army. And FRANCIS SFORCE (PICHININO's competitor) was General for them, so as there was a greater diuision in the Church of Rome then euer had been seeene before, for there were now two Popes, and two Councels; and some Princes fauoured the one, and others the other: amongst which ALONSO King of Arragon being an enemie to EVGENIVS, fauored Pope FELIX: but as it seemed that EVGENIVS had the better title, Pope FELIX his credit daily impaired, yet hee held the name of Pope the space of nine yeeres; and afterward Pope EVGENIVS being dead, in the time of Pope NICHOLAS he renounced the Papacie.

In Constantinople raigned IOHN PALEOLOGVS, who in those times came to the Councell at Florence; who hauing ended such matters as he came for, concerning the vnion of the Greeke and Latin Churches, returned to Constantinople; where, within a little after he died, and CONSTANTINE succeeded him in the Empire.



THE

THE LIFE OF FREDERICK, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND THIRTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

ALL the Electors ioyntly agreeing in the election of Frederick Duke of Austria, a young man of the age of fiue and twentie yeeres, he accepted the Empire; and comming to be crowned in Aken, was confirmed by the Pope. He was a louer of peace, and a faithfull obseruer thereof in all his actions. He supplanted the schisme, and shewed himselfe a perfect friend to the Pope; and comming into Italy was crowned in Rome, to the great contentment of all the Countries: Wh reinwere made most sumptuous feasts by al the cities which receiued him. He afterwards returning into Germany, was much troubled with the combustions he found there, by reason of the King of Bohemia; which could not be pacified but by the restitution of the King to the Bohemians. In time of this Emperor, Constantinople to the great shame and dishonor of all Christendome was lost, and greater hermes were threatned by the Turke: but a Croysade being made, the Turke had a very great ouerthrow, so as he was constrained to ceese his resolution. This Emperour had some controuersie with his brother about the Duchie of Austria, but in the end the title rested in the Emperor: who, to his sonne Maximilian gaue the title of Archduke of Austria, and made him King of the Romanes. He euer sought to maintaine peace, by reason whereof he was called the peaceable Emperor. And being now old, and his sonne Maximilian swaying the gouernment, it pleased God to take him out of this world, when he had ruled the Empire three and fifte yeeres.

THose which haue trauelled a long iourney, and being come neer to their iourneis end; through the desire they haue to attaine thereto, and to rest their wearie bones, make commonly greater haste then before: so I desiring to do the like, and to make a quicke dispatch in writing the history of the Emperors remaining yet behinde; being tired with the long iourney which I haue trauelled, and to obtaine rest, after so long watching and so much paines taken in that which is past; in the end of my iourney the Emperor FREDERICK presenteth himselfe, and after him his sonne MAXIMILIAN; whose liues were such and so long, that all the time and paper which I haue spent might haue bin employed in writing the liues of them two: of FREDERICK, for that he was naturally more enclined to peace, and procured the same, and raigned fiftie and odde yeeres; in which time so many accidents passed, that they require a long discourse: and of MAXIMILIAN, for that his acts were so great, and so many accidents happened in his time, that if they all should be written, this volume would hardly containe his history. Whereof (when I had well considered) it did put me in a great perplexitie, fearing to be tired or foundred before I should attaine to the end of my iourney: but setting all feare apart I will proceede, and thus it was:

As soone as the death of the Emperour ALBERT was published, the Princes Electors of the Empire assembling in the citie of Franckford; about two or three daies before the new yere 1440. chose for Emperour FREDERICK Duke of Austria, a young man of the age of fiue and twenty yeeres, who a little before came from Ierusalem where he had been in Pilgrimage. This FREDERICK was the son of Duke ERNESTVS of Austria, descended in line masculine from the Emperour ARNVLPH, aboue named. When as he vnderstood of his election, accepting the same, he prepared himselfe to go to Aken to be crowned; before which I hold it expedient to relate in few words what happened in the Kingdomes of Hungary and Bohemia, after the death of the Emperour ALBERT; since they were prouinces of the Empire: and forasmuch as they serue for our purpose, for the cleering and better vnderstanding of that which followeth.

Frederick Duke of Austrich chosen Emperor.

The widow Empresse (as before is said) at the time of her husbands decease was with childe: and as soone as he was dead, the Lords of Hungary assembling together consulted about the choosing of a new King: for sith the Empresse before had already two daughters, they thought not that she now would haue had a son: whereupon after many doubts they choosing VLADISLAVS King of Poland for their King (yet some say it was the Kings brother) sent to aduertise him thereof. In the meane time that the Ambassadours were vpon their way, the Empresse was deliuered of a son, who was named LADISLAVS; which when they saw, they then wished they had not sent to the King of Poland: yet they held it more expedient for the good of the Kingdom to haue him for their King, for that he was of age and power to protect their countrie, and to gouerne the same, which would be wanting in the infant; and they in like manner were of opinion that the Bohemians would haue made him their King also.

The King of Poland chosen King of Hungarie.

Standing in this doubt, the King of Poland (to take benefit of the time) in the greatest haste he could, came into Hungary, and was in Buda by those which desired to haue him so receiued for their King. In the meane time, the widow Queene with her new borne son, together with the Earle of Cilia and great part of the nobilitie, went to Alba Regalis, where vpon Whitsonday the young child was crowned King by the Archbishop of Strigonium.

This solemnity being ended, and fealtie sworn to him by those which were present, as to their Lord and King, the Queene with her son fearing the inconstancie of the Hungars, by the counsell of some her friends presently took her way towards Viena, and committing him to the protection of his Vncle the new Emperour, together with the crowne of that Kingdome, which she had in her power (which is there held for the best right to haue the possession thereof) she returned into Hungary, to see if she might haue the gouernment therof, during her sons minoritie. Some say that she sent the young King to the Emperor: but howsoeuer it was, the Emperour as his Vncle had the wardship of the childe, for to him appertained the protection of the house of Austria. In Hungary was great contention who should be King: but those which took part with VLADISLAVS King of Poland being assisted by IOHN HVNIADES VAIVODA (a very famous Captaine for the great victories which hee had obtained against the Turkes) for that time preuailed: and the young LADISLAVS, although crowned, remained a long time dispossessed in the Emperors keeping. In the Kingdome of Bohemia was no lesse combustions: for the Emperour ALBERT being dead, they in like manner treated of the chusing a new King; and they hauing appointed a day for that purpose, before the time came, the widow Empresse was deliuered of her son LADISLAVS, and she presently vpon her deliuerie sent into Bohemia, to enforme the Bohemians of the equitie of her cause, and to put them in minde that she was the daughter of the Emperour SIGISMVND, King of Bohemia; and that she and her husband ALBERT had enioyed the same, wherefore they should not now depriue her sonne of his right.

The Ambassadours doing what in them lay, found fauour and assistants; but TASCON and the rest which had been ALBERT'T enemies, were of such authority, that notwithstanding they confessed that the child LADISLAVS had right to the Crowne, yet they alleaged that he ought not to be King before he was foure and twentie yeeres of age: and their sentence preuailing, they chose ALBERT Duke of Bauiere for their King, who shewing the greatnes of his minde, would not accept it: a rare example of magnanimitie, and seldome seene. The Bohemians meeting againe agreed to send to entreate the Emperour FREDERICK; that seeing he had charged himself with the protection of the person of the young King, that he would also be pleased to take vpon him the gouernment of the kingdome of Bohemia: and TASCON who was one of the Ambassadors, counselled him to haue made himself King thereof, which was a matter easie to effect.

This Ambassage was deliuered to the Emperor at such time as he was going towards Aken to be crowned (for he was but newly chosen) his answere he referred vntill his returne; which which then was, that whereas they had offered him the kingdom of Bohemia, he would not shew himselfe so vniust a tutor, as to bereaue the pupill of his right: and that he could as ill take vpon him the gouernement of the countrie, for hee had otherwise enough to answere for before GOD, for that which he held, and for that cause he would vndertake no other charge: Wherefore amongst themselues they might finde men sufficient to haue the Rule and Gouernment.

Those which came with this Ambassage being returned, the Lords of Bohemia appointed a new meeting; and chose for Gouernors vntill that LADISLAVS should come to age, TASCON and MENANDER; who were heads and leaders of the contrary faction: TO TASCON repaired all the reputed hereticks of time past. Within a little while after, TASCON dying GEORGE POGIABRACCIO succeeded him, who after the decease of MENANDER, had the sole gouernment; and many other matters befell in the time that LADISLAVS, by reason of his nonage was in the Emperor FREDERICK's protection: And the Hungars and Bohemians oftentimes sought to haue the keeping of him vntill he came to full age. This for the present may suffice, to vnderstand the succesle of the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia.

The Emperor FREDERICK spent the time from Ianuary vntill Iuly, in prouiding for the affaires of Hungary and Bohemia, and to make prouision for his Coronation, which should be solemnized in the moneth of August, in the City of Aken, at which time Cardinall LEVVES being sent by the Councell at Basil, came thither to approue and authorise his Election. About whose comming, there were great alterations; for the Bishop of Liege who was an enemy to the Councell of Basil, and to Pope FELIX, holding with EVGENIVS, put him out of the towne but THEODORICVS Archbishop of Colen (who held with those of Basil) made him to be receiued in againe, whereupon Pope EVGENIVS deposed him from his Prelacy, vntill that afterwards he was through the Emperors entreaty by his Ambassadors restored. The Coronation being ended, the Emperor returned into Austria where he was at great controuersy with his brother ALBERT about the diuision of the estates thereof; with whom FREDERICK seeking to come to an agreement, procured peace and concord through all Germany, for he was euer enclined to peace and a louer thereof. Whilest the Emperor applied himselfe hereto, in Italie in those daies (or a little before) after great warre and infinite combustions, a peace was concluded between Duke PHILIP of Milan of the one side, and the Venecians and the Florentines of the other. And FRANCIS SFORZA who was Generall of their Army marrying the Duke of Milanes base daughter, had Cremona and other places with her for her dowry: this peace was made in the yeere 1442. A little before this, in the same yeere, ALONSO king of Arragon wholly expelling his competitor RENE out of the kingdome of Naples, remained in full possession thereof. About this time, VLADISLAVS King of Poland (who was also in possession of Hungary) after many aduentures past in the warres against the Turkes fighting a battaile with them, was therein vnfortunately slaine; hauing beene King of Hungarie but foure yeeres.

The Emperor Frederick crowned in Aken.

King VLADISLAVS being slaine in this manner, the Noble-men and Burgesses of Cities assembling, chose the childe LADISLAVS their right Soueraigne, for their King; who (as I said) at the age of foure moneths was crowned in Alba Regalis; and they hauing proclaimed him for their King, sent a solemn Ambassage to entreate the Emperor to permit them to haue the custody of him, to the end that they might crowne him: whereto the Emperor (commending their doings) answered, that there needed no election, sith he was their naturall Lord; neither was there any neede to crowne him, sith he was already crowned. And seeing that he was but an infant, and wanted a tutor, vntill that he should come to age, he willed them to chose them Gouernors; and he would take care for his person vntill he should be of yeers fit to gouern. With this answere the Hungars being greatly discontented, resolued to haue that by force which by faire meanes they could not obtaine: And IOHN HVNIADES being chosen for their Gouernor, came into Austria to warre vpon the Emperor, for that he gaue them not their King; but finding sufficient resistance, mist of his purpose. About the same time, the Bohemians in like manner did sue to haue him; to whom the Emperour gaue the selfe same or the like reasons and excuses as hee had done to the Hungares, and so he dispatched them for that time.

Whilest these matters passed, after most cruell warres, between England and France, a truce for a time was taken between them, and the Daulphin of France whose name was LEVVES, in the time of this truce, without any reason or occasion that might moue him thereto, leuied a very mighty Army, and entring Germany, besieged and tooke the City and state of Wittembergh, and other Towns of lesse quality, no man knowing the cause: yet Historians set down sundry. Somesay, that he came by the Emperors procurement against the Swissers, who at that time were enemies to the house of Austria. NAVCLERVS writeth, that hee published, that hee came to recouer those lands which in antient time appertained to the house of France. PLATINA and other Italians write, that the Dolphin's coming was by the Popes instigation, to ouerthrowe the Councell at Basil; which in my opinion is most likely to bee true: for, hee presently marched against Basil, and the Swissers (who were in league with that City) sent 4000 chosen men to the relief thereof; but they could not enter it without meeting with the Dolphin, who within sight of the City fighting with his whole Army, were all slain, not one escaping: but they sould their liues very dear; for, they fighting in a manner a whole day from the morning till night, were not broken vntill they had slain twice so many of their enemies as they were. After this battell the Emperor sent to require the Dolphin to make no wars in the Territories of the Empire, and began to prouide for the defense thereof. Some report it after this manner, and others after another: the conclusion was, that the Dolphin hauing done much harm in many places, returned to his fathers Kingdom.

A memorable battel fought by the Swissers against the French neer to Basil.

The death of John Paleologus, Emperor of Constantinople.

At this time died IOHN PALEOLOGVS Emperor of Constantinople; and for that he had no sonne, his brother CONSTANTINE PALEOLOGVS succeeded him. Many matters passed in those daies in Italy, which I haue not time to relate. King ALONSO of Arragon, possessing the Kingdome of Naples, and defending the cause of Pope EVGENIVS (with whom he was in great grace) was by him inuested, and confirmed in his Kingdome.

The death of Pope Eugenius, whom Nicholas the First succeeded.

Pope EVGENIVS being dead, Cardinall THOMAS SARZANO (who lately was Legate in Germany) was chosen, and called NICHOLAS the Fift; to whom (as soon as hee was consecrated) the Emperor sent to acknowledge obedience, and he sought to haue established a generall peace through all Italy: but the treaty of peace and the conclusion therof was interrupted by the death of the great and puissant PHILIP, Duke of Milan; who might iustly be called great: for, he was great of minde, of body, of power, of estate, and of farre greater wit and vnderstanding than any of his Ancestors: which PHILIP died the thirteenth day of August, in the yeer of our Lord 1447, in the two and fiftith of his age, and the two & thirtith of his raign. When he died he left neuer a son, and but one base daughter called BLANCH, who (as I said) was maried to FRANCIS SFORCE.

The death of the mighty Philip, Duke of Milan.

Titles to the duchie of Milan.

The Duke being dead, the City of Milan, crying Liberty and Empire, made choice of twelue men to gouern it; but there was a sudden alteration; for, many sought to haue been Lords therof. The Milanois (as I said) desired their liberty; and King ALONSO of Naples and Arragon pretended a title of inheritance: for, Duke PHILIP by his Will and Testament made him heir to all his dominions. The Emperor with better right pretended that estate to appertain to the Empire (for default of heirs) and therefore it was to return to the Empire: but hee had not time to come into Italy, by reason of the great fear and danger of the coming of the Turks into Hungary; which, as Emperor, and Tutor to the young King, hee was to defend. FRANCIS SFORCE, hauing married the base daughter of Duke PHILIP, pretended title to the duchie of Milan by the right of his wife. CHARLES Duke of Orleans would haue it, for that hee was the sonne of VALENTINA, sister to Duke PHILIP's father; which VALENTINA was married to LEWES Duke of Orleans, brother to CHARLES the sixt King of France: wherefore CHARLES pretended that Duchy to appertain vnto him. The Venecians, taking for their right the occasion which was offred, presently seised sundry Towns into their hands; as, Cremona, Placencia and Lodi. All those which pretended title to the Duchy of Milan, sent their Ambassadors to the Milanois; not that they all did absolutely make claim thereunto, but with certain complements and offers to assist them against the Venecians which took their Townes. The Milanois would accept no Soueraign but the Emperor: whom they intreated to permit them to enioy their liberty, vpon condition whereof they would yeerly giue him a cup of gold in token of their vassallage and subiection; and to that effect they dispatched their Ambassadors vnto him: but God in his secret iudgement had reserued that estate for FRANCIS SFORCE; which hapned after this manner.

FRANCIS SFORCE being certified of the death of his father in law PHILIP, and that the Venecians made themselues Lords of the countrie, hasted him to Cremona, which was his owne towne, giuen him for his wiues dowrie, and fortifying, garrisoning, and furnishing the the same with all things needefull, he went to Pauia, whither being called by the inhabitants, he became Lord thereof. The Milanois made him Generall of their Army against the Venecians, and he accepting the charge, hauing good successe, ouerthrew them in battaile: and being victorious (imitating OCTAVIVS CÆSAR) made peace with them, which they gladly accepted, and in their agreement they bound themselues to assist him with certain troupes of men of warre: and he resoluing to put in execution what he had intended (which was to make himselfe Lord of Milan) bent his forces against the Townes and Cities of Lombardy; some of which he tooke by force, and other by faire meanes, and in the end besieged the city of Milan it selfe: and after many accidents, was receiued into it; and so with the title and by right of Armes, was called Duke of Milan; and afterwards coming to be Lord of the whole estate, was a mighty and a valiant Prince, and liued many yeers Lord thereof.

At the same time when these matters passed in Milan and Italy, the Emperor FREDERICK, after the dissolution of the Councell of Basil, sought by all means to root out the schism betwixt the Popes, for FELIX was still called Pope and obeyed by the Sauoisins: but the Emperors Counsell and Authority so much preuailed with him, as he was forced to come to obedience, and renouncing the Papacy, was by Pope NICHOLAS made a Cardinall, and his Legate in Sauoy, and in certaine other Prouinces. Shortly after ensued great warres in Germany, between many of the Imperiall cities, and the Marquesse of Brandenburgh, who was assisted by the Earle of Wittembergh: the warre was such, as in the space of two yeers that it lasted, they fought nine seuerall times, and fortune fauoring sometime one, and sometime the other; much harme was done before that the Emperour could pacifie the same: vntill at length, by his intercession and commandement, a peace was concluded between these Princes and the cities. And he hauing settled this concord, resolued to come into Italy, for the great desire hee had to be crowned, wherein ALONSO King of Naples and Arragon was his allie and great friend; the Venecians were also his friends, for as he loued peace, so he euer sought to maintaine the same. He hauing resolued to goe his iourney, and agreed to marry with the Lady ELENOR daughter to the King of Portugall, it was decreed that shee (he being there) should come into Italie by Sea, and that the nuptials should there be solemnized. Whereupon he leuied an indifferent Army of foote and horse, and prouided all things necessary for his iourney: and departing from Germany, carried with him LADISLAVS the young king of Hungary and Bohemia, not without griefe to both those kingdoms, who very instantly desired to haue had the guard of him: by reason whereof, a great number of the Nobles of both those Kingdoms, together with many Lords of Sueuia and Austria accompanied him: with which (although in warlike manner) in the beginning of January in the yeere of our Lord one thousand foure hundred fifty two, he entred Italie: and comming into the countries subiect to the Venecians, Ambassadors with shew of singular loue and affection came to entertaine him, who freely furnished his whole Army with victuals whilst he was in their iurisdiction.

The Emperor going into Italy

Keeping on his way by Treuigi and by Padoa to Ferrara, he was there by BORSIO their Duke sumptuously feasted; and in all parts was entertained with great loue and good will: from Ferrara he came to Bologna (notwithstanding that FRANCIS SFORCE inuited him to come to Milan, there to be crowned with the crowne of Iron) and following his way towards Rome, accompanied with the Cardinall which came to receiue him there) he went to Florence, and was there most sumptuously entertained, and had the like in Siena, whither he presently went: at his being there, he was certified that the King of Portugals daughter, to whom he was to be married, being but sixteen yeers old, was arriued by Sea in the city of Pisa, and he staying for her there, she, with many gallants in her traine was brought to Siena; whdre the Emperour, accompanied with the King of Bohemia and other Princes and men of account, went to meete her.

The Emperor was already by his deputy betrothed to her; but he deferred the Nuptials vntill he might receiue her at the hands of the Pope. The Emperor being come to Rome, was sumptuously entertained and feasted by Pope NICHOLAS, who vpon the steps comming into Saint PETERS Church clad in his pontificalibus, attending his comming, receiued him; the Empresse and the King of Bohemia, kissing his foote, he gaue them his hand: comming into the Church, and hauing made their prayers, and other ceremonies accustomed, they went to their lodgings; and vpon the fifteenth day of March in the yeer one thousand foure hundred fifty two, the Emperour was married to the Empresse, and was the same day with the Iron crowne, which should haue been done in Milan, crowned king of Lombardy: And three dayes after Henricus Mulcius lib. 29.

The Emperor Frederick crowned and married in Rome by Pope Nicholas.

after in the same Church, with the ceremonies and solemnities accustomed, was crowned Emperour of Rome, and the Empresse in like manner. The feasts at the coronation being ended, the Emperour leauing King LADISLAVS in Rome went to Naples, whither afterwards came his wife the Empresse, to see King ALONSO who was her vncle, where they were continually for the space of fifteene daies sumptuously feasted. From Naples the Emperour by sea, and vp the riuer Tiber, returned to Rome, thence to take his iourney towards Germany; where he was aduertised, that the Hungars and Bohemians had caused some alterations for that the Emperor detained their King from them; the chief motors were VLRICH Earle of Cilia, and another VLRICH a man of great power.

The Empresse tarrying 8. daies longer in Naples then the Emperour, went by land to Manfredonia, and from thence by sea to Venice, for she knew that the Emperour would go to see that citie before his returne into Germany. The Emperour in his iourney took Ferrara in his way, where in reward of the seruice done him by BORSIO Duke of Ferrara at his comming and going, he made him Duke of Modena and Reggio, and gaue him the title and soueraignetie of those cities: and being there, GALEAS SFORCE Viscount, son to FRANCIS SFORCE Duke of Milan came to see him, and brought him gifts and presents from his father. The Emperour friendly entertaining him dubbed him Knight, for the good conceit he had of his person. And from Ferrara the Emperour sending his people by land, went downe the riuer of Po to the citie of Venice, where he was receiued with infinite sorts of triumphs, whither the Empresse was already com, and was receiued with no lesse solemnitie: in such feasting and pastimes he spent there other ten dayes: and then departed, accompanied with the Duke and Senate of Venice to the sea side, who sent Pouruoiers before with order, that in all their dominion, his whole court should be furnished with al things necessary gratis. And so this peaceable Prince passed through Italy in peace, and with euery mans loue and applause, which he could not haue done if he had been ambitious and desirous of warre: and if he could haue done it, it would haue bin to the greater losse of his people and expence of money, and with the peril of his life and burthen to his conscience, as by the histories of other Emperours which came into Italy to other intents, it may appeare.

Warres betweene the States of Italy.

The Emperor being departed out of Italy, it seemed that peace and quietnes went away with him: for the warres presently began betweene those which formerly had bin enemies, who as long as he was there were in some sort pacified. The Venecians being in league with King ALONSO, with the Duke of Sauoy, and with the Marquesse of Monferrato, against FRANCIS SFORCE Duke of Milan, made cruell warre against him, whom the Florentines and LEWIS GONZAGA Marquesse of Montoa assisted and aided. And King ALONSO, enemie to the Florentines, sent his son FERDINAND with 8000 horse as some write and 4000 foote to make warre in Tuscane. The King of France dealt with RENE Earle of Prouence, to passe into Italy with 2000 horse, in the behalfe of the Duke of Milan and the Florentines, in hope of the enterprise of Naples. So as there was most cruell war through all Italy, the issue whereof I haue no time to declare. The Pope vsing all meanes to haue pacified the same, desired they al should haue ioyned together, to haue holpen the Emperour of Constantinople against the great Turk, knowing that he purposed to besiege the citie of Constantinople: but he could not then effect the same, and so Constantinople was not relieued, when it stood in most need.

The Emperour FREDERICK comming into Germany, found it in no better quiet, then at his departure he left Italy; for a great part of his countrie of Austria was in Armes against him, and had thrust out the Gouernours which he had set there: all which was done for that he had not left the young King of Hungary and Bohemia at liberty, moued thereto by the Earle of Cilia and by VLRICH a great man in Bohemia; who perswaded them to take LADISLAVS, the son of ALBERT Duke of Austria for their Lord, to whom that countrie did more properly appertaine; and the Emperour vnderstanding of their rebellion, came with part of his Army to a towne called Nieustat, where those of Austria came against him; and notwithstanding that the Emperour had good forces, yet they fought with him, and the fight continued foure houres: but so many charged the Imperialists, that they were constrained to retire to Nieustat, before which those of Austria encamping themselues with great furie, in the name of Hungary and Bohemia requiring their King, battered the same. When it was knowne that the Emperour was besieged, great preparation was made through all Germany by sundrie Princes which resolued to free him; and the like was made by the Hungars and Bohemians, which to the contrary required to haue their King.

The

The Emperour foreseeing the great miseries likely to ensue, gaue care to a parley, wherein it was agreed that he should deliuer the young King LADISLVVS who was not yet fully 14 yeers old) into the hands of the Earle of Cilia, who should haue the keeping of him vntill November then next comming, in the yeere one thousand foure hundred fifty two: And that the Proctors and deputies of Hungary and Bohemia should meete in the City of Viena, there to conclude who should haue the gouernment of those kingdomes; with many other promises which were neuer performed.

Herewith the siege was raised from before the city, and the Earle of Cilia, carried the yong king to Viena, where he was receiued with as great ioy, as if he had been the naturall Lord thereof: and so presently without any other treaty, he gaue offices and dignities as lord of the countrie, and was also called Duke of Austria, by the Title before specified. To him came presently many great men of both the kingdoms, and amongst them IOHN HVNIADES VAIVODA, who had been gouernor of Hungary; and GEORGE POGIOBRACCIO Gouernour of Bohemia.

The time appointed being expired, thither resorted many Princes of Germany, and Ambassadors from the Emperour: but the yong vnexperienced King would accomplish no part of what was couenanted; and being ruled and led by fauorites, in the small time that he liued many disorders were committed in his house and Court, which ÆNEAS SYLVIVS hath most excellently written in his History of Bohemia. Viena, and the other Cities which held for LADISLAVS being supported by Hungary and Bohemia, perseuered in their rebellion, and so continued as long as LADISLAVS liued.

Whilest the Emperor FREDERICK was pestered with these troubles, and the other Princes had warres amongst themselues, MAHOMET the great Turke in the beginning of the yeere one thousand foure hundred fifty three, with an huge Army besieged the Imperiall City of Constantinople, the head of all the Greeke and Orientall Empire (CONSTANTINE the last Emperor thereof being within it) which he besieged the space of more then fifty daies; in which time (for that it was not relieued) vpon the nine and twentith day of May in the same yeere, the City was by force taken and entred, and the Emperor, to the shame and dishonour of all Christendome was therein slaine: and in that City were such cruelties committed, as the like thereof had neuer been seene or heard of. For the losse of Constantinople all the Princes in Christendome were very sory, but much more when they vnderstood how great cruelties and murthers the Turke had afterwards committed; and that he had taken other Townes and Prouinces thereto adioyning, and that he therewith threatned Italie and Germany: Whereupon they began to consult of defence and resistance to be made against him: but the Ambition and dissension which raigned amongst them, gaue no place to the conclusion or performance of any good exploite; as in our daies the like hath been seen in the like necessity. Yet the next yeere a peace was concluded in Italie between the King of Naples and the Venecians, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines, and those of their league: which being concluded, the Pope rigged vp a great fleete of Gallies to make head against the Turkes; but they write that he was euer so sorrowfull after the losse of Constantinople that he neuer enioyed good day, but falling sick died, vpon the twenty fift day of March in the yeere one thousand foure hundred fifty fiue, in the fifteenth yeere of the raigne of the Emperour FREDERICK, and the eighth of his Papacy.

Constantinople besieged and taken by the great Turke.

After his decease, Cardinall ALFONSO BORGIA a Spaniard was chosen Pope, and called CALIXTVS the Third. The first thing he vndertooke was to procure warre against the Turke, and to that effect sent out his Buls, and a generall Croisaide, and therewith sent his Legates into all parts of Christendome, especially into Germany; where the Emperour hauing the like care, had summoned a Diet or Parliament vpon that occasion. And notwithstanding that many Princes gaue in their names, and offered to serue in this warre, yet the icalousie and dissension amongst them was such, that they put nothing in execution: but the Pope neuertheless sent Cardinall IOHN CARAIAVAL for his Legate into Germany; who for that it was certainly known that the Turke was comming into Hungary, with the Emperours aide and fauor leuied men and money: presently hereupon came news that the Turke was come, and that he had in his Army (they which say least) one hundred and fifty thousand men, and that he went to besiege Belgrado otherwise called Alba Graca, and more anciently, Taurinum; and that he purposed in few daies (taking that City) to march forwards. King LADISLAVS giuing the charge of that warre, with the defence of that City and Kingdome to IOHN HVNIADES

The great Turke entred Hungary.

NIADES, retired to Viena: for in truth he was neither of age, neither had power sufficient to fight with the Turke.

The Popes Legate with the greatest number of men that he could get came to Buda, and from thence before the Turks comming put himselfe therewith into the City of Belgrade: amongst those which came with him, was one IOHN CAPISTRANO, a Franciscane Frier, who with his sermons and exhortations gathered together and brought with him a great number of men, which for their deuice ware the signe of the Crosse. The Turke comming with his power, and besieging the city, these men wrought wonders in the defence thereof, being furiously battered. To the reliefe thereof, with the power which the Emperor sent, and such others as he could raise in Hungary, which were forty thousand Foote, and fiue thousand Horse, came IOHN HVNIADES.

The Turks besieged Belgrade.

To be briefe, it pleased God, that the succors being arriued, and comm to blowes, they had so good fortune that the Turke was ouerthrowne and wounded, and a great number of his men slaine: Whereupon he raising his siege and flying, left his Artillery and baggage behinde him. This happened vpon Saint MARY MAGDALENS day, in the yeere one thousand foure hundred fifty six. All Christendome reioyced, and made bonfiers for this so notable a victory: And Italie and Germany by this meanes were deliuered from the feare which they conceiued, by reason of the late losse of Constantinople: For, considering the great power of the enemy, they all feared to haue been lost. Within few daies after this victory, died that excellent Captaine IOHN HVNIADES: and the Turke by reason of this ouerthrow, suffering Hungary and Italie to rest in Peace, made warres in the Ilands of the Sea called Archipelagus, and in other countries bordering vpon them.

The great Turke ouerthrown before the citie of Belgrade in Hungary.

The Emperor FREDERIDKS raigne was so long, and so many accidents hapned therein, that I shall be enforced to be briefer in writing what followeth, then I haue been in what is past. After this victory obtained by IOHN HVNIADES, the Emperour FREDERICK applyed himselfe to the establishing of peace in Germany, to the end he might be able to preuent what might befall: and being busie herein, the yong King of Bohemia and Hungary being of the age of eighteene yeeres died (not without suspect of poyson) in the City of Prague, where he attended the comming of the French Kings daughter, to whom he should haue been married. The realmes of Hungary and Bohemia, and that also which he held in Austria, by reason of his death without issue and heires, were voide; which caused much strife in those countries and kingdoms, about the succession and election, diuers Princes pretending to haue right to them. In the end the Bohemians took GEORGE POGIOBRACCIO (who was Gouernor thereof in the time of LADISLAVS) for their King, a man of a Noble house and of great valour. The Hungars for their King chose MATTHEVV the sonne of that excellent warriour IOHN HVNIADES, as well for the loue which they bare to his father, as for the good hope they had of his person, being a yong man of nineteen yeers old, and then prisoner in Bohemia for the death of the Earle of Cilia, which grew vpon this occasion, the yong King LADISLAVS was wholly gouerned by the Earle of Cilia, who had enuied the vertues and glory of IOHN HVNIADES; and after his death continued his hatred against his sonnes LADISLAVS and MATTHEVV, seeking their ruines: LADISLAVS comming to expostulate the matter with the Earle, they fell to wordes, so as in the end the Earle strooke him, and LADISLAVS slue the Earle.

The King of Hungary being informed of the fact, promised LADISLAVS pardon & gaue him a purple roabe imbroydred with Gold: yet being newly incensed, he seised vpon both the brethren, and put LADISLAVS to death, and finding that the Noble-men of Hungary hated him for this fact, and that he could not stay there without danger, he returned into Bohemia, carrying MATHIAS the yonger brother with him, where soon after the yong king died, leauing him a prisoner; whom POGIOBRACCIO the new King of Bohemia setting at liberty, married him to his daughter; and he afterwards being King of Hungary, proued an excellent and a most valiant Prince.

In the house of Austria (the gouernment whereof in right appertained to the Emperour) his brother ALBERT pretended, that for as much as his brother was Emperour, he ought to enioy the same; the like did his cosine SIGISMVND. About this controuersie those of Austria assembling maintained the Emperor to be their principall Lord; and that he according to the custome of Germany was to haue regard to the maintenance of his brothers and cosin-germanes estate: Wherefore and for the better preseruation of the peace, certain Lands and reuenues uenues were assigned vnto them. The Emperor vpon this agreement came to Viena, and was there receiued and obeyed: but his brother and cosin, persseuering in their purposes, caused some alterations in the Country; and there were some sharp bickerings about this matter: but, by the mediation of LEVVES Duke of Bauiere, a composition was made between him and them, yet they were neuer without iealousies and contentions till the death of ALBERT: at which time the Emperor without any contradiction took possession of that estate. After this, in the yeer 1458, died ALONSO, King of Arragon and Naples, whom his brother IOHN King of Nauarre succeeded in the Kingdomes of Arragon and Sicilia; and in the Kingdom of Naples succeeded his base son FERNANDO, who contended with IOHN the son of RENE, with whom his father was at variance about that Kingdome. And in the month of August following, died Pope CALIXTVS; and in his place was chosen ÆNEAS SILVIVS, a Cardinall and Citizen of Siena, and was called PIVS the Second; who was so excellently learned, and endued with so many graces, that I cannot expresse what is written in commendation of him: besides this, the books which he wrote bear record of his wisdome and learning; who accordingly first took care for the defense of Christendome, and for the wars against the Turk, and to that effect wrote to the Emperor and the other Princes.

The next yeer after his election, he summoned a generall Councell to be held in the City of Mantua, to treat more effectually of the matter; where many Noble-men and Princes Ambassadors met, and many matters were deuised and ordained, which were neuer put in execution, by reason of the wars and troubles in Italie, and between the most part of the Princes in Christendome. Particularly in Germany, in the yeer 1460, beganne great debate and strife between VDALRICVS Earl of Wittembergh, and FREDERICK Count Palatine of Rhine, about a dowry and some such matter; for which they came to fight sundry times, and many were slain of either side, vntill that an agreement was made by the Emperors commandement and authority.

After this another warre ensued, of longer continuance and more dangerous; which was for the Archbishoprick of Mentz: for which, DIETERVS of Isenburgh, and ADVLPH of Nassaw contended. DIETERVS, who was in possession of the greatest part of the Bishoprick, being for his contumacy, intrusion, simony, and such other matters, by the Sentence of Pope PIVS deposed, ADVLPH by the Emperors consent was by the Pope created; so as the one to get possession, and the other to defend the same, troubled all Germany, which the Emperor could not remedy: for, their rage grew to that height, that his commandements beeing contemned, some Princes taking part with the one, and some with the other, all imploied their whole force therein; and there followed many battels and encounters, and many great Personages were slain of either party.

CARION writes, that Pope PIVS the Second, of the house of the Puolomini, who had been Secretary to the Emperor FREDERICK, relying vpon his priuate loue, and his respect to the Sea of Rome, deposed DIETERY from the Archbishoprick of Mentz, and aduanced ADVLPH of Nassaw. The chief reasons they say were, for that he opposed himself stoutly against the Popes vniust exactions, wherewith the Prouinces were oppresst vnder colour of the Turkish warre; and that Pope PIVS required an oath, whereby his successors should also bee bound, that he should not call the Electors together for the chusing of a new Emperor, or to determine of any other thing concerning the Empire, before they had acquainted the Pope therewith, and knowne his pleasure, which he refused to doo. This quarell drew most of the Princes and chiefest Lords of Germany into Armes and combustions; as you haue formerly heard.

This warre continued long: but yet in the end, by the Emperors order and authority, the matter was taken vp; but the harms which were done before that time, could not be repaired as he would haue had them. For, he was so ill obeyed by his subiects in Austria, that those of Viena ioyning one day with his brother ALBERT, in the yeer of our Lord 1463, took Armes and besieged the Emperor in the Fortresse of that City; and, battring the same, would haue taken him prisoner.

The King of Bohemia, who was his next neighbour, desiring to win his grace and fauour, came to his aid; and rescuing him, in such manner pacified the rebellion, that the Emperor if it had so pleased him might haue apprehended his brother ALBERT, but hee of purpose let him go: and it pleased God that a while after Duke ALBERT died, when as without his death there was no mean of peace in the state of Austria. He being dead, the Austrians together with Duke SIGISMVND wholly submiting themselues, became subiect to the Emperour.

The death of Æneas Syluius, otherwise Pope Pius 2.

In the yeere 1464, in the 24 yeer of the raigne of the Emperor FREDERICK, died that excellently learned Pope, PIVS the Second, otherwise called ÆNEAS SYLVIVS, after whom was choſen Cardinal BARBO a Venecian, and was called PAVL the Second, who conſidering that the Turkes daily conquered the Chriſtian countries, applied himſelfe to procure a remedy: but the ſame reaſon which hindred others, preuented him alſo, ſo as he could not bring it to paſſe. Yet the Venecians entred into league with MATTHIAS King of Hungary, whoſe fame and reputation was then very great; and they giuing him a certain ſumme of money, reſiſtance was made in diuers parts. About this time died FRANCIS SFORCE Duke of Milan, whom his eldeſt ſon GALEAS MARIA SFORCE ſucceeded in that Dukedome. About this time alſo died PHILIP Duke of Burgundy, and Earle of Flanders, whom ſucceeded the moſt valiant and renowned Captaine Duke CHARLES, called CHARLES the Hardy.

In the ſecond yeer after Pope PAVLS election, the Emperour FREDERICK came to Rome, where by the Pope he was moſt honorably receiued: the cauſe of his comming, ſome ſay was to performe a vow which he had made; others ſay that it was to conferre with the Pope concerning warres againſt the Turke: but howſoeuer it was, he came and returned quietly into Germany, where through his meanes peace continued long after; at the laſt there was no great warre, eyther in Germany or in Italy. In thoſe daies notwithſtanding that theſe countries were in peace and quiet, yet Duke CHARLES of Burgundy had cruell warres with France, and with the Swiſſers, and with other Princes. Pope PAVL being dead, SIXTVS the 4 ſucceeded him, who although he was but a Franciſcane Frier, yet they write that he was ſo warlike, that the moſt part of the time that he was Pope he warred in Italie. The next yeer after his election which was in the yeer 1472, and the 32 of the Emperors raign, Duke CHARLES of Burgundy (of whoſe power and aſpiring minde and of his warres, and the battails which he fought, wonders are written) procured leaue to ſee, and to ſpeake with the Emperor: and they meeting in Luxzemburgh, the Duke requeſted many matters at the Emperors hands; amongſt which, this was one, that the Emperor ſhould giue him the title of King of Naples, and make him his Vicar or Lieutenant in Italie, for he purpoſed to haue made a conqueſt thereof.

The Emperor diſliking the ambition of this Prince, temporizing in the beſt manner hee could, anſwered him in generall tearmes without concluding any thing, and in a night without bidding him farewell, departed the City; wherewith the Duke was very much diſcontented, and the next yeer following he leuied a very great Army, and marching towards Colen beſieged the City of Nuis: which he did to the end (as he ſaid) to reſtore Colen to ROBERT of Bauaria the Archbiſhop thereof, who was his kinſman and good friend. The Emperour vnderſtanding that the Dukes meaning was (if he could) to take Colen; required him to raiſe his ſiege; which taking no effect he leuied a very great Army, and therewith marched directly againſt the Duke: but as he was ſlack in his buſineſſe, ſo he needed (conſidering the Dukes power) to haue ſpeedily brought a great Army: but as he came not with ſuch expedition as the cauſe required; ſo the beſieged, and the countrey thereabout endured great extremity, and the ſiege continued many moneths: but he comming at length (though late firſt) and the one Army encamping neere to the other (with the Emperor came the Duke of Saxony, the Marqueſſe of Brandenburgh, the Archbiſhoppes of Mentz and Treuiere) and being at the point to haue giuen battaile (which as it was thought would haue been very cruell) a treaty of peace was propounded betweene them, whereto the Emperour neuer refuſed to giue eare, in ſo much that hee was therefore called The peaceable Prince. What the conditions of the peace were, I finde not written by thoſe Authors which I haue read: but the effect of what enſued, was that the Duke raiſing his ſiege from before the Town, returned with his Army into his Countrey; and ſo the war ended betwixt the Emperor and him.

Some write, that by this peace it was concluded that MAXIMILIAN the Emperours ſonne ſhould marry with the only daughter of CHARLES, and enioy all his Prouinces, if he died without iſſue male. Out of this peace were excepted by CHARLES, LEVVES the French King, SIGISMVND of Auſtria the Emperors coſin-germane, RENE Duke of Lorraine, and the Swiſſers, who had made an irruption into Burgundy by the procurement of LEVVES: and hee was incenſed againſt SIGISMVND, for the redeeming of certaine Towns which had beene pawned to him. But the Duke had other warres, for hee euer deſired and procured the ſame, and thereby enlarged his Countries and Dominions vntill that that in the yeere one thouſand foure hundred ſixty ſix, in a cruell battaile which he fought with the Duke of Lorraine, he was ouerthrown and ſlain. His death was the cauſe that the Emperor and his ſon MAXIMILIAM warred with the French King, the reliques and ſeed whereof continued long, and hapned in this manner:

The warlike Duke CHARLES dying in ſuch manner, as I ſaid, left no heire but one only daughter; whoſe eſtate contained the two Burgundies, the eſtates of Flanders, Brabant, Guelders, Holland, Zealand, Artoys, and many other Towns, beſides thoſe which he had taken in Lorraine, in Picardy, and from the Swiſſers; for his minde and valour was ſo great, that he durſt hold all the world for his enemy, and made no reckoning to take their townes. But this ſmoake (for ſo it may well be called) being by his death ouerblowne; euen as he had done by all others, ſo all men dealt with his. The Duke of Lorraine, and his confederats the Swiſſers, recouered what he had taken from them. LEVVES the French King, ſpeedily leuying an Army, recouered Picardy, took the Cities of Peronne, Mountdidier, Turnay and other Townes. The Flemmings and Burgonians with thoſe of their party, in the name of their Soueraign Lady, MARY daughter of the deceaſed Duke, for their defence put themſelues in Armes. The French King alleaged that Burgundy for want of heires males, was to returne to the houſe of France: the Duke of Lorraine by his commandement entring Burgundy, took the greateſt part thereof; and the King ſent to require the Ducheſſe MARY to come into France in perſon to doe him homage for the Earledome of Flanders, and her other eſtates ſubiect to the Crown of France: but ſhe vnderſtanding his meaning, refuſing to come ſtood vpon her guard. Hereabout were many treaties and parleys, and many Towns were taken, too long to be recited.

The Flemmings ſending to the Emperour for aide, offered their Ducheſſe MARY in marriage to his ſonne MAXIMILIAN, who was then one and twenty yeeres old, a yong man of a great ſpirit, valiant, a comely perſonage, of a very good conſtitution, and apt for any attempt. The Emperor being very glad of this proffer, granted their requeſts, notwithſtanding that hee ſaw he vndertook a warre againſt France, and that he already had warres with MATTHIAS King of Hungary, who (like the Duke of Burgundy) was never content with what he had, but thought all too little; and incenſing the Auſtrians againſt the Emperor, took ſome towns from him in Auſtria and warred vpon him.

The French King hauing intelligence of this treaty of marriage, ſent to the Emperour and his ſonne MAXIMILIAN perſwading them to deſiſt. This notwithſtanding, MAXIMILIAN who was now called Arch-duke of Auſtria, with many good men of warre, in Iuly, in the yeere 1467, went into Flanders, and marrying this Lady MARY had with her all her dominions: the warres on the Flemmings ſide againſt the French through his comming, were well reinforced: and he therein fighting oftentimes in his owne perſon, ſhewing the greatneſſe of his minde, obtained ſome victories, eſpecially one memorable battaile betweene Turnay and Arras, wherein he alighting from his horſe, put himſelfe into a ſquadron of foote. Afterwards ſome treaties of peace being motioned, a truce was taken for a time; whereein the French King rendring ſome Towns, continued in poſſeſſion of what he had taken in Burgundy, and ſo for a ſeaſon the warre ceaſed. This peace (ſo farre as I can coniecture) was made by the Emperors procurement, by reaſon of warres made againſt him by MATTHIAS King of Hungary: for which, being otherwiſe troubled with other occaſions of the Empire, he could make no ſufficient prouiſion, and alſo for that the peace with Frunce (as preſently ſhall be ſaid) continued but a ſmall time.

The battaile of Guinegaſt.

The reaſon of the warre, betwixt the Emperor and MATTHEVV CORVINVS King of Hungary, was, for that the Pope hauing by his Buls giuen the kingdome of Bohemia to CORVINVS, from GEORGE BOIEBRAC, who conſtantly defended and maintayned the doctrine of IOHN HVSSE, which was hatefull to the Court of Rome, the Emperor refuſed to inueſt him in the ſaid kingdome. But this quarrell grew violent after the death of GEORGE, when as the Noble-men of Bohemia, and the Emperor neglecting CORVINVS, made choice of LADISLAVS the ſonne of CASIMIRE King of Poland, the Emperor hauing firſt refuſed to come vnto the ſaid kingdome; eyther terrified with the mutinies of the Bohemians, or elſe that he fled from toyle and danger, wherein he knew he ſhould be engaged againſt ſo powerfull and valiant a Competitor. In this warre the Emperour was in very great daunger to haue loſt Auſtria, if ALBERT Duke of Saxony had not valiantly and fortunately made head againſt MATTHIAS, forcing him in the end to accept of conditions of peace. MATTHIAS did ſo honour ALBERT for the euent of this warre, as hee gaue him onely the prayse, to be one of the greateſt and moſt valiant Captaines among all the Princes of Chriſtendome.

At the ſame time GALEAS MARIA hauing been nine yeers Duke of Milan, certaine his ſubiects and fauorites, for his licentiouſneſſe, and inſatiable Luxury, conſpiring againſt him, ſlew him as he was in S. STEPHENS Church at Maſſe, he being then of the age of three and thirty yeeres. He left for his ſucceſſor a ſonne of the age of nine yeers, whoſe name was IOHN GALEAS, who by reaſon of his nonage was vnder the tutele of his mother BONA: through whoſe negligence and vnchaſte life, his vncle LEWYS OF LODOVVICK, called the Moore (a man blinded with ambition and deſire of command) ſeized vpon the perſon of the young Duke, whom he conſumed away with a ſlow poiſon, and vſurped the gouernment, getting into his hands all the ſtrong holds, or whatſoeuer elſe did belong to that ſtate, whereby he came to be abſolute Lord of the whole Duchie: and his Nephew (languiſhing two and twenty yeers) had onely the title of Duke; and LODOVVICK the authority and poſſeſſion: where many matters happened, which for that they concern not my Hiſtory I omit. The truce between MAXIMILIAN and France continued little more then one yeere, at the end whereof the French King and he renewed the warre, which laſted a certaine ſpace, and ſome Townes were taken both of the one ſide and of the other; vntill at length through the procurement of the Emperour FREDERICK, a peace betweene them was concluded for ſeuen yeers.

At the ſame time when theſe matters paſſed, the great and mighty Turke MAHOMET, hauing done much harme in the Chriſtian countries, held Rhodes beſieged little leſſe then three moneths; but it pleaſed God that he could not then take it: this happened in the yeere of our Lord 1480. After this in the ſame yeere, he ſent a mighty Army by Sea, which landing in Puglia and in the kingdom of Naples, took ſome Townes, and amongſt others Otranto, which they held more then one yeere after: and if through the goodneſſe of God the great Turke had not died, all Italie was in danger to haue been loſt: but through the death of this mighty Tyrant (who in Gracia, beſides Conſtantinople and Thracia) had taken and ſubdued many Prouinces, and an infinite number of Cities and Towns) thoſe townes in Italie were recouered, and Chriſtendome was freed from the oppreſſion which it endured: and the rather for that his ſonne and heire BAIAZETH in the beginning of his raigne, was troubled with domeſticall warre and diſſenſion. At this time died RENE Earle of Prouence and Duke of Aniow, an antient challenger of the crown of Naples.

The death of Mahomet the great Turke.

In Italie was great war at that time, which beginning between the Venecians, and the Duke of Ferrara, ſpread it ſelf ouer all Italie: Which the Emperour FREDERICK perceiuing, and conſidering how great danger all Chriſtendome was in, hee procured the Princes of Germany to ſettle ſome perpetuall peace and concord, thereby to bee able to reſiſt the Turkes: the like he practiſed with the French King, and with his own ſon the Archduke of Auſtria, and Duke of Burgundy. Whil'ſt he was thus buſie, the Ducheſſe MARY, daughter to the braue Duke CHARLS, with whom MAXIMILIAN had ſo many prouinces, came vnfortunately to her end: for ſhe (as of cuſtome ſhe vſed to doo) riding ahunting, fell from her horſe; and, as ſome ſay, the horſe trode vpon her, or kickt her, whereof ſhee died: others ſay, that with the fall ſhe was ſo bruiſed, that ſhe died thereof the eleuenth day after, which was vpon the ſeuenteenth day of March, in the yeer of our Lord 1482, when ſhee had been Lady of thoſe Countries little more than fiue yeers. She left at her deceaſe one ſonne and one daughter which were PHILIP, who afterward was King of Spain, and father to the Emperor CHARLS the Fift; and MARGARET, which afterwards was a Princeſſe in Spain. When this Ducheſſe MARY died, LEWES the French King was very ſick, and lying vpon his death-bed, deſired peace; wherewith the Emperour being well pleaſed; they agreed, that MARGARET (which was a childe of two yeers old) when ſhe ſhould be of age, ſhould bee married to his ſonne CHARLES, who afterwards was King and then twelue yeers old: and that their fathers and they ſhould keepe perpetuall peace: with this condition, that eyther of them ſhould continue in poſſeſſion of what they held in Burgundy. This being concluded, the young MARGARET with great pompe was brought to Paris, where her wedding feaſt was held, although it afterwards took no effect, as ſhall be ſaid.

The death of Lewes kyng of France.

Within fewe daies after this ſolemnity King LEWES died, leauing his ſon CHARLES of the age almoſt of thirteene yeers, to ſucceede him. At the ſame time a peace was coucluded in Italy, and about the ſame time the Emperour aſſembled the Princes Electors and other Princes Princes of Germany in the City of Franckford, where he deſired and obtained of them to make his ſonne MAXIMILIAN King of the Romans, which was effected in the ſeuen and fortith yeere of his raigne, vpon the ſixteenth day of February, in the yeer of our Lord one thouſand foure hundred eighty ſix: and departing thence with a very great court of Princes and Lords, they went to the City of Aken, where he was with great ſolemnity crowned with the crowne which ſometime was of CHARLES the Great; brought for that purpoſe from Norembergh, where it was kept with great reſpect. The ſame day, by the conſent of all the Princes, he made a Law: Whereby hee ordained vnder great penalties that peace ſhould bee kept through all Germany; which was obeyed, and in the greateſt part of Germany obſerued a long time after.

After this, the new king of the Romans came into the Lowe countries, whereof his ſon PHILIP was now lord, whoſe tutor he was, where at firſt he had great oppoſitions, ADOLPH D. of Guelders being head of a faction, who (conſpiring with the French) was ſlaine at Tourney, whereupon the Dutchie of Guelders yeelded vnto him; he being aſſiſted by the counſell and fortune of that valiant warriour ALBERT Duke of Saxony: the Belgians factiouſly mutyning, and inſolently reiecting the command of their new Prince PHILIP of Rauenſe in being head of the faction, he ſo daunted them with incounters and ſieges, during the ſpace of eight yeers, as hauing taken ſome Townes by force and others by compoſition, he ſo terrified the reſt, as they willingly ſubmitted themſelues, and craued pardon.

After which ALBERT of Saxony tranſported the warres into Friſland, the which (in reward of his great ſeruice, and recompence of his charges) MAXIMILIAN (with the conſent of the Princes of the Empire) gaue vnto him and to his heires for euer, whereof although he ſubdued a great part, yet being preuented by death, he left the victory imperfect to his ſons. But the euent of this Friſland was, that although that GEORGE and HENRY brethren, Dukes of Saxony, had ſubdued the greateſt part of the countrey, yet afterwards they fell into a new rebellion, not able to endure a ſtrangers yoake: wherewith the brethren of Saxony being tyred, this Prouince lying farre from their hereditary poſſeſſions, the enioying whereof would be more chargeable then beneficiall, they afterwards paſt it ouer by tranſaction, to the Emperor CHARLES the Fift, for a certain ſum of money.

MAXIMILIAN being in the City of Bruges, in the yeere one thouſand foure hundred eighty ſeuen, vpon certain diſcontentments the Burghers roſe againſt him, and in this tumult apprehending his perſon, with certain of his traine, they held him priſoner the ſpace of foure moneths: whereof when his father had intelligence, leuying the beſt forces that he could, he haſted to him, and notwithſtanding that his ſonne before his comming was at liberty, yet he ſeuerely puniſhed the Burghers of Bruges and of Gaunt, and ſo the king of the Romans peaceably enioyed the gouernment of the Prouinces of the Low Countries, and of that which he held in Burgundy, and his father the Emperor being now old and tyred, returned into Germany, to maintaine peace and iuſtice, and to prouide for defence to be made againſt the Turks. For the preſeruation whereof, notwithſtanding that MATTHIAS King of Hungary had taken Viena and other townes in Auſtria, he endured it, and attempted not by force to recouer the ſame: but within ſhort ſpace after King MATTHIAS died, without any heires, when he had raigned ſeuen and thirty yeers. His death being made knowne to MAXIMILIAN King of the Romanes, he with great ſpeede departed from Flanders; and through his fathers aide, leuying a puiſſant Army, in ſhort ſpace recouered Viena, and all the reſt which King MATTHIAS had vſurped.

Whileſt theſe matters were in handling, LADISLAVS ſonne to CASIMIR King of Poland wholly recouered the kingdom of Bohemia, for which both he and his father CASIMIR had warred with king MATTHIAS, from the time that GEORGE POGIOBRACCIO died. After this, both he and MAXIMILIAN pretending to be King of Hungary, each of them ſought to marry the Queene widdow, the Lady BEATRIX of Arragon, daughter to FERDINAND King of Naples, who was of great authority in that Kingdome. MAXIMILIAN being ſomwhat ſlow in the matter deferred the time; but LADISLAVS making more haſte, married her and was receiued for King of Hungary, and crowned in Alba Regalis, and preſently between him, the Emperor and MAXIMILIAN a peace was concluded, wherin it was ordained by the conſent of thoſe of the kingdom, that if LADISLAVS died without lawfull iſſue male, then MAXIM. and his heirs ſhould inherit the kingdom. But LADISLAVS raigned 22 yeers after, and his ſonne LEWES ſucceeded him, who married MARY ſiſter to the Emperor

CHARLES the Fift: and FERDINAND brother to the Emperour CHARLES, married his ſiſter ANNE: by which marriage (King LEWES being in the yeere of our Lord 1526. ouerthrowne and ſlaine by SOLIMAN the great Turk) this FERDINAND ſucceeded in the kingdomes of Hungary and Bohemia: and ſo the couenant by meanes neuer thought of, came to take effect betweene LADISLAVS and MAXIMILIAN; which paſſed in the yere 1490.

Lewes king of Hungary ouerthrowne and ſlaine by the Turke, anno Dom. 1526.

Returning to our hiſtory, after this agreement, MAXIMILIAN comming to Norimbergh, by the conſent of his father he treated of a marriage betweene him and the Ducheſſe of Britaine, who after her fathers deceaſe without heires males, ſucceeded in that Dukedome: and CHARLES the French King in like manner ſought to haue her, notwithſtanding that he was alreadie betrothed to MARGARET of Burgundy, which was but a child, and whom he had in his power, as hath been declared.

The French writers excuſe him herein, and yeelde reaſons for what he did; whereof thoſe Kings are neuer to ſeeke which haue not the feare of God before their eyes. They alleaged that the Kings contract with the young Lady MARGARET was of no force, for that ſhe was vnder age; and alſo for that King CHARLES neuer conſented thereto: and notwithſtanding that he had conſented, yet he was likewiſe vnder age, and afterwards reuoked the ſame; And that the contract of the Ducheſſe of Britanie with MAXIMILIAN was of no effect: for the Ducheſſe gaue thereto no ſufficient authoritie, for none of the Ambaſſadours being foure in number, had any authority in ſolidum to make any contract; neither had the Ducheſſe any meaning to do it: and that which ſhe did was but to temporize with the Britaines, to the end they ſhould not yeeld themſelues to King CHARLES of France. And admitting that the contract had been made by men hauing ſufficient authority, not being confirmed it was of no force, for that the conditions and couenants were not afterwards performed. Finally, by theſe and other reaſons they excuſe him, holding their arguments for true and ſufficient in their opinion. And the French King going into Britaine, the Princeſſe MARGARET (who was nothing ſorie for it) returned: for (they ſay) ſhe neuer liked of the match, yet yeelded thereto by the perſwaſion of the Flemmings: and ſo a very furious and cruell warre began betweene the Emperor, his ſon MAXIMILIAN, and the French King. And foraſmuch as his father was now old, MAXIMILIAN had the ſole gouernment, and had already vndertaken the charge: but after ſome bickerings, a fained peace was made betweene them; whereto MAXIMILIAN by reaſon of the great and exceſſiue charges of the warr, and for ſome other reſpects, was conſtrained to condeſcend; but principally for that at the ſame time, which was in the yeere 1492, the men of warre which had ſerued the valiant MATTHIAS King of Hungary, which kept ſtill together (& for that they wore mourning colours for their King, were cald the black Regiment) through want of pay, or ſome other inſolence, making war in Auſtria, had the ſpoile of ſome townes: for the reliefe whereof, MAXIMILIAN leuying forces, went into thoſe parts, and without any great trouble brake and ſcattered the mutiners, and for example to others ſeuerely puniſhed them.

Warres betweene the Emperour and the French King.

This yeere was much noted aboue others for three ſpeciall things: the firſt was, for that therein died Pope INNOCENT the 8, in the eighth yeere of his Papacie; whom RODRIGO de Boria a Spaniard, borne in Valencia in Spaine ſucceeding, was called ALEXANDER the Sixt: GVICCHARDIN writing of his election ſaith, that hee came to be Pope by briberie, hauing corrupted ſome of the Cardinals with money, and poiſoned the reſt with promiſes of offices and great preferments; which made him hatefull to the world; and drew vpon him the vengeance of God. But his election was not ſo diſtaſtefull, but his conditions were more odious: who although he were ſharpe witted, excellent in counſell, a good Orator to perſwade and of great Iudgement in the greateſt affaires, yet theſe vertues were wonderfully blemiſhed by his vices: for his manners were diſhoneſt, in his actions was no ſinceritie, there was no modeſtie in his countenance, ſmall truth in his words, little faith in his heart, and leſſe religion in his ſoule. Al his actions were ſtained with inſatiable couetouſnes, immoderate ambition, barbarous cruelty, and a burning deſire to aduance his children (by what meanes ſoeuer) being many in number, among the which there was one no leſſe deteſtable then the father, to whoſe curſed counſels he became a wicked inſtrument. The ſecond was, for that the great citie of Granada in Spaine, was in the beginning of that yeere, by FERDINAND and ISABEL King and Queene of Caſtile taken from the Moores: the third was, for that in the ſame yeere, by the commandement of the ſame Princes, the Weſt Indies were diſcouered in the Ocean ſea.

This being paſt, and the yeer 1493 being comi; Germany and Italie beeing, through the Emperors perors wiſdome and good gouernment, in peace, and himſelf at peace with all Princes, in quiet poſſeſſion of the Duchie of Auſtria, and his ſonne MAXIMILIAN beeing King of the Romans, and Gouernor of the ſtates and prouinces of the Lowe Countries and of part of Burgundy, in the behalf of his ſonne PHILIP; when he had raigned 53 yeers and foure months Emperor (wherein no Emperor but AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, who raigned three yeers longer, could be compared with him: but yet FREDERICK did far exceed him in age) at this time it pleaſed God to take him out of the world. This Prince is reported to haue had many vertues: for, beſides that he was courteous, deſirous of peace, temperate in his diet, and very deuout, he was in all his life time neuer heard to ſwear but twice, which he could not auoid; once was, when he was crownd in Aken; the other time in Rome. He had great care for the preſeruation of the lands of the Empire: and to the end not to hazard the ſame, or to bring them in queſtion, he ſometimes made peace with the loſſe of his owne eſtate; neither would he euer inueſt FRANCIS SFORCE nor his ſon GALEAS MARIA in the Duchie of Milan, notwithſtanding that they were in quiet poſſeſſion thereof: which when FRANCIS SFOSCE ſaw it would not be gotten without much money, hee gaue ouer the purſuit, nothing fearing the Emperors force, who was diuerted without other war. He had by his wife ELENOR (who died long before him) three ſons and two daughters: his firſt ſonnes name was CHRISTOPHER, who died a childe: his ſecond ſonne was MAXIMILIAN, who was afterwards Emperor: the third was IOHN, who alſo died a childe. Of his two daughters, the one, called HELEN, died in her infancy; and the other, called HVGRADA, was maried to ALBERT, Duke of Bauiere, and was afterwards mother to the Dukes, WILLIAM, LEWES and ERNESTVS.

THE LIFE OF MAXIMILIAN, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND FOVRTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

FRederick being dead, his ſonne Maximilian, who in his fathers life time had the gouernment of the Empire, was without any contradiction made Emperor. In the beginning of his Raign, hee diſpoſing himſelf to go to the warrez againſt the Turke, who had kept a great ſtirre in Hungary, made him to flee. Hee took to wife Blanch, daughter to the Duke of Milan, and made great warrez againſt the Swiſſers. In this Emperors time the Piſans in Germany made an inſurrection, which was one of the greateſt tumults that had been ſeen: but they being ſoon ſuppreſſed, he ſubdued many other Rebels. Then became to growe the cauſes of the diſſenſion between Spain and France for the Duchie of Milan. This Emperor made warre againſt the Venetians: then then followed the terrible battailes of Rauenna and Marinian, with diuers accidents of warre, which ended in a fained (yet for a time durable) peace. When the Emperour Maximilian departed out of this life, he had raigned 25 yeeres.

After the peaceable FREDERICK, followed his son, the warlike and victorious MAXIMILIAN, who in his fathers life time was crowned King of the Romanes. The same yeere that his father the Emperour FREDERICK, died, the Turkes made an incursion into the countrie of Croacia, a prouince of Hungary, which bordereth vpon Dalmatia: and the new Emperour desiring to preuent the danger, speedily raising his forces, went to fight with them, but they hauing intelligence of his comming, retired: whereupon he dissolued his Army. The Emperour MAXIMILIAN hauing bin a good space a widower; when as his father was dead, he contracted himself to the Lady BLANCH, the daughter of GALEAS, and Niece to LEVVES SFORCE Duke of Milan; who being Vncle and gouernor to his Nephew IOHN GALEAS (who in right was Duke) vsurped and held his estate. This BLANCH being the faireſt woman of her time was wooed by many Princes, yet to her was the Emperour married. To whom LODOVVICK promised in dowrie 400 thousand duckets, to be paied within a certaine time and 40 thousand in iewels and other ornaments: and MAXIMILIAN (regarding money more then the alliance) tyed himselfe to inueſt LODOVVICK in the Duchie of Milan (to the preiudice of IOHN GALEAS his new brother in-law) to hold it for him and his succeſſors, as if the estate had been without a Duke since the death of PHILIP MARIA visconti. At the same time, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1494. the French king CHARLES the Eight made preparation to come into Italy, who a little before had giuen out in speeches that he meant to make a conqueſt of the kingdome of Naples, which he pretended to belong to him, by the last will and succeſſion of RENE Lord of Prouence, and his ancestors Dukes of Anjow: whereto he was chiefly induced by LEVVES Duke of Milan Vncle to the right Duke IOHN: For FERDINAND King of Naples, and his sonne ALONSO, had required him to leaue the gouernment of Milan, to Duke IOHN GALEAS, who was married to King FERDINANDS Niece, and vpon this quarrell they determined to make warre vpon him: by reason whereof he by all meanes possible perswaded the French King to come against him into Italy, and to that effect furnished him with a great summe of money. And to the end that the Emperor MAXIMILIAN should not be his enemy in this case, LEVVES SFORCE procured this marriage of his Niece with the Emperour. In the time wherein his comming was most bruited, died FERDINAND King of Naples, when he had raigned seuen and thirty yeeres, and his son ALONSO Duke of Calabria succeeded him.

Charles the eighth, King of France, came into Italy.

At this time was the new Empresse BLANCH carried into Germany, and there was married to MAXIMILIAN; Germany being in peace and quiet, and the Emperor taking care for the warres, and resistance to be made against the Turkes. But the King of France neuertheleſſe took his way towards Italy: and to the end he might passe in more safety, he gaue to King FERDINAND the Earledome of Rossillion, and the Ile of Sardinia, which IOHN, father to FERDINAND had morgaged to LEVVES the French King, father to this CHARLES. Of the comming of this King CHARLES, although it concerneth not this history, yet I will briefly write the summe: for it was a matter very famous, and much feared by the Pope, and by all the Princes and Potentates of Italy: and also for that it will serue for the better vnderstanding of what we shal speak of hereafter,

King CHARLES then with 50000. men of foote and horse, in the moneth of September in the same yeere came into Lombardy, where he was by Duke LEVVES receiued with great honor, and his Army was by him furnished with all things necessarie. Being there he went to visit the right Duke, IOHN GALEAS, who lay sicke in Pauia, and within few daies after died, leauing a young son called FRANCIS: He was his cosin germane: for the King and GALEAS came of two Sisters, daughters to LEVVES the Second, Duke of Sauoy. The words he vsed to him were in generall, for that LODOVVICK was present, onely expressing how much he was grieued for his sicknes, perswading him to hope of recouerie, but in his minde the King and all that were with him had great compaſſion on him, beleeuing confidently that the young gentleman had not long to liue, by the villanie of his vncle. The presence of ISABELL his wife did adde much to this compaſſion: who not onely full of sorrow for her husbands infirmity and the estate of her little son, but much afflicted for the danger wherein her father and friends were, in the presence of them all fell at the Kings feet, recommending vnto him with teares, her father and his howse of Arragon: to whom although the King for her age, beautie and present fortune made some shewes of pittie, yet not able to stay the course of so great an action vpon so slender an occasion, he answered her with shewes of will to do that which he could not; saying, that he was forced to prosecute the enterprize, being so farre aduanced. Then holding on his iourney he came to Pisa, and was afterwards receiued into Florence, and from Florence he went to Rome, no man daring by the way to make head against him, and much lesse at his comming to that city.

Pope ALEXANDER not daring stay his comming in his Palace, retired himself into the Castle Saint Angelo, so much did they stand in feare of him. Afterwards they two came to a composition of peace, although they neither met nor spake together: but afterwards vpon security they met and conferred; and within few daies after, the King with the greateſt part of the forces which he brought with him out of France, tooke his way towards the Kingdom of Naples, in the moneth of Ianuary, in the yeere of our Lord 1495. where King ALONSO durst not stay vntill he came; aswell by reason of the great Army which he brought with him, as for that, by reason of his vicious and dissolute life, he was ill beloued of his owne subiects of that kingdom. Whereupon, at what time as King CHARLES was in Rome; King ALONSO hauing raigned not fully one whole yeere, giuing vp that Kingdome to his son FERDINAND, went into Sicilia, where he became a Monke, and in short space after died: by reason whereof, his son FERDINAND being King, he raised the greateſt power hee was able, so that it is affirmed he had 5000. men at Armes, 500. light horse, and a great number of foot. Neuertheleſſe the French had so good succeſſe, and King FERDINAND found so great feare, and so little constancie in his people, that after some accidents, he came to Naples, and thence fled by Sea to Ischaia, and afterwards into Sicilia; and so the French King in two moneths space, became Lord of the whole Kingdome, excepting some little townes vpon the Sea side, which held for King FERDINAND.

King Charles of France his conqueſt of the kingdome of Naples.

Pope ALEXANDER seeing the prosperitie and power of King CHARLES in the kingdome of Naples, knowing his ambition, and fearing to loſe his estate; whil'ſt he was busied in the conqueſt of Naples, procured a league to be made betweene himselfe, the Venecians, and the Emperour MAXIMILIAN, whom hee solicited to come into Italy to the reliefe and defence of his Church. Into this league also entred LEVVES Duke of Milan (notwithstanding that by his procurement King CHARLES took occasion to come into Italy) being grieued in minde for that King CHARLES had so good succeſſe in Naples, which made him stand in feare of his owne estate; whereto the French King euer had an eye; as afterwards LEVVES Duke of Orleans and cosin germane to King CHARLES, who afterwards was King, made apparant; who challenged that Dukedome to appertaine vnto him, for that he was Nephew of the other LEVVES Duke also of Orleance, brother to King CHARLES the Sixt, and of his wife VALENTINA, sister to Duke PHILIP of Milan, the last of the Viscounts; whose bastard, FRANCIS SFORCE Duke of Milan took to wife, when he became Lord of that Duchie. Whereupon LEVVES for the better confirmation of his estate, obtained of MAXIMILIAN (as supreme Lord of all Lombardy) to be inuested in the Duchie of Milan: which in my iudgement, and of all those which write without passion, was his trueſt and beſt title; for after the death of Duke PHILIP aboue named, neither the Emperour FREDERICK, neither MAXIMILIAN had giuen the title to the Duke, or to his Father, or to his Nephew; neither could it descend to them by the feminine sex, and much lesse to this LEVVES Duke of Orleans, who then fought, and afterwards took the same, when he came to be King of France; and by so much the more, for that the descendents from this SFORCE, came from the woman being a bastard, whereby he vniustly and without reason posſeſſed so great an estate: he being inueſted by the Emperour with great ioy and solemnitie, tooke the Ducall Enſignes. King CHARLES hauing intelligence of the League newly made by these Princes, resolued to leaue such forces in the kingdome of Naples, as might suffice for the defence thereof, and with the rest of his Army to returne into France; and marching towards Rome, giuing the Pope to vnderstand that he came to do his dutie to his Holines; Pope ALEXANDER after some Ambaſſages betweene them, not daring to abide his comming, departed from Rome; wherein, and in other townes belonging to to the Church, the Kings troupes did much harme. The Pope not holding himselfe to be in safety in Civita Vechia, went to Perugia, with an intent, if he were oppressed, to go to Ancona, and there to imbarke himselfe for Venice.

A battell betwixt the Frech and the Italians at Fornouo.

The French King departing from Rome, continued his iourney towards France, notwithstanding that he knew that in Lombardy the Venecians and the Duke of Milan had an Army in a readinesse to fight with him; and in Lombardy LEWES Duke of Orleans had already taken the City of Nouarra, vnder pretext of the title aforesaid: whereupon the Duke of Milan made haste to besiege him. King CHARLES coming neer to Parma, passing the riuer Tarro, found a great Army of his enemies; whereof FRANCIS GONZAGA Marquesse of Mantoa was General: with whom neer to the riuer they cam to a battel, where hapned very notable accidents. But heerin is great difference among Writers about this matter: for, the French attribute the victory to their King; and the Italians giue it to the Venecians and to the Milanois. The truth is, that neither of the Armies was wholly broken or ouerthrowne, but the Italians that day seemd to be Masters of the field: which appears in this, that they taking many French prisoners, none of them were taken by the French; and they moreouer compelled the French king to seek another passage, by reason whereof they were reputed to haue the victory.

There died in this battell, which was fought on the sixt day of Iuly, in the yeer of our Lord 1495, a thousand men of both sides. But GVICHARDIN, writing of this battell of Taro or Furnoue, saith, that the French had not aboue 200 slain; and of the confederates there were slain 3000: among which was RAINVCIO de Farneze, Leader of the Venecian horsemen. Touching the honour of the victory, either side sought to appropriate it to himself with what reasons they could produce; The Italians, for that their tents and carriages were not spoiled: but, by the generall opinion of all indifferent men, the French were held to haue the glory of the victory, both for that they slue more of their enemies, they chased them ouer the riuer, and wonne their liberty to passe on. But after some treaties between the two Armies, the French in a night went towards Aste; where the King remained certain daies, and a peace was concluded between him and the Duke of Milan: and LEWES Duke of Orleans rendring Nouarra, King CHARLES returned into France; and shortly after, FERDINAND King of Naples recouered that Kingdome, but not without great difficulty, by reason of the French which remained in garrison there, and of those which the King afterwards sent thither. In which war, matters of greatest importance for the seruice of King FERDINAND, were guided and directed by the famous Captain GONSALO FERNANDES of Cordoua, who for his excellency was called the great Captain of Spain; sent thither by King FERDINAND, called the Catholick, for the defense of that Kingdome the first time that he went thither: and so of all this great enterprise, there remained nothing to the French King, but that hee did much harm, and put all Italy in great fear (for, the reputation and power wherewith he came, was very great) and making a iourney, gaue a bold attempt, and therewith returned.

The Kingdom of Naples recouerd by King Ferdinand of Arragon.

Whilst these matters passed in Italy, the Emperor in the same yeer 1495, assembled a Councell or Diet in the City of Worms; where the matter was debated, whether the Emperor should go to relieue the Pope against the French King, or make warre against the Turk: but the Princes were so contrary in their opinions, that nothing was concluded. The Emperor at this Assembly gaue to the Earls of Wittemburgh the title of Dukes, which they hould to this day: and from thence he sent the Ensignes and inuestiture before named to LODOVVICK Duke of Milan; and other matters were ordained concerning the gouernment and peace of Germany. At that time was MAXIMILIAN daily solicited by the Duke of Milan to come into Italy: and in the end by his importunity, and promise of certain money for the defraying of his Army, the Emperor past the mountains but slenderly accompanied, giuing it out that the body of the Army which he had promised, marched after. Being entred Italy, he sent to haue the Duke of Sauoy and some other Princes come and speak with him: but his forces were so contemptible, that not any one would obey. Then LODOVVICK Duke of Milan perswaded the Emperor to go to Pisa (against whom the Florentines made warre) hoping by his means to get that Towne into his hands: whereupon, the Emperor sent Ambassadors to Florence, to let them vnderstand, that intending to go with a great Army against the Infidels, hee held it necessary first to come into Italy, for the pacifying of all quarels. And for that it did belong to his Imperiall Authority, he required to be informed of the controuersies between them and the Pisans; commanding them in the mean time to surcease from Arms, with assurance that hee would administer iustice indifferently. To whom they sent their Ambassadors to Genoa to beseech him to think, that that seeing his holy resolution was to settle peace in Italie, there was nothing more conuenient than to restore Pisa to the Florentines, from whence sprung all the discontentments to his Maiesty and the confederates, Pisa being in that regard the cause which made some aspire to the Empire of Italie; who to that end laboured to keep it in continuall warre, meaning the Venecians. Moreouer, that it was not agreeable to iustice, that such as had been dispoiled by force, should (contrary to the Imperiall lawes) be constrained to referre their rights to compromise, if they were not restored to their possession; which if they might obtain of him, they would then refer their cause to him, and wholly rely on his iustice. MAXIMIL. discontent with this answer, went by sea to Pisa, meaning to besiege Liuorn: where doing little good, he raised his siege, and returnd suddenly with little honour into Germany, hauing shewed his weakness in Italy.

It hapned after, that King FERDINAND hauing recouered his Kingdome, falling sick, died; and for that hee had no sonne, his vncle FREDERICK, brother to his father King ALONSO, had the Kingdome; and many other matters befell in Italy, which I haue no time to write: and the Emperor was in peace with King CHARLES, who shortly after in the yeer 1497, died suddenly; which caused a great alteration: for, by reason that he had no issue male, the aforenamed LEWES Duke of Orleans, being next of blood, succeeded him in the Kingdome of France; who as soon as he was King, caused himself to be called Duke of Milan; whereby it might be easily perceiued, that he had a resolution to do that which he afterwards put in execution: and he presently diuorcing himself from his wife IOAN, which was sister to his Predecessor CHARLES, alleaging for his reason that she was barren, and that he was forced to marry her; and also to the end to haue (as he had) the Duchie of Britain, he married the widow Queen ANNE, late wife of the deceased King CHARLES.

The Emperor hauing intelligence of the death of the French King, desiring to get the Duchy of Burgundy for his sonne PHILIP, who afterward was King of Spain, entred it with an armed hand, and took some Towns: for the defense whereof, the new King LEWES sent a very great Army; but within fewe daies following, a peace was concluded between them, greatly to the Emperors honour and aduantage: which was the more easily effected, by reason of the great desire the French King had to proceed in his enterprise against Milan, for the right which he pretended to haue to that Duchie; and for that the Emperor had resolued to make warre against the Duke of Gelders. The Duke of Milan hauing a watchfull eye, and standing in great fear of the French Kings proceedings, as much as was possible for him prouided for his defense, principally through the league and friendship with the Emperor; who, being of sufficient power to protect him, was resolued to haue done so: but other warres happening in the mean time with the Swissers, who in the yeer of our Lord 1499, made warres in the Territories belonging to Austria (which warre, and the occasion thereof, is written at large by HENRICVS MVCIVS and NAVCLERVS); the Emperor, leauing the enterprise of Gelders, went to this warre: for, the Swissers (called in antient time Heluecians) as well by reason of the situation of their countrey, enuironed with most high hils and steep mountains, as also for their great strength and courage, were then (and at this day are) greatly esteemed, and reputed valiant in Arms. MAXIMILIAN coming against them, notwithstanding that this warre began against his will, yet he followed the same in such sort, that in sundry conflicts and encounters between them, 30000 men were slain of both parts, but the greatest number was of the Swissers; fortune inclining sometime to the one side, and sometime to the other: in the which warre he did wonders in his owne person, vntill that at last, through the entreaty of the Duke of Milan and other Princes (which interposed themselues) the Emperor concluded a peace with them. But before that this warre was ended, LEWES the French King (who procured the same) to take benefit of the time, raised his whole power; and in the moneth of October, the same yeer, entring Lombardy, he besieged and took the Duke of Milan's Towns; who because he was ill beloued of his subiects, and the Emperor failing him in his necessity, and also because the Venecians were in league with the King, he resolued by abandoning the City to giue place to the French fury; and sending his brother ASCANIVS SFORCE before, with his sonnes MAXIMILIAN and FRANCIS into Germany, he with the best and greatest part of his treasure, within few daies after followed. The Duke being in this manner departed, the French King with very little resistance or none at all, was receiued into Milan, and into the rest of the cities in that Duchy: and the Venecians (according to the composition made betweene them) took the citie of Cremona and other places of that estate.

King

King LEWES being in this manner become Lord of all Lombardy, leauing therein such gouernours and garrisons as he thought expedient, returned victorious and triumphant into his countrey. The Duke of Milan being come before the Emperour (who loued him very well) was by him very honorably and kindly intertained; and within few daies after, the Emperour assembling the greatest part of the Princes of the Empire, resolued to relieue and succour him as a prince by him inuested, and who had the best title to that estate; and so with the greatest, expedition that could be made, a good Army was leuied, the greatest part whereof were Swissers; wherein the Cardinall ASCANIVS the Dukes brother vsed great diligence. With these men and with such others as he leuied in Italy, the Duke in the yeere 1500. returned into Lombardy, and his brother the Cardinal going before, was receiued into Milan and other cities; who speedily conducted thither his brother.

The Swissers gaue the Duke of Milan into the power of his enemie the French King.

The French King being certified hereof, in the greatest haste possible sent into Lombardy the greatest number of choice men that he could get, the greatest part whereof likewise were Swissers: and the Duke who wanted neither men nor courage to fight, attended in field the comming of the French Army: the two Armies being at the poynt to haue ioyned, the Swissers which were with the Duke, not onely refused to fight, but (as some say) corrupted with money, deliuered vp the poore Duke to the French, who was carried prisoner into France and afterwards his brother the Cardinall was taken. And so in few daies space, the French King recouered the estate of Milan, and Duke LEWES afterwards, poore, afflicted, and depriued of his Duchy; dyed in prison, hauing been one of the most puissant, valiant and redoubted Princes of the world.

The Duke of Gandie murthered by his brother.

Pope ALEXANDER (who neuer had any feeling or compassion of an other mans affliction and miseries) felt tragicall crosses in his owne howse, the fruits of lust and vnnaturall crueltie; for he still desiring to aduance the Duke of Gandie his eldest son to all temporall greatnes, the Cardinall of Valentie ambitiously affecting his brothers place, and withall enuying him that he had a better share in the loue of the Lady LVCRETIA their common sister; thrust on by lust and ambition, hee caused him to be murthered as he rode one night alone in the streetes of Rome, and his body to be cast into Tiber. GVICHARDIN writes, that it was reported, that the father was a concurrent with his two sonnes in the loue of his daughter LVCRETIA, who being made Pope took her from her husband, as too meah, and married her to IOHN SFORCE Lord of Pesaro; but not able to endure her husband to be his corriuall, he dissolued this second marriage, suggesting that IOHN was colde by nature, and vnable to cohabit. The death of the Duke of Gandie afflicted him so, as with teares in the open consistorie he accused his owne actions and life, and promised reformation.

In this yeere 1500, vpon Saint Matthias day, being the fiue and twentieth day of February, CHARLES who afterwards was King of Spaine and Emperour, and was called CHARLES the Fift, was borne in the citie of Gaunt in Flanders. Duke LEWES hauing in this manner lost his estate, the Emperor receiued his sons which the Cardinal ASCANIVS brought with him: what became of them, you shall heare hereafter. In the yer 1501, prodigious sights, much to be admired, appeared in Germany; for certaine crosses of sundry colours, and some blacke, were seene vpon men and womens apparel, vpon their heads, and vpon the beds whereon they did lie, made so perfect and so liuely for the time they lasted, that it was wonderful to behold; after which, ensued a most grieuous and cruell Pestilence. In those dayes also in Asia began the Empire and dominion of that great Prince, called the Sophi of Persia, who had his beginning from one called SECHIN, or SECHIN, who was said to be descended from the auntient Kings of the Persians: this Prince by Armes made himselfe Lord of all Persia, and of great part of Armenia, of Mesopotamia, and other Prouinces: and afterwards the Kingdome of Persia was established in his successors; which since encreasing, is in some sort a bridle to the vnmeasurable rapine and power of the great Turk.

At the same time, LEWES the French King standing in some doubt of the Emperor, by reason of his late conquest of Milan, and the enterprise of Naples, which he purposed to vndertake, sought to enter into a league with him, and to giue his eldest daughter CLAVDIA in marriage to young CHARLES, who afterwards was Emperour and King of Spaine, being then but one yeere olde (she being also an infant) to whom appertained the succession and inheritance of the Duchy of Britaine: with this match, the Emperour and his son PHILIP were well content: and Queene IOANE and the said PHILIP being then to goe into Spaine, by the leaue and consent of the said French King, went through France, and in the citie of Paris this marriage marriage was solemnized; and so they passed into Spaine, where they making their abode not fully two yeeres, returned by the same way they came through France, as through their friends countrey. Which marriage afterwards was not accomplished, for King LEWES married his said daughter CLAVDIA, to FRANCIS Duke of Angolesme, who was afterwards King: by reason whereof King LEWES lost the title which he pretended to haue to the Duchy of Milan; for at the making of the peace, it was decreed, that if this marriage took not effect, that then the Emperor, should giue the Duchy of Milan to the said young Prince CHARLES. The French King being in this manner in league with the Emperour, sought also to enter into the like with FERDINAND King of Castile, with these conditions; that they two making a conquest of the kingdome of Naples, and deposing King FREDERICK should diuide the same betweene them: which conditions were accepted by King FERDINAND (as saith SABELLICVS, a writer of that time) for that King FREDERICK shewed himselfe ingratefull to his Nephew, who sent him ayde and succours; and the same went, that he secretly practising vnderhand with the French King, offered to pay him tribute, to the end he should not make warre against him, but suffer him to liue in peace; and that hee promised him his help for the taking of the Ile of Sicilia, which appertained to King FERDINAND, and to the house of Arragon.

A league betweene the French King, and the King of Castile.

This being concluded, the two Kings sending thither their Armies and Generals, the warre began; and after some matters (which I haue no time to relate) King FREDERICK abandoning the Kingdome, yeelded himself into the French Kings hands, who vsed him very kindely: but his Army neuertheless took all his Countrey, Calabria and Pulia excepted, which the Spaniards seised on in the behalf of King FERDINAND. And so for a while the peace continued betweene the French and the Spanish, vntill that the French seeking to intrude themselues into the Spanish limits, they made warre one against the other, which warre was one of the most cruell and famous that euer was, and wherein the French imployed the greatest force and power: and GONSALO FERNANDES of Cordoua, being Generall for King FERDINAND, in the space of three yeers that this warre lasted, obtained so many notable victories, and performed such exploits in Arms, and vsed so many policies and stratagems, that he purchased the name of a great Captain; and wholly expelling the French out of that Kingdome, made a conquest thereof for his King: and so it remains vntill this day subiect to the house of Castile. In the time of this war, which was in he yeer 1503, died Pope ALEXANDER, when he had been Pope eleuen yeers. He died (as it is written) of poison; which, GVICCHARDINE relates after this manner: Going the 18 of August to sup in a Vineyard neer to the Vatican, he was suddenly carried away dead to the Palace, being (according to most mens opinions) poisoned after this manner: The Duke of Valentinois his graceless sonne had resolued to poison ADRIAN Cardinall of Cornette in the wine they should haue at supper: for, it is most certain, that both father and sonne were well practised in poisoning; not onely to be reuenged of their enemies, or to be freed from iealousies, but euen of a wicked desire to get the goods of the rich whosoeuer they were; As happened to the Cardinall of S. Auge who was very rich, yea they would poyson their greatest friends and most faithfull seruants, such as were the Cardinalls of Capua and Modena. VALENTINOIS had sent certaine flagons of poysoned wine before, giuing charge to his man that no man should touch them. The Pope comming thither before and some what altered with heat, called for drink, his owne prouision being not yet come: he that had the charge of the poysoned wine (thinking it had been recommended vnto him for the rareneſſe thereof) gaue the Pope thereof to drink; and his sonne VALENTINOIS, arriuing at the same Instant, drank also of the same wine. The father died instantly: but VALENTINOIS by the vigor of his youth and the helpe of strong counterpoysons recouered after a long and grieuous sicknes. Al Rome reioyced to see the body of this monster dead; a man ful of ambition, infidelity, cruelty, luxury, and strange couetousnes, selling both holy and prophane things without distinction, with which vices he had infected the whole world. In his place was chosen Cardinall FRANCIS PICCOLHOMINI, Nephew to Pope PIVS, being his sisters sonne, and was therefore called PIVS TERTIVS; but he being Pope but thirtie dayes, Cardinall IVLIAN was chosen, and called IVLIVS the Second.

The Emperour intermedled not in the affaires of Naples, as well for the preseruation of the league and friendship with France, as also the better to prouide for other matters in the Empire, wherein at the very same time, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1502, befell a strange aduenture in the countrey of Spire; wherein an infinite number of people gathering themselues together vnder the name of liberty, addreſſed themſelues againſt the temporall Lords and Princes, and alſo againſt the ſtate of the Clergie: theſe men hauing made them two Captaines, began to warre, robbe, and to commit all manner outrages and inſolencies; hauing firſt determined to obſerue certaine articles, which they meant to hold religiouſly for a law: the firſt was to purchaſe liberty, and to make themſelues free, or to dye in the action: another was, to ſay euery day a certaine number of Pater Noſters, and other prayers; vpon another day, to deſtroy all the Princes, and to kill all thoſe which ſhould reſiſt them, and ſome others they purpoſed to robbe, and to make all the clergy goods common; with other ſtrange and dangerous deuices. Theſe men within few daies gathered themſelues together in ſo great a number, that if the Emperour had not very ſpeedily ſent an Army againſt them, which brake and ouerthrew them; they had brought the eſtate of Germany in hazard, if they had continued as they began: but through the Emperours endeauour this combuſtion was pacified, and the offenders were, for example ſake, iuſtly puniſhed. Neuertheleſſe, at the ſame time the citie of Baſil (which was an Imperiall citie, and tributary to the Empire) gat liberty, and making it ſelfe free, entred into a league and confederacie with the Swiſſers, which was a matter of great importance and danger; as well for the charge to prouide for ſuch a caſe, as for the warre againſt PHILIP, the Countie Palatine, and his ſon ROBERT, which ſprang through this occaſion.

GEORGE Duke of Bauiere, called the rich, hauing no more but one daughter, whoſe name was ISABEL; and marrying her to ROBERT the eldeſt ſon of the Count Palatine of Rhine, who was alſo called Duke of Bauiere, for in auntient time both had been but one houſe; he gaue him with her for her dowrie, the inheritance and ſucceſſion of his whole patrimonie, which was againſt law and reaſon, and a wrong done to his brother ALBERT, who was alſo Duke of Bauiere, and had married the Emperor MAXIMILIAN's ſiſter. This marriage being made, Duke GEORGE, father in-law to ALBERT, in the yeere 1503, dyed: and ROBERT hauing ISABEL to wife (being by his father in-laws laſt Will made his heire generall) with the helpe of his father, the Count Palatine of Rhine, began to take Townes and Caſtles in Bauiere, and to make himſelfe Lord of a great part thereof; and ſo began the warre. The Emperor ſeeking meanes to bring them to an agreement, ROBERT would not accept the conditions: whereupon the Emperour proceeding againſt him, and againſt his father the Count Palatine (who notwithſtanding that he had bin often required and perſwaded to the contrarie, counſelling his ſon to proceede, aſſiſted him both with men and money) confiſked his goods, and expoſing the ſame to him that would take them, made preſently cruell warre vpon him: and by his order, the like was done by the Lantzgraue of Heſſen, the Duke of Wittembergh, the Marqueſſe of Brandenburgh, and the ſaid ALBERT and ALEXANDER Dukes of Beuiere, and other Princes: againſt all which the father and the ſon armed themſelues, with the helpe of the king of Hungary and Bohemia, from whence many men came to their aide; and ſo betweene them began a moſt cruell warre; wherein the Emperor warred in his owne perſon particularly in the countrie of Bauiere (whereof ROBERT was in poſſeſſion:) And WILLIAM Lantzgraue of Heſſen, and the Duke of Wittenbergh, either of them for their portion, together with their friends and kinſfolks made warres in ſeuerall parts of the countries, ſubiect to his father the Count Palatine of Rhine.

The Emperour warred with ſuch force and courage, that obtaining certaine notable victories againſt ROBERT and the Bohemians, he recouered all the townes which he had taken; but ROBERT ſaued himſelfe by flight, and the Emperour giuing thoſe townes to his coſin ALBERT, went with his Army into the Count Palatines countrie, wherein the Princes aboue named had taken ſome townes: and comming with the like foree and fury as he had recouered the eſtate of Bauiere, he took the greateſt part of that dominion: and PHILIP being vnable to defend what he held, ſending to the Emperour for pardon, promiſed from thenceforth to be his loyall ſeruant. CHRISTOPHER Marqueſſe of Baden, together with certaine religious perſons being interceſſors; the Emperour conſidering that if he ſhould wholly ruine him, being a Prince Elector, there would be great controuerſie about the right of the election, he thought it beſt to pardon him; and ſo ceaſed the warres on all parts, and the Count Palatine returning to his obedience was pardoned: but his countrie and eſtate was much diminiſhed. His ſonne ROBERT after the warres were ended, being of the age of fiue and twentie yeeres, ſeeing himſelf ouercome and diſpoſſeſſed, dyed of ſorrow and his wife alſo, by whoſe right he challenged that which is aboue ſpecified.

Whileſt the Emperor was buſied about theſe matters, the great Captaine of Spaine, GONSALO FERNANDES, wholly conquered the kingdom of Naples, and (as writeth SABELLICVS) a truce being taken betweene King FERDINAND of Caſtile, and LEWES the French King for three yeers; Italie was in peace for a time. In this yeer, 1504, died ISABEL Queen of Spaine, whom Queen IOANE ſucceeding in that kingdom, was with her husband PHILIP called to the Gouernment: but their comming was deferred vntill the beginning of the yeere 1506. In which time the Emperor ſummoned a Councell to be held in the City of Colen, from whence he went with an Army againſt the Duke of Guelders, and taking ſome townes from him, brought him to ſuch diſtreſſe, that he was conſtrained to ſue for pardon, and he forgiuing him, returned to the Councell or Diet at Colen.

This CHARLES Duke of Guelders, by the prouocation and ſupport of the French, with whom after his fathers death he had been bred vp in hatred of the houſe of Burgundy, violating his faith by the which he was bound to MAXIMILIAN, did infeſt the Brabantines, committing great ſpoiles and murthers. This young Prince was of a fowre and proude diſpoſition, whoſe Grand-father ARNOLD, was ſon to MARY, daughter to IOHN Lord of Arkell, by the death of REYNOLD the laſt of the Dukes of Iuliers and Guelders, of the houſe of Naſſau, his mothers Vncle, it was conferred into the family of EGMONT who ſtill was an enemy to the houſe of Burgundy, in fauour of the French.

The next yeer following, the Emperour being diſpleaſed with the King of Hungary and Bohemia, for the aſſiſtance giuen to the Count Palatine againſt him, and for his rebellion againſt the Empire, leuied an Army and went againſt him; and entring Hungary, did great ſpoiles there, and put the king thereof in ſuch feare, that he (with great humility ſued to him for peace, which was granted vpon ſuch conditions as pleaſed the Emperour; and ſo the warre ended. In the meane time, LEWES the French King, hauing no meaning to marry his daughter CLAVDIA to Prince CHARLES, who being afterwards Emperour, was called CHARLES the Fift, ſhortly after married her to FRANCIS Duke of Angouſme and Dolphin of France, who afterwards was King: and fearing warres with the Emperour about the Duchy of Milan, made a perpetuall league with FERDINAND King of Caſtile, who was vpon his departure from Arragon to returne to Naples; for he expected King PHILIP who went thither in the beginning of the yeer 1506: this league being made betweene them, King FERDINAND married the Lady GERMANA, ſiſter to the Earle of Foix: and in Aprill, in the yeere 1506, leauing Spaine, he went to Naples: and vpon the fiue and twentith of September in the ſame yeer, King PHILIP being of the age of eight and twenty yeeres, departed out of this World: his death was much deplored by all his ſubiects, but more by the Emperor his Father, who was extreamly ſory for the ſame. After his deceaſe, for that the Queen was ſickly, and the Prince CHARLS a childe, King FERDINAND of Naples was called to the Gouernment of thoſe Kingdomes; whereupon the yeer next following he came into Spain to that effect: and the Emperor, to the end hee ſhould vndertake the Gouernement of the Lowe Countries, was by Ambaſſadours from the States thereof, ſolicited to come thither; who accepting the Gouernement, went preſently into Flanders.

The Spaniſh conquered the kingdom of Naples from the French.

The French King hauing leuied an Army to go into Italy to ſuppreſſe the rebellion at Genoa, the Pope and the Venecians were in ſome doubt that he had a further deſigne: whereupon they ſent their Ambaſſadors to the Emperor and Princes Electors, to let them vnderſtand that the French king had an intent to oppreſſe the ſtate of the Church, and to vſurpe the dignity of the Empire. This cauſed MAXIMILIAN to aſſemble a Diet of the Princes and free Cities at Conſtance; giuing them to vnderſtand that the French Kings intention was to aduance the Cardinall of Ambois, and to receiue of him the Imperiall Crowne. The Princes were herewith much incenſed with diſdaine; that through their negligence the Majeſty of the Empire ſhould be tranſlated into another Nation. After much conſultation, in the end they concluded to furniſh the Emperor for his voyage into Italie, with eight thouſand horſe, and two and twenty thouſand foote, paid for ſix moneths, and 6000 florens of the Rhyne for the charges of the Artillery monethly: But the French King hauing diſmiſſed his Army and himſelfe retired into France, the Pope and the Venecians grew cold in their hote purſuite; the Pope giuing charge to his Legate to perſwade the Emperor, in his name, to paſſe into Italie, without an Army, offering to doe him more honour, then had been at the crowning of any former Emperor: and the Venecians vpon great inſtance made by his Ambaſſadors to that State, for the paſſing of his army through their Territories, made anſwere; That their reſolution was to grant him paſſage, if he came without an Army, but comming Armed, to deny him that liberty: Wherewith the Emperour being discontented drawing his forces towards the Frontiers of Italie, he sent a Herald to Verona to publish his intent to passe into Italie, to receiue the Imperiall Crowne, and to require lodging for 4000 Horse; whereunto the gouernour made answere, that if he would passe for no other occasion then to receiue the Crown, they would honor him with all offices of obseruance: but they saw contrary effects, hauing brought so great forces with Artillery vpon their Frontiers. This voyage of the Emperors produced no great effects: for after some spoiles don in Friuli and some places taken, which the Venecians soon recouered, in the end he sought to haue a truce with the Venecians, the which was concluded for three yeers, and so the Emperor retired into Germany.

In the meane time, CHARLES Duke of Guelderland, through the ayde (as it was surmised) of the French king, made warres in Brabant, whereupon the Emperour was constrained to giue ouer the warre against the Venecians, and with his forces to go to the reliefe of that Countrey, wherein he making head against the Gelderois, put them to the worse. In the yeere 1508, LEWES Duke of Milan, called the Moore, being depriued of his estate, dyed prisoner in France; his sonnes MAXIMILIAN and FRANCIS, liuing in the Emperours Court in Germanie.

A league made at Cambray.

This yeere the Emperour and French King being either of them much discontented with the Venecians, they resolued to contract a league secretly against them; sending their deputies to Cambray to that end, where they concluded (contrarie to the couenants with either of them made with the Venecians) with the consent of the Pope and king of Arragon, to make war against the Venecians, euery one in his owne right, to recouer those townes which they had vsurped from them. As, for the Pope Faenza, Rimini, Rauenna, and Seruia: for the Emperour Padua, Vincenza, and Verona, belonging to the Empire, and Friuli and Treuisa as th'inheritance of the house of Austria: for the French King Verona, Guiaradada, Brescia, Bergamo, and Crema: And for the king of Arragon the Townes and hauens which had been morgaged by FERDINAND king of Naples: That the the French King should beginne the warre in person by the first of Aprill, at what time the Pope and the Catholicke King should enter into the action: And to the end the Emperour might haue some colour of excuse for not obseruing the truce which he had made with the Venecians, The Pope should demande succours of him as from the protector of the Church. There were many other Articles conteyned in this league whereof GVICHARDIN makes an ample relation.

The Pope being resolute, and loth to see the Emperour too great in Italy, he desired rather to obtaine part by accord, then the whole by Armes, labouring to induce the Venecians to restore him Rimini and Faenza; letting them know that the danger which threatned them by the vnion of so many Princes, would be farre greater if he did concurre with them, and pursue them both with his spirituall and temporall Armes; but if they rendred those townes he should haue iust cause not to ratifie the league, which without his Pontificall authority would easily vanish. The Venecians were herewith much perplexed, there being great contrariety of opinions amongst the Senators: but in the end the worse counsell preuailed, which was not to yeeld vnto the Popes desire, whereupon his Holinesse ratified the league.

In Aprill 1509 the French King aduanced his Army into Italy, sending a Herald to Venice to denounce war against them, whereunto the Duke and State answered; That since the king his master was resolued to make war against them, in a time when they hoped most for the obseruation of the league which they had neuer violated, whereby they had made the Emperour their enemy, they would stand vpon their defence, relying vpon the equity of their cause. They hauing drawne together a florishing Army went to field, and after some daies the two Armies met at Guiradada where there was a furious battaile fought, and the Venecians were ouerthrowne. But some write that onely the Venecian rereward came to blowes, where they were in a manner all slaine hauing fought very valiantly, their commander BARTHOLMEVV d'ALVIANA being taken prisoner. Many townes in Lombardy followed the Victors fortune and yeelded to the French King. The newes of this ouerthrow being come to Venice, it cannot be written what a generall lamentation there was in the citie, and how much they feared the ruine of their countrey. Thus in 15 daies after the battaile, the French King hauing conquered all that belonged to him by the league of Cambria, the Pope plaid his part with the townes of Romagnia, and the Emperour MAXIMILIAN sending diuerse troupes into Friuli, took diuerse townes there.

The Venecians, seeing their estate desperate, resolued to abandon the iurisdiction of the firm land, land, and to contain themselues within the salt water; commanding their Magistrates and Officers in Padoua, Verona, and other places, to retire, and leaue the Townes to the peoples deuotion. They also sent an Ambassador to the Emperor to pacifie him by their humble submission, and to obtain peace vnder what condition soeuer: but they could not mone him. They also sent to restore the Ports to the King of Arragon: and they sent a Secretary into Romagna to deliuer vp to the Pope whatsoeuer they held there; vpon certain conditions; which the Pope did not allow. Thus were they stript of all their great power, being almost out of hope for the preseruation of their liberty. This ruine of theirs was very sensible to many; who foresaw that the estate of Italy would be very wretched, if it should be brought vnder the yoke of strangers. The Pope aboue all others began to be much grieued for their fall; who, fearing the power of CÆSAR and the French King, resolued to dob all hee could to crosse their courses, accepting the Letters written vnto him in the name of the Duke of Venice with great submission, humbly entreating him to pardon and absolue them.

The Emperor delaying his coming into Italy, the Venecians began to recouer some Townes in the firm land which they had abandoned; and the French King prepared for his return into France. In the mean time the Emperor came into Italy with no great forces, so as hee spent the time in enterprises of small moment with little honour to the Imperiall Name: yet at that time he did solicite his confederates to ioyn their forces together, for the taking of the City of Venice; but they could not agree: but in the mean time Friuli and Istria were pitifully afflicted by the Emperors forces; and he went in person to besiege Padoua with a great Army, which the Venecians did fortifie with all the men, artillery and munition they could; so as all the young Gentlemen of Venice with their friends and followers put themselues in Armes, and went to guard the City: but after seuenteen daies siege he raised his Camp, and retired towards Verona with much discontent; and then presently returned into Germany to giue order (as hee said) for the warres he intended to make the Spring following: After which, the Venecians made their submission to the Pope; who gaue them absolution, and enioyned them for penance to visit certain Churches. The warre continued still betwixt the Emperors forces and the Venecians: and the Pope, seeking to reconcile them; the first that gaue ouer this war, was Pope IVLIO; who, being sued vnto by the Venecians for peace, granted the same; and therewith withdrew his forces.

Pope IVLIO (as he was a subtile cunning Prelate) hauing gotten what he desired, mistrusted that the Emperor and the French King hauing brought the Venecians to ruine, his owne state would be in danger: for, his meaning was, that no man should be of greater power in Italy than himself. But as the French Kings purposes were to the contrary, so he took his agreement between the Venecians and the Pope in very ill part; and after many Ambassages past between them, in the end they two fell at variance. The Pope, practising vnder hand with the Genoais, made them rebell against the French King; and the King (in requital) made a schisme in the Papacy, and to that effect drew the Cardinall of S. Crosse (who had been Legat in Germany) together with some other Cardinals, to his deuotion; who, calling a Councell against the Pope, appointed the City of Pisa for the place of their meeting. The Emperor, notwithstanding the league between the Pope and the Venecians, desisted not from warring against them: but hee was aduertised that the French King had induced the Duke of Guelders to take Armes against him, and to that effect had with money supplied his want: for, the King although hee would that all should aid and assist him, yet hee would not that any one but himself should haue the victory.

The French King caused a schisme in the Papedome.

Vpon this occasion, the Emperor, leauing the friendship of the French, ioyned with the Pope: and the French King, persisting in his resolution, caused many Bishops and other Prelates to go to Pisa; where he procured the Councell to bee assembled, which the Cardinall of Saint Crosse had already begun: but, holding themselues to be there in no safety, they went afterwards to Milan. And the Pope in like manner sent to the King of Castile, requiring his aid, which presently was promised, and afterwards sent him: and then he began with his fulminations to persecute the French King. And to the end to defeat this Councell, hee summoned a Councell generall to be held in Saint IOHN de Lateran in Rome, the yeer next following, which was in the yeer 1512. The warre between the King and the Pope beeing very cruell, the King mightily engrossing his Army, made MONSIEVR DE FOIX, Generall thereof; who going to Bologna, took it; and taking Brescia, sacked it.

The Cardinall of Saint Crosse, and those which ioyned with him, cited the Pope to appear before them: and the Pope, after many proteſtations proceeding againſt them, depriued them of all their eccleſiaſticall dignities and benefices. King FERDINAND'S forces coming to the Popes aid, after ſome encounters the two Armies (meeting neer to Rauenna vpon Whitſunday, in the yeer 1512) came to a battell, which was as cruell and bloody as euer was any; and although the French obtained the victory, yet twice ſo many of them were there ſlain, as of thoſe which were ouerthrowne, if they may be accounted ouercome; whereof one ſquadron remained whole and neuer broken, and ſo paſt through the middeſt of their enemies, none daring to charge them.

A battell betwixt the French and the Popes forces neer the riuer of Carro in Italy.

In this battell MONSIEVR DE FOIX the French Generall was ſlain, together with many of the French Nobility. Finally, the French were reduced to ſuch an eſtate, that notwithſtanding they had the victory, yet it fared with them as though they had been ouercome: for, they departing from Rauenna, and taking their way towards Milan (MONSIEVR DE LA PALISSE being the Generall) Pope IVLIO recouered the City of Rauenna, and in like manner Bologna: and vnderſtanding the iſſue of the battell (though at the firſt he ſtood in great fear) yet being certified of the truth, and how much the French Army was diſtreſſed, he after his accuſtomed manner leuying new ſupplies, wrote to all the Kings and Princes of Chriſtendome to ſtirre them vp to warre, and to that effect ſent a Cardinall to the Emperor; who, being diſcontent with the French King, within fewe daies after ſent into Italy by the way of Verona, an Army of Swiſſers and Germans, with MAXIMILIAN SFORCE the ſonne of Duke LEWES, to recouer the ſtate of Milan which was his fathers. MAXIMILIAN SFORCE entering Italie, and being come to Verona, ioyning with the Spaniſh Army, and with thoſe which were in league with the Pope, the French were ſtricken with ſuch fear, that the Cardinall of Saint Croſſe, and the reſt of the Councell of Piſa (which had withdrawne themſelues to Milan) with all ſpeed poſſible departing thence, fled into France: and MONSIEVR DE LA PALISSE the French Generall, leauing ſuch garriſons as hee thought good in the Caſtles of Milan and Breſcia, and other Towns in Lombardy, abandoning the City, retired to Pauia; and the enemy coming thither, he departed from thence, and went alſo into France. And ſo MAXIMILIAN SFORCE, in ſhort ſpace recouering the Duchy of Milan, was with great ioy (through the Emperors aid and fauour) receiued into the City: to whom preſently came Ambaſſadors from Genoa to do him honour, and to congratulate his return: for, the Genoais then rebelling againſt the French, and hauing choſen them a Duke, beſieged the Caſtle of the Lantern, which was at the French deuotion. In the proceſſe of his war, the King of Nauarre, for that he held with the French King againſt the Emperor, againſt the Pope, and the King of Caſtile, and would not giue paſſage to the Spaniſh Armies, was bereaued of his Kingdome; and the Kings of Caſtile poſſeſs the ſame vnto this day.

After theſe things, and other which ſucceeded, in the beginning of the yeer, vpon the three and twentith day of February, in Rome Pope IVLIO died, in the tenth yeer of his Papacy; and in his place was choſen IOHN, Cardinall de Medicis, who beeing taken at the rout of Rauenna, and afterwards ſet at liberty, was called LEO the Tenth: in the beginning of whoſe Papacy, the French King, the Lord of Tremouille, and the Duke of Albania, with a great Army came into Lombardy againſt MAXIMILIAN Duke of Milan; who with aid from the Emperor and the Swiſſers, coming to a battell neer to Nouarra (where his father was taken priſoner) obtained the victory, with the death, ouerthrowe, and impriſonment of many of them: ſo as he, driuing the French out of that Duchy, remained Lord thereof in peace.

Preſently after this in the ſame yeere, the Emperor (reſoluing to let the French King know that he had committed an error, in not keeping the peace made and concluded with him) came to a compoſition with HENRY the Eight King of England (who was enemie to the French King) to enter France, and to make warre againſt him: for performance of which conditions, the King of England came to Calis; and entring France, the Emperour with his Army came and ioyned with him: and although the French King durſt not fight in battaile, yet there paſſed many notable skirmiſhes betweene them: and notwithſtanding that the King of England lay two moneths before Terrouenne, yet the French King in all that ſpace not daring to come to free it, the towne was conſtrained to yeelde: and ſo the King after the taking of ſome other places, went to Tourney, which he battered with ſuch fury, that it yeelded, together with the Caſtles and other townes neere adiacent; whereof the King of England being Lord, made great ſpoyle in the countrey, without finding any Army in the field to make head againſt him. The Emperour in like manner by another way, ſent VDALRICK Duke of Wittembergh, with great troupes of Swiſſers into Burgundy; who beſieging Dijon, and hauing brought it to that diſtreſſe as it was thought the prouince would haue been loſt; the Swiſſers (according to the accuſtomed manner) in conſideration of one hundred thouſand Ducats, ſent them by the French King, and moued with the hope of a promiſed greater ſumme, raiſing the ſiege, returned home to their houſes, maugre the Duke of Wittembergh their Generall: who with his people ſeeing himſelfe abandoned, returned alſo into his countrey. It likewiſe happened, that whileſt the King of England made warre in France, the King of Scots (through the inſtigation of the French King) entred England; againſt whom in perſon came KATHERINE Queene of England, accompanied by ſome of the Nobility and Commons of that Realme, and fighting with the Scots (notwithſtanding that the victory was very doubtful and vnequall, by reaſon of the great multitude of them) yet their King was ſlaine in the battaile: and the Scots not daring any longer to hold the field, returned home; and the Engliſh entring Scotland, took certaine places there, in ſuch ſort that the King of England through his wiues meanes in England, and the Emperors ayde in France, returned victorious into his countrey. And the Emperour, for that his preſence was very requiſit in Germany did the like; for in Wormes was much debate and contention betweene the eſtates Eccleſiaſtical and Secular. There was alſo great controuerſie between WILLIAM and LEWES, Dukes of Bauiere, the Emperors Nephewes, the ſons of his brother in-law ALBERT. Whereupon the Emperour went to them, and in ſome ſort mitigating the contention, brought them to be in peace. In the ſame yeere 1513, the Venecians made a league with the French King, which was effected by meanes of BARTHELMEVV D'ALVIANO their Generall, who was taken priſoner by the King, and ANDREVV GRITTI a Venecian gentleman, who was afterwards one of the moſt excellent Dukes that hath been in Venice, who likewiſe was priſoner.

After this, a peace being concluded betweene England and France, the French King took to wife MARY the King of Englands ſiſter, with whom he liued but a while after his mariage; for he falling extremely ſick, died vpon the firſt day of Ianuary, in the yeere of our Lord 1514. and the 17. of his Raigne; whom ſucceeded the often named FRANCIS Duke of Angulesme, who after his Coronation, procured a league to be made with the Emperour: whereupon the Earle of Naſſaw came to Paris, and ſo a new mariage was concluded between CHARLES who then was Prince of Spaine, and RENATA ſiſter to CLAVDIA the new Queene of France; which Marriage afterwards took no effect. The Emperour conſented, and liked well of the march, as well by reaſon of the troubles he had in Germany, as for the peace and common good which was expected to enſue thereof. And for the better preſeruation of the particular peace made with LADISLAVS King of Hungary & Bohemia, he reſolued to marry his niece MARY to LEWES, the eldeſt ſon of the ſaid King, notwithſtanding that they both were very young: whereupon in Iuly in the yeare 1515. a meeting was appointed to be held in Viena in Auſtria, whither came SIGISMVND King of Poland, LADISLAVS King of Hungary and Bohemia, with his ſonne LEWES, the Emperour, the Dukes of Bauiere, and many other Princes of Germany, where the ſaid LEWES prince of Hungary was betrothed to MARIE the Emperors niece: and it was alſo agreed, that FERDINAND of Caſtile, ſhould marrie with his ſiſter ANNE, which afterwards took effect; who raigned in thoſe kingdomes after the deceaſe of his brother in-law LEWES; which marriages were accompliſhed after the Emperors deceaſe, in the yeer 1521. The French King FRANCIS knowing the Emperor to be enclined to peace, feaſting and banquetting; and hauing a little before confirmed a peace with England, and with the Venecians, as he had alſo done the like with the ſame Emperor; within ſhort ſpace after he leuied a very great Army of Germans, and Lantzknechts, with a reſolution to inuade the Duchie of Milan; and being with his Army paſt the Alps, neere to Turin, he ioyned with his Vncle CHARLES Duke of Sauoy; and then comming to Verſelli, thither came 2000 ſouldiers ſent him by the Genoais, at the requeſt of OCTAVIAN FREGOSO their Duke: from thence he went to Nouarra, which yeelded without aſſault; and paſſing on towards Milan: and knowing that the Duke had an Army of Swiſſers ſent him by the Emperor; and that he intended to giue him battaile, he ſought to haue corrupted the Swiſſers with money, as king LEWES did when he took the ſaid Dukes father; but failing thereof (for it was diſcouered to his enemies) he fought with them betweene Milan and Marinian, neere to a Village called Saint BRIGETS: the battaile was ſo fiercely fought, that before any ſigne of victory, they were ouertaken by the night, which was ſo darke, the Moone being down, that when they left fighting, neither party knew how to retire, and ſo they ſtood all the night armed, expecting the day; which being come they again renewed the battaile: at which time, a rumor was spred ouer the Camp, that BARTHOLOMEVS DALVIANO was at hand with the Venecian Army, and that he had marched all the night to come to ioyne with the French King. Whereupon the Swissers fearing so great succors, fled: and the victory remaining to the French King, a most cruell slaughter was made of the poore Swissers.

GVICHARDINE writes, that the Swissers grew proud of the first daies fight, it being bruited throughout Italie, that they had put the enemies Army to flight, and the King was carefull to prouide for all things fit for his safety. At the breake of day, the Swissers (who not only despised the French Army, but all the forces of Italie vnited) returned to the charge with like fury and rashnesse, and the French entertained them with great valour and discretion: and withall ALVIANO commander of the Venecian forces comming with his light-horse-men, charged the Swissers on the back, so that they despaired of the victory, sounding the retraite, and retyring in good order towards Milan, to the great astonishment of the French men, who durst not follow them. This was one of the most furious battailes that euer was seene in Italie.

The King hauing obtained so notable a victory; Duke MAXIMILIAN abandoning the citie of Milan, withdrew himself into the castle; whereupon the city yeelded to the King, and the other cities did the like. The Duke being besieged and assaulted in the castell, (notwithstanding that the Emperour certified him that he would speedily send him releefe) compounding with the French King for a certaine summe of money, which the king promised to giue him yearely, he resigned the title and state of Milan; and so putting himself into the Kings power, he went into France, where he afterwards dyed. The French King hereupon was receiued into Milan, and into all the other cities without resistance; wherewith the Emperour being much displeased, made preparation for his comming into Italy: whereof the King standing in some doubt, sought to enter into a league with Pope LEO; who seeing him victorious was glad of the match; and appointing to meete him in Bologna, the league was confirmed, which being ended, the King returning into France left the Duke of Bourbon with his Army in the state of Milan.

The French King inpossession of the Duchie of Milan.

At this time vpon the fiue and twentith day of Ianuary in the yeare 1516, dyed King FERDINAND in Madril neere to Guadalupe in Spaine; and to the gouernment of those kingdomes they called CHARLES, (who was afterwards Emperor, being then but sixteene yeeres old) who went thither the yeere following. The Duchy of Milan being conquered by the French King, in such manner as is said, within few dayes after the Emperor MAXIMILIAN by the way of Verona, came into Italy with so florishing an Army, that he would haue bin glad to haue met the French King: and the Duke of Bourbon in Lombardy not daring to keepe the field against him, shut vp himselfe in Milan: the Emperour finding no resistance, held on his way vntill hee came before the citie, and besieged it: which together with all the rest had been soone recouered, if he could haue staied some while in the country; but the treasure and reuenues of this great Captaine, were not sufficient to maintaine the warres which he vndertooke, and to pay the ordinarie troupes which he should neede in the action; which was the occasion that he that he oftentimes lost great occasions. Besides this, LADISLAVS King of Hungary falling sicke and dying, there arose after his decease, such discord, that to establish peace in that kingdome, and for the defence thereof against Turke, the Emperour was sent for; for LEWIS, sonne to the deceased King, was but a child of little more then thirteene yeares old: wherefore being constrained to leaue the wars of Milan, and to returne into Germany, the French King continued in possession of that Duchy for a time; as you shall heare.

The Emperour vpon so vrgent occasion being come into Germany, could hardlie keepe the peace in Hungary: the occasion whereof was, for that King LADISLAVS before his death nominated for tutors and gouernours for his son, in the kingdomes of Hungary, and Bohemia, the Emperor MAXIMILIAN, and his owne brother SIGISMVND, King of Poland: wherewith the Hungars were very much discontent, for they stood in feare that these two Princes would haue practised to haue had those kingdomes to themselues. But as the Emperours intent was but for the good of the countrie, so he took not so great care to haue the gouernment, as he did that those Kingdomes should be gouerned with equitie, and for the defence of Hungary against the Turk, which was put in effect so long as he liued: for he gaue the gouernment to certaine great personages of those Kingdomes: but not without great difficultie and trouble; which plainly appeared, by the the calamities which ensued in those kingdoms after his decease.

A

A hundred yeers were now past since the conclusion of the Councel of Constance, when IOHN HVSS foretold would come a fatal change in the Romane Hierarchie, which no fury nor fire should bee able to preuent. Wherefore this yeare 1517, MARTIN LVTHER an Augustin Friar, began to impugne the Popes trade of Indulgences, the which were carried about in Germany to be sold for little money, (vnder the title of ALBERT Archbishop of Magdeburg) by TICELIVS an impudent sycophant. LVTHER being moued with his wicked Sermons published certain propositions concerning Indulgences: against whom TICELIVS did spett out his poyson, and burnt his propositions, which forced LVTHER to write more copiously for the defence of the truth; yet in the beginning he did not wholly reiect Indulgences, but desired some reformation. The Elector FREDERICK Duke of Saxony hauing read LVTHERS writings and duly considered of his authorities, fauoured and supported his doctrine, neither could he be diuerted with any terror or threats, being straightly inioyned by MAXIMILIAN and CHARLES Emperours and by the Bishops of Rome not to graunt LVTHER any place to teach in: yet he would not of himselfe iudge of his doctrine, but craued the opinions of many learned men. And among others calling ERASMVS of Roterdam vnto him, he said that he had rather the earth should swallow him vp, then he would adhere to any false opinions, intreating him earnestly to deliuer his iudgement freely. To whom ERASMVS answered pleasantly, that LVTHER had committed two great sinnes, he had been to busie with the Monks bellies, and with the Popes Crowne, but he added seriously, that LVTHER had iustly taxed the errors, and that reformation in the Church was necessary, and that his doctrine was true, but he wisht more mildnesse in his proceedings. After which there were many disputations touching diuers points of doctrine held by the Church of Rome, which LVTHER did impugne, whereof diuers haue written, and diuersly, to whom I will referre the impartiall Reader.

At this time also it behoued the Emperour to take order for the going of his Nephew CHARLES King of Spaine into his Countrey: by reason whereof, he was constrained to giue eare to a new peace motioned by the French King, which was concluded; and it was also decreed that CHARLES King of Spaine should take to wife the daughter of King LEWIS. This friendship and alliance being made (although the marriage tooke no effect) King CHARLES taking shipping sayled into Spaine, where he arriued the nineteenth of September, in the yeer 1517. And so Peace being between the Emperor and the French King, and generally through all Christendome, he spent the rest of his time in ministring iustice, and reforming the lawes and customes of the Empire; and so liued in peace and good estate.

This yeere one thousand fiue hundred eighteene, the Emperor called a great and his last assembly of the Princes of Augusta (where they treated of the Turkish warres, for Selim, hauing ruined the Sultans of Egypt) strooke a great terror into all the Princes of the Christian World) and desired to settle the succession of the Romane Empire vpon one of his Nephewes, which he wished might haue been FERDINAND the yonger brother, thinking it better for the supporting of the honor of his house if two personages were great, then one alone: but being otherwise perswaded by some about him, and by the Cardinall of Syon, he commends his Nephew CHARLES to the Princes Electors, who could not be chosen King of the Romanes in his life time, for that he had not receiued the Imperiall Crowne from the Pope. After this he was taken with a Dissenteria, which bereaued him of his life vpon the twelfth day of Ianuary, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred nineteene, being of the age of nine and fifty yeers (as saith CVSPINIAN) and after others, threescore and three, and in the fiue and twentith yeer of his raign.

The death of the Emperor Maximilian.

Thus haue I briefly past ouer the great acts of this Emperor (for as I said in the beginning of his life) if I should at large haue described his prowesse and excellency, I should haue been driuen to haue run a long race, and haue needed an excellent wit and much eloquence, wherefore I know my selfe as naked and destitute, as this Prince was abundant in all vertue: for he was so bountifull, that if he had been Lord of all the rents and reuenues of the World, he would haue needed them, considering his gifts and expences, according to the greatnesse of his mind; and notwithstanding that what he had was great, yet was it euer too little in regard of his liberality. He was endued with such magnanimitie, that he neuer was seen to be timorous what danger soeuer he were in; and therewith was one of the most redoubted Princes in the World: he was very deuout, and as he liued so he died, he was of a most singular wit, and sound iudgement, as well in Peace as in Warre: and notwithstanding that he was well able to counsell others, yet he neuer disdained to aske and take counsell of such as he thought loued him, and were able able to giue him counsell. And as he loued learning, and learned men, so he gaue great gifts and pensions to such as were well seen in the Liberall Sciences: and it grieued him much that he had not in his youth been instructed in good Letters, and in the pure elegant Latine tongue; for as he had a barbarous schoole-master, so was that which he learned of him; yet he afterwards, hauing many learned men in his Court, came to the knowledge of many things. He was naturally enclined to Poesie, so as he compiled a notable peece of worke in his own vulgar tongue, of the many dangers wherein he had been, and another booke called the price of honour. Besides his excellent wit, he was of a wonderfull memorie: for whosoeuer had once conferred with him about any businesse, although in long time after he came not into his presence, yet as soon as he should see him he would know him.

He was so honest and bashfull as it was strange, for he neuer consented that any one should see him naked; neither did he at any time take the Vrinall to make water, in the presence of any Chamberlaine or Page, or any such like thing; neither would he permit that any should see his Vrine, except some fewe very excellent Physicians. He was of an excellent and strong complexion, and was seldome sick, and then but lightly; whereto this was a great help, in that he was very temperate in his diet; yet he kept a very bountifull table, and did take his meate so neately and comely as it was a pleasure to behold him. He could so well endure trauaile, that heate, cold, hunger, thirst, or any other want or discommodity did little annoy him. He much exercised his person in bearing Armes, especially at Tilt and Tourney, besides the warres and battailes wherein he fought in person; and aboue all he was exceeding milde and courteous in his behauiour towards Princes, and towards all his seruants and familiars; and was so friendly to those which had to deale with him; that with his looks and countenance he wonne their hearts, which put them out of the feare and bashfulnesse wherein they were, by reason of his presence: for which excellencies and other which I leaue to write, he attained to be the most honoured Prince of his time, and was both obeyed and beloued through the whole Empire, and saw all his sonnes and Nephewes Lords of the greatest part of Christendome. After his death CHARLES the Fift was chosen Emperor, whose great wars and acts require a more eloquent and exact writer.

THE LIFE OF CHARLS, THE FIFT OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND FIFTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

The descent of the Emperor Charles the Fift.

THE Author, writing the life of this famous Emperor, passeth ouer his memorable acts cursorily, both for that (as he saith) they were then fresh in memory, as also they were related at large by GVICHARDINE, IOVIVS, and other Writers. But, holding it an indignity don to so noble a Prince, to neglect him more in the writing of his life than other his Predecessors, or to send the Reader to seek satisfaction from other Authors, I am bould somewhat to enlarge the History of his life.

The Emperor CHARLES was by his fathers side of the Imperiall House of Austria; and by his mother he descended from the antient Kings of Spain; and his grandmother by his father, was of the house of France, in this manner: CHARLES the Fift, King of France, surnamed the Wise, gaue the Country of Burgundy by to his yonger brother PHILIP. From PHILIP, who had to wife the onely daughter of LEWES Earl of Flanders, descended IOHN, who was father to PHILIP which begat CHARLES the Hardy, Duke of Burgundy; whose warres with LEWES the Eleuenth, King of France, are written by PHILIP de Comines, Lord of Argenton. This CHARLES, being slain at the battell of Nancy, left his onely daughter the Lady MARY, heir to his whole estate: this MARY was married to MAXIMILIAN the Emperour, father to PHILIP; which PHILIP took to wife the Lady IOAN, the daughter of the Kings of Castile and Arragon, and by her he had the Emperor CHARLES the Fift. And forasmuch as FERDINAND King of Castile had neuer a son, hee adopted his son-in-law PHILIP for his sonne; who, after the decease of his father-in-law FERDINAND, became King of Spain: and by these meanes the house of Austria obtained the dominions of Burgundy, Flanders and Spain. As for his mother, her grandfather FERDINAND, King of Spain, had to wife the Lady ISABELL, the onely daughter of IOHN the Second, King of Castile; and after the conquest of Naples, he gat by her IOHN, ISABELL, IOAN, MARY and CATHERINE; but IOHN and ISABELL dying without issue, the succession of the Kingdome, by the lawes of Spain, came to IOAN, as to the eldest of them; but Austria, by the diuision of the inheritance, came to FERDINAND brother to CHARLES the Fift; which FERDINAND was afterwards Emperor also, and father to the Emperor MAXIMILIAN the Second.

The birth of the Emperor Charles.

CHARLES was born in Gaunt, a City of Flanders, vpon Saint MATTHIAS day, being the foure and twentith of February, in the yeer 1500: which day was noted to be euer very fortunate vnto him; considering that vpon that day many accidents hapned to him in sundry parts of the world, and he obtained vpon that day honourable victories; as by his actions, written by GVICHARDINE and IOVIVS, plainly appeareth. Being come to yeers of discretion, although but a youth (for, his father, dying, left him but sixteen yeers old) he was sent to Mecklin, a citie in Brabant, to school, his Masters name was ADRIAN of Florence; then whom, none in all that prouince was more famous, for many qualities, as the issue of his life made manifest; for he becam a Cardinall, and afterwards being made Pope, after the death of LEO the tenth, was called ADRIAN the Sixt. But in his exercise of armes he was instructed by CHARLES de Cheures, a valiant man at arms in that Age. It seemeth that hee profited little in learning, yet hee attained to the Spanish, Dutch, and French tongues, the Latin tongue he vnderstood somwhat grossely. Three bookes onely hee loued to reade, which hee caused to be translated into his owne vulgar tongue; of which, one was the Institution of a ciuill life, which was the Courtier of the Earle BALTASAR de Castilione; the other was of matters of state, which was the Prince, with the discourse of MACHIAVEL: the third was the Order of Knighthood, which was the historie of POLIBIVS. But he most delighted in armes, which besides religion, are the foundation of kingdomes; and hee more esteemed the warres then any man in the world. Hee was skilfull in the managing of Artillery, and very expert in the marshalling of an armie, and lodged the same very skilfully, and knew all the meanes and deuices how to batter and assault a City: so as all his attempts, or the greatest part which he vndertook, might well haue good successe. The constitution of his body was neither fat nor grosse, but of a gallant proportion and strongly sinued. His hands were great and strong, fit to wield weapons and to manage Armes. His legs were straight and of a due proportion, which chiefly appeared when he was on horseback: for, he rode with such majesty when he was armed, and managed his horse so gallantly, that it seemed no gallanter Knight could be found, or more fit to bear Arms than himself. Hee was of a fair complexion, with cleer azured eies, which (although he were angry) were not terrible, but accompanied with a graue bashfulnes and manly modesty. Hee was somewhat hook-nosed, after the manner of the antient Kings of Persia, which was a signe of the greatnes of his minde. He had a long chin, and a yellow beard: his hair was yellow of the color of gold, after the vse of the antient Emperors of Rome. It was thought by those which were wise, that neuer was man of better constitution, better aduised, or of riper judgement than he: for, with a certain motion which accompanied his speeches, he made men to wonder at his proceedings. He was very curteous in discourse, but double; so as his speeches might haue diuerse constructions; and so he euer saued himself by the interpretation, fitting it to his purpose; alleaging, that his meaning was to be vnderstood in this and in this manner. He was neuer throughly angry; but telling the truth, and grounding his speeches vpon reason, he satisfied the hearers. He was neuer ouer-hasty in his answers: for, he first consulted, and then concluded; but the conclusion must depend of him onely. He made great account of those which might either pleasure sure, or annoy him; but made no shew thereof in outward apparance, to the end to maintaine his reputation in greatnes. He was neither bloody nor vindicatiue vpon his enemies, but reformed them without ruine.

He seldome punished his seruants and officers, but vpheld them in their defects. And although that by his enemies he was noted of cruelty, in the matters of Rome, and in the death of the children of France, yet was he milde and pittifull, and they of malice slander him wrongfully. As for his friends which were made great by him, he constantly maintained them, and would not endure to heare them ill spoken of; giuing more credit to his owne iudgement then to other mens reports; reputing them to speake of enuy or malice. He was an earnest defendor of his Ambassadours, notwithstanding that they did ought that were not tolerable; for he loued to haue good intelligence, and knew all that passed in all parts of the World. He vsed to discourse of his affaires the space of foure or fiue houres together, and wrote downe the reasons pro & contra, the better to consider thereof; and his arguments were so well compounded, and all of one poize, that who so vnderstood the beginning of the matter, might presently comprehend the end thereof.

He knew the naturall inclination of those Princes with whom he had to deale, and spent much money to haue full notice of them; by reason whereof, he negociated with them, with liuely reasons and sound arguments, and not with generalities; and had his busines in all parts in readines, attending oportunity & fit occasion to put them in execution: Hence it grew, that in regard of his affaires, he was mortified in all his pleasures: concerning the lawes, he was iust, and made profession to maintain and hold his word, and to preferre his honour before all things in the World; wherefore whosoeuer desired to get his fauour, was to vse the meanes of honor, and of modesty, with shew of Religion: whereto he was so much addicted, as he communicated foure times in the yeere. He was very patient in hearing causes, and gaue audience aswell to the meane as the great, with much attention: and notwithstanding that he was slow to resolue of his owne affaires, aswell as of other mens; yet he concluded very prudently. But he that will blame him may say, that he was remisse and irresolute; and he that will commend him may affirm, that he was well aduised and politick.

Touching his liberality, he was held rather niggardly and sparing, then bountifull; especially towards his seruants, whom he entertained with hope many yeers; but when he did reward, if enough were enough, he gaue enough; for he had great meanes to giue, of the three orders of Knight-hood which are in Spaine, besides Bishopricks, Abbeys, Titles, Offices, and other reuenues: neuertheless, it seemed that in giuing he much more fauoured the Flemmings then the Spaniards or Italians. He was bountifull to such Captaines as serued him in the wars, and to such as he loued; but it came but slowly. He made shew to loue peace, and not to desire wars, but when he was prouoked. Briefly, he gaue example for all to follow, and abstained from all such vices as might staine his Conscience, or good name. He effected great matters by negociation, wherein he was more then in Armes; notwithstanding that in Armes he was inuincible and peerlesse.

He rose late in the morning, and after he was ready (clad in no better then in silke, or cloath, close made, more like a priuate Gentleman then a great Lord, but yet very neately) he heard a priuate Masse for the soule of the Empresse; and then gaue audience and dispatched much businesse; then going out of his chamber, he heard another Masse openly in a Chappell, which being ended, he went to dinner: Wherupon they vsed this prouerb in his Court, From Masse to Messe.

He was a great feeder, and did eate such things as did breede grosse and viscous humors, wherof proceeded the Gowte, and the Ptisick; which infirmities in his later daies greatly tormented him, especially the Gowt; which was of so maligne a condition, that it sent the vapour thereof from the stomack into the head, which put him often in danger of his life, which he assured himself could not be long: but yet when he was wel, he made small reckoning of Physicians, as though he should neuer be sick againe. He did eate little at night, thinking to make amends for disordering himselfe at noone. After dinner he gaue audience, and sometime retiring himselfe into some secret place, he passed the time in drawing the plot of some fortresse, or other edifice; but most commonly he vsed to iest with a Polonian dwarfe which he had, or with one ADRIAN a groome of his chamber; and often with the Baron of Monfalcon Steward of his house, in whose company he took great delight, for his ready and quick wit. He sometimes rode on hunting, not with aboue eight or ten horse at the most, and returned oftentimes times with a brace of stagges, or wilde Boares. And sometimes he vsed to shoote at Pigions, at Choughs, and such like birds; and in all these his disports he spent not an hundred crownes in the yeere; so much did he applie himselfe to matters of importance. He vsed the like sparing in cladding his court, in his table, in the furniture of his house, and such other ornaments; insomuch that if in trussing himselfe a poynt brake, he would tie it together, and keepe it, not to lose so much time as till another were fetcht. His sparing was such, that there was no man that spent tenne crownes by the yeere, but spent more then he: but for other expences, passing through other mens hands, he did as other Princes doe, which referre the same to other mens trust; yet he vsed all possible diligence to vnderstand euery particular, and would know how his money was issued, euen to a crowne; so carefull was he for what was his. The vertues and faire conditions of this Prince, together with his power, excelling all the Princes of his time, moued the Electors in Germany to create him Emperor.

But before we come to relate what his actions were after he came to the Empire, it shall not be impertinent to make a breefe repetition of the most memorable accidents which happened in his kingdomes of Spaine. FERDINAND King of Arragon dying, left Queene IOANE his onely daughter to succeed him in all his Realmes and estates: CHARLES Archduke of Austria and Earle of Flanders her eldest son was to inherit all those great estates after her; by reason of whose absence and the Queenes disability (being possessed with a melancholy humor) FERDINAND thinking that Prince CHARLES would not come in person to gouerne the Realmes of Spaine, was desirous to appoint FERDINAND his Nephew, brother to Prince CHARLES (whom he loued dearely, hauing beene bred vp with him) to gouerne those Realmes, for his daughter Queene IOANE; but he was diuerted by the wise aduice of some of his Councell, shewing the inconueniences that might ensue: wherupon he nominated Cardinall FRANCIS XIMENES of Cisneros for gouernour, vntill the comming of Prince CHARLES; giuing great testimonies of his fidelity and loialty: who tooke vpon him the gouernment of Castile, with the consent of all the Councell, and Nobility; onely the ministers of the Infant DON FERDINAND, sought to haue him intrude himselfe into the gouernment of affaires.

The death of Ferdinand King of Arragon.

The first care of Cardinall XIMENES was to make an accord with Doctor ADRIAN of Florence who had been Shoole-Maister to Prince CHARLES, hauing bin sent Ambassadour from him to King FERDINAND, touching some negotiation; but with secret authority, that the King dying he should take vpon him the gouernement of Castile; but the Cardinal and he made an accord that vntil they had other newes from Prince CHARLES, they should ioyntly signe all dispatches.

Accord for the gouernment of Castile.

The Cardinal with the Councell remaining at Madrid, there grew some tumult in Andalusia, the head wherof was DON PEDRO GIRON eldest son to the Earle of Vregna, who entred the Duke of Medina Sidonia's country with forces, pretending a title to the whole Duchie: which tumult the Cardinall sought to suppresse, proclaiming them troublers of the publike peace and guilty of high Treason, wherewith DON PEDRO GIRON retired for a time; But soone after he returned to his first frenzey, being countenanced and supported by DON FERNANDES of Velasco, Constable of Castile, by the Duke of Benauent, the Duke of Albaquerque, by the Earle of Medina Celi, the Bishop of Segutnea, with diuerse others, who hating the Cardinall entered into a faction: But by the wise aduice of of the Duke of Infantazgo (whom they sought to haue drawne vnto them) and by the constant resolution of the Cardinal these practices died; and they returned vnto their first obedience, the greatest of them seeking to insinuate themselues into the Cardinalls fauour.

A tumult in Andalusia.

This wise Cardinall knowing that he might be croft in the gouernment of affaires, by the Nobility which did both hate and enuy him, he sought to procure from King CHARLES Letters patents for the confirmation of his authority, and that hee might haue free liberty in matters of state to doe what he should thinke profitable for the safety of the kingdomes; requiring the like authority ouer iustice and the treasure; but before the dispatch of these Letters patents, he put one thing in execution which bred some alteration in the State.

The Cardinall after the death of King FERDINAND ordained for the defence of the Realme, aswell against forraine inuaders, as home-bred rebels, Legions and bands of soldiers taken out of the citizens and Burgesses of the good townes of Spaine, men of good fame, hauing both house and family. Some seditious men and desirous of innouation were much scandalyzed at this edict, and many townes began to oppose themselues against the execution therof, but especially specially at Vailledolit, where they took Armes against Cardinal XIMINES as against an enemy, offering violence to his officers who were sent to make the inrolments, wherein they were animated by the Admirall of Castile who had some hereditary rights in the gouernment of the towne, and the Bishop of Astorgia who had been Schoole-Master to the infant, Don FERDINAND. These alterations did much trouble the Cardinal; yet would he not procede rigorously against them vntill that he had receiued approbation from King CHARLES, the which was sent him the yeere following; so as at the comming of these Letters into Spaine, the inhabitants of all the mutinous townes, submitted themselues and gaue over their factions.

A tumult at Malaga.

In the yeere 1517 there grew a mutiny in Malaga against the officers of the Admiralty, the townesmen being desirous to free themselues from that iurisdiction, pretending that it did but hinder the course of iustice, and giue way to ill liuers, to auoid deserued punishment. This multitude of Malaga hauing no patience to attend an answere from King CHARLES of Austria, did tumultuously chase away the iudges, and defaced all the markes of the Admiralty in their towne and iurisdiction. The Admiral of Castile complained to the Cardinal and Councel, who sought by admonitions and threats to suppresse the fury of this people: but they persisted stil in Armes and planted the Artillery vpon their walles. But the Cardinall seeing no milde courses could preuaile, sent 6000 of his legionary foot and 400 horse against them, vnder the command of Don ANTONIO de la Cueua, vpon whose approach the Malagins fainted, and sued for mercy: whereof the Cardinal being aduertised, he commanded him to procede with mildnes and clemency, preseruing the Kings honour and dignity; So as there were fiue of the chiefe authors of this sedition hanged and the rest pardoned.

The state of Queene Ioane of Castile mother to King Charles.

Cardinall XIMENES was much troubled with the pitifull estate of IOANE Queene of Castile; for this Princesse being possest with a sharpe melancholy humor led a most lamentable life in the Castle of Iordesillas whereas King FERDINAND her father had lodged her, being a very pleasant place: yet LEVVES FERRIER of Valencia who had the chrge of her could neuer get her to lodge in any wel-aired chamber, but she would still lurk in some dark place neere the ground, fit to entertaine her melancholy. She did abhorre soft beds, and would ly vpon the ground, or vpon a boord couered with a carpet by importunity. They could not get her to weare a furred gowne in winter, nor any thing that was rich: She was many times three daies together without eating, complaining often, that she was kept like a prisoner, and that they withheld her from the gouernment of affaires like a priuate person. The Cardinall was much grieued hereat: and somewhat to redresse it, holding that the negligence of LEVVES FERRIER did feed the malice of her infirmity, he remoued him, putting in his place FERDINAND DVCA of Talauera, a man nobly borne and wise, who by his discretion in a short time did moderate this violent humor in the Queene, getting her to be content to haue her chamber made cleane, which grew vnsauory by reason of the meate which she would not suffer them to carry away, and by little and little he perswaded her to ly in a bed and to goe abroad to Church, and he made her to haue some feeling and apprehension that she was a Queen, and so acknowledged. And in time he made her familiar and brought her to a more mild and humane kind of life: The which did much please K. CHARLS her son, who thanked Cardinal XIMENES by his Letters.

Cardinall Ximenes impatient of iniuries.

Cardinall XIMENES found many crosses and oppositions in his gouernment: yet he was so impatient of any iniury, as whatsoeuer King CHARLES ordeined touching the affaires of Spaine, if it proceeded not from him and his counsell, he held it done in contempt of him, and condemned it as a subiect of sedition; accusing the Noblemen & Councel of Flanders of rashnes, who being ignorant of the manners of the Spaniards meddled with the gouernment, the which did wholly depend of the Viceroyes authority & of the kings Councel which was in the countrey: he did much honour ADRIAN FLORENT who was ioyned with him in the gouernment: for that he yeelded vnto him.

The Spaniards who are by nature hauty and proud, could not long indure the integrity of Cardinall XIMENES, neither were they well pleased with the Flemmings, who entertaining the King in Flanders were too busie with the affaires of Spaine, so as all things tended there to a combustion. But to preuent all disorders which were feared by reason of the Kings absence, it was resolued to send the Lord of Chaux thither to haue the third place in the gouernment with Cardinall XIMENES, and Doctour ADRIAN, who had formerly beene the principall cause of his sending; for that (as he said) he was not sufficient to resist Cardinall XIMENES a hauty man, who did manage all things at his pleasure, and could in no sort indure any companion; His comming was very pleasing to the the Noble-men and people of Spain, who were much discontented with the Cardinall; and they all went forth to receiue him with great honour, being the first that euer had been sent into Spain with authority, since CHARLES of Austria took vpon him the title of King. But the Cardinall maintained his authority resolutely, and held still the first place in all dispatches; as may well appear by that which follows: for, the other two hauing on a time signed certain Letters, leauing a space for the Cardinall to signe vnder them; he tore them in pieces, causing others to be made to the same effect, which he signed aboue: and thus he continued vntill the Kings coming. It was often resolued in Flanders to haue sent some great man into Spain to manage the gouernment, and to check the sowre and harsh disposition of the Cardinall. LEVVES Count Palatine was propounded both to take charge of the State, and of the Infant D. FERDINAND: but the Cardinall could indure no corriuall, beseeching the King by his Letter, not to send any one into Spain with whom he must bee in continuall quarell; but rather to giue him leaue to retire himself to his Diocesse, where he would liue religiously in peace, foreseeing that many would seek malitiously to crosse his good designs to serue the Common-weal; they hauing no other end but to breed some great tumults in Spain, hee desired not to bee engaged therein, but rather to be a spectator; aduertising the King, that the onely means to preuent all dangers, was, To commit the whole affairs of the estates gouernment to his tried faith, and to rely wholly vpon him, seeking to diuide the royall Soueraignty betwixt the King and himself: for, he said the Flemings vnderstood nothing in the affairs of Spain, and the King for his tender age could not vndergo so many cares: but the Cardinals proud courses bred him much hatred.

The King much desired in Spain.

The King was greatly desired in Spain by the Nobility, who thought thereby to supplant the Cardinall in his gouernment: and this voyage was much pressed by the Emperor MAXIMILIAN, who held it very necessary; and to that end came to see the King at Bruxelles, and to conferre with him, fearing that his long stay in the Low Countries would breed some alteration in the state of Spain, where he was much desired. This conference bred some iealousie in the Cardinall; who wrote, that the enterview of great men did neuer bring profit to themselues, nor to their affairs. The Spaniards, seeing the time spent in vain hopes of their King's coming, began to growe into mutinies, making great complaints of the greedinesse of the Flemings, who disposed of the affairs, and wasted the Kings treasure, transporting it out of the Realm. Many of the best Towns of Spain, being incensed with these complaints, sought how to preuent the disorders, and to curb the greedinesse of the Flemmish Courtiers. The Cardinall and Councell, knowing well, that what the Towns had desired was just, yet fearing some popular tumults, they perswaded them to forbear all Assemblies till there were certain newes of the Kings coming, who they vnderstood made preparation to imbark speedily: and in the mean time they aduertised the King of what had past. But the Cardinall and Councell were again importuned for an assembly of the States, promising onely to solicite the King to come into Spaine, to maintain the lawes and customes of the Country, and to reform such disorders as were crept in; or else the people did protest to send Ambassadors to the King, and to prouide that the Common-weal should take no prejudice. The Cardinall could not refuse their just demand, appointing the Assembly in September 1517, hoping by that time the King would be arriued in Spain; hauing to that end sent him a fleet of ships, and sending Post daily to aduance his coming, the onely means to maintain peace: for, the Cardinall held it a dangerous thing when as people (hauing cause of grieuance) presume to complain publiquely: for hauing once lost the respect due to the magistrate, there is no more any restraint; and popular complaints are easily believed by such as haue a desire to trouble the State.

Exactions of Pope Leo hindred by Cardinall Ximenes.

Pope LEO about this time, by vertue of a decree made in the Councell of Lateran, demanded the tenth of all the reuenues of the Clergy, vpon colour to defend the Christian religion against Infidels; fot that SELIM, Emperor of the Turks, threatned Christendome, and especially Italie: whereupon the Pope sent out his Bulls to exact this mony for three yeers, with many indulgences to such as should contribute willingly. The Clergy complaind heerof to Cardinall XIMENES, being at Toledo; who vndertook their protection, and by his authoritie (which was great with the Pope) freed them from that exaction.

Violence committed by the Duke of Infantago.

At one Instant there were three of the greatest Noble-men of Spain conspired together against the Cardinall vpon sundry discontents; which were, the Duke of Infantazgo, the Duke of Alua, and the Earl of Vregna: The Duke of Infantazgo had offred violence to a Promoter sent by the Cardinall touching some proceeding at Guadalajara, threatning to hang him. The Cardinall gaue it out, that he would call the Duke in question, for that he had violated religion, and broken the publike peace: and the Duke, desirous to braue the Cardinall, sent a Chaplain of his vnto him, with a message full of disgracefull reproaches and vain threats. To whom the Cardinall (hearing him quietly without any alteration) answerd, Go back to thy master, whom thou shalt finde repenting the foolish words which thou hast deliuerd: and in truth before his return, the Dukes choler was past, and he very sorry for his rashnes; but he was afterwards reconciled to the Cardinall by the Constable of Velasco.

The Earl of Pregnas excesse was of a higher strain: for, Don GVTTIERRE of Quixada hauing a suite against him for the restitution of Villafratte, a Town neer to Vailledolit; and certain officers of justice coming thither by order of the Court to put him in possession, they were outraged & beaten by RODERIGO GIRON the Earls sonne, BERNARDIN of Velasco the Constables sonne, BERTRAVD de la Cueua sonne to the Duke of Albuquergue, FERDINAND HENRIQVES son to the Admirall, with other ill aduised yong Noble-men then present. The Court being much incensed heerat (the Bishop of Malaga being President) commanded certain legionary souldiers to arm to assist justice, and to punish those rebels, getting himself in person towards the place. The Constable, foreseeing the danger, posted thither before, and caused them to giue way to the Sentence of the Court: for which good office, the Bishop of Malaga gaue thanks to the Constable, and dismist his souldiers. But the Cardinall was not so tractable, but sent out his warrant to apprehend these yong Noble-men; who, seeing him proceed criminally against them, returned to their old frenzy, putting themselues again into Villafratte, meaning to keep it. This businesse tended to sedition, many blaming the Cardinals seuerity, wherby the whole Realm might be drawn into combustion: but the Cardinall held it a glory to oppose himself against great men, seeking such occasions ambitiously to shew his magnanimity & courage. Finally, they proceeded against these young Noble-men by course of justice; and their names were proclaimed, and they cited to appear and to giue an account of the action.

The court of Parliament violated.

The Fathers of these young men were much troubled: who knowing the Cardinalls power and sowre disposition, resolued to pacify him by all faire meanes, sending to intreat him to haue regard vnto the youth of their children, complaining notwithstanding by their letters vnto the King of the Cardinalls harsh disposition, whereby Spaine was filled with combustions; The Cardinall in like manner did aggrauate this action vnto the King, complayning of the disobedience and contempt of these Noblemen, who made many assemblies tending to some great tumult: But in the meane time, they proceeded against them, that were within Villafratte, who fearing the Viceroyes power, left the place and dislodged by night. The towne was by sentence condemned to be burned, and the ground to bee sowed with salt: And the Earle of Pregna with his sonne and their other confederats were conuicted of high treason, which sentence was presently put in execution: The towne was burnt to Ashes and feauen of the inhabitants publikely whipt. This seuerity bred great hatred against the Cardinall. But the Admirall HENRIQVES comming to MADRID, told him with great mildnes, that hee did himselfe wrong, and the whole Realme (being Archbishop of Toledo and Primate so to blemish the honour of the greatest houses of Spaine, so well deseruing, both in these publike executions and in many bad offices which he had done them with the King; perswading him for the good of the Realme, and the kings seruice, to temper his austere behauiour, and to intreat men with more equity, and lesse choler. The Cardinall (with a settled countenance) answered, that hee had neuer sought to winne fauour of Kings or to maintayne his reputation in the world by doing wrong to any, but had euer indeauored to acquit himselfe duly, of the gouerment which had been committed vnto him: neither had hee done any bad offices to the king, as many did maliciously publish.

The Duke of Alua's discontent grewe vpon a suite depending betwixt Don DIEGO, of Toledo his sonne, and D. ANTHONY of Estuniga, brother to the Duke of Beiar, for the Priory of Saint IOHN of Jerusalem. D. ANTHONY, who had it at the first by resignation from his Vncle the which Pope LEO confirmed with consent of King PHILLIP, and now againe hauing sewed at Rome, he had wonne his cause, and gotten letters of execution from the Pope, who recommended him with other fauorable letters to King CHARLES, who sent him into Spaine to Cardinall XIMENES, giuing him charge to sequestrate all the places of the Priory into his hands, commaunding the Duke of Alua and his son to retire their men, and to refer the cause to his compromise, and if they should refuse then to execute the Kings letters, and the sentence. The Duke of Alua was loath to dispossesse himselfe, conceiuing that the Cardinall did not affect his cause; And therefore hee reiected such reasonable conditions as hee offered vnto him him; and falling into choler and rage, he mustred vp his friends and forces, thinking to maintain that by Arms which was not justifieable by law or reason: wherefore the Cardinall, seeing his furious proceeding, was forced to come to the last remedy, calling together his legionary bands, as well to guard and fortifie the counsell and iustice, as to suppresse and disperse the mutinies; of whom they encountred about a thousand foot and some horse, drawne together by the Duke of Alua, and put them to rout. The Duke presently saw his owne errour, imploying the fauour of his best friends for his reconcilement; submitting himself vnto the Cardinall, into whose hands he yeelded vp the Priory: which controuersie was after ended in friendly manner.

This yeer the Inhabitants of Algier (a Town in Affrick) being much afflicted by the dissension of two brethren Moors, who contended for the Signory, they had called vnto them FLORVSCO BARBAROVSSE, a famous Pirat, to defend their liberties; who hauing seized vpon that City, fit for theft and Piracies, he made himselfe king of Algiere, hauing slaine CELIM the lawfull Prince, and then he began to spoile the coasts of Spaine; and to tyrannize ouer the petty Kings of Affrick, of his owne sect, seeking to dispossesse ALBVZRVEN, King of Tunis; whom hauing slaine, he forced IAHIA his sonne to flie into Spaine, who imparting his miseries to Cardinall XIMENES, intreated him to assist him in the recouery of his Kingdome. The Cardinall caused men to be leuied to send against this Pirat BARBAROVSSE, giuing the charge of the Army to DIEGO VERA, a rash and indiscreet man. This Army, beeing about eight thousand strong, came neer vnto Algier in October, the Moores beeing aduertised, and prepared to hinder his landing. The Town was manned with very good souldiers Turks, which HORVSCO had brought with him out of Asia. DIEGO VERA, comming neer the Town, diuided his Army into foure parts, contrary to aduice: for, the Barbarians were in all places stronger than the Spaniards; so as the whole Christian Army was chased and dispersed with great slaughter. DIEGO VERA abandoned all, and hid himself with his sonne among the rocks till the euening; when as he found a vessell lying at anchor, with which hee returned into Spain, with much disgrace and dishonour; the children singing, that DIEGO was too weak to wrastle with HORVSCO, who had but one arme. Cardinall XIMENES made small account of this losse; saying, that by this means Spain should bee purged of a great many of leud insolent companions.

Algier attempted by the Spaniards.

The Cardinall was much importuned to send a fleet into Flanders to transport K. CHARLES into Spain: whereupon he prepared a good number of ships, appointing GOMES of Buiteron for Admirall. He caused the Ports of Biscaie, Asturia and Galicia to be visited for fear of infection, and victuals with other refreshings to bee sent vnto all places where the fleet should arriue: he himselfe went vnto Arando of Duero, there to attend the Kings comming; hauing in his company the Infant Don FERDINAND, Doctor ADRIAN now made Cardinall, and ARMASTO. Dining at Boleguillas, a Borough in the mountaines, it was thought that hee was poisoned; so as hee fell into a lingering consumption. Hauing dined, hee found himselfe very ill, the blood comming out at his eares and nailes: this suspicion was augmented by an vnknowne horseman, who that morning hauing neer vnto the village mette with the Prouincial MARQVINE and other Monks which went vnto the Cardinall, he willed them to make haste and to aduise him not to eat of a great Trout which would be set before him: for, without doubt it was poysoned. If you arriue, said he, too late, then care for the health of his soul, for his body will be past recouery. This message was deliuered late to the Cardinall; who answered, that if his infirmity came of poison, he thought it proceeded from Flanders, and that he had been infected by the eyes in reading of a Letter which came from that Countrey; since which time he had not been well.

A fleet sent into Flanders for king Charles.

Cardinall Ximenes poisoned.

Being in this estate, he caused himselfe to be carried to Aranda, and in the meane time, the town of Vailledolit fel into a new tumult, the people hauing a conceit, that the report of the kings comming was but counterfeit, and that this great preparation, was to send the infant Don FERDINAND into Flanders; so as Spaine remayning destitute of her Princes, being in the hands of an old Monke, halfe rotten and neere his end, must of necessity be ruined by home-bred seditions, or become a prey to forraine Nations: But to pacifie this mutiny, and to assure them of the kings comming, the Cardinall sent vnto them, and satisfied them: The Cardinall had resolued to doe one act more which he held necessary, but was full of enuy, and that was to reforme the Infant Don FERDINAND's house, and to take from him those which had bred him vp and serued him, either for some priuate dislikes, or for some other considerations which he pretended, wherewith he acquainted the King, who a little before his comming, sent his Letters of command to the Cardinall, to discharge D. PEDRO NVGNES of Guzman, the Infants Gouernour; D. ALVARO OSORIO bishop of Astorga his Schoole-master; Don GONZALO of Guzman his chamberlaine, and SANCHO de Euredes his steward, and to send them home to their houses, letting them know that the King was well satisfied with their good seruices; but their ages required rest, referring the rest of the Infants house to the Cardinals disposition.

Intreaty of the Infant D. Ferdinand to the Cardinall.

The secret of this packet was divulged before it came to the Cardinalls hands, which bred a great alteration in the Infants house, they giuing the Infant to vnderstand that this was a practice of the Cardinals, to debase him and keepe him vnder; whereupon he came in choler the next day to the couent of Aguillera, where the Cardinall lay sick of his infirmity, to whom he complained euen with teares, of the wrong he did him; seeking without any iust cause to depriue him of such faithfull seruants, and therewithall he intreated him and coniured him, by the memory of Queen ISABEL, not to suffer such an indignity to be done him, as to take from him such worthy personages which had attended him so faithfully, and now to see them so ignominiously disgraced.

Speech of Cardinall Ximenes to the Infant D. Ferdinand

The Cardinall sought by milde words, to pacifie the incensed courage of this Prince, laying before him the King his brothers pleasure, which tended to his aduancement, if he would shew himself obedient and tractable; he told him that he loued him deerely, and that he had no will to wrong him: he confessed that his care for the good of his seruants was honorable, but he must withall know, that the king his brother was dearer vnto him: and therfore he exhorted him, that laying aside those passions which his seruants had bred in him, he should wholly rely vpon him who was the greatest king in Christendome, against whose will it was neither safe, nor fit for him to oppose himselfe; vsing many other reasons to the like effect; But the young Prince was not so satisfied, but answered the Cardinall with these words: Seeing you are resolued to ruine me and mine, I must of necessity finde meanes to preserue our selues. The Cardinall being toucht at these words; Doe (said he) what you please, but I sweare by the life of king CHARLES your brother, that to morrow shall not passe, before his commandements be executed, the which it behooues you to obey before all other; yea, though all Spaine had conspired to hinder it. Hereupon the Infant went from the Cardinall without any shew of perturbation, and so returned to Aranda, where he found himselfe with the Towne and all the approaches, guarded by two Captaines of the Guard, and their troupes, which bred great discontent in the Infant, but he could not helpe it, nor auoid the remouing of his seruants, as you may reade at large in the Hiſtory of Spaine.

Arriuall of K. Charles at the Asturies.

King CHARLES hauing taken shipping in Flanders in the beginning of September, arriued about the end of that moneth, vpon an vneasie coast of the Asturies, a Rockie place and not frequented; The mountain-people hauing retired their wiues and children into the Rocks, betook them to their Armes, and came downe in troupes to take the Sea-shore, thinking there had been some enemies; which the king perceiuing, he caused his royall Standard to be aduanced, that he might be knowne, and the Asturians discouering the armes, knew it was their king; so as laying down their weapons, they came to salute him vpon their knees, accompanying him to Villa Vicienſe, where he rested himself after his trauel by Sea, being accompanied by his sister D. LEONARA then Queen of Portugall.

Practices of the Flemmiſh courtiers to keep the king from seeing of the Cardinal.

The Cardinall, who lay in his couent very sick, was so much ioyed, at the newes of the kings comming, as he left his bed and sang Masse; and the Flemmings, on the other side, were as much discontented, wishing him dead before the king should conferre with him, for they knew well that he sought to chace them from the Councell, and from the managing of all affaires: wherefore they were very inquisitiue of his life, and practised delaies to stay the King vpon the way, wishing he were dead before the King should see him: There were diuers deuices to haue drawne the king first into Arragon, which the Cardinall hindred, humbly beseeching him not to determine any thing touching his publike or priuate affaires, before he had giuen him a full information of the estate of his Kingdome: and he also counselled him to send Don FERDINAND his brother as soon as might be into Germany to the Emperor his grandfather, holding it the best course both for his owne affairs & the good of the Infant, and to be a means that all or the greatest part of MAXIMILIANS estates might be conferred vpon him, seeing that he was King and Lord of so many Realms and rich estates. This aduice was followed after the Cardinals death: but it seems the Flemings had other designs; for, the Lord of Cheures sought sought to keep him vnder, and would haue had him giue water to the King his brother; who (being discontented to see his brother so debase himselfe) said, that XIMENES counsel was better: whereupon he ordained, that the Infant should be conducted into Germany.

King Charles visits his mother

The King, vpon his way towards Vailledolit, had a desire to go and visit his mother Queen IOAN at Tordesillas; writing the causes which moued him thereto to the Cardinall and to his brother D. FERDINAND: his resolution seemed full of piety; but, considering the indisposition of this Princesse, it was not needfull to conferre so long with her of affaires and matters as he did.

Sight of the Cardinals disgrace.

The Court comming to Vailledolit, the Cardinall found that his credit began to decay, and that he was not so respected in the making of his lodging as he ought to haue been, whereat he thought himself to haue been disgraced; saying, that it was a poore recompence after so much toyle and sweat to receiue a wrong, in the place of a reward, blaming the Kings officers, who were ignorant of the customes of Spaine: But the receipt of the kings Letters touched him neerer, by which he was commanded to attend him at Moiados, vpon the way to Tordesillas, where he desired to haue his aduice touching the affaires of his Realme and house, to the end he might discharge him of so great a burthen, and suffer him to retire to his owne house to liue in rest; where God would reward him for the many good offices he had done to the Realme, which he thought was not in the power of man to doe, and that for his part, he would euer remember it, and honour him as his Father. He conceiued so great a griefe vpon the receipt of these Letters, to see himselfe kept back, and, in a manner, disgraced, as within few houres after he died.

The Death of Cardinal Ximenes.

Coronation of King Charles the firſt of that name.

The King hauing called the estates of Castile to Vailledolit, he was there proclaimed king of Castile, Toledo, Granado, and other Prouinces depending in Spaine, where he receiued and tooke the oath after the accustomed manner: at which there was some question made by some of the Granadoes, for that Queene IOANE his mother was yet liuing, but notwithstanding they proceeded. Hauing there ordained some things touching the Gouernment of Castile, he went into Arragon to haue the like assembly called and solemnly performed in regard of those countries and prouinces: during his abode there, he had newes of the death of the Emperor MAXIMILIAN: for which great dignity, there were two great Princes in competition; FRANCIS the First, King of France, and CHARLES King of Spaine: In the beginning they proceeded with great modesty, each of them labouring by his Authority and meanes to draw the Electors vnto his side.

Death of Max. imilian, and a concurrance for the Empire.

The King of Spaine thought the Empire did belong vnto him by right, as hauing continued by a long succession in the house of Austria, and that it had not been the custome to depriue the descendents of the dead, without apparant cause of disability, hauing diuers other reasons to feed his hopes to attaine vnto the Empire.

The French King on the other side had no lesse hopes, grounded vpon an opinion he had to purchase the Electors voices by money, whereof some were his antient friends and pensioners, to which enterprise they incouraged him, as a matter easie to effect: Hee also knew well that it was very grieuous to many great houses in Germany, who held themselues capable of so great a dignity, to see the Empire continue so long in one house, and become as it were hereditary; and that they might call that Election a succession, which durst not leaue the next descendents of the deceased Emperour. These humours of the Germane Princes made him hope, that the iealousies among them might helpe his cause.

The Germans, louers of their countries.

The Electors were assembled at Franckford to agree vpon their election. The French King was still abused by the promises of the Marquesse of Brandenburgh, who was drawne thereunto by offers of great summes of money, for the which he did not onely binde himselfe to giue his voice: but he also promised that his brother, the Archbishop of Mentz should doe the like, and the French King was in hope that some other of the Electors were well affected to his party. But the Germane people had no wil to see the Imperiall dignity transferred to a stranger, intreating the Pope that he would not fauour any one in that election, that were not of the Germane Nation; yet in shew he seemed to fauour the French King, but in his heart hee desired not to haue either of them chosen Emperour, fearing their great power; but laboured to cause some other of the German Princes to be elected. During all these practices and the Electors differences about the election, they were aduertised of an Army put to field by the King of Spaine (who was more ready to leuie Souldiers with his money then to giue it to the Electors) which Army drawing neare to Franckford vpon colour to bridle such as should offer to force the Election gate courage to thoſe Electors which fauoured his cauſe, and drew ſuch as ſtood doubtful vnto them. The Marqueſſe of Brandenburgh who ſtood for the French King, was ſo amazed, as deſpairing of the other Electors, and fearing the hatred of the whole nation, he durſt not diſcouer his intention; ſo as comming to the act of Election, CHARLES of Auſtria King of Spaine was choſen Emperour by foure of the Electors, onely the Archbiſhop of Treues gaue his voice for the Marqueſſe of Brandenburgh who was alſo concurrent in the Election for himſelfe.

Charles the Fift choſen Emperour.

This election did much trouble the French king, ſo as many conceiued that theſe two young Princes, betweene whom there were ſo many cauſes of iealouſie and debate, vpon ſundry pretentions, would in the end grow to ſome great & dangerous warre, as you ſhall hereafter vnderſtand. King CHARLES being at Barcelona, he had newes of his election to the Empire of Germany, by an Embaſſage ſent from the Electors, whereupon he went to make preparation for his iourney, and to ſet order for the affaires of Caſtile, which were very confuſed. But he was forced to make haſte and to leaue many things vndecided, being aduertiſed of the conſpiracies and leagues betwixt the townes and Noblemen of the Realme, for the defence of the priuiledges of the countrey, againſt the greedineſs of the flemiſh Counſellors. The king was loath to be ingaged in the Spaniſh mutinies with whoſe humors he was not yet acquainted: wherefore he embarqued ſodenly at the Groyne, leauing for gouernours Cardinall ADRIAN and the Conſtable VELASCO, with whom afterwards he ioyned FREDERICK, HENRIQVES great Admirall of Caſtile: And ſo paſſing by ſea with a great fleete he landed in England, to ſee king HENRY the Eighth, with whom he was in good correſpondence, where he was very honourably entertained for ſome daies, and then paſſed ouer into the Low countries, from whence he went with an honourable traine to Aix, where he made his entrie with all the Princes Electors, and many other Princes Embaſſadours and Noblemen, ſo as ſome write there were in the traine 15000 horſe, and there he receiued the firſt Imperial, crowne of Iron.

In the meane time the combuſtions increaſed daily in Caſtile, many townes and Noblemen complaining of the breach of the lawes and priuiledges of the Realme, and of the bad gouernment of the Flemiſh Lords, moſt of the chief townes fell to Armes and actual rebellion, hauing ioyned with diuerſe Noblemen and Knights and committing all ſorts of riots and inſolencies, refuſing to obey the Kings officers, but of themſelues they ſet downe a forme of gouernment, which was made by the generall multitude, and they called it, la Santa Iunta. The gouernours ſeeing this generall reuolt, leuied forces to ſuppreſſe the rebells, in the which there were many exploits don, which I omit. But in the end the two Armies met neere to Villa Lara, where the rebels were defeated, and thereby al tumults pacified, & the confiderate cities labored to recouer their former fauour. The Biſhop of Zamorra one of the chiefe of the confederates was taken & ſtrangled, and ſome other condemned to loſe their heads: and thus their ciuil wars ended, which grew by the exceſſe and violent gouernment of the Flemings.

Ciuil warres in Caſtile.

During this rebellion in Caſtile, the gouernours being weak, were forced to draw the garriſons out of Nauarre, and to draw away ſome of the ordinance out of Pampelona, whereupon the Lord of Aſperant brother to the Lord of Lautrech, with ſome French wel affected to HENRY of Albret, the right heire of that Realme, entred the countrey and took ſome places, and in the end was receiued into Pampelona: yet being abandoned by the Duke of Nagera, who was Viceroy, and finding no reſiſtance in the whole Countrey, during the ciuil warres, he vnaduiſedly paſt the riuer of Ebro and laid ſiege to Logrogna: but the Gouernors hauing gotten the victory at Villa Lora, marched towards him, and forced him to repaſſe the riuer, following the French vntill the Armies came neere to Pampelona, where the Lord of Aſperant reſolued to hazard a battail and would not attend ſuch forces as were to ioyne with them the next day, in the which the French were defeated, and the Generall taken priſoner; whereupon the whole countrey of Nauarre was eaſily recouered by the Caſtilians.

The Lord of Aſperans and the French defeated in Nauarre.

The heart burning betwixt the Emperor and the French King began now to diſcouer it ſelf, for the Duke of Bouillon (hauing put himſelfe vnder the protection of the French) ſent to defie the Emperor being at a Diet at Wormes, and his ſonne the Lord of Florenges hauing leuied ſome forces in France, went to beſiege a ſmal town in Luxenburg, but the king of England diſſwaded the French King, from entring into quarrell vpon ſo ſmall a ſubiect; there was nothing done, and the Duke of Bouillon diſmiſſed his Army: but the Emperor raiſed forces, and took diuers places and townes from the Duke, who finding himſelfe too weake obtained a Truce for ſix weekes. After the Emperors coronation the firſt act he did, was to ſuppreſſe, if he could by mild meanes, the doctrine preached by LVTHER the which increaſed much in Germany. To this end, and for for ſome othe reaſues of importance concerning the Empire, he cauſed the Princes and eſtates to aſſemble at Wormes, whither LVTHER came, hauing a paſport, and was heard diſputing againſt Doctour ECKIVS and diuers others, but there followed ſmall fruites of this Diet.

A Diet at Wormes.

King FRANCIS being much diſcontented with the ouerthrow of the Lord of Aſperants army, he ſent the Lord of Bonguet admiral of France with a greater power, who entred by Guipuſcoa and beſieged FONTARRABI the which after ſome daies he took by compoſition, and manned it with a garriſon of 3000 Gaſcoines, vnder the commaund of the Earle of LVDE: and about the ſame time the Viceroy of Nauarre receiued commandement from the Emperor, to ruine all the walled Townes and forces of Nauarre, to preuent another rebellion, the which was executed but at Pampalona and ſome few other places. Both theſe great Princes in like manner were in Armes vpon the frontiers of France and Burgundy, where there were diuerſe exploits done but of no great moment.

This yere the Emperor hearing of the alterations which had been in Spaine againſt the gouernours; hauing conſulted with the Princes Electors he diſpoſed of his affaires there and of the Netherlands, and took ſhipping at Fluſhing, who finding a proſperous winde he touched in England where he concluded an allyance with King HENRY the Eighth, to marrie with MARY his daughter (being then but ſeuen yeeres old) when ſhe ſhould come to age but it ſucceeded not, from whence he ſailed into Spaine and arriued at S. Ander the 25 of Iuly. The Emperor being gon into Spaine there fell out great combuſtions in Germany, the Peſants taking Armes againſt the Nobility, who being aſſembled in great numbers, made ſpoile of religious houſes, and committed a thouſand inſolencies hauing no ſubiect, but onely abuſed by certaine falſe preachers, who ſaid, they had a reuelation from God, that they ſhould root out that tyrannous Nobility and enioy their full liberty; but they were defeated, and put to rout by the Count Palatine, the Archbiſhop of Mentz; and ſome others. Their leader was publickly executed, and thoſe poore wretches that eſcaped from the battaile, returned home to their houſes.

The Emperours ſecond voiage into Spaine.

The peſants warre in Germany.

The Emperour being in Spaine, had ſent an Army to infeſt FONTARRABIE: the Earle of LVDE the gouernour wanting things neceſſarie for the defence of a towne of war, which attended a ſiege hourely, he aduertiſed the king his maiſter, intreating him to relieue him and to ſend another to take the charge: whereupon the Marſhall CHABANES came and victualled the towne, and changed the garriſon, leauing captaine FRAVGET, in the place of the Earle of LVDE, and the next yeere 1524 the Emperour ſent an Army to beſiege it, and FRAVGET hauing neither want of victualls nor endured an aſſault, yeelded the towne by compoſition, for the which he was degraded of his Nobility, vpon a ſcaffold in the citie of Lions. In the meane time the warres began to grow hot in Italy, whereas the Pope and the Emperour had made a ſecret league againſt the French King, ſeeking firſt to ſupplant him in the Duchey of Milan by ſecret practices, and then by open Armes, where after many exploits done in the end the Imperialiſts took the city of Milan. After with the Swiſſers vnder the French Kings pay, and vnder the command of the Lord of Lautre their General, would needes go and change the Imperialiſts at Bicocca where they were repulſt, yet they retired in good order with their Artillery, the enemy not daring to purſue them; in which conflict the Swiſſers loſt 3000 of their beſt men and 22 Captains: after which they returned home; and the French, into France. The lord of Lautrec hauing giuen order for the defenſe of Cremona, Genoa, and ſome other Townes in Lombardy, in the mean time the Emperor made a league with the Venecians: the Articles were, that betweene the Emperor FERDINAND Duke of Auſtria, and FRANCIS SFORZA Duke of Milan, on the one part, and the Senate of Venice on the other, there ſhould be a perpetuall peace and league, with diuerſe other Articles for the ioynt preſeruation of their eſtates. And in Auguſt following there was another league concluded at Rome betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, the King of England, the Archduke of Auſtria, the Duke of Milan, the Cardinall of Medicis, together with the ſtate of Florence, and the Genoais; where it was concluded, that this league ſhould continue during the confederates liues, and a yeer after the death of any of them, reſeruing place for any other to come in, ſo as they were admitted by the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of England: the reſt of the Articles you may reade at large in GVICHARDIN.

The French King was nothing danted with theſe leagues, nor the vnion of ſo many Princes; who being come to Lions, reſolued to go in perſon with a great Armie into Italie. His Armie paſſed the mountains: but the King was ſtaid by the conſpiracy of the Duke of Bourbon; who, being being the greateſt officer of the kingdome, and of a noble Family, ſeeing himſelfe in ſome diſgrace, made a league with the Emperour and the king of England, by which it was agreed, that as ſoone as the king ſhould haue paſſed the Alpes, he ſhould enter Burgundy with twenty thouſand Foote; But this could not be brought to paſſe, before it was diſcouered to the King being at Lions, who ſent to apprehend him, but he was fled away in a diſguiſed habit. This accident of importance ſtayed the king from his intended iourney, who keeping certaine troupes about him prepared for the new warre, he ſent the Lord of Bonnivet Admirall of France, into Italie, with one thouſand eight hundred Lances, and thirty one thouſand Foot, of ſeueral Nations, with which he drew neere to the confines of the Duchie of Milan, where he took ſome Townes, but attempted Milan in vaine.

The Duke of Bourbon, not able to doe the Emperor any ſeruice in Burgundy, for want of money to pay his Lance-knights, retired to Milan, where the Emperor (hauing no will he ſhould paſſe into Spaine, to marry his ſiſter the widdow Queene of Portugal) ſent to intreate him that he would ſtay there, giuing him the title of his Lieutenant generall in Italie; the Emperours affaires were not ſucceſſefull vpon the coaſts of of Spaine, for hauing a great deſire to paſſe in perſon into France, and thither to tranſport the warres, hauing to that end ſent his Army vnder the Pirenean hills, the which had taken Deluaterra: But his deſignes were greater then his power, being vnable for want of money to entertain ſuch great forces as were neceſſary for ſuch an enterpriſe: for which cauſe he could not draw his Army together before the later end of the yeer, which bred him great difficulties in that cold ſeaſon, for which conſideration together with the want of victuals he was forced to diſſolue his Army.

The Emperos deſigne to go into France made fruſtrate.

But to return to Italie, the Emperors Army was now on foote, vnder the leading of the Duke of Milan, the Duke of Bourbon, the Vice-roy of Naples, and the Marqueſſe of Peſquera; what ſucceſſe theſe two Armies had, I leaue to the relation of GVICHARDINE: part of this Army was ſent in France, vnder the Duke of Bourbon, and the Marqueſſe of Peſquiera, they entred Prouence and took Aix, the chiefe City of that Prouince, with ſome other townes. The Duke of Bourbon would gladly haue paſſed the riuer of Rhoſne, and entred farther into France, giuing diuers reaſons for his aduice; But the Marqueſſe and the Spaniards deſired rather to take Marſeilles a hauen of the Sea, lying very commodious for the Emperors paſſage out of Spaine into Italie, the which they went to beſiege, lying forty daies before it; but deſpairing to be able to take it, and fearing ſome great danger if the King ſhould approach, they raiſed their ſiege: the king being comm to Auinion with his whole Army, and marched with all ſpeede towards Marſeilles; the French King, ſeeing a faire occaſion offered him for the recouery of the Duchy of Milan, hauing a puiſſant Army, and his enemies being weake, he reſolued to embrace the occaſion, wherewith he acquainted his Captains; ſaying, I haue reſolued to paſſe in perſon into Italie, and whoſoeuer ſhall aduiſe me to the contrary ſhall much diſpleaſe me. Let euery man therefore looke carefully to his charge; for God is a louer of iuſtice, and the raſhneſſe of our enemies, hath at laſt laid open a meanes for vs to recouer that, which hath been violently taken from vs.

The Duke of Bourbon enters into Prouence with an Army.

The French king reſolues to paſſe the mountains and follow the enemy.

After which he cauſed the Army to march immediatly, ſhunning to meete with the Lady Regent his mother, who came to perſwade him not to paſſe the mountains in perſon: But he went on, and encamped with his Army before Pauia (hauing firſt taken the City of Milan) during which time, the Pope did mediat a Peace betwixt thoſe two great Princes, but it tooke no effect.

The French King continued ſtill his ſiege before Pauia, which was reduced to extremity, but the Imperialiſts drew all their forces together to relieue it; and the Armies lying neere together, they ioyned battaile vpon the fourteenth day of February, where the French Army was ouerthrowne, and King FRANCIS, fighting valiantly and long in the middeſt of the battaile, had his horſe ſlain vnder him, and himſelfe lightly hurt in the face and the hand, being fallen to the ground, he was taken priſoner by fiue ſouldiers who knew him not: But the Vice-roy changing to come, he diſcouered himſelfe vnto him, who gaue him his hand with great reuerence, and receiued him priſoner in the Emperors name. In this ouerthrow there were many Princes and Noble-men of France ſlaine and taken priſoners, the particularities whereof I omit for breuities ſake.

The battell of Pauia where the French King was taken priſoner.

The Emperour being aduertiſed of this ouerthrow, and of the kings impriſonment, the news were very pleaſing vnto him, yet he made no ſhew of pride for this great ſucceſſe, but carried himſelfe very modeſtly; For, being informed of the victory, and receiuing Letters of the French

French Kings own hand, which were humbly written, rather in the condition of a priſoner then of a king: He went forthwith to the Church to giue God thanks, and the next morning receiued the Sacrament with great deuotion, and ſo went in proceſſion with his whole Court, but he would not ſuffer any Bels to be rung, or bonefiers made in ſigne of ioy; ſaying, That it was fit to reioyce for victories obtained againſt Infidels, and not for thoſe which were gotten againſt Chriſtians. Whereupon he called his Councell together to aduiſe in what ſort he ſhould deale with the French King, and to what ends he ſhould vſe the Victory, commanding euery one to deliuer his minde freely in his preſence: Whereupon the Biſhop of Oſma, who was his Confeſſor, making a graue ſpeech & ſhewing three deliberations which might be taken, touching the French King; the firſt to keep him a perpetuall priſoner; the ſecond, to deliuer him friendly and brotherly without any other conditions but ſuch as might ſettle a perpetuall Peace betwixt them; and the third to deliuer him, but to draw as great profite thereby as hee could, concluding that the ſafeſt courſe was to binde the king vnto him by a free and brotherly deliuerance. But on the other ſide the Duke of Alua perſwaded the Emperour to make as great profit of this Victory, as poſſible he could, whoſe aduice was applauded by the whole Councell without any replie, the which the Emperour himſelfe alſo approued: Whereupon there were certaine Articles drawne and ſent with all ſpeede vnto the King, who reiected them as vnreaſonable.

The Emperours moderation vpon the newes of the Victory.

The Vice-roy doubting of the Kings ſafe keeping within the Duchie of Milan, he reſolued to tranſport him to Naples, whereat the King was much grieued: He was conducted to Genoa, and from thence to Portoſeio where he ſhould imbarke, but the Vice-roy hauing certaine French Gallies, ſent him by the Queene Regent, he changed his aduice, and tranſported the King into Spaine. The Emperor, hearing of his arriuall, gaue commandement, that he ſhould be receiued with great honour in all places as he paſſed: what followed during his impriſonment vntil his deliuery, you may reade at large in the French hiſtory.

The french king tranſported into Spaine.

In the yeer one thouſand fiue hundred twenty ſix, after many conſultations, in the end was a treaty concluded for the deliuery of the French King; but the Emperour tyed him to ſuch conditions as were very vnreaſonable: yet he promiſed vpon his oath to obſerue them faithfully, hauing left his two ſonnes in Hoſtage, and contracted himſelfe to Queene ELEANOR the Emperors ſiſter. This accord held all the Princes of Chriſtendome in ſuſpence, for they conſidered that if he obſerued the treaty of Madrid, all Italie being vnable to defend it ſelfe, would fall into ſeruitude, but the world was ſoone ſatisfied of the French kings intention; For, being arriued at Bayonne, he was required to ratifie the Accord, which he had promiſed to doe when he came to a free place, but he delayed it with many excuſes: giuing the Emperor to vnderſtand that before he proceeded to ſuch an act, it wes neceſſary he ſhould pacifie his ſubiects, who were diſcontented with bonds which tended to the diminution of the Crowne of France: But notwithſtanding all difficulties he would obſerue what he had promiſed; notwithſtanding the Pope and the Venecians ſending meſſengers vnto him, he complained much of the Emperors inhumanity vnto him, during his impriſonment, not vſing him like a Prince, nor with that commiſeration of his calamity that beſitted a Prince. That he had not found him any mildlier diſpoſed towards others, but perceiued by his ſpeeches vſed at Madrid that he affected nothing more then how to bring the Church, Italy, and all other Princes into ſeruitude: and therefore he wiſhed them to be carefull of their owne ſafeties: which if they did, he would concurre with them for the common good, and make a league with them againſt the Emperor, not that he had any intent to recouer the State of Milan, or to adde any thing to his own greatneſſe, but only by warre to recouer his children, and aſſure the liberty of Italie, ſeeing the Emperours great couetouſneſſe had left him no colour to binde him to obſerue the treaty: For that both at the firſt when he was in the Caſtle of Piſqueton and afterwards in Spaine, he had often proteſted to the Emperour, by reaſon of his exorbitant demands, that if through neceſſity he were driuen to compound vpon vniuſt conditions, or ſuch as were not in his power to performe, that not only he would not obſerue them; but holding himſelfe wronged in that he had forced him to make impoſſible promiſes, he would be reuenged if euer occaſion were offered, and that he had often told him, that it was not in the power of a French king, to binde himſelfe to the alienation of any thing depending of the Crowne, without the conſent of the generall eſtates: that the Laws of Chriſtians did not allowe, that he which was taken in warre ſhould be deteined in perpetuall priſon, which was a puniſhment proper for malefactors, and not for ſuch as had been beaten with the cruelty of fortune; that all men knew that bonds made by conſtraint in priſon were of no no value; and that the capitulation being of no force, the faith likewiſe which was but acceſſary, and the confirmation of the ſame, could not be bound; that by the oath which hee had taken at Rhemes at his coronation, hee was bound (according to the cuſtome of other Kings of France) not to alienate the patrimony of the Crown: and therefore for theſe reaſons he was no leſſe free than ready to abate the Emperors pride.

The Emperor ſends to the French King touching the treaty.

The Emperor, growing jealous of the Kings delaies for the ratification, ſent one vnto him to be certified of his intent, who found him very vnwilling to leaue Burgundy; which, beeing very prejudiciall to the Crown of France, he ſaid was not in his power to obſerue: but deſiring much to entertain the amity begun with the Emperor, and to giue perfection to the marriage, he would be contented (obſeruing all other Articles) to pay him two millions of crownes for the reſignation of Burgundy.

The Emperor, hearing this anſwer, was much troubled in minde, yet he reſolued not to alter any thing touching the reſtitution of Burgundy, and rather to accord with the Pope, and to conſent to the reintegration of FRANCIS SFORCE; being more fitting for him to pardon a Prince leſſe than himſelf, than by yeelding to the will of a powerfull Prince, and one that enuied his greatnes, to make as it were a confeſſion of feare. But the French King hearing that the Emperor would alter nothing touching the Articles of the capitulation, he preſently began to hearken to the treaty of the league, the which was concluded the tenth of May 1526, between the French King on the one part, the Pope and the Venecians on the other; that between the Pope, the French King, the Venecians, and the Duke of Milan (for whom the Pope and the Venecians aſſured their ratification) ſhould bee a perpetuall league to reſtore FRANCIS SFORCE freely to the Duchy of Milan, and the French Kings children to their liberty; that the league ſhould be ſignifi'd to the Emperor, to whom was giuen power to enter into it within three moneths, with condition to deliuer the Kings children, receiuing a competent ranſome, ſuch as the King of England ſhould arbitrate, and alſo to leaue the whole Duchy of Milan vnto FRANCIS SFORCE, and the other eſtates of Italie as they were before the laſt war began: there were many other Articles touching the managing of this warre, which I leaue to GVICHARDINE.

A league concluded between the Pope, the French King, and the Venecians.

The Army of confederates being in field, they came and ſate down before Milan, and ſoon retired again without any effect: and in the meane time the poore Inhabitants of Milan were wonderfully oppreſt by the rigour and cruelty of the Spaniards; and the face of this City appeared very miſerable and almoſt naked of Inhabitants, many beeing waſted by the plague, and many fleeing away daily to auoid the fury of thoſe mercileſſe Spaniards. They were ſomwhat reuiued by the coming of the Duke of Bourbon; perſwading themſelues, that ſeeing hee had brought ſome prouiſion of money, and that the confederates Camp was retired, their neceſſities and dangers would decreaſe, and they ſhould not bee ſo much oppreſſed and cruelly handled: furthermore, they had a conceit, that the Duke (to whom it was ſaid the Emperor had giuen the Duchie of Milan) would prouide for his owne profit, that they ſhould be no more ſo miſerably afflicted. Wherefore, aſſembling themſelues together, they came to the Duke, and deliuered their grieuances vnto him by the mouth of one of their company, with teares and lamentations. The Duke ſeemed to be much grieued for their miſeries, promiſing to doo his beſt to releeue the City, which had been ſo much oppreſt contrary to the Emperours will and pleaſure: he tould them, moreouer, that he had brought ſome prouiſion of money, but not ſo much as might content the ſouldiers; yet if the City would furniſh him with 30000 Ducates for the pay of one moneth, he would cauſe the Army to retire out of Milan; aſſuring them, that hee would not break his faith and word, vpon which they might confidently rely; praying God, that, if he failed of his promiſe, his head might bee taken from his ſhoulders by the firſt ſhot of Cannon from the enemy: whereupon, the poor Citizens with great difficulty began to make prouiſion of the money. But the Duke of Bourbon made no reckoning to keep his word and promiſe, or at the leaſt it lay not in his power to curb the pride and inſolencie of the ſouldiers.

The miſerable eſtate of Milan.

The Caſtle of Milan yeelded to the Imperialiſts.

The Caſtle of Milan was all this time beſieged by the Imperialiſtes and reduced to great extremity for want of victualls, the confederate army vnder the command of the Duke, promiſing ſtill to releeue them, and they came and planted their Camp within a mile of Milan: but they delaied the execution ſo long, as the Duke of Milan was forced by extremity of hunger, to yield it vp vnto the Duke of Burbon vpon certain conditions, the which were very ill obſerued.

Prouiſions of the Emperor againſt the confederats.

The Emperour began to fortify himſelfe in Italy againſt the confederates: hee ſent the Viceroy of Naples out of Spaine, with 6000 foot, Lanceknights, & Spaniardes, and he ſent directions into Germany for new ſuccours of footmen: but by reaſon of the want of money that Leuy came ſlowely.

After the ſucceſſe of theſe matters in Italy with diuerſe euents, Embaſſadors came vnto the Emperor in September from the Pope, the french king & the Venecians, to ſignifie vnto him the league which they had made; with the libertie which was left to him to enter, according to the conditions: at which act the Embaſſador of England being preſent, hee deliuered a Letter from the king his maſter, who perſwaded him to enter into the League. The Emperour hauing heard their charge, anſwered, that it agreed not with his dignity, to enter into a league, made principally againſt his eſtate and honour: but hauing been alwaies deſirous of the vniuerſall peace, he made offer to accompliſh it preſently if they had ſufficient commiſſions for the ſame.

This yeere the Duke of Burbon went out of Milan with part of the Imperiall Army, being perſwaded by the Duke of Ferrara to addreſſe himſelf to the head, and attempt Florence, or Rome: and in like manner the Viceroy of Naples, who alſo had an Army for the Emperor, was deſirous to inuade the territories of the Church: the Duke of Bourbon marched neere to Bologna, where he was in great danger of his life by reaſon of the mutinie of his ſouldiers for want of pay. But the Pope ſeeing theſe ſtormes approach, began to faint and to loſe all courage, ſo as he reſolued, to make an accord with ſome whom the Viceroy had ſent to Rome, to that end: which was, That there ſhould be a furceaſing of Armes for eight moneths, the Pope paying to the Imperiall Army 60000 Ducats; with diuerſe other Articles. The Duke of Burbon was perſwaded by the Viceroy to accept of the truce: the which he refuſed, ſaying that the Army could not bee ſtaied but by the aduancing of a greater ſumme of money; ſo as hauing no meanes to entertaine the Army longer without money (for vntill that day he had carried them through many difficulties, with fair promiſes and vain hopes) being conſtraind either to trie his fortune or to periſh, he reſolued to march with all poſſible ſpeed to ſurpriſe Rome: where the reward of the victory would be ineſtimable; and he was encouraged with hopes of good ſucceſſe, for that the Pope had vnaduiſedly vpon the treaty of the accord diſmiſſed his troupes. The Duke of Burbon, leauing his artillery and baggage behinde, marcht with incredible ſpeed, and drew neer to Rome, the Pope being ſcarcely aduertiſed of his coming: what paſſed within the City, I omit for breuities ſake. On the fift of May he ſent a Trumpet to demand paſſage through the City of Rome, to go with his Army to the Realm of Naples: and the next morning at the break of day he reſolued either to dy or vanquiſh, giuing a furious aſſault to the ſuburbs; in which hee was much fauoured by a thick miſt. At the beginning of the aſſault, the Duke of Bourbon, beeing in the head of the troops to draw them on, was ſhot through the head with a bullet, and ſlaine. This did nothing daunt the reſolution of the ſouldiers; who after a little reſiſtance forced the rampiers, the Defendants all fleeing away: whereupon Pope CLEMENT with certain of his Cardinals fled into the Caſtle; and the ſame night the ſouldiers entred the City, where they made a pitifull ſpoil, without reſpect of perſon or place, were they holy or profane. The ſpoil was infinite for the wealth and riches which they found, and for the quality and number of the priſoners, who were to redeem themſelues with very great ranſomes.

The Pope makes an accord with the Imperialiſts.

The duke of Burbon ſlain at the aſſault of Rome.

Rome taken and ſacked by the Imperialiſts.

On the ſixt of Iune the Pope compounded with the Imperialiſts: the conditions were, that he ſhould pay to the Army 400000 Ducats, that he ſhould deliuer vp to the Emperor the Caſtle Saint Angelo, the Forts of Oſtia, Ciuita vecchia, and of Ciuita Caſtellano, with the Cities of Parma, Placencia and Modena; that the Pope, with thirteen Cardinals which were with him, ſhould remain priſoners within the Caſtle vntill the firſt paiment were made of 15000 Ducates, and then they ſhould go to Naples or to Caietta, and there attend the Emperors pleaſure; that for aſſurance of the other paiments he ſhould giue in hoſtage certain ſpeciall men whom they named. This ſack of Rome drew all the ſouldiers of the Realm of Naples thither; ſo as there were at that one Inſtant 24000 men, who liued there tumultuouſly and inſolently, and would not depart: but a great number of them were deuoured by the plague.

Matters being treated of before for the preparation of a new war, in April a league was concluded betwixt the Kings of France and England, vpon certain conditions ſet down: and it was reſolued, that either of them ſhould ſend Embaſſadors to the Emperor to acquaint him with the league they had made, and to ſummon him to reſtore the Kings children, and to enter into the peace with honeſt conditions; which if he would not accept within one moneth, then to denounce war.

A league betwixt the Kings of France and England.

This league being concluded, the two Kings ſent two Gentlemen in poſte to make this ſum-mons to the Emperor; which act the two Ambaſſadors performed. And in like manner, on the fifteenth of May 1527, the French King (hauing newes of the ſack of Rome, and the death of the Duke of Bourbon) contracted with the Venecians and the Duke of Milan, for the leuying of an Army in Italy. Of this Army of the league, MONSIEVR de Lautrech was made Captain generall; who, hauing paſſed into Italie, took Genoa and Alexandria, and ſackt Pauia. After which he was importuned by the Pope to aduance with his Army: whereupon the Imperialiſts, fearing his deſcent into the Realm of Naples, which they were of neceſſity to defend, made an accord with the Pope. The Articles were, that the Pope ſhould make no enterpriſe againſt the Emperor, either in Milan, or the Kingdome of Naples; that hee ſhould grant him a Croiſade in Spain, and a Tenth of all the Clergy-reuenues in thoſe Realms; that he ſhould leaue in the Emperors hands (for aſſurance of the obſeruation) Oſtia, Ciuita vecchia, Ciuita Caſtellana, and the Caſtle of Parlie, and giue for hoſtages his nephews, HIPPOLITO and ALEXANDER; that he ſhould pay to the Lance-Knights 67000 Ducats, and to the Spaniards 35000: which being performed, they ſhould releaſe him with all his Cardinals: and they ſhould goe out of Rome, and the Caſtle; conuaying the Pope in ſafety to Oruietta, Spoleto or Perouſa, vntill the reſt of their moncy were paid.

Accord betwixt the pope and the Emperors agents

The night before the tenth of December, which was appointed for the Popes departure, he fearing that ſome ſiniſter accident might happen vnto him, ſtole, in the cloſing of the euening, ſecretly out of the Caſtle in the habit of a merchant; being attended by LEVVES de Gonzaga, who was in the Emperors pay, and conducted him ſafely to Oruietta: from whence he wrote a Letter to MONSIEVR de Lautrec, thanking him for that which he had done touching his deliuery.

Moſt part of the former yeer there had been treating of a peace betwixt the Emperour and the Kings of France and England; and taking no effect, the Ambaſſadors being retired, their Heralds came to denounce warre againſt the Emperor: whereto (as ſome write) hee made this anſwer, that the French King could not denounce war againſt him being his priſoner, although he were at liberty, hauing giuen his ſonnes for hoſtages: if hee could not obſerue his promiſe which he had ſolemnly ſworn, being hindred by his ſubjects, he ſhould return again to priſon; and that he could not by the law of Nations, being not yet freed from his oath, denounce war againſt him: and GVICHARDINE writes, that hee tould ſome of the Kings miniſters, that he would end all quarels with the French King by ſingle combate of both their perſons, and that he had dealt villanouſly and cowardly with him in falſifying his faith. The King, hearing heerof, held it a diſhonour to paſſe it ouer in ſilence: and therefore on the twentith of March, in a great aſſembly of all his Princes, all the Ambaſſadors and his whole Court, calling for PERRINOT the Emperors Ambaſſador, after ſome ſpeeches hee deſired him to carry a Letter and deliuer a meſſage to the Emperor from him of this tenor, that whereas the Emperor had told his Herald that he had falſified his faith, he had ſpoken an vntruth; and that as often as hee had ſpoken it, ſo often he had lied; and not to deferre the triall of their quarels, that hee ſhould aſſigne him the place where they might together perform the combate. The Ambaſſador refuſing to carry this Letter or deliuer the meſſage, tould him hee would ſignifie as much to the Emperor by an Herald: and although he were not ignorant that he had ſpoken againſt the honour of his brother the King of England, yet hee would ſay nothing therein, knowing that the King was well able to defend himſelf: but if through the indiſpoſition of his body he had any lawfull impediment, he offred to aduenture his body for him. But not many daies after, the King of England gaue him the like defiance with the ſame ſolemnities. The Army of the league vnder the command of Monſieur de Lautrec their Generall, entred into the Realme of Naples, being ſtill followed by the Imperiall Army, cutting off their victuals: but in the end of April he came to Naples, which he reſolued to beſiege both by ſea and land; where in the beginning there was a great fight at ſea between PHILIP DORIA who ſerued the French, and the Imperialiſts; in which Don HVGO de Monarda Viceroy of Naples, with aboue 1000 Spaniards, were ſlain, and many Noble-men and others taken priſoners. The ſiege of Naples proued very fatall for the French: for, ANDREVV DORIA with his gallies left the Kings ſeruice, and fell to the Emperor, whoſe Army was fortified with new forces. The French Army was diſtreſſed for victuals, and much infected with the plague, whereof many great Commanders and Captains died, and in the end Monſieur de Lautrec the Generall himſelf; which was the ouerthrowe of the French Army in the kingdom of Naples, hauing as bad ſucceſſe in Lombardy vnder the command of Monſieur de S. Pol, who was ouerthrowne and taken priſoner by ANTHONY

NY De Leua, at Lauidriano. Theſe many croſſes cauſed the French King willingly to giue eare to a treaty of peace, the which was debated at Cambray in the yeere 1530 by LEVVES of Sauoy, the French Kings mother, and MARGARET of Auſtria the Emperours Aunt, where after much debating the two Princes were reconciled; by the which the Infants of France were to be deliuered in regarde of two millions and 500000 crownes, paiable at ſeuerall times, whereof part was in diſcharge of the Emperour to the King of England, that the King ſhould renounce the Soueraigntie of Flanders, & Artois, and his pretentions to the Duchie of Milan & Naples, with diuerſe other Articles which did not hold. During the negotiation at Cambraye, the Emperour paſſed into Italy with great forces, which amazed all the States of Italy: he landed at Genoa, and went to Bologna, whereas Pope CLEMENT attended him and receiued him with great honor, and lodged him in the ſame palace with him, where by their outward demonſtrations they ſeemed to haue been alwaies in great amity. There he receiued the imperiall Crownes, one of Iron, which the Emperours haue bin accuſtomed to receiue at Milan, and the other of Gold which he ſhould haue taken at Rome: and during his abode there, by the Popes mediation, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan, vpon certaine conditions, were reconciled to the Emperor, who reſtored to FRANCIS SFORCE, Milan, with the whole Duchie: from whence he paſſed into Germany, to an Imperiall Diet which was held at Auſbourge, where aſſiſted FERDINAND King of Hungary his brother, with the Princes of the Empire. There the Proteſtant Princes, Noble-men, and Imperiall townes beſought the Emperor to heare the confeſſion of their doctrine, where were many diſputations by the Doctors on both ſides: where the Proteſtants ſeeing they could not preuaile any thing, made a proteſtation that they could not contribute to the warres againſt the Turke who threatned to beſiege Viena: After which, King FERDINAND was choſen King of the Romanes, with whom the Emperor went to Aix where he was ſolemnely crowned, in Ianuary 1531. And from thence the Emperour went into the Low countries, where he made a very ſeuere Edict againſt them of the reformed religion; and then he returned into Germany and went with his brother FERDINAND to a Diet at Ratiſbon, where the Councell of Auſbourg was allowed vntill a Councell were called: and ſo a peace was concluded in Germany, vpon certaine Articles; ſo as the Proteſtants for their parts, being ſeuen Princes and 24 townes, offered obedience to the Emperor, and promiſed him ſuccours againſt the Turk.

Ferdinand choſen King of the Romans.

A peace betwixt the Emperor and the Proteſtants in Germany.

This treaty was ratified by the Emperour the ſecond of Auguſt 1532, commanding the Imperial chamber and all other Iudges to obey it. The Emperor leauing Germany returned into Italy, and had an enteruiew with the Pope at Bologna, in ſhew to treat of a generall Councell, which was nothing pleaſing vnto the Pope: but the chiefe end was, to make a league betweene them and the other Potentates of Italy, for the aſſurance of their eſtates againſt the enterpriſes of the French: which done, the Emperor returned to Genoa and from thence paſſed into Spain.

A league betwixt the Pope and the Emperor.

The Emperour being in Spain, he was ſolicited by MVLEY HASCEN King of Tunis who had been diſpoſſeſt by HARADIN BARBAROVSSE, to reſtore him to his Realme, promiſing to hold it of the Crowne of Spain. This occaſion was willingly imbraced, as neceſſary for the good of Chriſtendome, and very honourable for the Emperour in particular. Hauing reſolued vpon this enterpriſe, he aduertiſed all Chriſtian Princes, inuiting them to contribute men, mony and ſhips to this warre, whither hee would go in perſon: the Rendez vous was in Sardinia, where he ſhipped his Army beeing neere 40000 men, with the which he landed happily within ſix miles of Tunis: he firſt aſſaulted Gouletta which was a ſtrong Fort ſet vpon the mouth of the lake, the which was taken by aſſault, in which there were ſlaine in fighting or in flying away aboue 1500 Turks and all BARBAROVSSES ordinance and Galleys taken. There was great conſultation touching the enterpriſe of Tunis, which ſome held difficult and others made it eaſie. It is written that BARBAROVSSE being much grieued for the loſſe of Gouletta was once in minde to haue ſlaine all the Chriſtian ſlaues: from which cruell reſolution he was diuerted by ſome, ſhewing him that ſo foule a fact would not onely blemiſh his name perpetually, but bring him in diſgrace with SOLIMAN, who was a generous Prince, and hated all ſuch baſe actions, as to kill people impriſoned which could not offend him. The Emperour marched with his Army towards Tunis, and BARBAROVSSE came forth of the citie in ſhew to giue him battaile, hauing (as ſome write) twenty thouſand horſe, 100000 foot, Moores and Arabians, with 7000 Turks on whom he did chiefly rely. The two Armies drawing neere, the charge began: but the Barbarians vpon the firſt charge, fled away baſely, neither did BARBAROVSSE ſhew any courage that day, but fled ſpeedily to the City, where the ſlaughter in this battaile was not great, the Barbarians flying presently. BARBAROVSSH being in Tunis entred into a new resolution to murder the Christian slaues, which moued two Renegados (much fauoured by him) to campassion, who opened the prison dores to these wrethes, who (as some write) were 10000: and they hauing broken their chaines, got staues and such other weapons and became maisters of the Castle, driuing away those few Turks which were left there in guarde, seizing vpon the treasure, victuals and Armes which BARBAROVSSH had left there, who posted to the Castle seeking to be let in; but they chased him away with reproches. This happened the day after the battaile, when as those slaues made signe vnto the Emperour to approach, but by reason of the distance they could not be seene: yet the Emperor finding there was some alteration sent to discouer it. In the meane time BARBAROVSSH fearing the inconstancie of his Moores, left the citie, and went towards Bona with his 7000 Turks: the Christian Army marching towards Tunis, they were met by Embassadours from the city, who offred to yeeld vnto the Emperour vpon what conditions he would prescribe, so as he would secure them from sack, the which was granted: But soone after the Emperors entrance the Spaniards and Germanes fell to spoile and kill, committing all acts of hostilitey. After all this MVLI HASCEN was restored to his kingdome by the Emperour, vpon certaine Articles set downe, doing him homage: and then the Emperor dismissing part of his Army from Gouletta he returned with the rest into Sicily, and so came to Naples.

The Emperour returnes into Sicily.

The Emperour being returned to Naples there began a new warre betwixt him and the French king, for the Duke of Sauoy brother in law to the Emperour, whom the French sought to dispossesse of his estate. The Emperour consulted with his captaines of the manner how he should begin this war, whether he should stay in Piemont or passe presently into Prouence: where after diuerse opinions it was concluded to inuade Prouence; for the which enterprise he made preparation of a mighty Army, hauing (as some write) 24000 Germanes, 14000 Spaniards, 12000 Italians and 5000 horse, with which he marched into Prouence, where he attempted Marselles in vaine, neither did he any thing in that voiage worth the memory, but was forced to retire with his Army with great losse and dishonor, the particularities you may reade at large in the French historie. After the Emperours retraite out of France the warre being still hot in Piemont, Pope PAVL considering what miseries it brought vnto Christendome, and foreseeing the ruine of Italy if it continued, he labored an enteruiew of these two Princes and himselfe at Nice, where they could not be reconciled, there being a truce onely for tenne yeers concluded.

The Emperours passage into Prouence.

An enteruiew betwixt the Pope, Emperor, and French King at Nice.

The Emperour returning towards Spaine, was staied by fowle weather about Marselles, where the King sent to intreate him to enter and to rest himself vntill the winde were faire; for which he gaue him thanks, letting him vnderstand, that he desired they might meete at Aigues mortes: whereupon the king went thither from Auignon; where the Emperour landed, and dined with the king, and he afterwards entred confidently into the Emperors Galley where they conferred long together, and parted with great shewes of friendship.

The Emperour and French king mees at Aguesmortes.

In the yeeare 1539. the Ganthois in the County of Flanders began to mutine: the Companies of Trades and occupations, assembled in their seuerall Halls, and then went to Armes, seeking to extort many things from the great Bailiffe, and the Magistrates of the Towne; they committed many to prison, and one they publikely beheaded of their owne authority. The Emperour hearing of this rebellion, (vpon the French Kings word and safe conduct) he posted from Spaine, to come by land, into the Netherlands through France; The Prince Dolphin and the Duke of Orleans, were ready to receiue him at the foot of the Pyrenian mountaines, who conducted him to Paris, being in great state, in all the townes where hee passed: approching neere vnto Paris the King met him hauing a godly traine of Princes, Noblemen, and Gentlemen; and being come to the Loure bothe the King and Queene ELENOR his sister, gaue him a very Royall reception, from whence hee was conducted to Valenciennes in Henalt: and from thence he went to Brussels, where hearing many complaints of the Ganthois rebellion, he went thither with 4000 men, where comming neere the towne the Magistrates met him, and brought him into the towne with great honor. Being duly informed of all matters, he caused many Burgesses to be apprehended: and their proces being made, there were nine of the chiefe beheaded, and the inhabitants were forbidden to carry knives, vnlesse the points were broken: and the better to keepe the towne in awe, the Emperour caused a strong cittadell to be built; their priuiledges were taken away, and many other indignities were done them, which I forbeare to relate.

The warres continued hot betwixt the Emperour and the French King, who had entred Brabant, and spoiled the Countrey vntill they came to Antwerp, being assisted by the troups of the Duke of Guelders. The Emperour hauing settled his affaires in the Netherlands, he went to Ratisbone, where he had appointed an Imperiall Diet; as well to prouide for the warre against the Turke, as to bring the Protestants vnder the obedience of the Church of Rome: and vnder the colour of Religion, he thought to stay the French King from making warre (being much incensed, for that his Embassadours had beene murdered going to Venice) by vndertaking the Conquest of Algier; for which attempt hee assembled his Forces, reiecting the wise counsell of his best Captaines, who aduised him to deferre the enterprise vntill the Spring following: but the enterprise prooued very fatall; for the Army was not onely annoied by Land by the Barbarians, but his Fleet was miserably torne and spoyled at Sea by Tempest, whereby the Armie was driuen to great extreamity for want of victualls, and the Emperour forced to retire; embarking his Armie in those few shipps and galleys that remained; himselfe shaping his course for Spaine, where he found himselfe ingaged in a difficult warre against the French King, who pretended the truce had beene broken, by the murder of his Embassadours; whereupon (as I haue said) he had sent troupes into Brabant, and the Duke of Orleance into Luxenbourgh: the Dolphin HENRY went with a goodly Army to besiege Perpignan, but he preuailed not: hee also made warre in Italy, and sent the Duke of Vendosme into Picardie.

His returne from that miserable attempt.

The French king inuades the Emperors territories.

The Emperour fainted not for all this; but that which troubled him much was to heare that SOLIMAN had newly repulst the forces of the Empire from before Buda, and that hee prepared to returne this yeere into Hungary with a mighty Army: and that which did afflict him more, was to vnderstand that BARBAROVSSH wes at sea with a great fleete, meaning to inuade his countries of Naples, and Sicily, or Spaine if hee could. To preuent all these mischiefs hee past into Italy and made a league with the King of England, from whence he went into Germany, and so into the Lowe Countries, and then began the warre in those parts betwixt the two Princes: for after many incounters, and sieges of townes, the two Armies being neere, and ready to giue battaile, by the mediation of some good men, a peace was concluded betwixt them, and the Emperour retired to Brussels in October, whither came in the same moneth Queene ELENOR the French Kings wife, with the Duke of Orleance, where they were receiued and entertained with great state and magnificence.

The Emperour went from thence to an Imperiall Diet at Wormes, where he meant to treat of matters of Religion; Pope PAVL and he hauing made a league in Iune 1546, concluding, that seeing the Protestants would not allow of the Councell of Trent, nor submit themselues vnto it, the Emperour should force them by Armes, and if he entred into any treaty with them, he should not preiudice the Church of Rome: That the Pope should consigne 100000 crownes at Venice, besides 100000 Crownes which he had already payed, to be imploied in this warre; that he should also intertaine 12000 foot, and 500 horse, for six moneths; That the Emperour might for this warre, take the one halfe of the reuenew of the Clergie, and sell of Abbey Lands, to the value of 500000 crownes: And if any Prince should seeke to hinder their resolution they should ioyne their forces together to resist them. Then they began to make preparation for this warre, both in Germany, Spaine, and Italy.

A league betweene the Pope and the Emperor against the Protestants of Germany.

The Emperour (as it seemed) had a further desigue; Viz. that hauing ruined the protestants, which made the greatest power of Germany, he would subiect the states of the Empire to his will, that he might keepe the Empire in his family, and make it hereditary: and for some proofe of this absolute power which he did affect, he had mad a truce with the Turk the better to attend this warre, without taking the aduice of those Princes and States, who had contributed great summes of money, to make warre against the enemy of Christendome.

Finally, after many conferences, and refusall of peace, which they had demanded; the confederate Princes raised a mighty Army, whereupon the Emperour proclaimed them guilty of high treason. The two Armies lay neere together, and the protestants offered battaile to the Emperor, but he would none; assuring himselfe that they could not long continue together. The protestants Army had two commanders, the D. of Saxonoy & the Lantgraue of Hessen, who did not concurre wel in their consultations, besides they wanted victuals, and money; so as they were forced to diſlodge and retire further off: whereupon, diuerſe proteſtant Townes compounded to pay money, and to receiue garriſons. The Emperor purſued the Elector, and forced him to fight with diſaduantage, where he was defeated and taken. Within fewe dayes the Emperor gaue Sentence of death againſt him, which was reuoked vpon ſuit made; yet vpon condition, that he ſhould reſigne the dignity of Elector; which was giuen to MAVRICE, with all his Lands. There were many other conditions impoſed vpon him, all which hee ſigned; onely he would not promiſe to obey the decrees of the Councell of Trent, proteſting conſtantly, that he had rather dy than yeeld to it: whereupon the Emperor cauſed that Article to be left out; yet for all this, FREDERICK continued priſoner to the Emperor.

Conditions propounded to the Lantzgraue.

D. MAVRICE being now Elector of Saxony, and the Marqueſs of Brandenburgh, ſons-in-law to the Lantzgraue of Heſſen, were ſuters for him; who obtaind a promiſe from the Emperor to pardon his life, to remit all other puniſhments due to the Rebels, to leaue him his Countrey, with one Fort furniſhed with artillery, ſo as he did renounce all leagues which did prejudice him or his brother FERDINAND, obey the Imperiall Chamber, deliuer vp the reſt of his Ordinance, pay 150000 crowns within foure months for the charges of the war, and deliuer the priſoners which he held, and come and craue pardon of the Emperor. The Lantzgraue accepted theſe conditions, and preſented himſelf to the Emperor vpon his knees; who returned him an ambiguous anſwer: yet, thinking that all went well, hee thanked the Emperour. Then going to ſup with the Duke of Alua, and thinking after ſupper to retire with his two ſons in law, he was detained priſoner, and giuen in guard to Spaniards, the which miniſtred matter of great diſcontent, Duke MAVRICE and Brandenburgh charging the Emperor with breach of his promiſe. This act depriued the Emperor of the fruits hee pretended of his enterpriſes, and was a means to chaſe him out of Germany.

Prince Philip take poſſeſſion of the duchie of Brabant.

Prince PHILIP, being ſent for by the Emperor his father, came from Spain into Italy; and ſo paſſing through Germany, arriued at Bruſſelles, the Emperor inueſting him in the Duchie of Brabant, the County of Flanders, of Henalt, and of Arthois, and afterwards of the Town of Antwerp, and the Marquiſate of the holy Empire: all which was performed with great pomp and ceremonies. In May 1550, the Emperor parted from Bruſſelles with the Prince his ſonne, to go to an Imperiall Diet held at Ausbourgh, where he preſt his brother FERDINAND to reſigne to Prince PHILIP his ſonne his right and dignity of King of the Romans; whereupon they grew to a quarell: for the pacifying whereof, MARY Queen of Hungary, their ſiſter, was forced to return to Ausbourgh. He purſued this reſignation by all means poſſible: but FERDINAND would neuer yeeld, thinking that if he made this dangerous alienation, all his ſons (hauing many) ſhould remain without eſtates: and he had ſent into Spain for MAXIMILIAN his ſonne to come to the Diet, beeing a milde and curteous Prince, and very pleaſing vnto all Germany. Prince PHILIP, hauing failed in this attempt, returned towards Spain the ſame way he came;

The Emperor ſolicits King Ferdinand to reſigne the dignity of the Romans for his ſon Philip.

Duke MAVRICE and Brandenburg, being aſſiſted by the king of Denmarke, the King of Romanes, and by many other Princes, who had written their Letters to the Emperour for the Lantzgraues deliuery: But it ſeemed the Emperor reſpected all theſe Princes little, referring the anſwere of their requeſt, to the comming of Duke MAVRICE, whom he ſaid he expected to come and treate with him. WILLIAM eldeſt ſonne to the Lantzgraue did importune him much: But Duke MAVRICE and the Marqueſſe of Brandenburg much more, ſpeaking very boldly vnto him, and putting him in minde of their bond and promiſe.

The Emperor, being puft vp with his good ſucceſſe in Germany, gaue diſtaſte to all, as well Catholiques as Proteſtants, by his exactions, vpon diuerſe pretenſes: of ſome to be ſatisfied for the charges of the warre, which he pretended to haue made for the liberty of Germany; of other by the way of chaſtiſement, for that they had reuolted: wherein he ſaid he proceeded mildely, quitting much of his right to eaſe and ſpare them. By this means there was neither Town nor Country, eſtate nor condition amongſt the Germans which were not vexed by taxes, and by ſowre ſpeeches and threats, if they preſumed to put him in minde of his conuention and promiſes. It is ſaid, that he wreſted from thoſe Princes and proteſtant Towns, aboue 500 pieces of great Ordinance, wherewith he furniſhed his Forts in Italie, Spain and Flanders. Duke MAVRICE remembring the captiuity of the Lantzgraue his father-in-law (whom hee had brought to the Emperor vpon a promiſe that he would not detain him priſoner, yet notwithſtanding he carried him vp and down as it were in triumph) reſolued to compound the wars with the town of Magdeburgh, which had been ſtraightly beſieged for that they reſiſted the Emperors edicts;

The Germans begin to growne diſcontent with the Emperor.

ſo as they had means to free themſelues vpon honeſt conditions; Duke MAVRICE beeing the chief in that action: who ſeeing the Emperor reject his many motions vnto him for the Land-graues deliuery, he entred into league with ALBERT of Brandebourg, the Land-graues children and others, and all they ioyntly with HENRY the Second, the French King (ſonne to FRANCIS the Firſt, who died before in the yeer one thouſand fiue hundred forty ſeuen) who marched ſpeedily with a great Army towards the Rhine, publiſhing that it was to reſtore the Germanes, his good neighbours, and antient friends, to their true and auntient liberty, which was taken from them by CHARLES of Auſtria, tearming himſelfe Emperour: the Proteſtant Princes went alſo to Armes, and took many Townes in Germany, into their protection, yet forcing them to furniſh both money and artillery into the townes of vpper Germany, to meet at Ausbourg in the end of Aprill.

A league betwixt the Princes of Germany and the French King againſt the Emperor.

Duke MAVRICE had taken Ausbourg, finding ſmall reſiſtance; from thence he marched towards Inſpruch, to ouertake the Emperour, who (ſeeing this new taking of Armes in Germany) had retired thither to draw men out of Italie. Hearing that the enemy approached, he ſent ſome fewe ſouldiers to defend Chiuſa, a very ſtrong paſſage in that Countrie, but it was ſoone forced by the Germanes; whereof the Emperor being aduertiſed, he parted ſuddenly from Inſpruch, in the night by torch-light, in a rainy ſeaſon, and retired to Villaco, a Caſtle belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, vpon the confines of Friuly. It was a miſerable thing to ſee the Emperor and his Court depart in ſuch haſte, at ſuch time, and in ſuch a ſeaſon, hauing left behinde them moſt part of their baggage, many walking on foote for want of Horſes, whom the Emperour comforted what he could. Duke MAVRICE came the ſame night to Inſpruch, but followed the Emperour no further, making ſpoile only of what the Court had left there. But this warre had an end by the Land-graues deliuery, and by a peace concluded by FERDINAND's mediation at Naſſau, the which the Emperour himſelfe ſigned.

The Emperour flies to Villaco for feare of Maurice.

The French king was diſcontented with this accord, yet hearing that the Land-graue was in great danger, if it had not been concluded, he yeelded, ſending back the hoſtages (which the Proteſtant Princes had giuen him) ſafe into Germany, and retired with his Army, retaining for his charges, Metz, Thoule, and Verdun, Imperiall townes. The Land-graue was ſet at liberty according to the accord, hauing been a priſoner fiue yeers at Macklin in Brabant, and returning homeward, he was againe ſtayed by the Queene of Hungaries commandement, who pretended that the Peace was broken.

The Duke of Saxony and the Land-graue ſet at liberty.

The Emperour ſet IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony at liberty, hauing firſt depriued him of his Electorall dignity, and his eſtate; And in September the Land-graue was abſolutely diſcharged, and returned to his houſe: And the Emperor finding himſelfe bound to recouer thoſe townes which the French had taken, came with a goodly Army, and laid ſiege to Metz, in Nouember, the which he battered with 40 Cannons. The winter was very ſharpe, and the town well mand, and valiantly defended, by many good captains, Princes, and others of great houſes, vnder the command of the Duke of Guiſe: ſo as feeing his Army ouer-toyled, and diminiſhed daily, through hunger, cold, nakedneſſe, and want of all things, being preſſed by neceſſity, he retired his Army with loſſe and diſhonor; from whence the Emperor returned to Bruſſells, and the warres continued betwixt him and the French King, vpon the Frontiers of Arthois and Picardy, where there paſſed many encounters and taking of townes.

Metz beſieged by the Emperor.

In the yeere one thouſand fiue hundred fifty foure, HENRY the French king, ſent three Armies againſt the Emperor, the firſt into Vermandois vnder the Prince La Roche ſur Yonne: the ſecond towards Crely led by the Conſtable, and the third was commanded by the Duke of Neuers, who entred the Ardennes, took Orchimont, and burnt many villages, and paſſing into the countrey of Leege, he aſſured the paſſage of the Riuer of Meuze, by the taking of ſome ſtrong Forts. The Conſtables Army took Marreimburg, and Rocroy, with diuers other places; The Prince of Roch ſur Yonne, with the Duke of Neuers, entred Henalt, and Brabant, where they burnt all the villages, and carried away a great Prey, leauing the countrey miſerable and deſolate; They beſieged the Caſtle of Ranty, which the Emperor came in perſon to relieue, whereupon the French retired their Army.

Three French Armies againſt the Emperor.

During the warres in Germany and the Lowe Countries: the Turkes and Pirates of Affrick, ſpoyled the Coaſts of Naples, Sicily, and Spaine: whereof the chiefe commander was DRAGAT RAYS a famous Pirate, who ſurprized the towne of Affrick, which then was well peopled and of great traffique, whereby he made himſelfe fearefull to all the Coaſts of Italie and Spaine. So as the Emperor was daily importuned to diſlodge him from thence, who gaue charge to Don IOHN de Vega, Viceroy of Sicilie, and ANDREVV DORIA, to gather an Army together with all ſpeede for this action, who came in Iune, one thouſand fiue hundred fifty two, with 54 Gallies well mand with ſouldiers and mariners, and landed neere to the towne of Affrick, but they firſt attempted Miniſterio a little towne neere it with a good Caſtle, the which DRAGVT had fortified with a good Garriſon of Moores, and Turks: the which they hauing battered; in the end, after a long defence they took it, all the Turkes being either ſlaine, or taken priſoners: Then they turned towards Affrick, the ſiege whereof they found to be of greater difficulty, it being inuironed on three parts by Sea, where they could not eaſily batter it, and the fourth ſide vpon the Land, was very well fortified, yet they planted their Cannon againſt a rauelin and made a breach which the Spaniards entred with great courage and reſolution: but there being no diuerſion made by the Gallies, as it was ordered, they were oppreſſed by all the forces of the Towne, and repulſt with great loſſe, the which did much afflict the whole Campe, there being ſmall hope in this ſiege; for the Moores and Turkes were growne proud, and in the Campe they wanted both men, munition and victuall; but ſending to Genoa, they were ſupplied with 1200 Spaniſh foote from Milan; and the Duke of Florence, and the State of Genoa, fortified them with munition and victuals.

Affrick a Towne in the Realme of Tunis taken by the Spaniards.

DRAGVT was reſolued to relieue them by Land, hauing gathered together many Moors, which he ioyned to ſeuen hundred Turkes, who making often attempts, did much annoy the Chriſtians: But in the end, hauing loſt many of his men in a furious skirmiſh, he deſpaired, and retired himſelfe to Gerbe; after which they concluded to make three batteries, one by Sea, and two by land, where hauing made ſufficient breaches, they came to the aſſault and tooke it, the Turks hauing defended it very valiantly: In which Towne (ſome write) there were 10000 priſoners taken; it was afterwards to be razed by the aduice of the Emperors Councel, being held a place of great charge, and not guardable.

After all the warres vpon the Frontiers of France and the Netherlands, betwixt the Emperour and the French king, they ſent their deputies, who met in a Plain betwixt Ardres, Calais, and Graueling, hauing Tents ſet vp for that purpoſe, whither came Cardinall POOLE from England, to aſſiſt as a mediator and vmpier betwixt them: The demands on either ſide were ſo exceſſiue, as they could not agree, and ſo the aſſembly proued fruitleſſe.

An aſſembly to treat of a peace.

This yeer, on the ninth of May, newes came to the Emperor of the death of Queen IOAN his mother, in the Town of Tordeſillas, hauing been alwaies troubled in her ſenſes and diſtracted ſince the death of King PHILIP her husband, vntill ſhe was 75 yeers old. This Princeſſe troubling herſelf infinitely for that ſhe thought ſhe was contemned and kept as a priſoner, this ambitious humour of command would not ſuffer her to take any reſt; ſo as this ſharp and violent humour of melancholy (which ſhe had as it were by inheritance from Queen ISABELL of Portugall, her grandmother, wife to IOHN the ſecond King of Caſtile) was continually augmented in her: her funerall was deferred vntill the coming of King PHILIP, who was then in England with Queen MARY his wife, who arriued at Bruſſels in September. At what time the funerals were celebrated with great pomp and ſtate.

The death of Queen Ioan the Emperors mother.

This yeer the Emperor performed an act, which bred admiration in all the World; for, being broken with the toiles and cares of the World, and willing to free himſelfe of ſo great a burthen, he renounced the abſolute Gouernment, with all the titles of thoſe Realmes and Eſtates, except the Empire, in the which his brother FERDINAND was to ſucceede. And to this end he called all the Knights of the order of the Golden-fleece to Court, in whoſe preſence he pulled the Coller of the ſaide order, from his owne neck, and put it about his ſonnes; ſaying, I doe now make you Soueraigne of the noble order of the Golden-fleece; maintaine it in the like dignity that I, my Father, and predeceſſors haue done. Then turning to the knights he ſaid, Prince my ſonne, theſe are the faithfull ſeruants, which haue been the ſupport of my Empire, by whom I haue ouergone many perils and dangers, and therefore I haue loued them dearly. If you doo the like, I aſſure my ſelf they will carry you the like affection and obedience: but if you intreat them otherwiſe, they will be the cauſe of the ruine of your eſtate; wherefore loue and honour them.

The Emperor reſignes his gouernment to his ſon K. Philip.

On the twenty fift of Nouember, all the States being aſſembled in the great Hall at the Palace of Bruſſels, the Emperor came thither, being accompanied by the King his ſonne, Queen MARY the Regent, with many other Noble-men; whereas the Queen cauſed all men to depart, of what degree ſoeuer, but ſuch as were called to this ſolemn Act.

The Emperour, King, Queene and all the deputies being ſet according to their degrees,

PHILLI-

PHILLIBERT of Bruſſels the Emperors Orator, made a long ſpeech to them in his Maieſties name; giuing them to vnderſtand, that he had gouerned thoſe his hereditary countries long, and had alwaies endeuoured to maintaine the publike quiet; that he had vndertaken many paineful and dangerous voiages to come vnto them; that he had been carefull to gouerne them with iuſtice, to maintaine their rights and priuiledges, and to doe all other things whereunto a good Prince is bound; All which he held well imployed, being done for ſuch faithfull, dutifull, and obedient ſubiects. But his age and the weakeneſſe of his bodie making him vnable to vndergo his forepaſſed toyles, he was reſolued to giue ouer that burthen and to commit it to another; who might continue as he had begunne; and ſo retire himſelfe into Spaine, from whence hee had been long abſent, the climate being more agreeable to his health then any other; wherfore he reſolued to ſubſtitute in his place, his deere and only ſonne, and their Lord and lawfull Prince, to whom they had giuen their oath; his maieſty knowing well, that the king his ſon was not only ſufficient to vndergo the charge, but alſo had a will and a deſire to imploy himſelfe for the good of thoſe countries: wherefore his Imperiall maieſty truſting that they would like thereof, and that for the loue of him, they would willingly accept in his place the king, their Lord and Prince, he did then giue ouer thoſe Countries, and reſigne them into his ſonnes hands, intreating them earneſtly to receiue him willingly and cheerefully. And accordingly he did freely acquit and diſcharge them of their oath of fealty and homage, that they might take the ſame vnto their king at the reception of their eſtates and offices.

An Oration to the States in the emperors name.

His Maieſty did alſo intreate them to take in good part the affection which he had ſhewed by the effects, hauing omitted no trauaile nor care belonging to his dutie, confeſſing withall that they had been good and loyall ſubiects, and had aſſiſted him faithfully and dutifully. He vſed many words more, admoniſhing them of diuers things which concerned their eſtate. After which ſpeech the Emperor began to ſpeake vnto them in French, ſaying;

That he had forty yeers ſince in the ſame place beeen emancipated by the Emperor MAXIMILIAN his Grand-father, and put in poſſeſſion of thoſe Countries, ſince which time he had runne through many fortunes, and endured much as well in Spaine, touching the affaires of Queene IOANE his mother, and the gouernment of her kingdoms, as in his other eſtates: he ſhewed alſo how many troubleſome, long, painefull and daungerous voyages he had made in paſſing and repaſſing the Seas, as well into Spaine as into Italie, to the great perill of his perſon; namely in the voyages to Barbary, Tunis and Algier; he ſhewed alſo into what daunger he had willingly thruſt himſelfe, paſſing through France, to preuent the troubles which were like to grow in the Nether-lands, which he euer had in great recommendation. And as they had alwaies been to him louing ſubiects and faithfull vaſſalls; ſo he intreated them to be the like vnto his ſonne, into whoſe hands he had reſigned thoſe Countries. In ſpeaking of which words he ſhewed ſuch paſſion, as ſighs interrupting his ſpeech, the teares trickled downe his cheekes, which moued many to the like compaſſion: hauing made a little pauſe, he tooke his Spectacles, and looking vpon a remembrance which he had in his hand, he ſaid that his ſight and memorie were not ſo good as they had been, and that he felt himſelfe to decline, and grow weake houreſy, vnable to endure the trauaile that was requiſite for the preſeruation of the Countrey and of them all, the which did moue him chiefly to returne into Spaine, and not to prolong his life, the which he referred into the hands of God. Laſtly, he intreated them to continue in the Chriſtian Religion, as they had done, and to obſerue iuſtice. After theſe words, the king kneeling down before his Father, ſaid vnto him that he was vnworthy of ſo great a fauour: but ſeeing it was his Maieſties pleaſure, he humbly thanked him, accepting the charge, proteſting to be ſo carefull to gouerne his Subiects with iuſtice, as he hoped they ſhould reſt ſatisfied with him, reſeruing to make manifeſt by his deedes the loue which he bare them: And turning to the aſſembly, he ſpake in French, ſaying; I would, my Lords, that my skill in this language were more then it is, to the end I might make you the better vnderſtand what affection I beare you; but for as much as I cannot expreſſe it in ſuch tearms as were fit, the Biſhop of Arras ſhal ſpeak for me; who riſing vp, deliuered the Kings minde at large: which being ended, King PHILIP retired to his ſeat. After which, Doctor MASEVS an eloquent Orator, deputed to that end by the States, made anſwer to the former ſpeeches, ſaying, that they knew well his Imperiall Maieſty had for many yeers gouerned that eſtate carefully and religiouſly; that he had vndergon great and many toils in many accidents; that notwithſtanding his Majeſties great and vrgent affaires, yet he had alwais carried a fatherly loue and affection to thoſe Countries of his inheritance, whereof the people had taſted the fruit whenſoeuer they ſtood in need: all which duely conſi-dered, they found that his Majesty was well aduised in that which he had propounded. And therefore the Nobles, Prelates, and Deputies of Townes there present (although it were a sword which did wound their hearts to hear of his Majesties departure, yet desiring to conform themselues in all things to his good will and pleasure) did humbly thank his Imperiall Majesty for the great honour and fauour he had done them; euery one being very ready to consent irreuocably to the said Cession or resignation made by his Imperiall Majesty of all those Netherlands to the behoof of the King there present, whom they did acknowledge for their naturall Lord and Prince, the lawfull sonne and onely heir of his Imperiall Maiesty, beeing ready to renew the oath which they had formerly made vnto him, with all other duties requisite in the like case: and so, after thanks giuen, he ended his speech.

The words of Queen Mary to the Emperor.

During this action, Queen MARY of Hungary, the Emperors sister, and Gouernesse of those Countries, rising from her seat, said reuerently to the Emperor, that she had euer endeauoured to gouern those Countries in such manner as she thought most expedient for his Majesties benefit and the publike good: but if peraduenture, according to his desire and her good intent she had not attained thereto, she humbly besought his Majesty to pardon her. To whom the Emperor, both with his hands and his countenance, made great shew to bee well pleased: and then she, turning herself towards the States, vsed in a manner the same words which shee had done to the Emperor.

After all these speeches, the Emperor by a publike Act resigned to his son K. PHILIP the Kingdoms of Spain, Sicily, Sardinia, Maiorca, Minorca, the Indies, and all others depending vpon the Crowne of Spain, reseruing onely a small yeerly reuenue for the maintaining of himself and a fewe seruants. The next morning the Deputies of the Duchy of Brabant coming to Court, King Philip takes the oath as Duke of Brabant.

King PHILIP in their presence renewed the oath which he had formerly taken in the yeer 1549, to keep, maintain and preserue them in their antient rights, priuiledges and customes, without breaking them, or suffering them to be broken in any sort whatsoeuer. And the Deputies of the chief Towns of Brabant did also take the oath of fealty and homage to him, as to their Lord and Duke of Brabant.

Resolution of the Imperiall diet held at Ausbourg.

About this time there ended an Imperiall Diet held at Ausbourg, where king FERDINAND did preside in the Emperors name; in the which, after much debate, it was concluded, that neither the Emperor, King FERDINAND, nor any other Prince, or State should doe wrong to any of the Empire, in what sort soeuer, by reason of the confession of Ausbourg; that from thenceforth they should not force by edict or other meanes, the allies of this confession, to abandon their Religion; but should suffer them to enioy it freely with their goods, rights, and possessions, with many other priuiledges, granted in fauour of their Religion. It was thought that the Pope was wonderfully discontented with this decree, and that he did solicite the Emperor to disannull it. Before the Act of the Emperors resignation, he gaue instructions to his sonne PHILP, touching the gouernement of his person and estate; the which being very long, would take vp too much roome in this Volume; but I will only make mention of the reasons which moued him to this resignation, who speaking vnto him, said:

The Emperors speech to his son.

I haue resolued deer sonne, to come to the point of resigning into your hands, the absolute gouernement of all my Realmes and estates; wherefore my pleasure is, that against the morning you giue order for the performance of this Act, with all due Ceremonies: you shall giue order with speede, that all Gouernors, Magistrates, and all other persons, acknowledge you for their superior; that all persons (except the subiects of the Empire) take the Oath of allegeance: the more rare this president is, the greater are the signes, both of my loue to you, and of the assurance I haue of your good inclination, and also of the great care I haue to see your estate settled. I could deferre this Act (as most Princes doe) vntill my death; but hauing a desire rather to imitate the smaller number of Fathers in this point, I haue chosen willingly by this Act in my life time, to make my selfe a superior, rather then a companion to any. It is a weake triall of the valour and resolution of a Prince, to subdue kingdoms by force, in comparison of conquering himselfe, being not only content to bridle all ambition and desire of Rule, but to submitte himselfe to a certain kinde of obedience: Against this course, sensuality doth striue with all her force; and in exchange of all worldly satisfactions, which are enioyed by the prerogatiue of absolute authority, setteth before our eyes the rigor of the Lawes; to which (Princes setting their authorities aside) must leuell all their actions, as well as priuate men. To blinde our vnderstanding with like veiles, the same sensuall consideration stirreth vp, by way of admonition, a prouident forecast of diuers inconueniences, whereinto many fall, which haue made themselues subiect to the will of other men, by the diuersity of their conceites and censures, the which by the corruption of the care of priuate interest, are apt to swarue from the right rule of integritie. It may be that some will be terrified with this common supposition, that Princes which are once possessed with authority, may resigne it at their own pleasures, but they must resume it at the pleasures of other men: yet fatherly loue and affection hath preuailed more with me, then all these worldly considerations, and dutie also in some sort; for, finding my selfe now aged (which may be accounted greater, in regard of my sickly estate) my satiety of glory in this World, and wearinesse of toyle; finding moreouer that by my continual trauaile vnto this day, I could not satisfie in any part the dutie which belongerh vnto the profession of a Christian; I finde my selfe enflamed with a most earnest desire to free my selfe from so many troubles and incombrances, and then retire to a more religious kinde of life, and more fit for a Christian. On the other side the consideration of your age being now ripe, and fit for gouernement, together with the expectation which you haue gotten in the World, by managing the greatest affairs of Spain with great iudgement, moueme now the rather to proceed in my resolution. Being incited with all these good considerations, I haue thought it fit to lay this waighty burthen vpon your shoulders, and to ease mine owne, which time and trauaile haue now weakened and disabled. I doe confidently hope, that the subiects of all my countries, shall haue cause to thanke God first, and then me for this resolution, in respect of the gracious vsage they shall receiue at your hands, succeeding in my place: neither is it hurtfull vnto your selfe, that by this occasion, during my life, you shall settle your selfe more firmely in my Dominions. And so hee proceeded to his aduice and counsel, touching the gouernment of his Estates.

After that the Emperour had resigned all his kingdomes vnto king PHILIP his sonne, and disposed of his affaires in the Netherlands, being desirous to free himselfe from all temporall cares, and to spend the remainder of his daies in peace, applying himselfe wholly to the seruice of God; he resolued to retire himselfe with his two sisters, ELENOR the French Queen, and MARY Queene of Hungary into Spaine: But before his departure, he would also dispose of the Empire, the which he would resigne vnto his brother FERDINAND King of the Romanes, and to that end he wrote his Letters vnto the Princes Electors and States of the Empire; giuing them to vnderstand, that finding himselfe ouercharged with age, and continuall infirmities, which had disabled him for the managing of affaires; hauing long before resolued to resigne all his Realmes of Spaine to the Prince his sonne, hauing taken leaue of the Court, being ready to imbarque with the first prosperous winde; and seeing that by his absence, the gouernement of the Empire did of right belong vnto his deere and welbeloued brother FERDINAND king of the Romanes, of Hungary and Bohemia, as his lawfull successor in the said qualitie of King of Romanes; which gouernment he had for many yeers well deserued in his absence, supporting the burthen with a brotherly loue and affection; wherefore lest the holy Empire should fal into some dangerous inconuenience, he had resolued that his said brother, king of Romans, should haue absolute and irreuocable power to treate, negociate and command in all things that he should finde requisite and necessary for the greatnesse, prosperity and increase of the Empire, as absolutely as he himselfe being Emperor might doe: and for that he could not come vnto the Imperiall Diet at Ratisbone, there to haue resigned the gouernment of the Empire vnto the king of Romanes, as he had intended, he thought it good by those Letters to acquaint them with his resolution, inioyning all men by his Imperiall authority to shew all loyalty and obedience vnto the King of Romanes, and to honour and respect him in all his commandements, and Decrees, without any contradiction, as they would doe himselfe, if hee were there in person.

The Emperor writes to the princes Electors

After this, the fleet being ready in Zeland, he took his leaue of PHILIP his son, and of all the Princes and Noble-men: then he imbarked with his two sisters, and arriued within fewe daies in Spain; where, after some daies rest, he retired to a Monastery of Saint IEROME the Hermite, in Estremadura neer Placencia, an vnfrequented place, and fit for heauenly meditations, where he liued not aboue two yeers, spending his time in holy and godly works. And the better to attend the seruice of God, he would haue his sisters to liue from him at Vailladolit, that they might not trouble him. He reserued but 100000 crowns a yeer to himself, whereof hee employed only 4000, for his diet and entertainment: the rest he disposed of, for the marrying of yong maids, and to relieue widdowes and orphanes, and for other works of Charity.

The Emperor departeth with his two sisters out of the Netherlands.

Diuerse opinions touching the Emperors renunciation.

This Act of renunciation, being one of the rarest presedents, that had bin seen for manie ages, ministred occasion vnto the world, to discourse of the reasons that might induce him to depriue himself of so great a dignity. Some held opinion that his infirmity of the gowt being very grieuous; and foreseeing that it would shorten his life, was the cause that moued him to that resolution. Others said that he did it vpon discontent, seing himself bearded and ouermatched, by HENRY the French king: and some affirmed that to auoide the crosses of fortune, which (by the relation of certaine Astrologians) he knew would befall him, he with great iudgement resolued to retire himself before it should in that sort obscure the brightnesse of that glory, which he with so much toile had gotten. There were also some which said that fortune began to frowne on him when as he made his retreat to Vilacco and went to besiege Mets: so as some commending and others blaming his resolution all did censure diuersely thereon.

THE LIFE OF FERDINAND, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND SIXTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

THis present life of the Emperour Ferdinand, containeth his countrey, his parentage, his education, and where he was brought vp; how he became Lord of Austria, Bohemia, Hungary, and Transiluania; his warres with Iohn Sepusius, the taking of Buda; with the siege of Viena; when he was created King of the Romanes, his agreement made with the said Iohn, the difference betweene Frier George and him; the often comming of Soliman into Hungary; the Insurrections in Germany against the Emperour Charles the Fift; the displeasure of Pope Paul the Fourth, the creating of Maximilian King of the Romanes, his conuersation and behauiour, and the children which he had by his wife Anne, sister to Lewes King of Hungary.

The birth of Ferdinand, when, and who was his father.

AMong many Townes worthy respect, in the Kingdom of Toledo in Spaine, it is certaine (as it appeareth by the Chronicles thereof) that Alcala Henarez in antient time, euer hath been, and still is, one of the chiefe; wherin besides the men of singular valour which in time past haue liued there, in the yeere of the incarnation of the sonne of God 1503. vpon the tenth day of May, in the same yeere, FERDINAND of Austria of that name the first Emperour of the West, was borne; whose father was PHILIP the first of that name, King of Castile, and sonne to the Emperor MAXIMILIAN: his mother was IOANE, daughter to FERDINAND and ISABEL, King and Queene of Spaine, who by reason of the vnexpected sodaine death of his Father (which happened in the yeere 1506) remaining vnder the tutele of his Grandfather FERDINAND (commonly called the Catholike) was by him (by means of the excellencie cellencie of his wit, besides the exercise of Armes) carefully instructed, in diuers languages; principally in the puritie of the Latin tongue; wherein, in short space he profited so much, that to the great admiration of all men, he prooued a most actiue Knight in Armes, and a perfect Orator in the Latin, Dutch, Spanish, Italian, Hungarish and Bohemian tongues; so as all men did prognosticate him to proue a Prince of singular valour: and this made him the more accounted of, for that by all men generally which knew them, he was likened to FERDINAND the Third, who by force took Seuil from the Moores, from whom by his mother, he descended. That FERDINAND for his many vertues, was no lesse numbered amongst the blessed, then reputed happie amongst all the Kings of Spaine, for being father of King ALONSO, who for his rare knowledge in Sciences, was surnamed the Sage: who in the long schisme of the Empire, in the yeere 1258, being by the greatest part of the Princes Electors of the Empire chosen Emperour; by the perswasion of Pope GREGORY the Tenth, for the common quietnes of Christendome, voluntarily resigned, and gaue vp his right, after that he had enioyed the name of Emperor the space of sixteene yeeres, approouing and ratifying the successiue election of RODVLPH the First of that name, from whom from father to sonne this FERDINAND lineally descended.

This FERDINAND being brought vp in Spaine, vnder the Catholike King, was for his rare qualities so much beloued by the Spaniardes, that his brother CHARLES in the yeere 1520. remaining (through the death of his Grandfather FERDINAND, which happened in the yeere 1516.) heire generall of the kingdoms of Spaine, of both the Sicilies, of the West Indies, of Burgundie, and Austria, and in the yeere 1519. through the death of his Grand-father MAXIMILIAN, chosen to weare the Imperiall Diadem, was by those which (tumultuously mutinying vnder the name of the holy assembly) rebelled against his brother CHARLES, by reason of the vnmeasurable oppressions laid vpon them by his polling officers, instantly requested and entreated to make himselfe King of Spaine; whereto not consenting (much more esteeming the preseruation of his faith, by refusing those estates, then the greatnes of them, by violating the same to his eternall infamie) with singular integrity of minde, he not onely refused their offer, but vsed all meanes possible to retaine those kingdomes in his brothers subiection: for which, he was euer after entirely beloued by him. Who returning into Spaine, in the yeer 1529. not onely reconfirmed vnto him the donation of the Archduchy of Austria (the antient patrimonie of their family) made ouer to him by testament, by their Grandfather MAXIMILIAN, by his brother CHARLES his consent, to whom as to the eldest sonne it did appertaine; but he also freely gaue him the Countries of Stiria, and Carinthia, with the Counties of Tirol, Halspurge, and Hassia: hauing first in the Diet at Wormes, declared him (to the good liking of the Princes Electors) his Lieutenant, and Imperiall Vicar in Germany; whither, within a while after this graunt, going in the yeere 1521. hee was honorably receiued by the Germanes; and as Vicar of the Empire, was with great magnificence, met by all the Potentates: where making no long abode, he went to take possession of his dominions, to the great good liking of that people.

In the same yeere he celebrated his contracted nuptials, with ANNE sister to LEWES king of Hungary and Bohemia; renewing the oaths sworne in the yeere 1515. betweene his Grandfather MAXIMILIAN, and LADISLAVS father to King LEVVES; which were, that LEVVES dying without issue, FERDINAND, or any other begotten by him, and his said sister ANNE, should succeed in his kingdome. But either through the iust wrath of God kindled against the manifold iniquities of the Hungars, or what other occasion I know not, the two brothers in-law had scarcely enioyed the beloued fruite of the established succession two moneths, but FERDINAND being molested by the instability of fortune (seldome constant in prosperity) was aduertised that SOLIMAN Emperour of the Turks, being victorious, hauing subduced GAZELLES in Soria in the yeere 1516; and also for that his father SELIM, had in three seuerall battailes, with incredible fortune, first ouerthrowne CAMPSON, and soone after TOMOMBEY, Souldanes of Egypt; GAZELLES giuing place to fortune, and voluntarily yeelding himselfe into the power of his victorious enemy, was with great fauour receiued into grace: so that notwithstanding that the Empire of the Souldanes was extinguished in Egypt, yet he hauing liberty was made Gouernour of Soria (not without much murmuring of the Turkish Captaines, his Lieutenants in that countrey). Neuertheless GAZELLES in the yeere 1519. being certified of the death of SELIM, thinking himself now discharged of the oath of fealtie which he had sworne vnto him onely (without any mention made of his successors) and therewith earnestly desiring to reuiue the antient dominion of the Souldiers, Egypt taken by the Turks.

leuied the greatest forces of Mamalukes, Arabians, and Syrians that he possibly could; with which, rebelling, he made himselfe Lord of sundry Cities in Soria: against whom in the yeere 1520, SOLIMAN sent FARAAT Basha with a great Army; who fighting with him neere to the City of Damasco; GAZELLES being slaine in the battaile, he obtained a notable victory, which happened in the end of the yeer 1520. FERDINAND (as I said) being aduertised that SOLIMAN puft vp with pride by reason of his victory, resolued to make warre in Hungary; where through the negligence of King LEWES, and want of reliefe from the Emperour CHARLES, or his Lieutenant FERDINAND, the Turkes (making sundry roades and incursions into the Countrey) in the end besieged, battered, and tooke the strong City of Belgrade, in antient time called Taurinum, situated in Angularia Forme, between the riuers Sauus and Danubius, the which was held the buckler of Christendome, and in the time of MATTHEVV King of Hungary, it had been twice assaulted in vaine by MAMORT his great Grand-father, and AMVRATH father to the said MAHOMET, and now by the negligence of King LEWES, who did not relieue it in time (although he were much importuned thereunto by FERDINAND) after some moneths siege, it was forced by SOLIMAN, and a great slaughter made of the Christians.

Belgrade in Hungary taken by the Turke.

But FERDINAND as it seemeth taking more care to suppresse LVTHER's doctrine, then for the defence of Hungary against the Turkes; in a Councell held at Norimburgh, vpon grieuous penalties, prohibited the reading of the Bible, which LVTHER had translated; but yet LVTHER neuertheless being countenanced by IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony published his booke, wherein he toucht all the Romish Princes of Germany, but chiefly FERDINAND. Hereupon FERDINAND summoned a Councell to be held in Ratisbone in the yeer 1523, whither from Pope CLEMENT the seuenth, who succeeded ADRIAN the sixt, came Cardinall LAVRENCE CAMPEIVS, to procure (although in vaine) the suppression of LVTHER's doctrine. About which matter FERDINAND hauing spent the yeers 1523, and 1524, had intelligence that SOLIMAN after the taking of the Isle of Rhodes (which he vpon composition entred vpon the fiue and twentith day of December, being Christmas day, in the yeer 1522, after that it had been by the Knights of the order, held and valiantly defended against the whole forces of the Infidels, for the space of 214 yeers, from the yeer 1380 at which time it was taken from the Infidels vntill then; and after that it had been now besieged the space of fixe moneths, in which time the Turke lost the greatest part of his Army; for besides those which were slaine at the many assaults which were giuen, aboue 30000 died of the flix) threatned to bring greater calamities vpon the Christians: among which a man would haue thought, the long troubles of the former wars, in the yeer 1525, would haue ended. For the imprisonment of FRANCIS the first King of France, who by the Emperors Captaines, vpon the foure and twentith of February in the same yeer, was taken at the battaile of Pauia, made most men to thinke that the Emperor would not haue released him, without an assured peace with France; by which meane, he might not only haue been able to haue performed any great attempt, but also haue made frustrate SOLIMAN's designes. But as men in future accidents are most commonly deceiued in their opinions, so the affaires of the Christians fell afterwards into farre worse tearmes; for the most part of the Christian Princes being moued against the Emperor, either through griefe for the French kings aduersitie (a Prince for the worth of his person, and the greatnesse of so flourishing a kingdome highly esteemed) or else for feare of their owne particular interest, doubting that he would haue aspired to the absolute Monarchy; the state of Christendome came to be so confused and out of order, especially in Italie, that mens iudgement proued not only vaine, but the troubles continued a long time after.

Soliman the great Turke entred Hungary with an army of 200000 men: & the reason.

Italy being by reason of the warre betweene CHARLES the Fift, and FRANCIS the French King miserably afflicted, the one enuying the others greatnesse; most of the Princes and states in Christendome were by the one or other (to the great enfeebling of the whole Christian Common-wealth) drawne into the action; which SOLIMAN the great Turke perceiuing, was thereby encouraged with an Army of two hundred thousand men to inuade Hungary; into which (hauing Belgrade) he had an open passage; thinking withall that he might easily oppresse the young king of Hungary, who was ill obeyed in his kingdome, by the discord of his Barons; hauing also small experience in the art of war, by reason of his yong yeeres. King LEWES, who in regarde of his tender age, was but weake of iudgement and terrified with the fame of so powerfull an enemy, sending in vaine to all places for succors; hee called a Diet of Hungarians, which was according to their custome of armed men, who were bound to assist him in in the wars. The Nobility of Hungary (who had neuer seene the campe of a Turkish Emperour, but had onely incountred them in light skirmishes) despised the Turkes in such sort, as they bragged vainely, that if they came to fight they would cut in pieces huge Armies of Turks: Among the which PAVL TOMORBVS Archbishop of Colossa shewed himselfe most vaine, assuring himselfe confidently of the victory, bragging that he would be the first that should charge the Turkish troupes with his lance. The King had not in his Army aboue 26000; and yet TOMORBVS would needes presse him to fight: whose presumption all men of iudgment condemned; and the old soldiers said that it was the part of desperate men, to ioyne battaile with such an enemy who had neere eight times as many fighting men in his Army: wherefore some were of opinion that the king should retire himself, and STEPHEN VERBESIVS Generall of his Army perswaded him to go into the Castle of Buda; but the obstinate soldiers opposed, saying that they were not to fight vnlesse the King did lead them. TOMORBVS prenailed, and the king resolued to go and meete the enemy: yea, TOMORBVS madnes was such, as he would not staie for IOHN SEPVSIVS gouernour of Transiluania who marcht with an Army to ioyne with the king. The Armies ioyning, the Hungarians were in halfe an houre ouerthrowne. And the poore king seeing his whole Army in rout, thought to saue himselfe by flight: but passing through a marish fenne, his horse falling, he was smothered in the mud, there being not halfe a foot of water: his page escaped and obserued the place, so as many daies after the enemies retreat, the Kinges bodie was found, and buried in Alba Regalis. After the victory it is said that SOLIMAN wondred at the beastly humor of the Hungarians, and that the kings Counsellers should be possest with such madnes, as with so small forces to incounter so great an Army. Hauing seene the pictures of the King and the Queene his wife, he was grieued (he said) for the disgrace of that young king, who hauing had such foolish counsellors, in a matter of such importance, had grossely made haste to ioyne battaile; adding withall that he came not into Hungary to depriue him of his kingdome, but to reuenge the wrong done him by the Hungarians; and if he had escaped from the battaile he would onely haue imposed a tribute, and restored him to his kingdome: and that he would haue held it a glory to haue preserued one who was son to a brother of SIGISMVND King of Poland his friend, and so strictly allied to the Noble house of Austria: which words he deliuered with great maiesty. This battaile was fought in October 1526.

The Hungarians ouerthrowne by the Turke.

Death of Lewes king of Hungary.

For the infortunate death of King LEWES, FERDINAND was very sorrowfull: for besides the losse of his friend and brother in-law, he was aduertised that SOLIMAN besides other places, without one blow striken, had taken the city of Buda; and that from thence, besides the most excellent Artillery which he found there, he had carried the statues of HERCVLES, APOLLO, and DIANA, most exquisitely made in brasse, and left there by the great MATTHEVV CORVINVS: and that with an infinite number of captiues, and loden with prey and bootie, he was returned to Constantinople.

After SOLIMAN's departure, King FERDINAND went into Bohemia, and there was crowned together with his wife, who a little before was deliuered of a daughter called ISABEL, which afterwards was married to SIGISMVND King of Poland: and being in peace King of Boliemia, he challenged to be King of Hungary. But knowing that IOHN SEPVSIVS Vaiuode of Transiluania, after the celebration of the sumptuous obsequies of King LEWES, notwithstanding FERDINAND's former election, aspiring to the kingdom, had made himselfe to be crowned King of Hungary; and at the same time had bestowed vpon those Lords which had assisted him in the action, the principall estates of that kingdom, to the end that being obliged to him for receiued benefits, they should not after their accustomed manner practise ought against him; FERDINAND made himself in Bohemia to be crowned King of Hungary, in the presence of Doctor STEPHEN, and other Hungarian Lords his friends, which after the death of king LEWES came to see him.

Iohn Sepusius Vaiuode of Transiluania crowned king of Hungary.

Ferdinand in Bohemia crowned king of Hungary.

After this coronation, FERDINAND hauing leuied an Army, presently marched therewith against IOHN SEPVSIVS: who by reason of the inequality, of their powers standing in some feare of him, departed from Buda, which after SOLIMANS departure was againe recouered by the Hungarians; and retired himself on the other side of the riuer Tissa, to Toccay, a place both by nature and Art very strong; where, sending to his friends in sundry parts for aide, he wrote two Letters, one to the Princes Electors, entreating them to giue no aide to FERDINAND against him: the other to the Emperor, therein exhibiting sundry complaints against FERDINAND. But FERDINAND pretending the kingdome of Hungary in right to be his; marching forward, with his Army, without any resistance took Buda, and other principall places in that kingdom: and being vnwilling to giue his enemy time to recouer heart and courage, he without any great difficulty, passing the riuer Tissa, vpon a bridge made of boates brought thither for that purpose vpon carts, went to seeke him at Toccay; and within sight of the castle making an Alt, made VALENE TYRAC Generall of his Army; who in the day of battaile diuided the Cauallery of Stiria and Austria into two squadrons, in the middest betweene which he raunged his maine Battaillion, which of both the one and other Army, were Hungarian footemen. Which order when FERENCE BODO, who was Generall of King IOHNS Army perceiued, he marshalling his troupes in the like manner, perswaded King IOHN with certaine troupes of choise horse, to withdraw himselfe to some place from the Army, where he might, notwithstanding any sinister accident, saue himselfe. After whose example PHYLE BARCHIT a Seruian, one of the chiefest Captaines of king FERDINAND'S Army, retired himselfe to a close place, a good distance from the Army; with a determination to charge his enemies in flanke. To be briefe, the two Armies ioyned in a battaile, wherein for a space the fight was very doubtfull: for the left wing of King IOHNS battaile charging the right of the Stirian horse, and gallantly ouerbearing them, had put king FERDINAND'S people to rout, had not the men at Armes of Austria in rescuing them, with such furie charged the enemy, that they were constrained to retire fighting.

The battaile of Toccay Fought betweene Iohn and Ferdinand, both pretending to be King of Hungary.

In the meane time the footemen, which of either side were almost all Hungarians, fought with such obstinacie, that it was hard to iudge whether partie should haue the better. So as, if BARCHIT with his troupe, which vntill then lay close in an Ambuscado, had not risen and suddenly charged at vnawares, FERDINAND (as the report went) had had the worst of the bargaine; but BARCHIT giuing a fresh charge, BODO, notwithstanding that he that day, shewed himselfe no lesse a valiant Souldier then a prudent Captaine, often attempting in vaine to haue rallied his squadrons, being ouerborne by his enemy, was taken prisoner together with many other very excellent Captaines: and their campe being assaulted, their Ordinance and Colours were likewise lost; and the whole troupes were so much disordered, that they running away, left all their baggage to the Austrians. Which when King IOHN perceiued, he as fast as his horse could beare him, fled: and not holding himselfe in safetie in his owne countrie, he fled into Poland, where by IEROM LASKY a Noble-man of that countrey he was honorably entertained. And FERDINAND'S Captaines entring Transsiuania, all the countrie, together with what in Hungary held for him, without any resistance yeelded to be at his deuotion. But forasmuch as BODO, vpon promise of liberty, would not renounce his oath made to king IOHN, and so beare Armes against him, he was by king FERDINAND'S commandement cast into a dungeon, where of griefe and sorrow he died miserably.

King Iohn flieth into Poland.

After this victory FERDINAND made himselfe together with his wife in Alba Regalis, to be solemnly crowned king of Hungary by the Archbishop of Strigonium, who forsaking king IOHN came to FERDINAND, bringing with him the Crowne of STEPHEN king of Hungary, which amongst the Hungarians was held in great veneration. Shortly after, FERDINAND leauing STEPHEN BATOR for Viceroy of that kingdome (to be assisted by the Bishop of Strigonium) went to Bohemia, and thence into Austria, where vpon the first day of August in the yeere 1527. his Queene bare him a son, who was christened MAXIMILIAN, and in processe of time comming to be Emperour was called MAXIMILIAN the Second. FERDINAND hauing so happily gotten the kingdome of Hungary, was very earnest with his brother CHARLES the Emperour to release Pope CLEMENT the Seuenth, taken prisoner by the Duke of Burbon Generall of the Emperours Army in Italy, the same yeere, vpon the sixt day of May, a fatall day in antient time in Rome: which he did to the end to auoide further cause of discontentment amongst the Christian Princes: for the greatnes of the house and state of Austria being growne odious and suspect to all Christendome, it seemed that by long detaining the Pope, the hatred and ill will conceiued against it, would daily encrease: which reasons induced the Emperour after seuen moneths imprisonment to set Pope CLEMENT at liberty, although vpon hard conditions.

Stephen Viceroy of Hungary for King Ferdinand.

Pope Clement the Seuenth released out of prison.

King IOHN after the battaile of Toccay, being expulsed his kingdom, fled as we haue said to IEROME LASKY, a Noble-man of great account among the Polonians, by whom he was most honorably entertained, with the consent of SIGISMVND King of Polonia, who notwithstanding their affinity was nothing pleased with FERDINAND'S greatnes. To be briefe, IEROM LASKY counselling king IOHN to craue aid of SOLIMAN the Emperor of the Turks, went went himselfe Ambassadour (King SIGISMVND winking therat) to Constantinople, where he so behaued himselfe amongst the Bashaes, that SOLIMAN taking IOHN into his protection, with promise to restore him to his kingdom, proclaimed war against Hungary. Wherwith FERDINAND seeing himself destitute of sufficient forces to withstand the Turkish power; and that by reason of the wars amongst the Christians, chiefly in Italy, he could not haue such ayd from his brother the Emperour as the necessity of the cause required, he was much grieued: neuertheless to cleere himselfe from blame, acquainting the Emperour with all matters, he sought meanes to obtaine of SOLIMAN (according as LADISLAVS and LEWES, Kings of Hungarie had done) truce for some yeeres; and to that effect sent IOHN OBERDANSK, a very wise man, to Constantinople; who after many practices could bring no other answer from SOLIMAN, but that if FERDINAND did not restore IOHN to the kingdom of Hungaria, he would make him to know how much the Turks power was to be feared: with which answer, OBERDANSK being driuen out of Constantinople returned into Hungary; where relating SOLIMANS proud answere to the Councell, he went to Spire to FERDINAND, who at that time was busied at the Diet, about matters of Religion.

John Sepusius seeth to the Turke for ayde.

Ferdinand seeth to the Turke for truce, but in vaine.

FERDINAND, vpon this answere, standing in great doubt of the Turkes forces, made all the prouision that the breuity of the time would permit: but the yeere 1529 being come, in the beginning of the Spring, SOLIMAN commanding his Bashaes to draw his Forces to an head, came in person with 140000. men to Belgrade; where, by meanes of his fauourite LEWES GRITTI, sonne to ANDREVV GRITTI (at that time Duke of Venice) and of ABRAIM Basha, gently receiuing IOHN with many other Hungarian Lords, he againe promised to restore him to his Kingdome: wherwith IOHN being very ioyfull, with many his friends followed the Turkish Armie; which marching from Belgrade was already before Buda. Those in Buda being in extream feare, presently yeelded to SOLIMAN; who entring the City, sought with as great speed to haue had the fortresse, guarded by THOMAS NADASKY a Captaine for FERDINAND; who valiantly resisting the enemy, was within few dayes (to the great reproach of Christian Souldiers) betraied by those Germanes which FERDINAND left there in garrison: who perceiuing that the enemy with Mines & other Military stratagems, sought to force the place, willing to prouide for themselues, and to the end that NADASKY should be no impediment vnto them, bound him, and then yeelding to SOLIMAN, with their liues and goods saued, gaue vp the Fortresse. Whereinto when the Turke came, knowing the treason of the Souldiers, and moued with a noble disdaine, he presently set NADASKY at liberty, and made his Souldiers cut all those in pieces which had committed so shamefull a villany, making no conscience to break his faith with men so base and so vnworthy to liue.

Soliman with an Army of 140000. men entereth Hungarie.

Soliman contrary to his promise, put to the sword all the Souldiers in the Castle of Buda.

SOLIMAN hauing (without effusion of bloud) gotten the citie of Buda, presently sent his Army towards Vienna in Austria; and comming before the same, vpon the six and twentith day of September that present yeere, he besieged the citie in fiue parts; hauing first by the way taken Altenburgh and the fiue Churches. From thence with great speed he made his horse troupes to ouerrun the countrey as farre as Lintz, (many miles distant from Vienna); where doing much harme, and loden with bootie, and many prisoners, they returned to the campe; which being diuided into many parts, continually infested Vienna. The Count Palatine of Rhine, with many other excellent Captaines, being therein for the defence thereof in the behalfe of FERDINAND, vsed all meanes to frustrate the enemies attempts; who besieging the City by land, had intelligence that the Fleet which came vp the Riuer Danubius with great store of Ordinance to batter the City, was for the most part by WOLFANG of Oder Gouernour of Poson, beaten and sunke in Danow, which then was swolne extraordinarily high, by reason of much rain which fell at that time. Whereof when SOLIMAN was certified, he with the rest of the Artillerie which escaped WOLFANGS furie, so beat Vienna, vpon the fifteenth day of October, that he misst but little to haue taken it: but he was repulsed by the valour of those which had the guard thereof.

Vienna besieged by Soliman.

SOLIMAN lost at the assault in this one day thirty thousand Turkes, with many famous Captains: who thinking with himselfe, that if he should haue the like successe in two other assaults, he should haue a small Army remaining; hearing withall that FERDINAND came with a great Army to succor them, and that he was not farre off, he resolued to retire from that enterprise; sending word vnto them of Vienna, that if they would yeeld, he would not enter in to the City, and their goods should be saued, giuing them a perpetuall exemption, for that he was not come to doe them any harme; but only to meet with FERDINAND, to end the quarrell for the possession of the kingdome of Hungary by battaile: whereat, the people of of Vienna made a scorne; so that the day following being the thirtith day of the siege, he was constrained (after that he had giuen many fierce assaults) to retire with the losse of 80000. men; and the sooner, hauing intelligence that FERDINAND with a great number of Bohemians and Moraians came to the reliefe thereof. Which making him to doubt that his people being weakned with the wars, would be vnapt to make head against FERDINAND's fresh troups he resolued to raise his siege and to depart. And being departed with so great losse of his people, and hauing in vaine sought to allure those of Vienna to giue vp the City vpon composition, he went to Buda; where confirming King IOHN King of Hungary, calling him his friend and vassaile, and leauing LEVVES GRITTI with him for his counsellor, he with a determination to return againe the next Spring with greater forces, leading with him about 4000 captiues, returned to Constantinople.

Soliman raiseth his siege from before Vienna.

Shortly after SOLIMAN's departure, FERDINAND came to Vienna: from whence aduertising his brother the Emperor of all what had happened, he tooke order for the reedifying of the City, which together with all the countrie round about was in a manner wholly ruined, and then shortly after returned into Germany, very ioyfull for the news of the peace concluded between the Christian Princes, hoping that the Emperor being free from warres, would now haue suppressed LVTHER's supposed heresie, which daily encreasing, was in such manner dispersed, that many Princes of that countrey were of his opinion; by reason whereof there was nothing but Councels in Germany concerning Religion: which to abolish was FERDINAND's chiefest care. But the yeere one thousand fiue hundred thirty, being comn, and CHARLES being with the Imperiall Diademe, by the Pope solemnly crowned in Bologna in Italie, vpon Saint MATTHIAS the Apostles day (an auspicious day to him) and afterwards going into Germany, and there celebrating the Ausburgh Diet, he took such order, that FERDINAND by the Electors (after some contradiction) was chosen King of the Romanes; who being crowned in Aken, and the Emperor being gone into Flanders to visite those Countries, hee went for feare of SEPVSIVS to Vienna: for SEPVSIVS by the counsell of LEVVES GRITTI, daily incensed the Turkes against FERDINAND, who in the end of the yeere comming into Hungary, spoiled such countries as held for him: but King IOHN being desirous to bring those troubles to an end, he in such manner solicited GRITTI to be an intercessor for him, that SOLIMAN in the yeere one thousand fiue hundred thirty two, much displeased with FERDINAND, proclaimed open warre against Hungary; and comming shortly after thither with an Army of three hundred thousand men, he committed such spoiles in the countrie, that more could not be done. Which FERDINAND vnderstanding (who at that time was with the Emperor at the Diet at Ratisbone about matters of Religion) was greatly troubled: and hauing no sufficient power to resist the Turkes forces, imploring aide of all the Potentates in Christendome, he (by the Emperors meanes) obtained some of the Germane Princes: and the Emperour causing a great number of his footemen to come into Germany, resolued with the assistance of other Christian Princes, in person to ioyne with him; particularly with the aide of Pope CLEMENT the Seuenth, who with nine thousand men paid; sent his Nephew the Cardinall HIPPOLITO de Medicis, with all the succours that possibly in time of such discord (especially between France and Italy) could be gotten. And in such sort the matter was handled, that the Emperour and his brother FERDINAND hauing ninety thousand foote-men, and thirty thousand horse, taking their way towards Vienna, resolued to fight with SOLIMAN; who proudly reiecting FERDINANDS Ambassadors sent to treate with him of a league, he with such furie assailed in many parts, such places as held for FERDINAND in Hungary, that he did infinite harme; for besides the desolation of townes, he in person with great furie bent his forces against the City of Guinz: The charge of which siege, was giuen to ABRAIM Bassa, Captain generall of the Turkes Army; who vnderstanding that NICHOLISSA (a man well knowne to him) was Gouernor within the Towne, he sent to perswade him not to hold so weake a place against him, promising him all honest conditions: but NICHOLISSA, who was a souldier, hauing resolued either to die or winne honor in that seruice, answered him courteously that he could not doe it: whereupon the place was battered many daies, and valiantly defended, but the Turkes had no great Ordinance; SOLIMAN giuing it out that he came only to fight a battaile against the Christians, and therefore had brought none but field peeces.

Soliman came into Hungary with 300000 men.

ABRAIM, seeing what difficulty there was to force this place, he drew NICHOLISSA to to his Campe vpon a safe conduct: where hauing much commended his valour, he laid before him the great danger wherein he was, if he attended the great Ordinance which was neere, perswading him by the friendship that was betwixt them, to yeeld him the place, the which he must for his honour take. The gouernor seemed to esteeeme his words little, telling him that his garrison was strong, and that he had many Germanes and Spaniards within the place, who would not accept of any accord: but through the importunity of ABRAIM, he suffered some few Turkes to enter, to giue him some satisfaction for his honor, and so Guinz was brauely defended against this mighty Army: and ABRAIM retired to SOLIMAN's Campe, from whence he dismissed FERDINAND's Ambassadors; to whom he wrote that he was come into Hungary, to reuenge the wrong done vnto IOHN his friend and tributary, and that he would be soone with him to giue him battaile: wherewith he was not much troubled.

Guinz freed from the Turkish Army.

LEVVES GRITTI (left in Hungary with SEPVSIVS after the siege of Vienna) likewise assailing Strigonium, and making incursions by his Captaines into the countrey, did put the Hungars in such feare, that many of them abandoning their houses, retired to the Christians Army lying intrenched without the walles of Vienna; whither it was thought that SOLIMAN in the end would haue come: but he failing of his purpose to get the City of Guinz, and fearing the Emperors fortune; after that he had harried the countrey, and taken many prisoners, retired to the other side of the Riuer Mura into Carinthia; and from thence leading his Army in great disorder, and with dishonor to Belgrado; and there not holding himselfe fully in safety, hee shortly after went to Constantinople; being first greatly annoyed by the Christian Cauallery, which then did followe his Campe to Belgrado, and did often fall vpon his rereward.

SOLIMAN being departed out of Hungary, FERDINAND vsed all meanes to draw the Emperour to attempt the recouery of Buda; but for as much as he could not perswade him to stay in that Countrey, he obtained of him to leaue the Italian foot-men, together with Cardinall HIPPOLITO there in Garrison, against the Turkes: but they vnwilling to stay any longer, mutyning, by the perswasion of one MARKE da Volterra putting themselues in order, in a great rage returned into Italie: with which their departure FERDINAND was so discontented, that comming to a composition with IOHN SEPVSIVS, he granted him during his life, peaceably to enioy such part of Hungary as then was at his deuotion; by reason whereof the wars for that time being ended in Hungary, FERDINAND bent his forces against the Lantzgraue PHILIP: who being an enemy to the house of Austria, induced VLRICH Duke of Wittembergh (assisted (by FRANCIS the French King) to take Armes against FERDINAND, for the recouery of his estate taken from him by the Emperor, and giuen to FERDINAND at the Diet at Ratisbone; in which action the Duke so valiantly behaued himselfe, that to FERDINAND's great losse and preiudice, he recouered his Duchie: in whose behalfe sundry Princes in Germany carried themselues so towards the Emperor and FERDINAND, that they permitted the Duke peaceably to enioy his estate: Yet vpon condition, that from thenceforth the Duke should neuer take Armes against FERDINAND or the house of Austria.

The Emperor Charles leyes the ways against the Turk in Hungary to go to war against christians in Italy.

After this peace, FERDINAND receiued Letters from LEVVES GRITTI, importing a request; which was, that if FERDINAND would be content to permit GRITTI during his life to enioy the Kingdome of Hungary, he would so deal with SOLIMAN, that hee should confirm the same after GRITTI his decease to FERDINAND and his heirs: which his demand, refused by FERDINAND, did much offend GRITTI, who had been sent into Hungary by SOLIMAN who fauoured him very much, to the end hee might assist IOHN SEPVSIO as his Protector, and haue a care of the confines of that Kingdome against FERDINAND and the incursions of the Christians, giuing him full authority both in peace and warre. LEVVES GRITTI parted in great pomp; SOLIMAN hauing giuen him certain companies of Ianisaries, with seuen thousand other souldiers, bringing with him two Hungarian Captains his friends, who were in SOLIMAN's pay; called IOHN DOCCIA and VRBAN BACCIANI, with two companies of horse for his guard.

Lewes Gritti sent by Soliman into Hungary.

Being come into Transiluania, he made a publick proclamation, that as absolute Commissioner for SOLIMAN he was comn into that Kingdome to compound all differences. AMARIGO Bishop of Varradine was Gouerner of Transiluania for King IOHN SEPVSIO, a Noble Gentleman, endued with many vertues, of great iudgement and generally beloued of the people, with whom he had great credit; who came not to meet and honour GRITTI as he thought he was bound, representing the person of SOLIMAN. IOHN DOCCIA, one of his Hungarian Captains hated this Bishop of Varradine, of whom hee had spoken much euill in their voyage, and that he was in secret a capital enemy to SOLIMAN and all his ministers; whereof hee had alwaies shewed effects, speaking much of his haughtinesse and pride: And GRITTI, seeing the Bishop stay long before he came vnto him, did easily beleeue his malitious suggestion; who being of himself proud by nature, and very glorious, desired to be honoured at his first entrance into the Kingdome: whereupon, he grew much discontented with the Bishop; which DOCCIA perceiuing, hee thought it then time to bee reuenged of AMARIGO; telling him, that he should neuer gouern freely during this mans life, offring to go and kill him, or to bring him bound: whereto GRITTI consented. AMARIGO was then vpon the way to meet with GRITTI, marching softly with 12000 men to do him honour: for, the season of the yeer was very hot, which caused DOCCIA to breed more iealousie in GRITTI, saying, that he came for no good intent with such forces: whereupon he grew into choler, and gaue him order to go and do the effect; so as, taking with him some companies of horse, he came in the night to the Bishops Tent, his people lying scattered abroad, and cut off his head. Then going to horseback, hee returned and presented it to GRITTI; whose choler beeing now past, and he better aduised, repented the fact. The Bishops Tent with some others were spoiled by the Turks; and his people rising at the noise, found him dead, and vnderstood the manner: so as he being greatly allied in that Country, many of the chief Barons conspired against GRITTI, and resolued to be reuenged for that Noble Prelate: for whose death all the Transiluanians were so much grieued, that they ran generally to Arms without calling; so as in an Instant there was an Army of neer 40000 men, horse and foot. GRITTI hearing heer-of, retired himself to Mega, into which he was receiued with some difficulty, where he meant to defend himself. The Army coming, the multitude ran rashly to giue an assault without battery, but they were repulst with losse. MIALATO (who was Generall of this Army, and a great friend to AMARIGO) resolued to take it by siege, knowing they had no store of victuals. GRITTI seeing no succours come, both for that the Turkish Captains which liued on those frontiers, excused themselues that they could not leaue their charges without expresse commission from their Generall, who was farre off; and King IOHN (who hated him much, both for that he was come to be his competitor in the gouernment of the Realm, as also for his great cruelty committed vpon his Gouerner, and so worthy a man) in words made shew that he would assist him, and began to leuie men to send him; but they came not in time.

The Bishop of Varradine slaine by order from Lewes Gritti.

The death of Lewes Gritti.

GRITTI seeing himself thus abandoned, and all things desperate, fell sick and had recourse to the Moldauians who were in the Camp, intreating them to receiue him and his sonnes into their Quarter; which, PETER their Prince promised: so as, coming forth at a little Port the next night, he was encountred by MIALATO and the friends of AMARIGO, who laying hold on him, they led him to the Generals Tent, where they caused his head to be cut off by a hangman; his children were taken, and (as some think) were secretly put to death by PETER the Moldauian. DOCCIA (who was the cause of this foule fact) was tormented and cruelly slain, with most of the Turks. Some write, that when as the hangman stript GRITTI, he found in his breeches a bag of iewels, to the value of 100000 crowns. This death of GRITTI was pleasing to many, especially to FERDINAND, for that he might now with more facility contend against King IOHN, his enemy, being no more supported by him.

After the death of GRITTI, King IOHN entred into Transiluania, and within fewe daies became Lord thereof: but being still molested by FERDINAND, hee was forced to sue to SOLIMAN for aid; who, hearing of the miserable death of GRITTI, was much displeased: but being certified that K. IOHN had no hand in it, and supposing that King FERDINAND had been the author, he sent MAHOMET IAIA GOLI, an old expert souldier and wise, to defend the Frontiers of King IOHN against FERDINAND; who being very diligent, had in short time taken many places, ioyning with the Sangiac of Bosna, FERDINAND being vnable to resist him for his many hinderances. Among others, they took a Castle in the Prouince of Posega called Essechio, very commodious for the passage of the Riuer of Draua, to enter into Hungary, the which he fortified very well, and manned with a good garrison: from whence he made incursions into FERDINAND's Countrey, notwithstanding that there was a truce betwixt SOLIMAN and him, made before the coming of GRITTI; whereby hee was content that IOHN SEPVSIO should be called King, and enioy that which he held, during his life. FERDINAND seeing the spoils which the Turks made, and beeing importuned by his subiects, subiects, he drew an Army together of eight thousand horse, and sixteen thousand foot, and gaue the charge of Generall to IOHN CATTIANIER an old souldier, who had won much honour at the defence of Vienna; and the Earl of Lodron was Generall of all the foot. This Army marching towards the enemy, being much staid vpon the way by their great Ordinance, they began to growe in distresse for victuals, their Commissaries failing them; yet being a little supplied, they marcht towards the enemy, their foot companies being much decaied: yet the yonger men cried out to fight; whereto the Generall CATTIANIER consented: so as they marched neer vnto the enemy lying at Essechio, where there passed many skirmishes betwixt the two Armies.

Ferdinand feeds an Army against the Turk

The Turk, seeing the Christian Army in great distresse of victuals, would not suffer his soldiers to go out of their Camp: wherefore the Commanders consulting together, they resolued to rise and march to Ermando, a Castle ten miles off, whereas MAHOMET had drawne together much victuall, the which they thought would satisfie their hunger; but hauing yeelded, they found little corn and some wine, which would not suffice the Army two daies: wherefore they resolued to passe the riuer of Bodrego, and to go to Valpiano, where they heard there was great store of victuals. The Turks pursued them, and annoyed them continually with skirmishes, and the Christian Army grew into a generall amazement. At night the Captains went to councell, to consult what course they should take, and which way they should go. CATTIANIER was of opinion they should part that night towards Valpiano, a place of safety not farre off, where was store of victuals to refresh the Army, giuing order for the troops to march away at midnight: but there fell out great disorder, diuerse troops going away vpon the first watch before the word was giuen, euery company taking his owne way. CATTIANIER hearing this, was much amazed; and thinking that all the troops had taken the same course, he went away vnarmed and without his baggage. They write, that these infortunate newes being delinered to the Earl of Lodron (who slept, being oppressed with toil and watching) he returned to his rest vntill that some of his Captains awaked him, assuring him that their Generall was fled: wherewith this valiant man being troubled, he stood for a time in doubt, and could not beleiue that a man practised in so many wars, and who had neuer yet deserued the name of a base coward, should with so great impiety do an act contrary to his honour. Then calling the Captains and chief of the companies together, he comforted them, and exhorted them either to dy gloriously, or to winne perpetuall honour by the victory: and being intreated by them all to take charge of the Army, he gaue order for their march, that they might recouer Valpiano if it were possible. Being ready to march, at the break of day they discouered the enemies troops, with whom they continually maintained skirmish, and continued their march: but being oppressed still with fresh troops of Turks, hauing lost many men, the footmen being tired with fighting, and almost dead with hunger, they were in a manner all cut in pieces. Count LODOVVICK, being sore wounded, retired himself into a narrow lake adioyning, with three companies that remained: beeing oppressed with his hurt, and intreated by the Turks to yeeld, hee submitted himself.

The flight of Cattianier.

The Christians ouerthrowne by the Turks.

MAHOMET, growne proud with this victory, sent the Earl of Ladron's head, and many of the chief Captains, with a great number of their noses which were slain, vnto SOLIMAN. FERDINAND, hearing of this infortunate successe, was wonderfully grieued, considering that it hapned by the basenes of his Generall, and other fugitiue Captains who were growne a scorn both to women and children. CATTIANIER, hearing heerof, wrote to FERDINAND, that he vnderstood his honour was much blemished in Court by his aduersaries; desiring, his Majesty would be pleased to giue him a safe conduct to come to Court to justifie himself; the cause of this great ruine proceeding not from him, but from the Commissaries who had not according to their duties brought victuals to the Camp. FERDINAND granted his desire, and CATTIANIER came; but he had such cold entertainment from the King and the whole Court, that he repented his coming. He spake much in his owne excuse: but not able to defend his going from the Army, and hauing giuen no signe to depart, the rest were slain, euery man called him a base Traitor. FERDINAND hauing committed him to custody to punish him as he deserued, fearing with the losse of his honour, his life would bee in question, he made an escape by night, and fled to MAHOMET; who receiued him kindely, promising him great entertainment if he would bring Austria vnder SOLIMAN's command: the which hauing promised, he parted and went to NICHOLAS SADEINIO, a man of great power in that Country, seeking to drawe him to serue the Turk: but NICHOLAS, hauing giuen him him good words, slew him. Hauing cut off his head, he carried it to FERDINAND, making an ample relation of his wicked designe: for the which the King honoured him much, and rewarded him with the estate of CATTIANIER.

Peter, Prince of Moldauia, inconstant and faithlesse.

About this time 1538, PETER gouerned in Valachia or Moldauia: he was nephew to DRACOLA, who had made the league with King MATTHIAS against AMVRATH. This PETER although he were a Christian of the Greek Church, yet was he a man of an ill disposition, faithlesse, inconstant, greedy of spoil, and without any conscience, to make his owne estate great. He was Tributary to SOLIMAN: but he carried himself so, that when any occasion was offred whereby he might annoy him for his owne good, he had no respect so as hee might do it couertly, or haue any colour to excuse it. He had friendship with King IOHN, and likewise with FERDINAND, and yet he laid wait to murder them. He assaulted FERDINAND'S Camp traiterously, neer to Brassouia: for which, King IOHN gaue him great thanks, thinking he had done it for his relief. PETER (who neuer took Arms but for his owne profit) growne proud by that former victory and the artillery which he had taken, soon after he inuaded Transiluania, took many places, and spoiled the Countrey. King IOHN sent to expostulate with him, why he did him wrong vnder the colour of friendship; requiring restitution. The Moldauian answered, that he meant to be his friend; whereof he had giuen him good proof when he relieued him against FERDINAND. And if hee had made vse of VESTRICK, it was to secure CIZOVIO, against whom FERDINAND had a practice. He inuaded the confines of Poland often: but at the last he was encountred by IOHN Earle of Tornau a valiant Captaine who fought with him, and ouerthrew his Army, and took forty peeces of Ordinance with FERDINANDS Armes; he himselfe was wounded and fled into his countrey. King SIGISMVND was importuned by his subiects to make warre against him, and to ruine him, the

which he would not doe without SOLIMANS leaue, being his tributary; who at that time hated PETER much, for that vpon his faith, LEVVES GRITTI had gone forth, and was slain, and also he had murdered his innocent children with great cruelty. And moreouer he paid not his tribute duely.

They write, that SOLIMAN took this request of SIGISMVND very kindely, shewing him such respect: to whom he made this answer. That he knew well the deserts of the Moldauian, but it did belong to him as well to punish his seditious and wicked tributaries, as to defend the good; and soon after he entred Valachia with an Armie, but PETER fled out of the countrie: whereupon SOLIMAN made STEPHEN his brother, Prince in his place; and then returned, freeing both King IOHN and FERDINAND from the fear of his Armes. PETER being fled into Cimouia with his wife and children and chiefest treasure, King IOHN (who hated him very much) went to besiege the place; which being very strong, and well furnished with men and victuals, continued foure months, vntill that he had withdrawne the Transiluanians who were his subiects: whereat PETER being amazed, and seeing the danger, yeelded himself and the place. King IOHN (who was pitifull by nature) although he knew his treacherous disposition, yet had he compassion of his miserable state, and receiued him curteously. Soon after, SOLIMAN wrote his Letters to King IOHN to send PETER to Constantinople: to whom IOHN made an humble relation in what manner PETER had yeelded, and that he had promised him his life; beseeching him, that, as he was a Noble and generous Emperor, he would not suffer him, being his vassall and tributary, to fail of the faith he had giuen to that wretch, promising so to keep him as STEPHEN should haue no cause to fear. But SOLIMAN was not so satisfied, sending sharper Letters for him; and King IOHN, fearing to incense him, resolued to send him; but in such sort, that SOLIMAN, being a generous Prince, should bee forced to vse him with all clemency: and therefore being well accompanied, hee wrote, that he had sent him as an Ambassador, not as a prisoner; recommending him much. SOLIMAM vpon his submission, and the faith which King IOHN his friend had giuen him, was moued to mercy, and confined him onely to Pera. STEPHEN his brother, who raigned in his place in Moldauia, began to growe odious to all his subiects for his couetous disposition and cruell extortion of money; whereupon they slue him, which gaue good hope to PETER to recouer his Country again: but the Nobility made choice of a young man called ALEXIVS, of the same house of DRACOLA. But soon after, those Noble-men which are called Boiari, who made choice of him, cut off his head, and sent it to PETER, who was vpon the confines with an Army of Turks, to restore him into his estate; who by degrees put all those traiterous Boiari to death.

Peter restored to his Country.

In

In the beginning of the yeer 1538, DEVELS ASSEMBER (a man of great account in Bohemia) seeing the negligence of SEPVSIVS his people, gathered together certain companies of foot and and horse; and going towards the Countries guarded by the Turks garrisons, particularly to the City of Toccay, situate on the other side of the riuer Tissa, there hauing easily surprised those which had it in guard, in fewe houres took it: and hauing almost sacked it, he went through to the Citadel against a squadron of the Turks horse, who vnderstanding of the surprise of Toccay, came to relieue the garrison: and coming to blowes with them, hee so distressed them, that they were constrained to retire; whereupon, returning to the City, and making an end of sacking it, loaden with the spoil, and hauing gotten certain peeces of artillery, he returned: whereat FERDINAND greatly rejoycing, bestowed many gifts vpon him. The Emperor, the Pope, and the Venecians being ioyned together in league against the Turk, he was comprised in the number of the confederats, in the yeer one thousand fiue hundred thirty nine. FERDINAND helping his brother the Emperor to suppresse the Gantois, which rebelled against him, and tired with the continuall warres of Hungary, he came to an agreement with King IOHN, vpon condition, that each of them should continue in possession of what he held in Hungary, and that IOHN should freely enioy the title of king: and if that IOHN should haue no heires, that then the kingdome should fall to FERDINAND and his heires: prouided alwaies that king FERDINAND should conceale this agreement from SOLIMAN, of whose displeasure IOHN stood highly in feare.

The matter was not so secretly handled, but that SOLIMAN had full notice of all their agreement. Whereupon being angry with IOHN, he often times charged him with ingratitude; and had it not been for his friends, and (that which did more import) the warre with the Persians, he had without doubt troubled him for it: who either for feare of SOLIMAN, or vpon some other occasion, being a while after displeased with FERDINAND, he took to wife ISABEL, the daughter of SIGISMVND King of Poland; who within few moneths appearing to be with childe, induced him to seeke to driue STEPHEN MAIALTO and BAILASSO out of Transiluania, both gouernors of that Prouince: the one of which, which was MAIALTO, notwithstanding that he knew that SOLIMAN deadly hated him; yet he sundry times instantly sued to haue been by him crowned King of Transiluania: whereof IOHN being aduertised by SOLIMAN himselfe, who hated traitors and treason wonderfully; he sent to king IOHN the Letters which MAIALTO had written, blaming him for his carelesnes, to haue giuen the gouernement of his Prouinces to so faithlesse a man, exhorting him to repaire it, and to be more aduised hereafter when he should haue any occasion to make choice of the like gouernors: And to MAIALTO (whom he hated for the death of LEWES GRITTI, and the Turkes which were slaine with him) he gaue a sowre answere, more by his countenance then his words; MAIALTO seeing himselfe reiected by SOLIMAN, and his treachery discouered to King IOHN, he entred into practice with King FERDINAND, who easily entertained it, by meanes of THOMAS NADASKY, brother in law to MAIALTO: who being receiued into FERDINAD'S protection, were assisted by him against King IOHN; but neither of them being of equall power to him, they were constrained, the one which was BAILASSO, to retire himselfe; and the other being in Megest (a most strong place) was by King IOHN'S souldiers besieged: but King IOHN vnderstood that his wife Queen ISABEL in the meane time whilest he was about Megest had borne him a son.

During this siege, King IOHN lay at Sabino, being fallen into the relapse of a former sicknesse; The Captaines of the Army whom the King fauored most (being but a daies iourney off) came to him to reioyce with him. Vpon this happy newes of hauing a successor to his kingdom, the king would needs be brought forth of his bed vnto the banquett, where eating more then was fitte, in the regard of the feuer which had newly left him, his stomack hauing no strength to digest it, he fell againe into a feuer, whereof he died. By his testament (contrary to the Accord made with FERDINAND) he left his sonne heire to his kingdome; giuing him for tutors PETER VICENTO his kinsman, whom he had left for his Viceroy in Buda with the Queen; and Frier GEORGE Bishop of Varradine a man very faithfull and wise, vnder the protection of SOLIMAN. Who being nobly born in Croatia, after some time spent in the seruice of King IOHN, became a Monk in Buda, where hee had not long remained, but waxing weary of the Monasticall life, he retaining still the habit, went out of the Couent, and returned to the seruice of IOHN in Polonia: to whom (being expulst his kingdome by FERDINAND, and remaining with IEROM LASKY) he did many seruices of importance, so as being very highly highly respected by him, he created him after the recouery of Transiluania, and the rest of Hungary, Bishop of Varadin; and at his death, left him together with the Queen (mother vnto the childe) Gouerner of the Kingdome: who in the yeer 1540, compounding with MAIALTO, in the name of the Queen refused to stand to the agreement made betwen IOHN and FERDINAND; and temporising with him, leuied certain companies of horse and foot: and to the end to be in the more safety, suing to SOLIMAN for aid, as to the Protector of the pupill, hee together with the Queen and the yong King retired to Buda: wherewith FERDINAND beeing highly offended, and therewith hoping to recouer that Kingdome, he leuied an Army: and in the mean time, sending Ambassadors to SOLIMAN, hee offered to giue him that tribute which King IOHN was wont to pay; but he first perswaded Queen ISABELL, that she contenting herself in peace to enioy Transiluania, should resigne the rest to him, according to the agreement made between him and her husband. But seeing that hee could obtain neither the one nor the other of his demands, he sent LEONARD VELSCH one of his Captains, with a great number of men of war, to molest the Queen. VELSCH, entring the Countrey of the yong King, went from Strigonium to Visegard, which he took without any difficulty; and, hauing taken it, staid there certain daies to refresh his Army.

Then passing the riuer Dannby, and with the like celerity hauing taken Pesthe and Vaccia, he presented himselfe before Buda; wherein VALENTINE DVRAC (who in former time had serued FERDINAND) lay then in Garrison. This DVRAC to his great credite, withstanding VELSCH, defended the City, vntill that constrained by the Turkish souldiers, sent by the Saniacque of Belgrado to the reliefe of the young King, VELSCH retired to Visgard: where hauing in few daies space taken the Citadel, and garrisonized it, in the name of King FERDINAND; and wintred his souldiers in the same place, without any molestation by the Turkes, vntill the end of that yeer: in the yeer one thousand fiue hundred forty four, the Turks took the field with such furie, as hauing suddenly taken Vaccia, they sundry times attempted Pesthe; where being resisted by the valour of the defendants, they departed, fearing that FERDINAND's Army (which being much increased, was come to make head against them) would haue defeated them, whose assaults they could not so well auoid; but being in ill plight, they lost many of their Arierguard. By reason of which good successe, FERDINAND hoping to haue taken Buda, gathered together 40000 men, which he sent vnder the conduct of WILLIAM ROCKENDOLPH, a Captaine of great worth, to take that City. ROCKENDOLPH comming thither, gaue many attempts: but being euer valiantly repulsed by the besieged, he saw that by assault he could not take the City; he therefore resolued to try what he could doe by siege: and besieging it round, he so kept victuals from the City, that had not Frier GEORGE vsed great diligence, the City doubtlesse had yeelded. Neuertheless ROCKENDOLPH with words and threatnings frustrating the deuices of some seditious persons, continued the siege, till it was freed by SOLIMAN.

Rockendolph sent by Ferdinand to attempt Buda.

The Queen, being thus distrest in Buda, sent her Ambassadors to SOLIMAN to craue aid; who calling them into his presence, said vnto them, that hee had inuested King IOHN in that Realm of Hungary, the which should passe to his heirs; and that hee would, his promise should hould perpetually, as long as the heirs should remain obedient to him, and perform that whereunto they were bound: wherefore he confirmed his vassall and tributrry. STEPHEN the pupill, giuing to the Ambassadors the Ensignes of the confirmation of friendship with the Infant; which were, a round shield, an iron mace with the handle of gold, a Semitar with a scabberd enriched with iewels, and a long robe of crimsin velues and gold; saying, that by those Ensignes which he sent him, he took him into his protection. These Ambassadors being thus happily dispatcht, LASCO, sent by FERDINAND, arriued, and demanded the inuestiture of that Kingdome for him, with an offer of tribute, shewing the agreement which hee had made with King IOHN; but he could not be heard: and for that hee did often name the Emperour CHARLS, magnifying his power, SOLIMAN disdaining it, caused him to be put in prison. SOLIMAN vnderstanding that Buda was in great distresse, sent MAHOMET Basha with many men of warre, and a great quantity of victuals, to the relief thereof; promising to follow himself in person, as within fewe daies after hee did. Which much troubled ROCKENDOLPH, that they forced him to retire into the Ile of Comer: for, MAHOMET hauing victualled Buda, and being incamped within sight of FERDINAND's Army, after many skirmishes he so much prouoked his enemies, that they joyned with him in battell; wherein, after sundry accidents, ROCKENDOLPH being ouerthrowne, was constrained to flee, and many of of his Captains were taken prisoners. And MAHOMET Basha, sending to visit the yong king and Queen mother, perswaded her to hope well of SOLIMAN the great Turk; who, coming from Adrianople into Hungary, shortly after came to the Camp, bringing with him a great number of souldiers, with a resolution to free himself from troubles, and wholly to put FERDINAND out of all hope euer to recouer that estate.

SOLIMAN being come neere vnto Buda, he sent vnto the infant king three goodly horses, with their furnitures of gold, set with iewels, and three Royall Robes of Gold, and to euery Hungarian Baron a Robe with a chaine of Gold: by his Embassadors he sent word vnto the Queene that he should send the childe with those Barons, vnto the Campe, excusing him that he came not to see her, being not the custome of the Ottomans to see women in another house; neither would he in respect of her honor (being young and beautifull, the daughter of a King his friend, and the wife of his confederate) that she should goe into his campe. The Queene (they say) was much amazed, fearing for her son: but FRIER GEORGE perswaded her to send him speedily, least she should shew any distrust of that great Emperour. Being brought to SOLIMANS pauilion he embraced him louingly; the Hungarian Barons were honoured, and dined with the Basha: but in the meane time SOLIMAN had giuen order, that some of his captaines (making shew to visit the city) should seise vpon a port and draw in their men; the which they did before it was discouered: whereupon they disarmed the citizens, and lodged their troupes, but with great modestie and shewes of friendship.

SOLIMAN being aduertised that the city was at his command, he sent the Infant back vnto the Queene, but retained fiue of the Barons, which were FRIER GEORGE, PETER VICCHIO, VALENTINE STEPHANIO, VERBESIO the head Chancelor, and VRBAN BASHIANO who had the guard of the city. The Queene seeing the city taken by fraud, and her Barons deteyned, sent humbly to intreate SOLOMAN that he would not blemish his great name of clemency and magnaminity, but obserue the faith giuen, and send back her faithfull Barons, who had alwaies deserued well of his greatnes and of the Turkish name. SOLIMAN was three daies in counsell touching this action. Some perswaded him to put the Barons to death and seise vpon the whole state. But ROSTAM Bashaw his son in-law whom he fauored much, was of a milder disposition, aduising him to restore vnto the Queene the city and the Barons, and that SOLIMAN being a iust Prince should not vniustly take from that poore pupill his kingdom, seeing that the father was his tributary and the Queene had offered it for her son: that he should remember he had taken the Infant into his protection, and had confirmed him in that Realme with the vsuall ensignes and ornaments; the which if he should now take awaie, he should purchase himselfe perpetuall infamie with the world, to haue by fraude vsurped the Realme of a poore pupil, who had recommended himselfe vnto him, and had been confirmed by him; giuing many other reasons to the like effect. SOLIMAN took a middle course, sending word vnto the Queene, that she should part from Buda, for that he meant to hold it as a Bulwark against FERDINAND; and that she should go and raigne at Lippa beyond the riuer of Tiuisco; that he would receiue nothing of that kingdome, but his ordinary tribute, and defend the city and castle at his owne charge; whereupon all the Barons were sent back, but VALENTINE whom she could not obtaine by any suite: yet he promised he should haue no harme, and withal he assured that the young king should be no sooner able to gouerne, but he would restore whatsoeuer belonged to him and was in his power.

The city of Buda in the power of Soliman.

The Queene departed from Buda to Lippa with her son and all her Royall furniture, accompanied with all her Barons, except VALENTINE, cursing the infidelity of such a Tirant, and repenting in her hart, that she had not accepted the conditions offered by FERDINAND, to giue the prouince of Sepusia, and other places which he had taken, where she might haue liued with more quiet of minde, then to haue her son king of the whole Realme, subiect to so perfidious a Barbarian, as she might doubt hourely he would depriue him. She said that this happened for her sins, to haue rather trusted in the friendship of a cruel Mahometan then in a Christian King, who was milde, iust, and of the same faith: but she durst not discouer her thoughts. FERDINAND hearing of the defeat of his Army; in fear of some greater losse, beeing also sorry for the losse of Buda, a place of great importance for the defense of Christendome, he resolued to send Ambassadors presently to conquering SOLIMAN, with conditions of peace, who were dispatched vnto him with very rich Presents; and falling down the riuer of Dannow, they came to the Camp lying before Buda, and were honourably entertained by ROSTAN Basha, and brought into the presence of SOLIMAN: to whom they deliuered their Ambas-sage, requiring in the name of FERDINAND, that he would grant him the Realm of Hungary for the same tribute which King IOHN had paid; promising to satisfie the Queen in the behalf of her son; shewing also that the said K. IOHN moued in his conscience, who told him he had no title to that Kingdom, hauing vniustly vsurpt it, had promised it him after his death; whereof they produced the contract: by reason whereof, FERDINAND made war.

Solimans answer to the Ambassadors.

After two daies pause, SOLIMAN gaue answer to the Ambassadors by ROSTAN, that hee was content to giue peace to FERDINAND whensoeuer he should restore the Forts, Cities, and places in Hungary; and for that he had been often prouoked to war, and spent much, yet he would impose no other penalty, but the paiment of a small tribute yeerly for the Arch-duchy of Austria, and that he should quit his pretensions to Hungary; threatning, that if FERDINAND did not accept of these conditions of peace, he would not fail to take those places by Arms which were vniustly vsurped. The Ambassadors said, that FERDINAND could not resolue to accept of these conditions without the priuity of the Emperor his brother, and therfore they craued some time of truce that he might write to him, and receiue his answer. But SOLIMAN knew well that their designe was onely to win time, to the end that winter might approach, and the war be deferrd; assuring himself, that FERDINAND would neuer accept of such vnreasonable conditions, and therefore hee would not grant any truce. After twentie daies stay at Buda he retired to Constantinople; hauing giuen charge to the Sangiac of Belgrado to make an incursion into Austria, and to put all to fire and sword; and hee commanded CACON Generall of the Aduenturers to spoil Moravia: but God had compassion of his people; for, there fell such abundance of rain, that they could not do any thing to annoy the Christians.

Marano treacherously surprised.

This yeer 1542, King FERDINAND lost Marano, a place of great importance, and a Port of the sea vpon the Adriatick Gulf, neer to Aquilegia and the confines of the Venecians: it was treacherously surprised by BELTRANIO SACCHIA of Vdena who pretended to be a great friend vnto the gouernour, promising to bring him two barkes of corne, whereof the Castle was in want: by which colour he brought in diuerse souldiers and became master of the Castle, and put the gouernour his wife and sonne in prison: but soon after, SACCHIA himself was shut out of the Castle by his companion TVRCHETTO da Naue, and forced to flee to Venice. It was besieged by FERDINAND'S forces which lay at Gradisca and thereabouts. TVRCHETTO did pretend to hold it for the French King, sending to PETER STROZZI (who was then leuying of men for the King) to send him some troops. FERDINAND, beeing aduertised heerof, caused men to be leuied in the County of Tirroll and the bordering places, for the recouery of Marano, sending also a little Army of Barks, besieging it by sea and land. Hauing after a long siege reduced the Castle to extremity for want of victuals, in the end there appeared certain Venecian Gallies; who gaue the Commander to vnderstand, that they should depart from thence, for that the Segnory of Venice had bought the place of the French: and so the Venecians entred presently, and it was yeelded vp vnto them.

The Emperors Ambassador complaining heerof to the State, they answered that they had bought Marano (that is to say, the circuit as it stands in the water, not meddling with the firm land) to auoid a greater scandall, the French King being else resolued to deliuer it to the Turk; which they hoped FERDINAND being a wise Prince would not take in ill part. And thus Marano continued in the hands of the Venecians, and doth to this day.

This yeer 1543, there was a great Assembly of Princes and Noble-men at Noremberg, where they conferred touching the aiding of FERDINAND in his Turkish warres; so as they had drawn together from the Noble-men and free Cities 30000 foot and 7000 horse, all Germans. CONRAD HESSIVS commanded the foot, and THEODORICK VOLFANGO the horse; and IOACHIM Marquesse of Brandenburgh was Generall. Coming to Vienna, the Gouernor of Stiria came to them with ten thousand horse; and their were almost 15000 Hungarians on horseback, vnder the command of PETER PERENO, who had alwaies commanded the old bands. The Councell being now assembled at Trent, King FERDINAND sent his Ambassadors thither to demand aid: whereupon Pope PAVL sent him 3000 foot commanded by ALEXANDER VITELLI and SFORZA PALLAVICINO: and fearing the Turk, he had great forces on the frontiers, before commaded by the Marquess of Marignian.

Feildmarshals preparation against the Turk.

The Army being assembled at Vienna, they marched in good order along the banks of the riuer of Dannow, and went to besiege Pesta neer vnto Buda; where were many encounters and skirmishes, with great losse of either side, but especially of the Turks. The Towne was battered, and a furious assault giuen by the Italians and the Hungarians: but in the end they were repulst with the losse of 700 men. It is written by VLLOA, that vpon their retreit a Ianizary cried vnto them in the Italian Tongue, saying; You valiant Italians, retire and saue your selues, and let come those cowardly Dutch-men: for, we desire to drawe the wine out of their heads, and to giue you all possible respects. After this repulse, the Commanders and Councell hearing of the coming of ACCOMAT Sangiack of Belgrado, and winter growing on, they resolued to retire the Army, and returne to Vienna, much against the will of the Hungarians, the Marquesse of Marignas and Vitelli; who perswaded them to batter it again the next day without giuing any assault, to the end it should not seem that the amazement of the former dayes successe had made them depart: which done, they withdrew their artillery; and the Armie marcht away in good order, being sometimes annoyed by the Turk, but still to their losse: and thus ended that shamefull enterprise.

Pesta besieged, and the Christians repulst.

The end of the war of Pesta.

At this time PETER PERENO, a Noble-man of Hungary, of great account, who had alwaies commanded the Hungarian horse, and done great seruice, being accused that hee practised to make himself King of Hungary, was by FERDINAND'S commission taken in the Castle of Strigonium by LESCANO a Spaniard, and giuen to MARIGNAN, who conducted him to Vienna; where he was put in prison, and could not be admitted to iustifie himself publikely. Which much discontented the Hungarians, seeing he was a valiant Captain, greatly beloued of them; som thinking he was falsly accused by such as were neer FERDINAND and enui'd him.

Pereno imprisoned by Ferdinand.

FERDINAND, imploying himself to the affairs of Germany, vsed all means to hinder the meeting of the Princes of Germany in Smalcald, with the Ambassadors of the free Towns, who (as the fame went) were assembled to the prejudice of the Emperor. Which for that he could not effect, he assaied to make peace between the Emperor and the French King, notwithstanding that both in the one and the other he found great difficulty: neuertheless, hee so handled the matter, that in the beginning of the next yeer they agreeing vpon sundry conditions, in the yeer 1544 the articles of peace were confirmed by them both.

Peace between the Emperor & the French King.

In the beginning of the yeer 1545, FERDINAND sent his Ambassadors to the Councell of Trent, to the end that the disagreement in matters of religion in Germany might bee reconciled according to the Emperors desire: but hee seeing the ill will which the Assembly at Smalcald bare to the Emperor, and that the same increased, by his Letters hee perswaded each of them to quietnes: which perswasions taking no effect, the Emperor came from Flanders into Germany; where he obtained aid from the Duke of Florence, the Duke of Ferrara, and from euery Potentate in Italy some, but chiefly from Pope PAVL: who seeing that the warre should bee waged against the Lutherans, coutemners of his Holinesse, sent him twelue thousand footmen and six hundred horse, commanded by his nephew OCTAVIVS FARNESE the Emperors son-in-law, with his brother the Cardinall ALEXANDER FARNESE, Legate à Latere for his Vncle the Pope. With which supplies, the Emperor hauing in the yeer 1546 and 1547 distressed his enemies, he restored the Duke of Bruinswick to his estate; who from the yeer 1543, had by the Lantzgraue, and IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, liued depriued of his duchy: and notwithstanding the promise made to Duke MAVRICE, assuring him that the Lantzgraue should be restored to his Countries; yet he neuertheless was likewise taken prisoner the same day that according to the agreement they spake together; so as Germany being in short space in quiet, Duke IOHN FREDERICK was depriued of the dignity of Elector, and together with many other Captains of the league committed to prison in the yeer one thousand, fiue hundred, forty seuen.

This Pope sent 12000 foot and 600 horse to aid the Emperor against the Protestants.

In the yeer 1545 SOLIMAN came again into Hungary with a great Army, sending to besiege Valponie, a Town belonging to PETER PERENO (who at that time was prisoner with FERDINAND) in the which his wife was, with a garrison of Hungarians: but she yeelded the place vpon good conditions, the which were duely obserued. After which, they besieged Sole, another Town belonging to this Lady; the which was valiantly defended, and many Turks slain: but being forced in the end by their continuall assaults to retire into the Castle, they offered to compound. ACCOMAT who commanded that Army, disdaining that so little a place should make such resistance, said, that he would accept of no other conditions, but discretion: whereupon, yeelding they were all slain, to terrifie the rest. SOLIMAN being come to Buda, he sent to besiege Strigonium: in the which, SALAMANCA and LESCANO, two Spaniards, commanded for FERDINAND; the one hauing charge of the City, the other of the Castle: where, after many exploits of warre and assaults giuen, the Commanders began to faint, and resolued to yeeld (as it was thought) to saue the wealth which they had gatherd together; which the ſouldiers diſcouering, cried out, that they might yet defend it valiantly; but they could not preuail: whereupon, the Town was yeelded to SOLIMAN, vpon condition to haue their liberties and liues.

Tatta yeelded to the Turks.

From thence the Turks went to Tatta, a Caſtle neer to Gomora, the which was commanded by HANNIBALL TASSO of Bologna, and ANTIO a German, with a garriſon of 800 men; who deſpairing to defend ſo ſmall a place againſt ſo great an Army, yeelded it without fight, being ſuffred to depart freely. The Earle of Torneillo, who commanded in Gomora, put theſe two Captains in priſon, and cut off TASSO's head, leauing ANTIO to FERDINAND's cenſure, who referred him to the ſame Sentence which Torneillo had giuen of the Italian Captain: and ſo they died both of one death. Then the Turks went to beſiege Alba Regalis; which they battered, and gaue diuerſe aſſaults: but in the end it was yeelded to the Turks by the wilfulnes of the Citizens, contrary to the will of the Commander and ſouldiers, vpon condition to haue their goods and liberties: the like was granted to the Italians and Germans, but not to the Hungarians; and they departed without the loſſe of any thing. After which, the Turk retired with his Army to Conſtantinople.

Alba Regalis taken.

FERDINAND went againſt the Bohemians, which in the behalf of the Duke of Saxony had rebelled againſt him: and being comn into the Kingdome, after much reſiſtance and apparant danger of his perſon, he at length got the Caſtle of Prague; wherein being entred, hee put the Bohemians in ſuch fear, that, notwithſtanding the many difficulties, yet hee ſubdued them in ſuch manner, that they yeelded themſelues abſolutely to his mercy. And ſo hauing accompliſhed this enterpriſe, he ſent his eldeſt ſoune MAXIMILIAN with certain gallant troops of horſe to the aid of his brother the Emperor; and hee himſelf in the mean time neuer deſiſted, together with Duke MAVRICE, to trouble Duke IOHN FREDERICK. In the day of the battell beyond the Riuer Albis, he not onely aſſiſted his brother with his forces, but with certain very good troops of horſe came thither in perſon; where hee ſhewed himſelf no leſſe a valiant man at Arms, than a moſt prudent Commander. After which victory, returning into Bohemia, he celebrated the obſequies of his wife ANNE, who in the beginning of the yeer died in childe-bed: which obſequies he could no ſooner ſolemnize, by reaſon of the wars in Germany, and the inſurrections in Hungary.

FERDINAND, hauing ended the wars of Bohemia, and holpen his brother to ſuppreſſe his enemies, in the yeer 1548, houlding a Synode with the Emperor in Auſburgh, there were fifteen Inſtitutions publiſhed appertaining to religion, with expreſſe order, that the ſame ſhould be obſerued till the diſſolution of the Councell of Trent; which ordinance was called an Interim: wherein was contained what was commanded to be beleeued till the determination of the ſaid Councell. After which publication, the Emperor deſirous that his ſon PHILP, Prince of Spain, ſhould be acknowledged by the Netherlanders for their legitimate and naturall Lord, he married his daughter MARY to MAXIMILIAN Arch-duke of Auſtria, eldeſt ſon to his brother FERDINAND, to the end that they ſhould make their reſidence in Spain vntill the return of PHILIP: and purchaſing a diſpenſation from the Pope, hee publiſhing the nuptials, ſent him into Spain, accompanied by the Cardinall of Trent, and the Earle of Manſfelt, and many other of the German and Bohemian Nobility. But firſt, before his departure, he obtained for him of his father FERDINAND the Kingdome of Bohemia, to the end that hee ſhould come into Spain with the greater dignity; where, as Gouerner of thoſe Countries, he remained till the return of Prince PHILIP.

Ferdinand gaue Bohemia to his ſon Maximilian.

In the yeer 1551, FERDINAND receiu'd Letters from SOLIMAN the great Turk; wherein ſhewing himſelfe diſcontent both with FERDINAND and the Emperor, for that ANDREVV DORIA had taken the town of Africa from DRAGVT RAIS a Pirat, he proteſted, that if it were not rendred, he would cruelly reuenge the injury don to his Captain DRAGVT. Whereto FERDINAND made anſwer, that for as much as Pirates were not compriſed in the Articles of agreement, neither hee nor his brother were bound to any thing. With which anſwer diſpatching the meſſenger, in the moneth of May hee ſent IOHN BAPTISTA CASTALDO into Tranſiluania, to aſſiſt Frier GEORGE againſt Queen ISABELL; who hauing in former time drawne great part of the Tranſiluanians to her deuotion, and ſought to preſerue that Prouince for her ſonne, fell at open variance with the Frier: who, ambitiouſly deſiring to continue his gouernment, gaue FERDINAND to vnderſtand, that the Queen hoping by the Turks means to hold that Country, was again riſen againſt him, and ſought to driue him out of that eſtate: which for that he knew to be very preiudiciall to all Chriſtendom, he had aduertiſed him thereof; therewith entreating him, that for the preſeruation of the countrey, he would be pleaſed to relieue him againſt the Queens inuaſions, which daily troubled him.

Caſtaldo ſent to aid Frier George againſt the Queen.

FERDINAND, induced by theſe reaſons, ſent (as before is ſaid) Caſtaldo to the Frier: who as his Lieutenant General comming to Agria, leuied 5700 foote-men, and 1700 horſe; with which paſſing the riuer Tiſſa, he went to Debrezen; where finding Andrew Bator; and Thomas Nacladi, principall Lords of that kingdome, he went into Tranſiluania: where hauing for the ſpace of three moneths beſieged Coloſuarre in the behalfe of the Frier, he was aduertiſed that the Frier through a new compoſition with the Queen, hauing taken Alba Iulia, was retired from the warres; and that he had neuertheleſſe ſent him word, that if he would meet him at Egnet, he would ſpeake with him. Whither Caſtaldo being come, after many diſcourſes and treaties paſt between them, obtaining of the Frier the Citie of Alba Iulia to winter his people in; he had word from the Queen, that ſhe would come to an agreement with FERDINAND, according to the couenants made with her husband: ſo that after many conuentions, comming to Coloſuarre, whither were already come the moſt part of the Lords of that kingdome, Iſabel in the name of her ſonne renounced, and gaue vp the kingdome and eſtate of Hungary to Caſtaldo, who in the name of FERDINAND accepted the ſame. After which renunciation, ſhe granted to the moſt inſatiable Frier all his demands, which were vnreaſonable, together with the Archbiſhoprick of Strigonium, being at that time voide. Caſtaldo accommodating that Prouince according to the order receiued from FERDINAND, and as he thought moſt expedient, celebrated the nuptials between one of FERDINANDS daughters, and Iohn, at the firſt called Stephen, the Queenes ſonne. But the ambitious Frier, not content with the agreement, by the meanes of a Frenchman, who was a ſpie for the Turke in that kingdome, he acquainted Soliman with the whole agreement and compoſition made between FERDINAND and the Queen. Wherewith Soliman being highly diſpleaſed, ſhortly after ſent the Beglerbey of Grecia; who paſſing with great celerity to Belgrado, came to Beche, and tooke it, with Bekerque and Senate: and hauing without any reſiſtance, vpon compoſition taken Lippa, he went without any oppoſition made by the Chriſtians, to Themeſuar; where encamping himſelfe, he vnderſtood that Caſtaldos Armie was come. Who with much adoe, hauing induced Frier George, then made Treaſorer of that kingdome, and Vaiuode of Tranſiluania, to leuie forces againſt the Turke, he brought it ſo to paſſe that he conſtrained the Beglerbey to raiſe his ſiege from before Themeſuarre; notwithſtanding that the Frier euer endeuored all that he could to hinder Caſtaldo's proceedings.

Lippa taken by Caſtaldo.

The Frier vnderſtanding of the Turkes departure, went to Lippa; where he ſtayed not long, til by Pope Iulio at the requeſt of FERDINAND, he was made Cardinall; yet he ſought to croſſe Caſtaldos deſignes, and to betray him and FERDINAND's whole Army into the hands of the Turkes: hoping by this meanes, not onely to reconcile himſelfe to Soliman, but to become abſolute Lord of Tranſiluania. Whoſe wicked practice being made fruſtrate, Caſtaldo continued the ſiege of Lippa: which after many skirmiſhes and aſſaults, comming into Caſtaldos power, was giuen in prey to the Souldiers, who loaden with ſpoyle, preſently beſieged the Fortreſſe; about which hauing ſpent ſome daies, they had taken the ſame, together with Oliman Gouernor thereof, if the Friers villany had not fruſtrated Caſtaldo's purpoſe; Who deſiring by theſe meanes to obtaine the Turkes good will, dealt ſo, that he ſet Oliman at liberty: wherewith Caſtaldo being infinitely diſpleaſed, ſought to abate the Friers authority: but failing of his purpoſe, he diſſembled the matter.

Meanwyfed by Caſtaldo to trap Frier George.

Winter being come, FERDINAND's forces leauing Tranſiluania (he being vnwilling they ſhould remaine there) ſtayed vpon the frontiers of the enemy. After whoſe departure CASTALDO conducting the Artillery into the kingdom, diſcouered to SFORZA PALLAVICINO that FERDINAND had commanded Frier GEORGE ſhould be put to death; but being vnable, without great circumſpection, to bring it to effect, he willed PALLAVICINO to be in a readineſſe vntill he gaue him further direction. In the meane time repairing to the Citadel at Lippa, he ſtayed neere to Varadin: and ſending his Army before, he ioyned with the Frier riding together in one Coach to Buiſe, in which place being againe ſolicited by FERDINAND to make away the Frier. CASTALDO ſpeedily wrote to SFORCE PALLAVICINO that as ſoone as hee might, he ſhould with his troupes come to conferre with him, about what courſe was to be taken in that buſineſſe. Wherupon PALLAVICINO comming to Buiſe, and hauing laid the plot for the Friers diſpatch, he went to ſeeke him iuſt at the time when he ſhould haue ſaid Maſſe: with whom CASTALDO holding a long diſcourſe ſhewed, ed him ener a good countenance, notwithstanding that he was in all occasions croſt by him: and his inſolency was ſuch, that he forbare not openly to negociate with the Turkes. Whereupon CASTALDO directing thoſe which ſhould kill him, in what manner they ſhould diſpatch him; he appointed his ſecretary MARC ANTONIO FERRARI of Alexandria (vnder colour to get the Friers hand to certain Letters which SFORZA PALLAVICINO ſhould beare to FERDINAND) to come to him, vpon the eighteenth day of December, the ſame yeere. Who coming in the company of Pallauicino into the Caſtle with certaine Harguebuziers, and preſenting the Letters to the Frier, to the end he ſhould ſubſcribe them, after that the Frier had aduiſedly read them, ſtooping downe to write vpon a little table which was in the chamber, Ferrari drawing his poynard ſtabbed him twice; which being of no ſufficient force to kill him, it behoued Pallauicino (who vpon the noyſe ranne into the chamber) to ſet his helping hand to the worke: for the Frier was a gallant ſtrong fellow; who turning to him that ſtabbed him, threw him to the ground, and therewith made ſo great a noyſe, that Pallauicino comming into the chamber and ſeeing Ferrari downe, ſetting hand to his ſword, gaue the Frier ſuch a blow on his head, that he cleft the ſame in two: an act truely worthy of great reprehenſion, if the behauior of the man had not deſerued it. For Frier George was endued with ſuch excellency of wit, and therwith was of ſo generous a ſpirit, and ſo diligent in all matters of importance, that FERDINAND himſelfe (who cauſed him to be ſlaine) would often ſay openly, that he enuyed the Vayuode for nothing, but Frier George.

The death of Frier George.

The Frier dying in this manner ſuddenly, Caſtaldo impriſoned his great friend Francis Thendi, who to eſcape from FERDINANDS forces, had after the Turkiſh manner clad himſelfe in Scarlet, whoſe impriſonment was a great helpe to Caſtaldo: for Thendi being reconciled, was the cauſe that the Sicoli, a moſt fierce people of Tranſiluania, yeelded obedience to the King of the Romanes; which people with others, through Caſtaldo's endeuour, within fewe daies ſubmitted themſelues. But in the yeer one thouſand fiue hundred forty two, Soliman vnderſtanding of the death of Frier George, ſent two Armies into Tranſiluania, to inuade the ſame in two ſeuerall places: where Caſtaldo thinking by fortifying the frontiers, to entertaine the Turkes vntill the comming of an Army out of Germany, he ſent Frier Georges treaſure to FERDINAND; and taking Seghedin, had ſundry ſupplies from the Lords of that kingdome; and fortifying Lippa and Themeſuarre he gathered thoſe men together which (to auoide the rage of the Turkes) came to his Campe.

The death of Cardinall George bred great rumors and diſcontents in Tranſiluania: the inhabitants being much affected to their King, imagined that the death of Frier George did not proceed of any treaty he had with the Turkes, but that FERDINAND taking away the dogge which kept the flock, he might (as they ſaid) with more eaſe afterward deuoure it: but in the Conſiſtory at Rome, they were much ſcandalized, and FERDINAND blamed to haue committed ſo great an exceſſe vpon a ſacred perſon, and of that eminency. The matter was much aggrauated: and although that FERDINAND was otherwiſe well reſpected, and held for a iuſt Prince, and of great bounty; yet the Pope would not abſolue him, being excommunicate, without the conſent of the Cardinalls: but making the truth appeare by his miniſters, and the danger wherein thoſe Realmes were, if he ſhould not haue vſed that preuention, in the end hee obtained abſolution, not without the contradiction of many Cardinalls, whereto the Popes facility was a great helpe: And not long after, Sforza, and all the reſt that were actors in the death of Frier George, were in like manner abſolued, but with farre greater difficulty.

FERDINAND vnable to ſend ſuch ſuccours as he had promiſed, by reaſon of the warres in Germany between his brother the Emperor and Maurice Duke of Saxony, perſwaded Caſtaldo to beare his fortune in the beſt manner that poſſibly he could; promiſing with all poſſible ſpeed to relieue him. Who perceiuing that the Moldauian, and Mahomet Baſha were with a great Army come into Hungary, to inuade Tranſiluania; he ſent Felix Earle of Arco, to defend the Caſtle of Braſouia. And obtaining great reliefe and victuals, from the City of Zibanio, he endeuored to reinforce his troupes, and to fortifie many places; but this nothing furthered FERDINAND'S proceedings: For by reaſon that the Articles of agreement were not obſerued to Iſabel, many of thoſe people rebelled againſt him, and after much contention, hee was conſtrained to come to blowes with them: For ſpending much time, both in loſing, and in recouering, the Turks daily conquered more and more. Who taking Lippa, and Themeſuarre, with many other places, by an order from Mahomet; the Baſha, together with the the Baſha of Buda, marched to the Caſtle of Drigall; before which lay Sforza Pallauicino with ſix thouſand men, Germanes and others: who valiantly aſſaulting the Caſtle, was at vnawares ſet vpon by the Baſha; with whom comming to fight, and performing the office both of a valiant Souldier, and prudent Captaine, he was in the end ouerthrowne, and ſhortly after with many other Captaines taken priſoner, and brought (by a Turke which charging him in the flanke with his Cimitare had wounded him very ſore) to the Baſha: from whom he was afterwards ranſomed for a great ſumme of mony. After which, Mahomet to the great ſlaughter of his men, took Salonch, built by FERDINAND in a ſtrong place beyond the riuer Tiſſa; the loſſe wherof greatly troubled FERDINAND. Who ſeeing that his affaires notwithſtanding the valour and wiſedome of Caſtaldo daily went from ill to worſe, and vnderſtanding that the people of Tranſiluania were wholly reuolted to the Queene, greatly fauoured by Mahomet Baſha, and that they had often practiſed to kill Caſtaldo, he commanded him that notwithſtanding Mahomets retreit, deſpairing to take Agria, long attempted by his people, he ſhould retire. Which Caſtaldo putting in execution, placed the Spaniſh and Dutch ſouldiers in Zibinio, and other places neere adiacent: and hauing fortified Deua, after much prouiſion made, he went to Alba Iulia to winter the reſt of his Army. In the meane time, abſolution came from Rome for thoſe which kild Frier George. And the yeere 1553 being come, Francis Thendi, fauouring the Queenes cauſe, brought it ſo to paſſe, that notwithſtanding the many Councels, wherein Caſtaldo was euer preſent, a great number of the Lords of Tranſiluania in the behalfe of the Queene, tooke Armes againſt FERDINAND, and expulſing FERDINAND'S forces, reeſtabliſhed her, together with her ſonne in her eſtate.

Sforza Pallauicino wounded, ouerthrown and taken priſoner by the Turkes, before the Caſtle of Drigall.

That yeer being ended, and the yeer 1554 begun, FERDINAND ſent his Ambaſſadors to his Nephew Philip in England, to congratulate his mariage with Mary Queen of that Country, who ſucceeded her brother Edward. And in the yeere 1555 dyed Ioane, mother to FERDINAND, and the Emperor Charles the fift, in Spaine; whoſe death FERDINAND took very grieuouſly. In the meane time taking a truce with the Turke, who vpon an acknowledgement of a tribute, ſuffered him peaceably to enioy all that he held in Hungary. King FERDINAND (as ſome write) did vpon the concluſion of this truce yeeld to pay vnto the Turke a yeerely penſion of 30000. crownes, but not by way of tribute; for the confirmation whereof, he ſent his Ambaſſadors to Conſtantinople. But the Baſha of Buda had no will to peace: for in the beginning of the yeere, 1556 he complained of wrongs done vnto them by the Garriſons of Sigeth, Babott, and other neighbour places; whereupon he drew together 10000. men, and ſurpriſed Caposuiuer and Babot ſuſpecting no danger; with the like hope he went to Sigeth, but tarried not: yet he returned ſoone after with a great Army and began the ſiege. The towne was defended by valiant ſouldiars, vnder the command of Marke Hornato a worthie gentleman, and of a noble family. At that time FERDINAND was troubled with tumults in Tranſiluania, procured by Peter Vicchius: who not onely perſwaded Soliman to cauſe Tranſiluania to be reſtored vnto him, belonging vnto him as he ſaid by hereditary right; but he alſo diſſwaded all the ſubiects from their obedience to the young Vayuode. Moreouer George Bebequius infeſted the confines of Agria, taking certaine caſtles with the helpe of the Valacchians. FERDINAND being oppreſſed with ſo many enemies, he ſent to the Princes of Germany being aſſembled at Ratisbone, to craue aide, and in the meane time he leuied ſoldiers with his owne reuenues. His troupes being ready, the rendez vous was appointed at Canitia a towne in Stiria, where they reſolued to beſiege Babot, thereby to relieue Sigeth. The Turks left the ſiege, and went with all ſpeede to incounter the chriſtians, where notwithſtanding that they were more in number and had the aduantage of the gound, yet they were beaten and forced to retire with very great loſſe; wherein 300 Auſtrian horſe which they called the black bandes, did ſo charge the Turks in the retreat as they confeſſed they neuer dealt with more fearefull enemies.

The Turkes put to Rout at Babot.

FERDINAND being aduertiſed of this incounter at Babot he did much honour the Earle of Serine and the other commanders: and being deſirous to finiſh the warres he leuied new troupes and made his ſon FERDINAND Generall of the Army, but before he could attaine to the Campe, the Turks had againe inueſted Sigeth with a new ſiege: aſſuring themſelues to carrie it, they planted their battailes, and vſed all perſwaſions and threats to draw them to yeeld, but the gouernour nor his ſouldiers would not be moued, although they were in ſome want of powder and victuals, but made daily ſallyes and returned with much honour, and great ſpoiles, which made the Baſha deſpaire of the euent, and reſolued to leaue it. They write that the beſieged ſhewed ſuch valour, as the Baſha wept, hearing that he had ſlaine but one chriſtian in fiue daies daies, and so he retired. The Arch-duke FERDINAND beeing come to Canisia to the Army, they took Carioth, Babot, Saint Martins, and diuerse other Townes in those parts: and the garrison of Sigeth being now at liberty, went as far as the walls of Quinqueecclesia, and brought away great spoils. Charles Serotin, a Baron of Morauia, was sent to refresh Sigeth with victualls, powder, and all kinde of warlike munition: the which hauing performed accordingly, he returned within few dayes to the Archduke; who hearing that the Turkes drew all their forces together, and seeing Winter approach, and diseases to creepe into his Armie, hauing freed Sigeth from Seege (which was the chiefe end of that expedition) he resolued to returne to Vienna, being also called home by Letters from FERDINAND his father, who receiued him ioifully about the end of November. In the Archdukes retreat, the Turkes (contrary to their vsuall custome) neuer followed, but like men amazed kept themselues within their defences: soone after Soliman made a truce with FERDINAND, but the affaires of Transiluania would not suffer it to hold.

Exploits of the Archduke Ferdinand in Hungary.

Truce made with the Turks.

There came a Turkish Embassador into Transiluania, who bringing (as hee sayd) hope of peace, they intreated FERDINAND to giue them leaue to treat with him. A conference then being appointed by his sufferance, the Turke deliuered a farre other charge then they expected: which was, that expelling FERDINAND's soldiers, they should presently receiue Iohn, (who was baptized by the name of Stephen) sonne to the first Vayuode, for their King: which being done Soliman would accept of their tribute, and vouchsafe them his fauour; but if they did otherwise, he would take reuenge of them. He did also write vnto Andrew Battori, a man of great credit amongst the Transiluanians, complaining that they had receiued forraine forces, who committed many insolencies, and that he would come with a great Army, to expel them, punishing them seuerely, if they did not obey his commandements. The Transiluanians being terrified with these threats, acquainted Castaldo withall: who came vnto the assembly of the Noble men; where he refuted all Solimans threats, perswading the Transiluanians, rather to dye honorably, then to liue basely in the Turkish seruitude. Wherefore, it was concluded to pay him the promised tribute, the which if he refused, then to command him to depart out of their confines; but the Ambassador seeing he could obtain no other thing, receiued the tribute and returned.

The Turke threatneth the Transiluanians.

After which, Isabell mother to Iohn the Vaiuode, expelling all that fauoured FERDINAND got the whole gouernment into her hands, partly through the peoples fauour, and partly relying vpon the Turks, and Polonians friendship: which she might effect the more easily, for that the plague had consumed many thousands of men, and made the whole countrey in a manner desolate. FERDINAND did forbeare to take Armes against her though iustly incensed, knowing that the king of Poland and other Princes, would treat with him about a peace.

CHARLES the Emperor hauing giuen vp the states of the Low Countries, the kingdoms of Spaine, and all his other kingdomes to his son Philip; FERDINAND sought to suppresse and extinguish the preaching of the Gospell in Germany; and receiuing Letters of his brothers renunciation made to his son, he infinitely commended his resolution.

That yeere being ended, and the yeere 1556 being come, he was aduertised that his brother the Emperour hauing renounced the Empire vnto him, was retired into Spaine, to leade a solitary life; for which yeelding him thankes by his Letters and Ambassadours, he went to Viena to make prouision for the warres, which (as it was said) Soliman would make in Hungary: where spending the rest of that yeer, he remained vntill the yeere 1557. In the beginning of which yeere, he interposed himselfe betweene King Philip and the Pope, perswading them to peace: for the Pope induced by his Nephew the Cardinall Caraffa, made warre against the King. And that yeere being ended, in the beginning of the yeere 1558, he was by the Electors according to the will of his brother Charles, chosen and proclaimed Emperor; no man but the Pope contradicting his election, who affirmed that the resignation made by the Emperour Charles could not be done without the Popes consent: but his exception being reiected, FERDINAND was chosen and proclaimed lawfull Emperour. Not long after, hee had newes that his brother Charles was departed out of this world: for whose death he with his whole Court were very sorie; neuertheless suppressing his griefe, he celebrated the exequies with great pompe, and presently sent his Ambassadours to King Philip, to condole the common losse. Soone after the decease of the Emperour Charles, in the beginning of the yeere 1559, FERDINAND vsed all his endeauour to make a peace betweene King Philip, and Henry the French King; which after many treaties being concluded, and an alliance made, he was exceeding glad, for that after seuentie tie yeeres continuall dissension, peace was now made betweene those two mighty kings, which was proclaimed through all Christendome. A little while after, in the beginning of the yeere 1560, FERDINAND was confirmed in the Empire by the new Pope, who willingly approued his election, and held it an vnworthie thing, after a peace so long desired, againe to bring Italy into new combustions: and so following the desire of that Prince, hee consented to the calling of a Counceil. In the yeere 1561 he made proclamation to all Prelates and Nations, of a Councell to be held the yeere following, wherein the Articles proponed by the Lutherans should be determined. And in the yeere 1562 a Councell was againe called, to be held in the city of Trent, whither FERDINAND sending the Prelates of his dominion, perswaded al the Princes of Germany to doe the like: and writing to his Nephew King PHILIP, and to the King of Portugal, and to all the other Princes of Christendome, he vsed such meanes that al the Princes according to his desire, sent the Bishops of their countries with their particular Ambassadours to that Councell, wherein the matters of greatest importance were handled concerning religion. In which time FERDINAND desiring that some one of his sons after his decease might succeede him in the Imperiall dignity, he called the Princes Electors to a Councell held at Franckford, where propounding to them his desire, he alleaged that in respect of the Turk it was requisite it should be so; and after the matter had been long debated, he obtained his purpose to his content: which being concluded, he made his son MAXIMILIAN within fewe daies after to be crowned King of the Romans. After which ceremonies, going to Ispruch to see his daughters, he vnderstood that the truce lately treated of with SOLIMAN, not only took effect for ten yeers, but that at his sute Don ALVARO de Sande was released out of prison, together with three other principall Knights, taken in the yeer one thousand, fiue hundred sixty, in the enterprise of Tripoli, by DRAGVT RAIS. At that time were great wars in France between the Papists and the Huguenots, which the Emperor sought to haue pacified: but that nation was so extremely incensed, that the Emperors perswasions could nothing preuail among them.

The Emp. confirmed by Pope Pius 4.

In the yeer 1564, the Councell of Trent being dissolued, FERDINAND came to Vienna; where falling sick of an Ague, and knowing by the vehemency of his disease that his life drew neer to an end, he sent for all his children, which then were dispersed into sundry places: to whom after he had giuen his blessing, together with many good exhortations, hee rendred his soule to God vpon the fift day of Iuly in the same yeer. He was a Prince by all men reputed to be of singular bounty and piety, and of a most gentle and pleasing disposition, not very strong of body, but repleniſhed with so much majesty, that whosoeuer saw him could not but respect him: for, being of a pleasing and affable condition, hee would most curteously incline himself to euery one that came to salute him. He was naturally merry, free from surfetting, and wore his beard rather short than long; and his hair so long, that it couered his eies, with some baudnes. He was in all his actions (prosperous or aduerse) alwaies constant, houlding all things to happen to him by the will of God. He confessed himself three or foure times in the yeer, and with great deuotion receiued the Communion, willing that euery one in his Court should doe the like: so that his house seemd to be rather a regular Monastery, than a Court of secular men. He left behinde him many children, and had in all fifteen; foure sonnes, and the rest daughters, which were married to sundry Princes in Christendome. ISABELL, which was his first, was giuen in marriage to SIGISMVND King of Poland: ANNE was wife to the Duke of Bauier; MARY, to the Duke of Cleue; MAGDALEN, a chaste Virgin; CATHERINE, to FRANCIS, Duke of Mantoa; ELENOR, to WILLIAM Duke of Mantoa: MARGARET was a Nun: BARBARA was married to ALFONSE the second Duke of Ferrara; VRSVLA a Virgin and a Nunne: HELEN liued but a little while; and IOAN was wife to FRANCIS the great Duke of Tuscane. Of sonnes, besides the Emperor MAXIMILIAN, he had FERDINAND and CHARLES, Arch-dukes of Austria, and IOHN, who died very yong. Hee had but one onely wife, and (as it was said) neuer before nor after knew any other woman but her; whom he loued so entirely, that he would not marry the second time. Hee much loued learned men, and gaue them great pensions for their maintenance. Hee neuer vndertook any warres but for religion; either against the Turk or the Lutherans, whom he vehemently persecuted.

The death of the Emperor Ferdinand.

FERDINAND hauing been King of Hungary and Bohemia foure and thirty yeers, and Emperor seuen; to the great grief of his people, and of all the Princes of Christendom, ended his daies: After whose decease, his obsequies being celebrated with great pomp, sundry funerall Ferdinand's speech to his son Maximilian.

FERDINAND seeing his end draw neere, called King MAXIMILIAN his sonne (who was to succeede him in the Empire) to whom he made a long speach, touching the gouernment of himselfe, and state, the which according to Vilos's relation, I haue presumed to set downe Verbatim, for that it deserues to be written in gold, for a perpetuall president for all Princes to imitate: his words were these. Deere son seeing it hath pleased his diuine maiesty to call me vnto him, and that my soule shall leaue these earthly spoiles, I haue thought good to impart some things vnto you, which I hold very necessary: the which I intreate you to heare with an attentiue eare, seeing I deliuer them with a ioyfull heart: know then sonne that I leaue this world ioyfully, for that I found my selfe in a lodging which was not firme nor constant, wherewith I was much troubled: I repent not the time that I haue liued, hauing imployed the whole course of my life in the seruice of god, and the increase of his holy faith: and I depart contented for that I leaue thee my son, in whom as in a liuely image of my body and soule, I trust, although I be dead, yet I shall in some sort liue, and that thou wilt imitate me in all my actions, according to my desire. The which I intreate thee to doe if thou louest me and thy selfe; and let it be thy chiefest study and care, to the end the world may know that thou art my son, and the strong pillar and firme support of the house of Austria: The which shall be easie when as thy counsels and actions, shall be squared by the rule of honesty and honor. Next if thou shalt set before thine eyes the reputation and glory of RODVLPHVS (a great Prince, the honor of our house, and an excellent Emperor) of FREDERICK thy great Grandfather, of MAXIMILIAN thy Grandfather; of Charles the Fift thine Vncle, inuincible Emperours; and of my self who am thy father; and if like a good childe, thou shalt imitate their famous and worthy deeds, they will make thee glorious in future ages: but if thou shalt doe the contrarie, thou shalt reape nothing but infamy and dishonor; For they which spring from noble and glorious Princes are held base and vnworthy, when as their actions doe not concurre with their progenitors whose deedes are not without great iudgement recorded in writing to posterity. It shall not be needful to tell thee what helpes the valiant and worthy deedes of our progenitors haue giuen to mee and the Emperour my brother, in the laborious course of our liues, for that our actions do shew them. Know then sonne, that I leaue thee a heauy burthen, that is the gouernment of the Empire and of my kingdomes: but if thou proueste a good and vertuous Prince, they will seeme light vnto thee: be then my son such a one, as thy subiects may not lament the losse of thy father: that is to saie, striue to exceede me in their good vsage and gouernment. And to the end (with the Empire and state which I leaue thee) thou maiest haue Armes to defend them, I will put thee in minde like a good father what thou art to doe, the which will be happie and valiant Armes. Those things which I loued in my life (if thou wilt shew thy self to be my son) do not contemne after my death: I recommend strictly vnto thee the worship of religion, reuerence to the Sea of Rome, honour to God, and iustice, if thou wilt haue thy gouernment continue long. Consider, all wisemen direct their actions to purchase fame in this world and eternall glory in that which is to come. I mean a good name, not by their vain glory, but that God may be honored, and by their good example of life and works, others (which shall succeede) may take example; Thou must consider that a good Prince may attaine to both. Seeke not that fame which he had that burnt DIANA'S Temple, or that of ALEXANDER, and IVLIVS CAESAR, which was so preiudiciall to the world. A good fame is purchased by good workes, not by bad; If thou wouldest truly attaine to that which all others seeke, striue rather to be called a good Prince then a great, haue a care rather to better, then to increase thine Empire, endeuoring to imitate such as gouerne their estates well, not those which got them or increased them: for that many seeking to gaine another mans, lose their owne: what the Prince is, such are his subiects: striue then to be such a one as thou wouldest haue thy people. If thou beest a gamester, all will play: if thou followest women, all will be luxurious; if ambitious euery man will seeke to rise, at what rate soeuer: and if thou beest superstitious thou shalt see superstition raigne. But if thou beest religious and a good Prince, O what profit will it bring thee? If thou wouldest free thy selfe from the heauie burthen of importunities, shew thy selfe to be much displeased with ambition. If thou canst doe this thou maiest call thy selfe happy: If thou shalt propound vertue for the reward of all thy labours, thou shalt neuer liue discontented, and thy subiects wil do the like. If thou canst attaine to this, thou maist sleepe securely: finally I put thee in minde that what thou art, such will thy subiects be: striue then to be good if thou wilt haue them good.

Princes should in their actions imitate their predecessors vertues.

The

What Princes chiefly want.

The greatest want we Princes haue, is of men that will tell vs the truth; wherefore giue liberty to all men, that they may admonish and reproue thee; and they that doe it freely, hold them for thy truest friends. As thou dost exceede other men in honor and dignity, so must thou exceede them in vertue. Remember sonne that a common-weale is not instituted for a King; but a King is ordained for a Common-weale: For that many Common-weales, haue flourished without a Prince; but no Prince hath continued long without a State. Striue rather to be beloued then feared, for that no State is long preserued by feare. Whilest thou art only feared, thou shalt haue as many enemies, as subiects: But if thou art beloued, thou shalt not neede any guarde, for that euery vassaile will be a Halberdier. If thou wilt be beloued, Loue; for that Loue is not purchased but with Loue. Loue thy subiects in such sort, as thou maiest alwaies preferre a generall good, before thine owne affections, or thy priuate intrest. Be such a friend to truth, as there may be more credit giuen to thy bare word, then to another mans Oath. Haue more care to gouerne thy selfe, bridling thine affections, then thy subiects; for if thou wilt not obey thy selfe, why shouldst thou be obeyed by others? Maintaine thy grauity in such sort as becomes a prince; and on the other side, be pleasing, courteous, and affable. Remember how other Princes haue liued, imitating the good, and flying the euill. Let nothing proceede out of thy mouth, that may be iniurious or dishoneſt. Punish no man, being angry; for choler giues no way to reason, and thou maist afterwards repent it. Be not carried away with the opinion of the Vulgar, but alwaies embrace the aduice of wise men: For, those Common-weales may iustly be called happy, which are gouerned by the wise. Gouerne thy subiects in such sort as all thy care may be, that no man shall exceede thee in good Gouernement, and iustice. Whilest thou art yong, set alwaies before thine eyes, that thou art not only a Prince and Pastor: but reuerence the Christian faith, making account that it is most necessary for Princes to follow it. Striue to seeme a Christian, not only in outward Ceremonies; but with Christian works. Offend not God, seeing thou hast sworne him to be thy Lord. With what face dareſt thou punish one that hath betrayed thee, if thou beest a Traytor to thy Lord? The more powerfull a Prince is, the more staied and circumspect he should be, not respecting what he may doe, but what he ought to doe; imagining that he stands vpon a high Tower, whereas all the World beholds him, and that no vice can be concealed. If thou maiest defend thy State without preiudice to thy subiects, hold it the best course; for that the Prince was ordained for the Common-wealth, and not the Common-wealth for the Prince. Remember CODRVS and OTHO, who (although they were Pagans) desired rather to die, then to defend their estates with the losse of humane blood. Hold it better to be a iust man, then an vniust Prince; for that a good Prince deserues a great reward, and a wicked merits grieuous punishment. If thou wilt be held a good Prince, striue to be like vnto God, not doing any thing which he would not doe. There are three things chiefly attributed vnto God, Power, Knowledge, and bounty; He that hath the first, and wants the rest, is no King but a Tyrant: Know that the difference betwixt a King and a Tyrant, is not in the name, but in the actions. If thou shalt doe the workes of a Tyrant, they may well, whileſt thou liueſt, tearme thee king, but when thou art dead, they will call thee Tyrant. Wouldst thou know the difference that ARISTOTLE sets betwixt a King and a Tyrant? A King affects the good of the Common-wealth; and a Tyrant seekes his owne profit. Endeuour to leaue thy kingdomes better then I now leaue them, and this shall be thy true glory. Consider there is a contract and conditions betwixt the Prince and the people: if thou doeſt not that which thou oughtst vnto thy subiects, they are not bound to performe their duties vnto thee; with what face canst thou demand thy rents, if thou dost not pay them? Remember that they are men and not beasts, and thou art a sheapheard of men, and not of sheepe. Seeing that all men learne the Art whereby they liue, why shouldst not thou learn the Art to become a good Prince? the which is the most excellent of all others. Be contented with the name of King or Prince, not striuing to be so; for it may be they will call thee Tyrant: For he is no true Prince, to whom a kingdome commeth by succession, but he who by his actions striues to be so. He is a free King which gouernes and commands himselfe, and the other is a slaue, who cannot restraine and bridle his affections. If thou vaunteſt thy selfe to be free, why shouldst thou obey thy passions, which is the most infamous and brutish seruitude of all other. I haue seene many free-men serue, and many slaues to be serued: A slaue is a seruant by force, and cannot be blamed if he be so, seeing it is not in his owne power; but a vicious man, who is a voluntary slaue, ought not to be put in the number of men: Wherefore loue liberty, and learne to be truely a King. Be so carefull of the good gouernement of thy sub-ſubiects, as thou maiſt neuer ſleepe one whole night without it: Studie not how to paſſe away thy time; but how to looſe it. Barbarous Kings, eſpecially in Perſia, maintained their Maieſty by hiding themſelues from their ſubiects; but thou on the other ſide (following my example) ſhalt keepe thy gates alwaies open to the poore, rather then the rich; for they haue more neede of thy fauor then theſe. In thy anſweres follow the aduice of ARISTOTLE, Thoſe which be good and milde giue thy ſelfe: the bitter and ſowre leaue vnto thy Miniſters, and let no man depart from thee iuſtly diſcontented. What thou haſt to giue, giue it ſpeedily and cheerefully, of thine owne free will; and giue them no cauſe to thanke others, for the fauors which thou thy ſelfe doeſt them. Baniſh from thee ſuch as ſeeke out new meanes to oppreſſe and grieue thy ſubiects, and remember that the poore, not the rich, pay tributes and exactions. Be ſo deſirous to doe good, as thou maiſt thinke to haue loſt that day, wherein thou haſt not aſſiſted ſom one. Honor the good and vertuous, more then the rich and powerfull, and thou ſhalt make all men to follow vertue. Admit no idle men into thy kingdomes, for they will breede a world of miſchiefes. Be tractable to pardon thine owne iniuries; for, if an equall to thy ſelfe hath done it, thou canſt not take reuenge, without preiudice to thy ſubiects and his, who haue not offended: If a priuate man doth thee wrong, the greater thy power is to reuenge, the better will thy clemency appeare. Let thy exerciſes be honeſt, holy, good, and profitable to the Common-wealth. O how well it becomes a Prince, to heare the afflictions and grieuances of his ſubiects, and to redreſſe them! Imitate not thoſe who vnburthen themſelues, all they can, of matters of iuſtice; for it is thy chiefe office. Think alwaies of the meanes, by the which thou maiſt gouerne thy ſubiects: endeuor alwaies to know the nature and manners, not only of thine owne ſubiects, but alſo of ſtrangers. Be alwaies in peace and friendſhippe with thy neighbors; contend not with them, leſt it breede thee warre and diſcord. Learne rather by Hiſtories, then by experience, how dangerous and pernicious warre is: Let this be a ſpeciall remembrance vnto thee, that thou neuer vndertake warre, for hatred, or priuate intereſt; and when thou ſhalt be forced vnto it, let it not be ſo much for thy ſelfe as for thy ſubiects. Conſider firſt of all (which will be moſt commodious) whether to vndertake it, or leaue it; and being forced vnto it, let it bee with extreme neceſſity. But firſt endeuour to make an accord: for, peace is better then iuſt warre; from the which thou muſt endeuor to flie, if it were for no other reſpect, but for the honor of the name of a Chriſtian, being much oppoſite vnto it. Make war againſt Turks and Infidels; for otherwiſe they will not only make Chriſtians ſlaues, and force them by torments to deny the faith of Chriſt, but alſo ruine Chriſtendome, and prophane the Temples of Chriſt: But let it neuer come into thy minde, to make warre againſt them, for thine owne priuate intereſt, or for Ambition. Conſider, that vnder this colour of making warre againſt Infidels, there lurkes much poyſon: and when thou haſt conquered them, labor to conuert them to the faith of Chriſt, principally by good workes; For, with what face canſt thou aduiſe them to becom Chriſtians, if thou and thine in your actions be worſe then Infidels? It will be no great matter to conquer the Moores and Turkes, if they ſhall ſee Chriſtian vertues to ſhine in thee and thine, wherefore with theſe labor to conuert them: It imports much whether thy conuerſation be good or bad, and with whom thou doſt conuerſe; therefore ſtriue alwaies to draw into thy company good and vertuous men, and chaſe away the wicked and vicious, which may corrupt thee and be very hurtfull. Loue them which reproue thee freely, and hate ſuch as flatter thee. Doe not obſerue what company is moſt pleaſing vnto thee: but what will be moſt behooueſull for thee; for there is no beaſt ſo venemous. nor creature ſo pernicious and uhrtfull about a Prince, as flatterers, and ambitious perſons: For, the vulgar ſort, who know not the diſpoſition of their Prince, doe alwaies thinke that he is like vnto his fauorites; if they be vertuous, they hold him for vertuous; if wicked and vicious, they eſteeme him the like: Conſider then how carefull thou oughteſt to be in making choice of ſuch as ſhall conuerſe with thee; chiefly make choice of a Confeſſor that is ſincere, pure, incorrupt, of good life and fame, and not ambitious. The principall part of the good gouernement of thy kingdome conſiſts, in that thou beeſt good: and the ſecond, that thou prouide good Miniſters; wherefore conſider well how thou giueſt thy Offices, thy Benefices and thy Biſhoppericks; there is none worthy of any adminiſtration in the Common-weale, but he that takes it by conſtraint, and againſt his will. Wherefore it would be very profitable vnto thee, neuer to giue any Office, Benefice or Biſhopperick, to him that ſeekes it, but to him that being vertuous, and full of baſhfulneſſe, will not ſue for any thing. And know for certaine, that ſuch as ſeek them, are inſufficient to gouerne them; for either they know what they demand, or not. If they know not, they deſerue it not; and if they know and demand it, they diſcouer themſelues to be proud, ambitious, and wicked. Neuer commit matter of iuſtice, but to men that are vncorrupt and good, and who accept them being intreated: for, committing them to others, thy ſubiects ſhall ſuffer oppreſſion; for there is nothing more pernicious, then to haue couetous iudges, who affect gouernement to oppreſſe the people. Let the iudges keepe their reſidence; and forget not ſometimes to ouerſee them, rewarding the good and puniſhing the badde; where I would not haue thee vſe clemency, nor with thy ſeruants, which ſhall forget their duties: but puniſh them with more rigour then other men, both for that they are more bound to be good, being neere vnto thee; as alſo for that part of the infamy redounds vpon thee. Puniſh falſe-witneſſes and ſcandalous accuſers by TALION's Law. In making of Lawes, haue more reſpect vnto the publike good, then to thine owne particular. What thou ſhalt ſee profitable to thy ſubiects, do it before they intreate thee. Be diligent and reſolute in that thou haſt to doe, leſt in the action thou loſeſt the occaſion, and in the benefit the thankes. Striue euer to purchaſe a good name rather then riches or great eſtates: for, the one, wicked men attaine vnto by money; but the other good men only purchaſe by vertue. Loue and feare God, who will teach thee all the reſt, and guide thee in all thy actions. I haue long deſired to ſpeake this vnto thee, but I neuer had oportunity; wherefore I intreate thee (deere ſonne) ſo to imprint it in thine heart, that thou maiſt neuer forget it. Laſtly, I commend vnto thee thy brethren, ſiſters, and kinſfolkes: intreate them in ſuch ſort, as they may not be diſgraced, their old father being dead, nor growe proude ſeeing their brother Emperor. Moreouer I recommend vnto thee my old ſeruants, to whom my long cares, my troubles, warres, affaires, and my long infirmitie, haue been the cauſe of much toyle. And if they ſerued me faithfully vnto death, it is reaſon they ſhould be rewarded: and although my bodie remaines in the graue with the Wormes, yet will I be alwaies mindefull of them before God. Herein thou ſhalt ſhew thy ſelfe a good ſonne, rewarding thoſe which ſerued thy Father. Aboue all things I will put thee in mind, and hold it for good aduice, Be euer in peace and league with PHILIP King of Spaine, my Nephew, and thy Cozen, and ſonne to that father whom I loued much; from whom thou maiſt alwaies receiue good aſſiſtance. And when it ſhall be fit for thee to make a league with him againſt Infidels; I exhort you to doe it, for that with your two forces, you may with more facility ruine the common Enemy. I commend vnto you your brethren, whom I haue enioyned to be obedient vnto you. Loue them, and liue in Peace and Charitie, like good brethren: It ſhall bee a great ioy vnto mee, and my bleſſing ſhall bee with thee, and with you all together, with the Grace of our Lord GOD: to whom I giue infinite thankes, that hee hath done mee this fauour, that I might ſpeake this vnto thee, and bleſſe thee with my hand, as I doe.

THE LIFE OF MAXIMILIAN, SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND SEVENTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

(k)

THE ARGVMENT.

HIS life containeth little else, but the Countries, Parentage and Noble descent of Maximilian, with his acts in the warres in Germany against the Lantzgraue, his going into Spaine to gouerne the same for King Philip, his assumption to the Imperiall dignity, with his warres with the Turkes at Sigeth, and the Election of his sonne Rodulph for King of the Romanes, with some other occurrents concerning the Turkish Warres.

THE house of Austria, amongst the chiefe houses of Germany, is euery way very Noble, and hath beene so of long time (as it euidently appeareth) not only through the hereditary succession of the Empire, from the father to the sonne, in tenne Emperours, from the yeere 1273, at what time RODVLPH the First was chosen Emperour of the Germanes; but also in that it hath since that time in short space, with admirable felicity, not only in Germany enlarged the small confines of Habspurge and Hassia (the antient inheritance thereof) but through the singular protection of the heauens, it hath by inheritance attained to the kingdomes of Bohemia, and Hungary, the Duchie of Austria, the Countie of Flanders, with the estates of the lower Germany, the kingdoms of Spain, with all those countries of the East and West Indies (to the wonder of the World, by CHRISTOPHER COLVMBVS a Genowaies, and AMERICVS VESPVSIVS, a Florentine, newly found and discouered; which for their greatnesse, and the nouelty of the action, are called the new world) together with the kingdomes of Sicilia and Naples; and lastly the Duchie of Milan, farre excelling all the other Dukedomes in Christendome. Of which family, in the yeer of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred twenty seuen, the Emperour MAXIMILIAN the Second of that name, borne in the Citty of Vienna in Austria, had to his father FERDINAND, brother to the Emperor CHARLES the Fift, sonne of PHILIP the First, King of Spaine, Nephew to MAXIMILIAN the First, son of FREDERICK the Third, Emperours of the Almaines: his mother was ANNE the daughter of LADISLAAS King of Hungary and of Bohemia, Nephew of the great SIGISMVND, sonne of CASSIMIER King of Poland, and sister to that LEVVES which through the vnaduised counsell of PAVLVS TOMOREVS Archbishoppe of Colossa, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred twenty six, comming to a battaile with SOLIMAN King of of the Turkes, was not onely through the innumerable multitude of the Ottomans lamentably ouerthrowne; but also when hee sought to haue saued himselfe from his enemies; was (through the weightinesse of his Armour, wherewith hee was oppressed, and the stumbling of his Horse, which fell vpon him in a passage ouer a Marrish or Fenne) most miserably drowned.

This Emperour shewing euen from his infancy the excellency of his wit, was by his father the Emperour FERDINAND committed to very learned men, by them to be instructed in good Literature, but chiefly in variety of tongues; wherein in short space he so much profited, that he not only spake Latin very elegantly, Spanish, French, Italian, Dutch, Hungarish, and Bohemish; but also very perfectly attained to the knowledge of the Sciences, particularly the Mathematicks. So that all men did confidently hope that he would proue no way inferior to his progenitors. And he no sooner came to yeeres fit to beare Armes, but that he sundry times gaue no lesse testimony and proofe of his noble valour, seeking to imitate his Grandfather MAXIMILIAN whose name he bare: which he expressly manifested when in the yeere one thousand fiue hundred fifty six, in the warres which his Vncle the Emperour CHARLES the Fift made against IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, and PHILIP Lantzgraue of Hessen, he went to that warre, sent thither by his father with the commaund of twelue thousand horse; hauing before that time, been euer present in the warres which his father had with the Turkes. In that seruice of his Vncle the Emperour CHARLES, he so nobly behaued himselfe, that he therin sundry times deserued to be compared with his Grandfather MAXIMILIAN; for he constantly enduring, with the greatnesse of his minde, all those wants and fortunes which the troubles of the wars bring with them, was euer the first man in all seruices, wherein he made no lesse shew of a valiant man at Armes, then of a discreete Chiefetaine: which made him so deerly beloued by his Vncle the Emperour, that the ciuill warre being ended (which continued little lesse then two yeers) he considering that his sonne PHILIP Prince of Spaine was to be inuested in the County of Flanders, together with the Prouinces of the lower Germany, and being vnwilling that Spaine should remaine without some man of authority to gouern the same, fearing the pride of that Nation ordinarily desirous of nouelties; notwithstanding that he was his Nephew, yet by the dispensation of Pope PAVL the Third, he made him his sonne in law, giuing him his daughter MARY to wife, and therewith made him gouernour of those kingdomes. And those nuptiall rites being celebrated, MAXIMILIAN in the yeer one thousand fiue hundred forty eight, went into Spaine, being first by his father FERDINAND King of the Romanes, made King of Bohemia, to whom the Lords of that kingdome sware obedience as to their king and naturall Lord.

Before his comming into Spaine, passing through Italy, he was by all the Italian Princes visited and highly honoured; and being arriued at the City of Genoa, and there shortly after embarked in the Gallies of Prince DORIA, he passed to Barcelona: whence taking his way towards Vailledolit, where the Spanish Court then lay, he was in the name of his espouse and of his cosin-Germane oftentimes visited by the principall Lords of Spaine.

Finally, within few daies after his comming to the Court, hauing with applause of the Spanish Nation celebrated his nuptials, he was settled in the gouernement of those kingdomes, in the absence of Prince PHILIP: which he with great quietnesse, to the contentment of that people gouerned, vntill that in the beginning of the yeer one thousand fiue hundred fifty one, the Emperor CHARLES summoned a Councell to be held in Ausburgh; whither being by his father sent for, he came from Spaine into Germany, hauing first left the gouernement of those kingdomes to his wife Queen MARY, and to the Councell royall: and staying there till the end of the Councell, he went with his father the king of the Romanes to Vienna: where making his abode till the beginning of the yeere one thousand fiue hundred fifty two, and then passing from Germany againe into Spaine, to bring his wife into his Countries, he came from Barcelona, (after that he had been molested by the French fleete) to Genoa; and from thence comming to Trent, he went to Ausburgh, where by the Emperor CHARLES the Fift, he was kindely receiued, and together with his wife was by the Germane Princes much honoured; but particularly by his father, who then absolutely resigned vnto him the gouernement of the kingdome of Bohemia: which to the great contentment of the Bohemians hee euer after gouerned so long as hee liued.

From thence in the same yeer he sent great troups of men to the Emperor, for his wars against MAVRICE Duke of Saxony, who by reason of the imprisonment of the Lantzgraue

PHILIP warring against the Emperour, was proclaimed traitor: but it was not long before the Emperor was freed from that trouble. And MAXIMILIAN recalling his forces, peaceably applied himselfe to the gouernment of Bohemia, without that any matter of moment happened; vntill that in the yeere 1554, he together with his father sent his Ambassadours to congratulate the marriage of his cosin King PHILIP with the daughter of King HENRY the Eight, then by the death of her brother EDVVARD, Queene of England.

In the yeere 1558, he was present at the Coronation of his father, who by the Emperour CHARLES the fift was adopted Emperour, and accepted by the Princes of Germany. Afterwards taking his way with his father towards Viena, he returned into Bohemia; where within a while after, vnderstanding of the death of his Vncle and father in law the Emperor CHARLS, he with great pomp celebrating his Obsequies, sent Ambassadors to his cosin PHILIP to condole the death of the deceased Emperour. In which actions ending the yeere present and next following; in the yeere 1560, after foure moneths vacancie, IOHN ANGELO DE MEDICIS being chosen Pope, and called PIVS the fourth, he sent his Ambassadors to yeeld his obedience to the Church of Rome. And in the yeere 1562, FERDINAND desiring that his sonne MAXIMILIAN should succeede him in the Empire, assembled a Councell in Franckford; where proponing to the Electors his determination, he so handled the matter, that by the generall consent and good will of all men, MAXIMILIAN was chosen and crowned King of the Romanes; with great applause of the Germanes and the Italians, who for his rare qualities dearely loued him. Then being according to his fathers desire created his successor, he departed towards Viena, first visiting his sisters which were in Isprvch, where he remained vntill the yeere 1564, in which yeere his father dyed; whose Obsequies hee together with his brothers sumptuously celebrated. After which, hee receiued Ambassadors from the Princes, which as to the successiue Emperour and King of Hungary and Bohemia came to doe him honour: amongst many which came, were the Ambassadors of Spaine and of Portugall; MAXIMILIAN being then receiued and accepted by the Christians for lawful Emperour.

Maximilian chosen and crowned King of the Romans.

Hauing scarce finished his fathers obsequies, newes came of new combustions. The Vaiuode of Transiluania, who was comprehended in the Turks peace and restrained with the hope of a royall affinity, continued for a time quiet: but now either thinking that FERDINAND's peace had been dissolued by death, or incraged by the ill aduice of some lewd persons, or else prouoked by his neighbours iniuries, he surprised Satmaria, by a notable stratagem. MELCHIOR BALASSVS was gouernour thereof for FERDINAND, a valiant man and actiue, who in former times, had taken many townes from the Vaiuode vpon the confines of Transiluania. Hauing taken the towne, the Castle (although it were very strong) made small resistance: where the gouernour lost his goods, and his wife and children were led into captiuity. BALASSVS (being sore wounded) escaped, and after his recouery he surprised Debreim, a towne of good note belonging to the Transiluanians: and hauing spoiled it he set it on fire. The newes of the losse of Satmaria was vnexpected to MAXIMILIAN, and the more troublesome for that hee was then diuerted with other cares. The Vaiuode was not ignorant that it would be displeasing vnto CESAR, pretending that he had done nothing against the peace, laying all the blame vpon the Emperors gouernors, especially vpon BALASSVS; affirming that the beginning of all iniuries sprang from them, who oppressed his subiects with vnaccustomed tributes, and daily incursions; adding that he had often complained, but could finde no remedy: wherefore it was no wonder, if he had found some meanes to reuenge those iniuries and to repaire the losses. MAXIMILIAN holding it not fit to indure this insolencie, sent for LAZARVS SVENDIE, a Baron of Swethland, a man of great experience in Armes, wise, vigilant, and valiant, to whom he committed the charge of the Transiluanian warre. But for that he was ignorant of the state of Hungary, he had giuen him for assistants ANDREVV BATTORI, MELCHIOR BALASSVS, and GABRIEL PERENE, men well acquainted with the enemies affaires. SVENDI marcht presently into the countrie of Sepusio, from whence he sent to intreate MAXIMILIAN to giue him leaue to manage that warre at his will, and not be compelled alwaies to send to his maiesty; lest before a resolution should be taken, a good oportunity might be lost. Hereupon the King of Poland sent his Embassadors to let the Emperor vnderstand how much he was grieued with this war, the Transiluanian being so neere allied vnto him: wherefore he laboured to haue a surceasse of Armes, and the offence remitted. The Emperor gaue him good words, but staied not his warlike preparation.

This

This yeere LAZARVS SVENDIE, went to besiege the Castle of Toccai, a place strong both by nature and art, standing vpon the confines of Transiluania and Hungary: The which FERDINAND had giuen to a Nobleman of Hungary, for his good deserts; who dying recommended it, and the guard of his young son to FRANCIS MENETVS. This man of a tutor became a Tirant: he fled to the Transiluanian and deliuered both the the Castle and Pupil into his hands. This Castle being battered, and MENETVS the Traitor slaine, they yeelded vpon condition to depart with their swords, and not to beare Armes against the Emperor. After which he recouered Satmaria, the which the Transiluanian had abandoned distrusting his owne forces; After which he took Erdod (the which FERDINAND had often attempted in vaine) with diuerse other places.

Toccai besieged and taken by Suendie.

Satmar recouered by Suendie.

The Vaiuode finding himselfe too weake to cope with MAXIMILIAN, he craued aide from the Turk, who being busie at the siege of Malta, he sent STEPHEN BATTORI (who afterwards was King of Polonia) with other Embassadours to the Emperour to sue for peace; the King of Poland did the like, and SOLIMAN sent a Renegado to Viena to expostulate the wrongs done vnto his tributarie, and to finde some meanes of reconcilement. But CESAR was not ignorant, that this was a practice to stay the course of SVENDIE's prosperous successe, and daunt the mindes of the Hungarians with a hope of peace: but for that it should not seeme that he hindred the conclusion of a peace, he commanded his Army to forbeare from spoile, but vpon this condition that all the townes on this side the mountaines should be his. This was of hard digestion to the Vaiuode: wherefore he incensed SOLIMAN, who being returned from Malta with losse and dishonor, resolued to transport the war into Hungary, and to imploy all his forces against the Emperor; hereupon he sends a new Embassage to Viena, for the tribute which had been long vnpaid: complaining much of the wrong done vnto the Vaiuode his client; saying it was not lawfull for him to make a peace with the Emperor, without his priuity, commanding restitution of all that had been taken from him, and withall he renounc't the peace, which he had obserued with FERDINAND. MAXIMILIAN gaue him good reasons for non paiment of the tribute; that the peace had been violated by the Vaiuode and not by him; that all the places did neuer belong to the Transiluanian, but to his predecessors, from whom they had been violently taken away: whereupon SOLIMAN resolued to besiege Iulia. This yeere the Vaiuode (in the absence of SVENDIE, who was gon to Viena concerning the warres) went to besiege Erdod with the helpe of the Turks: the which being battered, and valiantly defended, in the end they yelded vpon composition to depart with bagge and baggage, but they were all treacherously slaine by the Turks.

The Transiluanian sue for peace.

Soliman renewes the war in Hungary.

This sommer 1565 AVGVSTVS Elector of Saxony sent 1000 Saxon horses to SVENDIES Camp, promising to entertaine them for fiue moneths, with whom there ioyned 350 Noblemen and Gentlemen. The Turkish and Transiluanian Embassadours were still in Viena treating of a peace, desirous as it seemed to protract time; yet SVENDIE did often aduise the Emperor by his Letters, not to trust their faire words, nor to be abused by their false promises: but new Embassadours comming from SOLIMAN and the Turkes hauing retired their Camp, the Emperor commanded his Generall to forbeare from al hostile attempts. At that time the Earle of SALVI gouernour of Iauerin, had an enterprise vpon Alba Regalis which hee had a great hope to surprise, by meanes of some of the towne: but the Emperour commanded him to surceasse, and retire, so as his credulity made the enterprise frustrate, and the Turks discouered the conspiracie, and put 40 of the citizens cruelly to death.

The treaty continued still at Viena, and the Emperour sent an Embassador to Constantinople to conclude a peace with SOLIMAN, who detained him there vntill the yeere 1567. In the mean time the Basha of Buda made an incursion towards Iauerin and carried away great spoiles. It appeared by probable coniectures that the Turks made shew of a peace outwardly, but prepared for warre. The which a Turk of good note being acquainted with the secret counsels of the Basha of Buda, confessed freely, being taken, and that SOLIMAN would come the next yeere with a great Army to besiege Iulia & Sigeth. STEPHEN BATTORI one of the Transiluanian Embassadors was yet in Viena, who at that time had the wife & children of BALASSVS (being taken at Satmar as we haue said) in prison: wherefore BALASSVS made great suite vnto the Emperour to detaine him vntill his wife and children were set at liberty; CESAR importuned BATTORI very much, but he could not preuaile, and BATTORI refusing to stay any longer was dismissed: whereat BALASSVS being much discontented, the Emperor told him that there was a great difference betwixt their qualities, for they were Captiues taken in warr, and hee was an Ambassadour, whom he might not stay, without doing wrong vnto his dignitie.

A Diet called at Ausburg.

After his departure, the Emperor imploid all his care to make prouision for the Turkish warres: and being vnable to incounter SOLIMAN with his owne forces, he assembled a Diet at Ausburge, this yeer vpon the tenth of March, to consult with the Princes of the Empire, touching the Turkish warres, and many other things concerning the Empire. In the meane time MAXIMILIAN was full of cares, the fame of the Turkish warre increasing daily, and it was said the Transiluanians gathered together great forces. The Princes being assembled; ALBERT Duke of Bauaria, speaking in the Emperours name, promised, that touching matters of Religion, there should be nothing changed, so as the Princes would endeuour to expell all strange opinions which had crept into the Empire: That the publike Peace confirmed by so many Edicts, should be obserued: That such as had been proscribed for the fact at Herbipolis, should be punisht, and iustice done to euery man in the Imperiall Chamber. But laying aside all other things, he perswaded them, first to consider of aide against the Turkes: whereupon they promised to entertaine twelue thousand horse, and twenty thousand foote, for eight moneths; and moreouer to pay foure thousand horse, for two yeeres and a halfe: which the Emperour accepted very thankefully. At the same time the Arch-duke CHARLES, called an assembly of Hungarians, at Possonia, and of Austrians at Vienna; whereas euery house promised to giue a Florine: and the Nobility and Gentry, were so willing to contribute to these Turkish warres, as he that had but one hundred crownes of yeerely rent, was content to maintaine a horse, and the Nobility in generall promised to goe in person, if CÆSAR or any of his brethren should be there. The Pope, with the Princes of Italie, and the French king, were solicited for aide in this warre.

The Princes of the Empire aide Emperor against the Turke.

At the Assembly at Ausburge, GROMBVCH, with his confederats, who had slaine the Bishoppe of Herbipolis, and afterwards surprised the City, and spoiled it in hostile manner, troubling the peace of Franconia, was by a new proscription condemned by a generall consent of all the orders of the Empire. IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, sent his deputies, and lawiers to pleade for GROMBARCH, and to vrge an abolition of the first proscription; among which HENRY HVSAN a famous lawier was the chiefe: who being partly disswaded by his friends, and partly terrified with the weightinesse of the cause, left it; and sought to perswade the Duke by his Letters to relinquish their protection; but hee could not bee diuerted.

Grombach proscribed against at Ausburg.

In the interim, the Transiluanian Vaiuode slept not: for hauing prepared himselfe to Armes, he perswaded the Nobility of Hungary, to fall from their allegeance, writing Letters, by the which he said he was inioyned by the Turkish Emperor, to perswade all the orders of Hungary to yeeld him faith and obedience, whereon, and their good agreement, the hope and health of afflicted Hungary depended; and by that only meanes, the Turkish Army might be kept from their confines: and alleaging many other reasons, in the end he perswaded them, to meete at an assembly at Torda; or to send foure deputies with full authority. These Letters being diuulged in Hungary, SVENDIVS made an answere vnto them, whereby he discouered the Vaiuodes impostures, and gaue the World to vnderstand, that CÆSAR had alwaies sought for Peace with the Turke and Transiluanian; but it succeeded not, chiefly by this mans slanders, and ambition, who had often broken the peace, the which CÆSAR had so strictly obserued, as he had neglected many good occasions to aduance his affaires. Moreouer if there were no hope left of any future Peace, yet the Hungarians should not feare that CÆSAR would leaue them; who being assisted first by God, and then by the Germanes, and all forraine Princes, should haue power sufficient to resist all their enemies attempts, perswading them not to faile in their obedience both to their King and Countrey, the warre being not onely iust, and lawfull, but most necessarie; and therefore they should not doubt of the happy euent. Lastly, he commaunded them all in the Emperours name, not to haue any commerce with the Transiluanian.

Sueudius answeres to the Transiluanians Letters.

The Transiluanian, what he could not get by faire meanes, he sought to attaine vnto by force: and the Turkes omitting no opportunity, surprised Aiuat by Scalado, in the absence of the Gouernor, and part of the Garrison, where they slew all the Cittizens and Souldiers most cruelly. They thought to haue gotten Sigeth with the like policy; but the Earl of Serin repulsed them with great slaughter: and afterwards, making an incursion into the Turks Countrey, he slue so great a num ber of them, that he returned to Sigeth with two carts full of their heads.

SVENDIVS

SVENDIVS besieged Huſt in vain, the Transiluanian coming with 20000 men to relieue it, but not without great slaughter of his people; whereas SVENDIVS took certain Turkish ensigns with much Ordinance. The Basha of Buda likewise besieged Palotta; which hee had brought, by continuall battery, to extreme necessity, the Gouerner being wounded, but yet would not yeeld. And thus, when all humane help did seem to fail, God deliuered them miraculously. There were come to Iaverine twelue companies of Germans; whereof 900 horse with ninety carts were sent out for forrage on the foureteenth of Iune: which the Turkish Scouts seeing afar of, and thinking them to be farre more in number, they returned amazed to the Camp; telling them, there was a great Army coming to relieue the Besieged: wherewith they were so terrified, that they presently left it, and departed in such haste, that they left behinde them their tents, much ordinance, powder, and other munition.

Palotta besieged by the Turks in vain.

In the mean time, the Earl of Solmes, going out of Iaverine, besieged Vesperine; the which he soon took, putting a garrison of Turks to the sword. The like he did to Totisa, being siue German leagues from Iaverine: he also took Gesteso, with diuerse other Forts vpon that Confine; the Turks being all fled to Strigonium, the which the Earle meant to besiege: but, acquainting MAXIMILIAN therewith, he would not suffer him to attempt so great a City with so small an Army, hearing that SOLIMAN was ready to march.

Exploits of the Earl of Solmes.

In the beginning of Iuly, SOLIMAN hauing all things ready for the warre, he commanded the Basha of Buda to cast a bridge ouer the riuer of Drave, being very swift: the which hauing often attempted in vain, he sent word to SOLIMAN, that it could not be done; whereupon, he sent him a halter, commanding he should be hangd if it were not finished against his coming. The Basha terrified heerwith, setting 25000 men on work, finished his bridge in tenne dayes; where SOLIMAN passed an Army of 200000 men, the which he diuided into three. The one he sent to Alba Regalis, the other to Sigeth, and the third to spoil the Countrey. Vpon the way the Vaiuode of Transiluania mette him with rich Presents, giuing him great thanks for his assistance.

Soliman passes Drave with 200000 men.

SOLIMAN, hauing passed the riuer Drave, resolued to besiege Sigeth and Iiula. Sigeth is a Town strong both by nature and art, seated in a Marish: it was commanded by the Earle of Serin, hauing 1800 foot, 200 horse, 150 Citizens, with great store of Ordinance and munition. The Gouerner, seeing the Turks forces approach, called all the souldiers and citizens together, making an Oration vnto them, to incourage them to constancy and resolution. After which, he took an oath to liue and dy with them, and neuer to forsake them: the like did all the souldiers to him, swearing to obey him, and to liue and dy with him. The Turks hauing planted their Camp, they presently attempted the new Town; the which, for that it could no longer be defended, he caused to be burnt. They then planted their Ordinance in three parts, and raised three Mounts which ouer-lookt the wals. SOLIMAN, seeing this siege very bloody, sought to tempt the Earl with gifts and promise of great rewards; offering him the gouernment of Illiria, and the possession of Croatia, if he would yeeld him the Castle: but, finding him constant, he tried him by another means. A Trumpetter which serued the Earls sonne, was by chance taken by the Turks: him SOLIMAN sent into the Castle to tell the Earle that his sonne was a prisoner, and to perswade him to yeeld the Castle if he would preserue his sonnes life. But the Earl, neither by the hope of great reward, nor the infortunate accident of his sonne (although it were false) could not be wonne; respecting more his Countries liberty, and his faith giuen to the Emperor, than his sonnes safety, left by this fact hee should lay a foule stain vpon his former deserts. This not succeeding, SOLIMAN goes to force, commanding many assaults to be giuen, not with small troops, but with whole armies, one seconding another; so as the besieged being oppressed with multitudes, and their forces and spirits spent with continuall fighting, towards night they were forced to retire into the Castle: the which the Turks attempted twice in vain, setting fire in one part of it which was diuided from the other, there beeing a bridge betwixt them.

Sigeth besieged by the Turke.

The besieged seeing all about them on fire, and themselues brought to despair, they resolued to open the gates, and to salie forth among their enemies, and there to dy fighting; whereunto the Earl incouraged them by a long speech, concluding it with these words: Knowe then, that our Emperor, our Country, and all Europe, look vpon vs, and are witnesses of our valor or basenes. Think, that heer an occasion is offred vs, either to vanquish or to dy gloriously. Heer, necessity hath set the bounds of our labour, whereas euery man, possest with a certain despair betwixt victory and death, must endeauour to vanquish; or if God will not suffer it, it is better to fall fighting than fleeing: wherefore going to this warre, remember you carry, in your hands, immortall fame, religion, liberty (which no good man loseth but with his life) and your country which bare you and bred you vp: wherefore endeauor that you fall not vnreuenged nor taken, or be slaughtered like sheep; but may leaue to the enemy a bloudy and mournfull victory: whereto the souldiers gaue a ioyfull consent, all vowing to dy with their Commander.

A singular example of constancy in a wife.

At this time there fell out a memorable accident. One of the souldiers, preparing himself to fight and dy, hauing a wife of a Noble family & very fair, resolued to kill her lest she should be subiect to the lusts and reproaches of the Turks: which his wife perceiuing, shee intreated him to forbear; saying, that it was a wicked thing for a husband to imbrue his hands in the blood of his wife whom hee had loued so much; but it was more vnworthy, if a good and chaste wife should leaue her husband in the extremity of danger. I knowe, quoth she, I haue sworn neuer to forsake thee: wherfore I will be thy companion in death, that whom loue in life hath ioyned together, death may not part; whereupon she put on mans apparell, and her husband gaue her Armes wherewith she ioyned herselfe to her husband.

The Duke of Serin prepares to sally forth.

The Earl of Serin, seeing his men in Arms, attired himself in his richest robes, as if hee had been going to some solemn feast, putting 200 crowns in his pocket, the which he said should be a reward for some Barbarian to bury him. After which, he put the keies of the Castle in his bosome, saying; With these the Emperor put me in trust, and whil'st I breathe no man shall take them from me. He would not couer his body with any Arms; saying, that he had no need of them seeing, hee desired nothing but a fair death by wounds. He made choice of the sharpest of his swords, saying; With this sword I first wonne my honour, and whatsoeuer I enioy, and with it I will willingly bear whatsoeuer God hath decreed of me, where I shall finde an end of danger or of life. So, hauing a great Standard carried before him, calling vpon the Name of IESVS, he commanded the gates to be opened, crying out; Follow mee noble souldiers, as you haue done euer, and let vs perform this last work of mortall men: and so, thrusting into the midst of their enemies, they made a great slaughter vpon the bridge. The Earle was shot thorough, and fell as he came on the land: of 300 there were not foure which came aliue into the enemies power; and the woman (of whom we made mention) fighting valiantly, died by her husbands side. Thus Sigeth fell into the Turks hands; but they had no great cause to joy of it: for, the Earl hauing laid a traine of powder, a great number of Turks being gotten into it, the Castle was blowne vp; wherewith there were three thousand men slain, and many others sore wounded.

Solimans death

During this siege, SOLIMAN died of an Apoplexy, the seuenth of September; the which, MAHOMET Basha concealed from the knowledge of the Army: and, lest it should be discouered, he slue his physician, and such as had attended him. In the meane time hee caused the trumpets and musick to sound after the accustomed manner, his diet to bee prepared, and his guards to bee set before his tent as if hee had been liuing, vntill the comming of SELIM his sonne.

Maximilians preparation against the Turk.

Whil'st that SOLIMAN was at Sigeth, MAXIMILIAN had drawne a great Army together at Vienna, whereof he made his brother FERDINAND Generall, and the Earl of Suarzenburgh his Lieutenant: wherein he was assisted by the Pope and many Princes. Many Noble-men came out of England to serue in this warre at their owne charge. From France cam the Duke of Guise, the Earl of Brissack, Lansack, S. Croise, and many other Noble-men. The Duke of Ferrara sent 400 Gentlemen and 300 shot; the Florentine, 3000 foot; the Duke of Sauoye, 400 harquebusiers on horseback; and other Princes did the like: neither did some Princes of Germany faile to send voluntary supplies; so as the whole Armie consisted of fourescore thousand men.

Whil'st that SOLIMAN was busie before Sigeth, he sent BARTHA Basha to the siege of Iulia, a strong Castle vpon the confines of Transiluania, he hauing in his Army 80000 men; Transiluanians, Moldauians, Turks and Tartarians. The Gouerners name of the Castle was LADISLAVS SERETZIN, by whose inconstancy and treachery it was yeelded fiue dayes before Sigeth, vpon certain conditions, but not obserued: for, the garrison marching away, the Turks lying in ambush fell vpon them; who making resistance for a while, in the end they were oppresst by multitudes, and in a manner all slain; onely some fewe (which would not consent to the yeelding of the Castle) escaped miraculously. SERETZIN was taken aliue, and carried captiue to Belgrade; who afterwards was put to a most cruell death in Constantinople.

SOLIMAN's third Army lay neer to Iauerine to infest the Emperors Camp; so as there were daily daily skirmishes betwixt them, in one of the which MAHOMET Basha of Alba Regalis comming to charge the Imperialls was taken prisoner by George THVRIGER: who presenting him to the Emperour, hee rewarded him with a chaine of gold, and gaue him the honour of knight-hood. There was a Spaniard then present, who hauing conuersed much in the Turkes court, had heard this Basha bragge, that he alone would subdue the Germane King: the which he denied not, but with an vndaunted minde answered, that such was the fortune of warre, he had not onely spoken this, but might haue done it, but now he was a slaue, and could not doe any thing.

Mahomet Basha taken coming to charge the Emperors campe.

The Vauoid of Transiluania, required to haue the Castle of Iulia, which Bartha Basha had taken, restored vnto him, for that it did belong to Transiluania; the which the Basha promised to doe, if he would pay him 400000 crownes, for the charges of that siege: which the Vauoide being not able to performe, it continued in the Turks power.

SELIM comming to the Army was proclaimed Emperour of the Turks, and then retired towards Constantinople: vpon whose departure Iauerin was by chance set on fire, wherewith the whole towne except the Temple, the Palace, and some few other buildings was consumed: but the Emperor knowing it to be an excellent bulwark against the enemy, caused it to be repaired; & seeing the Turks retired, he dissolued his Camp, and went to Viena, leauing the Earle of Solmes gouernour of Iauerin.

SELIM left Bartha Basha in Hungary with a great number of Tartarians, who committed vnspeakeable cruelties. The Vauoid had drawne part of them vnto him, to the siege of Toccay, whereas SVENDIVS lay sick, hauing formerly prouided for the siege, and receiued succours from the Emperour; but the Vauoide hearing that the Tartarians spoiled his countrey, he raised his siege to relieue his subiects. The Emperor being returned to Viena, he assembled the estates and obtained a yeerely ayd of 138000 crownes against the Turk, and for the repairing of Iauerin 13000. Then he gaue Letters to AVGVSTVS Elector of Saxony, to execute the sentence giuen against IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, who had vndertaken the protection of WILLIAM GRAMBATH and others condemned by the Emperour: whereupon the Saxon souldiers who had serued in Hungary were commanded to prepare for the siege of the Castle of Gotha; whither AVGVSTVS went with his forces, being accompanied by the Emperors commissioners, commanding all gentlemen, citizens, and countrey men, in the Emperors name to leaue him, and to returne to their houses, vpon paine of losse of life and goods, and absoluing them from their oath vnto the Duke; but these perswasions could not moue them to leaue him: whereupon they prest the siege, so as on the thirteenth of Aprill the Castle was yeelded, and IOHN FREDERICK became a prison to the Emperour. In the Castle Grombachius (being seuenty three yeers old) with seuenteene more of his confederates were taken, and all publikely executed.

Gotha taken, & Grombach with his companions executed.

The 12 of May there was a Diet ended at Ratisbone: where although that neither the Emperor nor any of the Princes of the Empire were present, except ALBERT Duke of Bauaria, who represented the Emperors person, yet it was decreed that the contribution promised at the Diet of Ausburg for three yeares should be paied in two; That the defences of the towne of Gotha, and the Castle of Grimensteine should be rased, and that the Elector AVGVSTVS should be paid for that expedition.

MAXIMILIAN hearing that SELIM the Ottoman Emperour was tractable to a peace if it were required, he sent his Embassadors to Constantinople; where after some treaty it was concluded: and then they returned to Viena, accompanied with an Embassadour from SELIM. A peace was made for 8 yeares, vpon these conditions: That euery one should hold what he had gotteen by warre; That the Vauoide should be comprehended; that the bordering countrie men who paied rents both to the Turke and CESAR, should now pay onely to the Turks, and performe their workes onely to them; and the tribute or pension of 30000 Hungarian duckets which FERDINAND did yearly pay, should in like manner be paied by MAXIMILIAN to SELIM. This peace was very pleasing to all Christendome, and did much increase the Emperors power in Transiluania by the helpe of SVENDIVS.

A peace concluded with Selim.

The conditions of peace with Selim.

In the yeere 1570, the cruell warre, which had continued long betwixt the Kings of Denmarke and SVETHEN, was compounded by the mediation of MAXIMILIAN, the French King and the Princes Electors of Germany, who sending their Embassadours to a treaty at Selina in Pomerania, a peace was concluded to the content of both the Kings. And about the same time died IOHN SIGISMVND, the Vaiuode of Transiluania (who had formerly beene called STEPHEN)

A peace betwixt the Kings of Denmarke and Swethen.

STEPHEN) being but 30 yeeres olde: his father was IOHN Earle of Sibinia (whom after the death of King LEVVES, the Barons of Hungary had choſen for their King, contrary to the will of the Emperour FERDINAND) his mother was ISABEL daughter to SIGISMVND King of Poland; during his life time he vſurped the title of a King: and ſtudying for innouations, with the Turks aid he ingaged Hungary in many miſeries. STEPHEN BATTORI (who was afterwards called to the Kingdom of Polonia) ſucceeded him, CASPAR BECSSIVS (whom IOHN had appointed for his ſucceſſor) being rejected, and driuen out of Tranſiluania: but ſeeking to raiſe vp a ſedition againſt STEPHEN, with the Emperors help he was vanquiſhed and baniſht for euer; and STEPHEN gouernd that Prouince being ſeparated from Hungary, with more quiet and peace.

1575. Rodulph choſen king of Hungary, of Bohemia, and of the Romans.

The peace continued ſtill in Hungary; and RODVLPHVS, eldeſt ſon to the Emperor MAXIMILIAN, was choſen King of Hungary with his fathers conſent, who willingly yeelded the Kingdome to him. And in the yeer 1575 hee was declared and crowned King of Bohemia in Prague with great ſolemnity, hauing receiued the Diademe of Hungary three yeers before at Poſſonia. After this, the Emperor calling a Diet at Ratiſbone, RODVLPHVS was choſen King of the Romans with a joynt conſent of all the Electors; and by his fathers deſire was on the firſt of Nouember, one thouſand fiue hundred ſeuenty fiue, crowned in the Cathedrall Church at Ratiſbone with accuſtomed ceremonies.

Controuerſie for the Kingdome of Poland.

HENRY the French King, who had retired himſelf ſecretly out of Polonia, was now by a publike decree rejected: whereupon, they called an Aſſembly at Warſauia, for the chuſing of a new King; in which, the high Chancellor, with the greateſt part of the Counſellers, made choice of the Emperor MAXIMILIAN: and ſome others, with a great part of the Nobility (diſſenting from the Councell) deſired to haue a King iſſued from the Poland blood; and therefore they made ANNE, ſiſter to the deceaſed King, a Virgin almoſt fifty yeers ould, their Queen; giuing her for husband STEPHEN BATTORI Prince of Tranſiluania, and proclaimed him King. Preſently ſome write Letters to MAXIMILIAN, and perſwade him not to accept of the Kingdome of Poland, relying vpon the ſuffrages of a fewe Senators and Noblemen. On the other ſide, they which had choſen MAXIMILIAN, ſent to diſſwade the Prince of Tranſiluania from accepting of that Kingdome; whereof the Emperor MAXIMILIAN was choſen lawfull King by the generall conſent of the Senate of Polonia, Lituania, and all Pruſſia. Such as fauoured MAXIMILIAN, ſent to intreat him to make haſte and come into the Kingdome before that STEPHEN BATTORI ſhould get poſſeſſion: but (whether preſaging his death at hand, or buſied with the affairs of the Empire, or vſing his naturall floweneſſe) he ſought delaies, requiring a more ample reſolution touching the heads of his election. The Ambaſſadors told him there was danger in delay, and importuned him to ſet downe a certaine day for his coming into Polonia, and that he ſhould ſignifie ſo much by his Ambaſſadors to the Nobility aſſembled at Leouitia. CÆSAR found new delaies for his iourny, and propounded new conditions; requiring, that the Virgin ANNE, who onely remained of the family of the Iagelons (which the Polonians honoured ſo much) might be maried to his ſon ERNESTVS, and he to be crowned King in his place.

Whil'ſt time was ſpent in theſe differences, Letters came from the Aſſembly at Leouitia; whereby they complained much of his delay, the which was very preiudiciall to his affaires; and gaue him to vnderſtand, that vnleſſe he came ſpeedily, they ſhould bee forced to giue the kingdome to him that came firſt: whereupon, the Emperor ſent Letters to the Eſtates which were to meet at Marſauia, propounding conditions touching the marriage of ERNEST with ANNE; requiring in the mean time, that nothing ſhould be decreed that might preiudice his lawfull election.

Stephen Batori crowned K. of Poland.

In the mean time, STEPHEN BATTORI, being called out of Tranſiluania by the Noblemen of his faction, poſted ſpeedily into Polonia; and, taking ANNE to wife, was crowned in Cracouia, the firſt of May, hauing firſt taken an oath to obſerue all the rights, priuiledges and liberties, as they had been obſerued by CASIMIER and other Kings his Predeceſſors; adding withall, that if he ſhould violate them in any part, he ſhould then loſe all the right he had in the Kingdome, and the Noble-men ſhould be freed from the faith and obedience which they did owe him as their lawfull King.

During this, the Emperor MAXIMILIAN called a Diet at Ratiſbone, whither the Noblemen of Poland ſent Ambaſſadors to him after the Coronation of King STEPHEN; intreating him, that ſeeing amidſt the diuiſions of Noble-men, and factious Citizens, he could not attain to to that kingdome, he ſhould take it in good part, the Realme being now come vnto a king, who was his friend, and deuoted vnto him: to whom he anſwered, that it ſhould plainely appeare, that he would not ſo eaſily renounce the right which hee thought he had by this election. At this Diet the Emperour confirmed FRANCIS de Medicis, with the conſent of theſe Princes, in the title of great Duke of Tuſcane, the which Pope PIVS the Fift had graunted to COSMO the Great in the yeare 1566.

The death of the Emperor Maximilian.

MAXIMILIAN (liuing but few moneths after the election of his ſon to be King of Romanes) departed this life on the twelfth of October in the yeere 1577. He left great teſtimonies of his wiſedome, piety, and vertues, worthy of an excellent Emperor: he had often that ſymbol of ABRAHAM in his mouth, Dominus prouidebit, and did much blame them which made fortune a goddeſſe. He condemned thoſe Princes which would commande ouer the beliefe of their ſubiects, affirming that there was no greater ſinne then to force mens conſciencies: for (ſaid he) they that wreſt the ſoule, whil'ſt they couet after heauen, loſe earth. He deſired to ſuppreſſe all controuerſies of religion: He was mercifull to his enemies, and louing to his faithfull ſeruants: he honoured and reſpected Princes and Noblemen: he was an enemy to intemperance: he loued naturall Philoſophie, ſpake many tongues readily, of an exquiſite iudgement, admirable of memory, eloquent, graue, and ponderous in his ſpeach; An obſeruer of equity and bounty, a ſeuere cenſurer of couetouſnes, and much delighted in gardening: he conferred oft of the holy ſcriptures, of the immortality of the ſoule, and of the reſurrection from the dead.

To conclude, he was a Prince ful of al pietie & bounty: and if the troubles & ciuil wars in Germany had not croſt his good reſolutions, and weakned his power, he would haue left nothing vnattempted to haue ruined the Ottoman Empire. Hee was of an ordinary ſtature, his countenance full of grauitie, and his head ſomewhat balde. He was a great fauorer of Learning, and learned-men, to whom he gaue great penſions, and eſpecially to Mathematicians, and Antiquaries, being greatly delighted in thoſe faculties. He was very actiue of his body: by AVGVSTA MARIA daughter to CHARLES the Fift, and his coſin-germane, he had ſixteen children, whereof tenne were liuing. Of his foure daughters, ISABEL was married to her Vncle PHILIP King of Spaine, MARY was wife to CHARLES the Ninth, the French King. ANNE and ELENOR were then but children. His ſonnes were RODVLPH and MATHIAS, both Emperours; ALBERTVS, a Cardinal and Arch-biſhoppe of Toledo (but afterwards renouncing his Eccleſiaſticall dignities, he married with ISABELLA Infanta of Spaine, in whoſe right he is duke of Brabant, Earle of Flanders, &c.) ERNESTVS, MAXIMILIAN, and VENCESLAVS. He had but one wife, after whoſe deceaſe he would not marry any other. Hee was, blindely, very Religious: and reſpecting much the greatneſſe of the Pope, hee endeuoured alſo to haue drawne all the Princes of Germany to haue done the like.

THE

THE LIFE OF RODVLPH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND EIGHTEENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

(*)

HE Imperial dignity (being in a manner made hereditarie to the house of Austria) after the death of MAXIMILIAN the Second of that name, was by a generall consent of all the Electors, confirmed to his son RODVLPH, King of Bohemia, and Hungary; chosen a little before King of Romanes, at his fathers intreaty. At his first entrance, he gaue great hopes to restore the Empire to her auncient dignity and splendor, and to recouer such countries as had beene vsurped from the Empire: But he was a prince of too soft a spirit, and loued peace and ease, referring the gouernment of affaires to his Counsellors. He liued much in the Castle of Prague, and was much delighted in the gathering together of pretious stones, and the exquisite setting and working of them. He bid Armes Adue, yet he valiantly protected Hungary, Bohemia, Austria, and other prouinces. Presently after his coronation (for the better settling of his new dignitie) he sent to the Pope to be confirmed by him, and to intreat him to declare him the eldest son of the Church. Then calling a Diet at Ratisbone, he imployed all his credit and meanes, to haue matters concerning the Romane Religion reformed, pressing the Princes of Germany to consent to his new reformation. After this, he sent an Embassadour to the Ottoman Emperour, to haue a confirmation of the truce made betweene him and his father MAXIMILIAN, and in the meane time hee perswaded his brother MATHIAS (who was gon into the Nether-lands, with hope to make himselfe Lord of those prouinces) to abandon that enterprise, and to returne into Germany; shewing him, how dishonorable it would be if through his fault, the troubles of those countreys should be increased: But his perswasions could not preuaile against his resolution: yet soone after (being discontented with the estates of those countries) leauing them he returned (with little honor) into Germany.

Sal entine Elector of Cullen marries and resignes his Bishopricks.

This yeere SALENTINE B. of Paddeborne, and Elector of Cullen, a iust man, and valiant, more fit for war then to make a priest, being the last which remained of the house of the Earls of Isenburg, married a daughter of the Earle of Aremburg, and gaue ouer both his Bishopricks. HENRY Duke of Saxony and Archbishop of Breme succeeded him in that of Paddeborne, vpon condition that he should euery yere keep his court three moneths in the diocesse of Paddeborne; as much in Osnaburg; and six moneths in Breme. And to the Electorship of Cullen, succeeded GEBARDVS TRVCHSESIVS sonne to WILLIAM Baron of Walbourg. STEPHEN BATTORI going to bee king of Polonia, had left his brother CHRISTOPHER to succeede him in Transiluania: who being worne with continuall infirmities, died, leauing SIGISMVND his sonne to succeede him, the which was confirmed by the consent of all the estates: and STEPHEN BATTORI, King of Polonia, sent an Ambassador to AMVRATH the Turk, to intreat him, that (seeing Transiluania was tributary to the Turk) he would suffer SIGISMVND to injoy it, as other Princes before him had done; and if any thing were attempted to the contrary, he said he could not abandon his kinsman and his countrey: but AMVRATH yeelded easily vnto it for King STEPHEN's sake, who at that time was in war with the Muscouite touching Liuonia which he detained. And the Muscouite in the mean time sent Ambassadors to the Emperor RODVLPH, and to the Bishop of Rome, promising succours against the Turk, the common enemy of the Christian Name; hoping by this means, that he should easily obtain a peace with the King of Poland.

Sigismund Battori chosen Prince of Transiluania.

TRVCHSIS, hauing succeeded SALENTINE in the Archbishoprick of Cullen (as wee haue said) in processe of time resolued to take a wife, and yet retain his Electorall dignity and Archbishoprick: whereupon he married ANNE, daughter to GEORGE Earle of Mansfeld. The marriage was secretly consummated at Bona, in the presence of her brother & sister; which marriage bred great confusion in Germany. The marriage thus consummated, TRVCHSIS left Bona: and hauing drawne some horse and foot together, he seised vpon Marpourge, and tied his subiects to him by a new oath. Then he called an Assembly of the Estates of Westphalia and Cullen: to whom the Elector and the other Palatines, with the Lantzgraue of Hesse, sent their Ambassadors: and LEVVES Elector Palatine laboured faithfully with the Emperour, with the Chapter, and with the Senate of Cullen, for the retaining of TRVCHSIS his dignity; which others did oppose strongly: and the Earl of Aremberge seised vpon Bona, in the name of the Chapter; whereupon TRVCHSIS flew to Arms, and craued aid of his friends. In the mean time, the Pope sent down ANDREVV, Cardinall of Austria, to depriue TRVCHSIS of his Electorship of Cullen, and to giue power to the Chapter to chuse another; but the Elector Palatine would not suffer them to passe: whereupon, afterwards the Pope by a publike decree made in Rome, dated in April, in the yeer 1583, declared the said GEBHARD TRVCHSIS to be a notorious Heretick, periured, fallen from his Archiepiscopall dignity, and vncapeable of all spirituall charge: and soon after, ERNEST of Bauaria, sonne to ALBERT Duke of Bauaria, was chosen by the mediation of the Pope, the Emperor, the Duke of Parma, and others. Whereupon, the war grew hot betwixt them, either of them fortifying himself with his friends: but ERNEST still kept possession, and liues at this day.

Ernest of Bauaria chosen Arch-bishop of Cullen.

In the beginning of this yeer, Pope GREGORY the Thirteenth took vpon him to reform the Calendar, for that there was some small difference or distance, the yeer being not precisely fitted, equal to the course of the Sunne; so as in the beginning this little error did produce many discommodities: whereupon the Pope, desiring to haue the honour of this reformation, published his Bull for the adding of ten daies. The Emperor, being at a Diet at Ausburg, propounded the publication of this new Calendar: which the Protestant Princes reiected; not for that it was rashly done and needlesse, but for that the Bishop of Rome had ordained it without the priuity of the Emperor to whom that office did belong, nor with the consent of the Princes of the Empire; the Elector of Saxony grauely admonishing them to haue a care, lest vnder this colour of reforming the Calendar, they did not giue to the Pope a new iurisdiction and commanding power ouer the maiesty of the Empire and the Emperor himself. Wherefore, when as none of the Princes or Cities which imbraced the Confession of Ausburg, would allow of this Calendar in Germany, he commanded that the old form, obserued in the Imperiall Chamber, should be for that yeer kept.

The Kalendar corrected by Pope Gregory the 13.

The protestant princes in Germany refuse to admit the new Kalendar.

In the yeer 1584, there was a truce concluded betwixt AMVRATH who had succeeded SELIM his father, and the Emperor RODVLPH, the which was to continue for nine yeers. The Emperor sent his Ambassadors with Presents, who came first to Buda, where they concluded this truce with SINAN Basha; and then they went to Constantinople to haue it confirmed. In the mean time, ten thousand Turks entred vpon the confins of Carniola, where they committed great spoils, and carried many poor Christians into slauery: but they were pursued by two thousand Christians, who ouerthrew them and put them to flight, freeing all the captiues; in which conflict there were foure thousand Turks slain. AMVRATH was somewhat mooued heerwith: but, being duely informed that the wrong proceeded from the Turks, hee was soon pacified, and held them worthily slain; saying, that hee would not haue his people attempt any thing vpon the confines of Hungary that might trouble the peace; commanding the Bashaes of Buda and Temesuarre, very strictly, to contain their bordering souldiers in their duties: the like he required from the Christians.

A truce betwixt the Emperor and the Turk.

A controuersie compounded.

This yeer 1585, the Citizens of Magdebourg were in great controuersie with their Archbishop touching the ecclesiasticall and politicall iurisdiction, and for one of the Cities gates ioyning to the Bishops Palace, by which he did vsually come in and go out at his pleasure. The Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh by their intercession compounded these quarels; whereby it was concluded, that the City should haue free exercise of the religion of the Confession of Ausburg, with diuerse other priuiledges, and the Archbishoppe should haue the gate opened whensoeuer he would enter; but the keies should be kept by one of the Senators, and the Porter should bee appointed by the Senate; who should enter into bonds, both to the Archbishop and to the Senate, to giue free egresse and regresse to either party, and at all times when need should require, without any preiudice to the other party; but yet so as no Counsellors nor Ministers should be admitted, vnlesse either the archbishop, or the administrator, were there in person.

Competitors for the Crowne of Poland.

STEPHEN BATTORI king of Polonia, dying this yeere 1587, the Nobilitie met at Varsouia, for the chusing of a new king. There were many Competitors for the Kingdome; namely, ERNESTVS, MATHIAS, and MAXIMILIAN brethren, Arch-dukes of Austria, recommended by the Emperor RODVLPH their brother, by the king of Spain, the Pope and other Princes, whom also many Noblemen (enemies to SAMOSCIVS the Chancellor) did fauour. The second was SIGISMVND, king of Swethland, grand-child by the mothers side to IAGELON king of Poland. THEODORE, great Duke of Muscouy, did much affect this neighbor kingdome. Some would haue one PIASTVS, a Noble-man of Polonia chosen; and other desired to haue SIGISMVND, brothers son to the deceased King: yea, there were some which gaue their voices to ALEXANDER FARNESE for his singular vertue, and glorious exploits.

After much contention, in the end the Nobility was divided into two parts: the one made choice of SIGISMVND of Swethland, the other, of MAXIMILIAN of Austria, the Emperors brother: so as either of them chalenging the kingdome they fell to Armes; but the Swethen being a young Prince of one and twentie yeeres of age preuailed: being supported by the Chancellor SAMOSCIVS who was very powerfull, he came into Poland, and was crowned in Cracouia this yeere in December.

Maximilian of Austria besiegeth Cracouia.

The yeere following, the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN seeking to get the possession of the Kingdome, came speedily with 16000 foot and horse, and planted his Camp within sight of Craconia, requiring to be admitted and crowned. The Cracouians who fauoured the Swethen would not receiue him, but sent vnto the other to hasten his comming, and in the meane time they fortified their City, burnt their suburbes, and salied forth daily. During the siege many Germanes died: and MAXIMILIAN hearing, that the King of Swethen was come to Petricouia, he raised his Campe, and marcht to meete with him, to decide their quarrell by a battaile; but either knowing by the way, that the Swethen was farre stronger, hauing thirty thousand men in his army, or for some other consideration, he changed his aduice, and returned to Cracouia, which he attempted againe in vaine: and SAMOSCIVS the Chancellor followed him with a thousand two hundred choice men; the report whereof, did so terrifie the Army, as MAXIMILIAN retired to the confines of Silesia, putting himselfe into the towne of Pitsense; whither SAMOSCIVS pursued him, and besieged the towne: where MAXIMILIAN (no longer able to defend himselfe) was forced to yeeld, and so was carried backe Captiue into Polonia.

Maximilian taken prisoners by the Polonians.

MAXIMILIAN being committed to custodie, the Bohemians did expostulate with the Polonians, for the breach of the League which was betwixt them, for that during the peace betwixt both the kingdomes, the Polonians had entred in hostile manner, into Silesia, and had besieged their friend MAXIMILIAN, and carried him out of the prouince captiue, for whose disgrace many Princes were grieued.

Notwithstanding the truce betwixt the Emperour RODVLPH and AMVRATH the Third, yet the Turkes did often breake it: and this yeere they hauing gathered together their bordering troupes at Capanum, vpon the lake of Paletta, meant therewith to inuade the confines of the Christians, but they thought it fittest to preuent them: whereupon they set vpon the Castle, and forced it, wherein they took 190 men of special note, 70 women, with a great number of ordinary souldiers, whom they carried away Captiue; but ALI Basha the motiue of all these broiles escaped: whom AMVRATH afterwards without any respect of affinity (hauing married his sister) caused to be hanged, for that he had broken the truce with the Christians.

Capanum taken by the Christians from the Turkes.

But

But this execution did not terrifie them from making incursions, spoiling some townes and many villages.

GEORGE SERIN sonne to Count NICHOLAS, imitating his fathers glory, was sent against them, of whom he made a great slaughter; the which was the more grieuous to the Ottoman Emperour, for that there perished many choice souldiers and excellent Captaines: whereat being incensed, he rewarded the Gouernour of Sigeth, the author of this expedition, as he had done ALI Basha. Afterwards SINAN Basha to reuenge these former losses, and to wipe away the ignominy, had gathered together ten thousand men, horse and foote, meaning to spoile all Hungary. Neere vnto Sixa, CLAVDIVS RVSSELVS opposed himselfe with one thousand seuen hundred men, with whom the Gouernour of Agria ioyned, and both together set vpon the Enemy, and put them to flight; in the which there were three thousand Turkes slaine and drowned; all their Waggons, with great store of victuals, and thirty Ensignes were taken. This victory was not so pleasing to the Emperor as was expected: for notwithstanding that he had a faithlesse peace with the Turkes, and knew well that they gouerned their counsels by the euent of things, and would willingly imbrace all occasions to annoy the Christians, yet he would not be the cause, the truce should be infringed: Wherefore he dismist all the Captains from their charges, pardoning the soldiers; but when he vnderstood that the beginning of these wrongs proceeded from the Turkes, hee allowed of their excuse. AMVRATH depriued SINAN Basha of all his goods, and committed him to prison in Constantinople.

The Turkes defeated by the Christians.

The question betwixt King SIGISMVND and the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, being a prisoner, was yet treated of in Poland by Cardinall ALDOBRANDINO Legate for the Pope, and the Ambassadors for either party. There were manie difficulties, and still new did arise; but in the end, by the diligence and care of those Ambassadors, a Peace was concluded betwixt the Polonians and the house of Austria, vpon certaine conditions, which the Emperour should confirme by oath, and so SIGISMVND the Third enioyed the kingdome quietly. After which, there being an Assembly of the States called, the Emperour sent his Ambassadour, who complained much of a Decree made the yeere before, wherein it was mentioned, that no man, hereafter, in the election of a new King of Poland, should presume to name or recommend any one of the house of Austria; if he did, he should be (ipso facto) infamous, requiring that this ignominious exclusion (the like whereof had not beene seene in any other Nation) might be abolished: Which done MAXIMILIAN should take the oath he had promised, and the Emperour, with the whole house of Austria would suffer them to leuie men, and to buy victuals in their Countries, if Poland should be inuaded by the Turke. Whereunto the King answered; that hauing conferred with his Councell he would satisfie him; in the meane time he could not conceale, that he had been aduertised from the Turkes Court, and by the Ambassadours of other Kings, that the Emperour had prest the Turke to make warre against Poland, being a most fit time; the Noblemen there being then in factions, that they had no firme peace with the Princes of Germany, nor with the Muscouite, neither had they any store of money to leuie and entertaine strangers.

A peace betwixt Sigismund of Poland, and Maximilian & he set at liberty.

When the Ambassador had excused all this, he afterwards receiued his answere: That the Polonians had been forced to make that constitution concerning the house of Austria, to auoide greater daungers. But if the King of Spaine, and MAXIMILIAN would performe the promised Oath, they would doe that which was iust and fit for the dignitie of the Common-wealth; that the Decree did onely concerne MAXIMILIAN; but if the other Arch-dukes and his kinse-menne did support him, then it should extend to the whole house of Austria. Thus the Ambassadour took his leaue, and departed with a sowre answere: notwithstanding afterwards these houses were throughly reconciled, by reason that King SIGISMVND married with ANNE of Austria, who was daughter to the Arch-duke CHARLES.

1592. Amurath renews the warre in Hungary.

The truce continued still in Hungary with AMVRATH, to the great content of the subiects, and AMVRATH was well pleased to haue prolonged it eight yeeres more: but hauing made a peace with the Persian, his Bashaes perswaded him to imbrace the occasion, and to send a good Army against the Christians, they being now ingaged in ciuil warres. This counsell pleased AMVRATH and his sonne, whereupon hee commanded preparations to bee made both by sea and land. In the beginning of the yeere they entred vnexpected, and forced diuerse townes. After which the Army turned to Camisa: but they were repulst, and put to flight by the garrison, losing in a manner all the fruites of their former victory. AMVRATH (being importuned by his sonne and others) sent ASSAN Basha with a strong Army into Croatia, where at the first hee tooke Castronitium by treason: after which hee went to Vehicium the Metropolitan City of Croatia, the which after some small battery yeelded; after which he put to flight ERDOD with fifty thousand men, lying betwixt Vehitium and Carolostad.

The Turkes proceede into Croatia.

This Army in Croatia increased daily; which strooke a great terror into all Hungary, Bauaria, Bohemia, Stiria, Carinthia, Morauia, Silesia, and all the neighbour prouinces. The Emperor assembled the states of Silesia and Morauia, acquainted them with the danger, and perswaded them to ioyne all their forces, to resist this barbarous enemy, although he did not doubt but AMVRATH would disauow this warre, and the breach of the truce; yet hee knew that the Turks property was, that hauing once taken any townes neuer to restore them: wherefore hee sought by all meanes, to get aid to resist this tyrant. On the sixteenth of July the Turks came with a forraging troupe to Senderine, thinking to surprise it in a misse: but they were discouered, and some few daies after, the gouernour of Agria meeting them but with small troupes and forces, they put him to flight, hauing lost in a manner all his footemen.

The Turkes slaine by a policy at Sisseck.

In July, ASSAN Basha, growne proud with this successe, laid siege to Sisseck, a Monastery standing betwixt the riuer of Saue and Colapa, it beeing defended by a Chanon of Agria, with a good garrison: this he battered six dayes together with foure and twenty peeces of Ordinance: but it was valiantly defended, and he was forced to retire with shame and losse. Hauing lodged his Army not far off, he attempted the Chanon with promises of reward, giuing him to vnderstand that hee knew well in what estate they were. The Chanon wondred who should discouer their secrets to the enemy; yet hee brought in his Messenger and shewed them the whole Monasterie, being very carefull to discouer the traytor: In the end, hee findes it was the Steward, whereupon taking him and the Turke, hee cast them secretly into the Riuer. ASSAN wondring at the long staie of his Messenger, sent to know if anie violence were offered him. The Chanon answered, hee had sent him away presently with a kinde answere, and if any accident had happened vnto him vpon the way, he was not acquainted with it; adding withall, that seeing there was but little hope to defend the place against the Turkes forces, hee would treat with the Basha to yeeld it, so as hee would send some honourable persons, the which (for that it concern'd his reputation much) should receiue the place, and withall appointed a day for the deliuerie. The Basha was glad of this answere, making choice of a troupe of the better sort to goe into the Monasterie; in the meane time the Chanon planted his Ordinance, and couered it that the enemy might not see it, lodging his garrison armed in secret places, that when a signe were giuen they might fall out vpon the enemy.

The Turkes came on, all richly attired, and riding three in a ranke; whereof fiftie were receiued in at the great gate: but presently the herse was let downe, and the Ordinance discharged vpon them, and at the same instant the garrison salied forth vpon such as stayed without, and such as could escape, made what haste they could to returne, cursing their entertainment at Sisseck. The Basha wrote proud Letters to the Chanon, that he would not giue ouer the siege til he had taken the place, and that he would slay him aliue to the reproach of Christendome. But the Chanon was not much moued with his threats, neither did the Basha any memorable thing there this yeere.

The Christians slaine in their Camp by the Turkes at Carolstade.

The Beglerby of Greece entred Hungary with a great Army: hee attempted Toggay a strong Castle in vaine; from which he attempted Gomorrha seated in a mariish, and easily to be defended. ASSAN Basha was still in Croatia and Carinthia, putting all to fire and sword. In September newes came to the Emperours court, that Canisa was straightly besieged with an Army of 160000 Turkes, yet there was good hope for that the Christian Army increased daily, the Arch-duke ERNEST being made General. The Camp lay then at Carolostadium, where the Turks came to view the Army from the top of a hill; and the Christians sending out 50 horse to discouer the enemies Army, found no more then what they had seene on the hill, so as the Christians slept securely without feare of any enemy; who came and charged them so suddenly as they had scarce leisure to put on their Armes: The fight was long and furious, and the slaughter great on either side: but the Christians being oppresst with multitudes fell in the same place where they fought, so as in all there scarce escaped fourescore: the commanders and Captaines Captaines fled betimes: but afterwards they lost their heads, as a iust reward for their basenes.

This victory was great, yet purchased with much bloud: for many write the Turkes lost 12000 men. All the neighbour prouinces were so terrified herewith, as they abandoned their townes.

The Emperour craues aide against the Turke.

The Emperour sent to all the Princes, and Imperiall townes, laying before them the danger wherein Germany stood, vnlesse the enemy were presently repulst from their borders. The Princes of Germany, both to obey the Emperour, and to preuent the danger of the Christian Common-wealth, did presently giue order for the leuying of men and money; and the Pope, the King of Spaine, the Princes of Italy, and others did contribute bountifully to so necessarie a warre. The citizens of Aix, of the reformed religon, did not onely enioy the free exercise thereof, but also required to be admitted into the Senate, contrary to an edict, made by a generall consent, whereby none but Romane Catholikes might be admitted to be Consuls; whereupon the auntient Magistrates complained vnto the Emperour; who enioyned them strictly to reduce their Common-wealth to the auntient forme. The new Consuls and Senators pretended that the peace of religion was infringed, and imployed all the Princes and orders of the Confession of Ausburg: the Emperour taking aduice hereupon at a Diet at Ausburg, commissioners were sent to Aix, who hearing both parties, and leauing the cause vndecided, made relation vnto the Emperour, who gaue a seuere sentence against the accused, disannulling all that had beene done, and reducing the gouernment to the same estate it was in the yeere 1560: That they should pay all the charges of the suit, the Emperour referring to himselfe the penalty for the offence committed &c. The execution of which sentence, they of the reformed religion laboured to stay, by the mediation of the protestant Princes.

The Emperours seuere censure against the citizens of Aix.

The Turks beseiged Sisseck.

This yeere the Turkes came againe to beseige the monastery of Sisseck, with 30000 men. ASSAN Basha (who was there Generall) planted his Ordinance, and battered it furiously tenne dayes together, so as the beseiged were brought to that distresse, as they had small hope to defend it any longer. The most resolute did incourage the rest: so as in the end they resolued to attend all extreames, rather then to yeeld themselues to assured death and shame. They aduertised the Bishop of Agria, and the gouernour, of their desperate estate; whereupon the Christians hauing drawne an Army of 5000 men together, after much consultation of the danger, in the end they resolued to charge the enemie. The two Armies ioyned: and although the Turkes exceeded them farre in numbers, yet God gaue strength vnto the Christians, who defeated them, and put them to flight: their Camp, baggage, ordinance and munition was taken, and carried to Sisseck. They write that there were eighteene thousand slaine, amongst which ASSAN Basha was one, with many morre of speciall note. And of the Christians there died not aboue fiftie two.

The Christians victory at Sisseck.

The Emperor sends to Amurath.

The Emperour being aduertised of the victory at Sisseck, he wrote vnto AMVRATH concerning this expedition, and to know whether he would continue the truce and peace, which had hitherto beene kept betwixt them, or that he would hereafter proceede by Armes: and withall he sent a present to the Sultan, according to the vsuall manner, commanding his Embassadour to stay at Commorrha, vpon the confines of Hungary, with the present vntill the returne of his messenger: and if that AMVRATH would continue the peace, he should proceede; if not, then come back to the Emperor. In the meane time newes came vnto the christians camp, that SIMAN Basha had receiued commandement from AMVRATH, to inuade Hungary with forty thousand men, to reuenge their late losse: that he should not be moued with CÆSARS Embassie, and if he should by chance meete with the Donatiue, he should take it away and distribute it among the soldiers, and so proceed in the action.

The Turke proclaimes war against the Emperor.

At this time the Turkish Emperor proclaimed warre against the Emperour both in Constantinople and at Buda: he gaue the charge of this warre to MAHOMET Basha of Temesuarre and to the Beglerby of Greece; SIMAN Basha being chiefe Generall. SIMAN marcht with his troupes to Buda, and the Beglerby led his Army by Croatia, meaning to beseige the monastery of Sisseck, which they had twice attempted with great losse and shame, but now they battered it with such fury, as in the end they tooke it, almost in sight of the christian Army, who were not able to relieue them. The defendants were all cut in pieces, and the Monk was flaid aliue and then consumed to ashes.

Sisseck taken by the Turkes.

The Emperour being aduertised of the denouncing of this war, resolued also to Armes, and to prouide all things necessary for his defence; and the rather for that he was giuen to vnderstand, stand that his Legier Embassador at Constantinople was kept in chaines, and his seruants miserably torne in pieces. SINAN, after the taking of Sisseck, went to Vesperine: the which hauing battered some dayes, the garrison finding themselues vnable to resist so great a power, by night fled out at a Posterne gate; whom the Turkes discouering followed, and slew many of them. Thence he went to Palotta: where hauing batterd down the vpper part of the Castle, the Gouerner compounded for himself and the garrison, to depart with their liues & liberty: hauing plighted their faiths, the enemy being admitted into the Castle, this periured Barbarian taking the Gouernor and two others, they slue the rest. The garrison of Pappa had the like successe.

Vesperine taken by the Turks.

Palotta taken.

The Emperor, hauing by his spies discouered the enemies strength, leuied new forces, and commanded his Captains to draw all their men into one head; where vpon a muster ther were found to be 18000 able and resolute men, besides the Hungarians and the horsemen. The Army, hauing passed the Dannow, incountered the enemy, and slue some thousands of them, freeing an infinite number of Christian captiues. The Turks made haste to besiege Tatta. MELCHIOR REDER with a good troop of horse charged them vpon the way, and slue many, freeing many Christians of all Ages. These two victories strook a great terror into the enemy. The Commanders of the Christian Army went to Councell touching the managing of this warre: in the end, after some diuersity of opinions, they resolued to besiege Alba Regalis; whither they marcht as secretly as they could, and took the suburbs: but the Basha of Buda, beeing aduertised heerof, posted thither with an Army of 20000 men, who came marching directly towards the Christians Camp, who resolued to attend them, and to fight with them; wherein God gaue them a speedy and an easie victory: for, the Turks lost, in fighting and fleeing, 16000 men, and as some write but 12000; whereof the Basha of Buda was one, and SINAN their Generall was sore wounded: there were taken 40 of the enemies ensignes. Hauing gathered together the spoils, they took counsell for the continuing of the siege: but winter growing on, there being no great store of powder and shot in their Camp, and the Town hauing a strong garison, they thought it fit to draw their men into good Towns to winter.

Alba Regalis besieged by the Christians.

The Turkes ouerthrowne by the Christians.

In November, FREDERICK DIEFFENBACH, Gouerner of Cassonis, went with 14000 men to besiege Sabat, a strong Castle, which did much annoy the Christians; the which after some dayes battery he took. From thence he went to Fillec, whither PALFYS came to him with new supplies; where hauing battered three daies together, in the end they gaue an assault: but the enemies trusting to their numbers and strength (being 4000 choice men) defended the breach valiantly, and repulst the Christians; who, nothing daunted therewith, resolued either to dy honourably, or to enter the Towne: the which they did vpon a second assault, not without some losse. There yet remained two Castles to force; the which, the valour of the souldiers, and the indiscretion of the Bege of Fillec, made easie: for, in the beginning of the siege he had gone forth to seek for aid, and had brought with him the Basha of Temesuarre, and 18000 men.

Sabat and Fillec taken by the Christians.

The Generall of the Christians, knowing that his intent was to force his Camp, went in the night and charged him, ouerthrew his Army, slue some thousands of them, and the Basha himself, with the Bege of Fillec. And from thence they returned to Fillec; where hauing taken one of the Castles by force, the other yeelded vpon composition to depart with their liues without Armes, they being in number 800 good men. The prey which they took in the Turks Camp and in the Castles, was very great. After the taking of Fillec, the Castles of Dylin and Homosck were abandoned: they took the Towns of Setschin, and Brauenstein, and Salac, which the garrisons had left and fired. PALFYS in the mean time took Pregel and Palanc. Samose a strong Castle yeelded, with Arnac and Holac. Thus, by the great bounty of God, a great part of Hungary was freed from the Turkish slauery: after which, the vnseasonable weather forced them to go to garrison.

The Basha of Temesuarre with an Army of Turks ouerthrowne.

Awhile after, the garrisons of Petrina, Sisseck, Castrouits, and other neer to them, to the number of 3000, went forth to spoile the Christians Countrey: but GRASVINIVS, meeting them with 900 men, set vpon them, and slue 500, and forced all the rest in a manner to flee into the riuer of Collapa; so as fewe escaped. The diuerse victories and rich spoils which the Christians had gotten, gaue great cause of ioy to the Emperor and his brother MATHIAS: to whom they sent Ordinance, Turkish horses, with many other rich Presents to Vienna.

Nouagrade taken by the Christians.

This yeere, one thousand fiue hundred ninety foure, the Arch-duke MATHIAS brother to the Emperour, was made Generall of the Christian Army, against the Turkes: who hauing intelligence by a Turke which was their captiue in the Christian Campe, that Nouagrade, a strong Towne within three miles of Buda, was but weakely mand, they resolued to besiege it. The Garrison, seeing the Army approach, remembring that the Basha of Buda had promised to relieue them, they prepared themselues for defence; but finding the Towne too weake to be defended against so great a power, they retired into the Castle, the which was strong both by Nature and Art, built vpon a Rock, with thick walles and high; the ditch was exceeding deepe, cut out of the Rock. Right against it there was another hill, vpon the which the Christians with great toyle planted their ordinance, with which they battered the Castle, and withall set fire on their fortifications; wherewith being much terrified, they offered to treate: whereupon the Arch-duke gaue them leaue to depart only with their swords, there being 450 good soldiers in the Castle. The Gouernor going to Buda was committed to prison by the Basha; & not able to purge himselfe was afterwards hangd, for that he had yeelded vp so strong a place, without losse of men.

The Emperour finding the burthen of the Turkish warres to be heauy, he demanded aide from the Duke of Muscouie, the Polonians, and Transiluanians. The Muscouite receiued his Ambassador honorably, and dismissed him with great hopes. The Polonians, although they were in peace with the Turke, yet they promised the Emperor all the assistance they could: And the Transiluanians desirous of liberty, and to purchase the Emperours friendshippe, did willingly embrace the occasion. The Earle of Serin and Nadastius, hauing gathered together some small forces, went to the Castle of Precenit and Segestan which they found set on fire by the Turkes; but Serin besieged Babottes, a strong Castle seated in a marish ground, the which the Turkes basely abandoned.

The Emperor craues aid from the Muscouits and Polonians.

Nouagrade being taken, DIEFFENBACH went with twenty thousand men to Hatuan, a strong Towne six miles from Buda, the which he battered furiously, and brought to despaire of all safety, if they were not speedily relieued by the Basha of Buda, who had gathered together an Army of fifeten thousand men, past the riuer Saua, and marcht to charge the Christians behinde; which the Generall vnderstanding, he left the siege, and put his Army in order, taking some places of aduantage: the Armies met, and the incounter for a while was furious; but in the end the Christians put them to flight, and took their ordinance and munition, with seuenteene ensignes. After this battaile they tooke Iasperin, which was abandoned by the Turkes, in which they found good store of corne, great ordinance and munition for warre. The Turkish Garrison which remained in Zaboll, hearing of the ouerthrow and death of their men, being terrified, abandoned the place, without any necessity: the which for strength and bignesse is compared to Toccai or Agria. The Arch-duke MATHIAS incouraged with this good successe, resolued to besiege Strigonium, the which would open the way to Buda: whither bringing his Army, he battered it furiously, yet could they not keepe out the succors which were sent vnto them: notwithstanding they prest the siege, and the Turkes defended it valiantly; but the Citty being terribly torne with their continuall batterie, and in danger to be lost; newes came vnto them that Sinan Basha approached with a great Army; which did much reuiue the besieged, and made MATHIAS for feare to raise his siege, contrary to the aduice of many of his commanders, whereupon he past the Dannow.

The Turkes defeated by the christians.

Strigonium besieged, in vaine, by the Arch-duke.

During this siege at Strigonium, the Emperor assembled a Diet at Ratisbone, at the which hee assisted in person, making them acquainted with the whole progresse of the Turkish war; that in the yeer 1591 he had by his Ambassadors concluded a truce with the Turkish Emperour for eight yeers; yet, contrary to his faith, he had in hostile manner spoiled Hungary and the neighbour Prouinces, taking many places, and carrying away 5000 Christians into seruitude: that he had often complained thereof to AMVRATH by his Ambassador, and required restitution: but he could haue no good answer; yea, ASSAN Basha, the Author of all this warre, was honoured and aduanced: whereupon he fell to open war, and besieged Sisseck. Being again put in minde of the truce, he inuaded Hungary with a greater Army, forcing the poor peasants with fire and sword, to pay him an excessiue tribute; that contrary to the law of Arms hee had cast CRECOVITZ his Ambassador into bonds; who being brought captiue to Belgrade, he there in great misery ended his daies in a filthie loathsome prison. That he for his part hauing drawn his forces together, had ouerthrown his enemie in some battailes, and taken diuers Townes and Castles from him. Yet it might be well coniectured, that he was not growne so weake but he could soone repaire his forces; yea it did appeare plainely, that the Turke would employ all his power, to reuenge his former losses and ouerthrowes. He had therefore called that assembly with the consent of the Princes Electors, to the end they might conferre of those things which did belong to the preseruation of the Empire, but especially of the Turkish warres, how it should be managed and with what supplies: Whereunto the Archbishoppe of Mentz (after conference with the Electors, and Princes of the Empire, and with the other orders as well Ecclesiasticall as Secular) told the Emperor, that he should haue aide against the Turkes, and that Ambassadours should be sent vnto forraine Princes; to inuite them to put to their helping hands, to suppresse the common enemy of Christendome.

DIFFENBACH was still at the siege of Hatuan, and had brought them to that extremity, as they sent word vnto the Basha of Buda, that if they were not relieued within three daies, they should be forced to kill their wiues and children, to set fire on the Towne, and to make their way through the middest of their Enemies, by the Sword. The Basha, hearing in what daunger the besieged were, hauing gathered together many thousands of Turkes, marched towards the Christians, whom DIFFENBACH went to incounter, with fiue thousand horse; and charging them on the suddaine, slue fiue thousand, and returned to the Campe with rich spoils, whereupon they were in hope the Towne would haue yeelded; but the besieged endured a fresh assaule: wherein, the Christians being repulst, they lost 1000 good men, wherewith they were out of hope to take the City; wherefore fearing lest the Basha should returne with new forces, the Christian Army, being much wasted, DIFFENBACH was forced to leaue the siege.

The Christians raise their siege from Hatuan.

SINAN Basha, in the meane time, entred Hungary, with an Army of 125000 men, his first attempt was vpon Tatta, a Towne lying betwixt Strigonium and Iauerin, which yeelded: From whence he marched to Iauerin or Rhab, which is twelue Germane leagues from Vienna, the Christian Army lying in sight on the other side of the Riuer Dannow; but they were so weake, as they durst not passe it, to fight with Sinan; daily expecting new forces: and the rather for that they heard, there were 2000 Italian foote come to Vienna with 9000 duckets from the Pope, for the Hungarian warre.

Sinan Basha comes into Hungary.

In the beginning of August, the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN tooke Castrouitz, hauing put all the Turkes and Valachians to the Sword; from thence he went to Petrinia, a Fort built some few yeeres before by the Turkes, vpon the Emperors territorie: this Castle had six strong Bulwarkes well fortified, which made it seeme inexpugnable; yet MAXIMILIAN battered it in such sort, as the Garrison being terrified, set fire on the Castle, euery one escaping away as hee could, leauing it to the Christians; and in like maner they of Sissecke, setting fire of their Fort, abandoned it. After which exploites MAXIMILIAN retired to refresh his Army.

The Christians take some forts.

In the meane time Sinan Basha prest the siege of Iauerin (in which Count HARDECK was Gouernour) battering it with sixty peeces of great Ordinance; but he preuailed little. The besieged made many sallies, in one of the which they slew two thousand Turkes, with the Gouernour of Greece. There were great difficulties both in Armies; the Enemies forces were much decayed, both by sickneſſe, and their daily excursions, wanting victuals. The Christian Army was much weaker, wherefore they were forced to keep themselues within their strength: but being not so vigilant as they ought to haue been, the Turkes suddenly cast a bridge ouer the Riuer, and inuaded the Christians Campe; where, after some resistance, they were forced to flie fearefully, to Altenbourg. The Enemy tooke that day great store of money, brought for the payment of the Army, all the furniture of the Campe, one thousand Waggons, two hundred Barques laden with Munition, and ten Gallies. SINAN still battered the Towne, and gaue assaults, and was still repulst with losse, so as within two daies space (as some write) there were twelue thousand Turkes slaine.

The siege of Iauerin.

The report was, that when SINAN could not take the Towne by force, he sought to corrupt the Gouernour Count HARDECK: the which he imbracing, he euer after, secretly, fauored the Enemies attempts, by the which they tooke away some of their Bulwarkes, whereby they had small hope to defend the Towne. HARDECK conferring with some of the Captaines, resolued to send Messengers to SINAN to craue a Truce for some daies, that they might in the meane time treate of the conditions of yeelding: In the meane time, fearing they should bee taxed with infamy, if they should yeeld vppon a Towne so well fortified, without necessity; they wrote Letters to the Barons of Hungary, to excuse themselues, and to iustifie their action. After this protestation, hostages were sent on both sides, and in the end it was concluded, that Count HARDECK, with his Captaines and Souldiers should depart with bagge and baggage baggage with their full Armes and colours flying, and be conducted safely to Altenbourg. Thus the strongest fort of all Christendome, by the treachery of Count HARDECK was yeelded vppe to the Enemy, being abundantly furnished with Wine, Corne, and all munition for Warre. For the which, the Earle, comming to Vienna, was committed to prison: and the yeere following, by the sentence of certaine Commissioners, who were chosen for that purpose, hee had both his hand and head cut off; which was a iust rewarde for so foule a Treacherie.

SINAN, full of ioy for this victory, presently repaired the ruines, and fortified the Town: after which he resolued to besiege Gomorrha, seated in the Iland foure miles from Iauerine; in which ERASMVS BRVNNEVS commanded with a strong garrison. SINAN, remembring how well he had sped with Count HARDECK, sent Letters by a country-man to BRVNNEVS, promising him mountains of gold if he would yeeld the place: but he would not look on the Letters, commanding the messenger to depart presently; saying, that he had no skill in the Illirian Tongue; neither was he made Gouerner there to conferre with the enemy, but to fight; and that SINAN was deceiued if he thought to finde a HARDECK in Gomorrha. After which answer SINAN began to presse the siege with all the speed he could. The Arch-duke knowing, that after the losse of Iauerine, all the hope of miserable Hungary, next vnder God, consisted in the preseruation of this place; hauing gathered together a good Army of Germanes, Hungarians and Bohemians, went with all speed to Nitrea, not far from Gomorrha: which the enemy vnderstanding, hauing set fire on his Camp, he left the siege, and went to Iauerine. The Arch-duke entred into Gomorrha, repaired the ruines, fortified the defenses, and caused new bulwarks to be made.

1594 Gomorrha besieged by Sinan Basha.

The Turkes leaue the siege of Gomorrha.

This yeer 1595, AMVRATH the second Emperor of the Turks, sonne to SELIM, left his life and Empire; whom succeeded MAHOMET the Third: whom all men supposed would continue the warre against the Christians with more violence. Wherefore the Emperour, besides the aid which was granted at the Imperiall Diet, desired an extraordinary supply of horse and foot; the which diuerse Princes willingly brought at their owne charge. From the vpper Saxony came 1200 horse; from the lower, 600; from Franconia, 1000 horse. Sueuia sent 4000 foot; Austria, 2000 horse and 6000 foot; Tirill, 4000 foot; Bauaria, 3000; Westphalia, 500 horse and 1500 foot: the Silesians, Morauians, Bohemians and Lusatians, sent great supplies. Besides the Pope, the Dukes of Florence, Ferrara and Mantua, the Emperor required the Poloniens to ioyn in league with him, and to make a sociall warre against the common enemy of Christendome. This proposition was much debated; SAMOSCIVS and many other holding that they should not violate the peace, which had continued firme 75 yeeres betwixt them and the Turkes, and draw vpon them an vnnecessary warre; yet for that they would not vtterly deny aide vnto the Emperour, they lett him vnderstand, that they held it fit, that the Pope, the King of Spaine, and the rest of the Christian Princes should ioyne in a firme league against the Turke: that these counsels should bee imparted to the Princes Electors, to the end the league might be made, not with the Emperour alone, but with the whole Empire: and soon after, the Emperors ambassadors coming to Craconia, Commissioners were appointed to treat of the conditions of the league they were to make with CÆSAR and the Empire.

The Princes of Germany assist the Emperor for the Turkish wars.

SIGISMVND BATTORI, Prince of Transiluania, hauing wrested many Forts from the Turk, did this yeer annoy them with many incursions: and the better to fortifie himself and his authority against the common enemy, he resolued by all means to ioyn in league with the Emperor, sending a stately Ambassage to Prague: where a league was soon concluded vpon certain conditions: that the Emperor should constantly prosecute the warre, that if he should conclude any peace or league with the Sultan, he should impart it to SIGISMVND, and comprehend Transiluania, Moldauia and Valachia therein; that SIGISMVND should promise and confirme by oath for himself and all his subiects, to continue the warre against the Turks, and not to conclude any peace with him without the priuity & consent of the Emperor; that SIGISMVND BATTORI should enioy Transiluania, with those parts of Hungary, as his Predecessors had formerly done, with all their rights and reuenues, acknowledging the Emperors maiesty and his lawfull successors for their lawfull Kings; for the which they should take the oath of fealty when he should enter into the possession of the Prouince: and if the Prince or his Successors should dy without issue male, then Transiluania should be annexed to the Kingdome of Hungary. There were many other Articles set down in this league, the which to auoid prolixity I omit.

A league betwixt the Emperor and the Prince of Transiluania.

The articles of the league.

The

The Turks seek to surprise the Prince of Transiluania.

The reasons which moued the Transiluanian so much to affect this league with the Emperor, was the treachery of the Turks against his owne person, and the exceſſiue tributes wherewith his Country was oppreſt: for, in Iuly 1594, the Tartarians, who had been drawne down to aid the Turks against the Hungarians, were sent into Transiluania to seiſe vpon that Prouince by the Sultans commandement, and to expell Prince SIGISMVND, or to send him captiue to Conſtantinople. It was not vnknowne, that he sought to fall from the Turk to the Roman Empire, by reason of the intolerable tribute: which desertion many Noble-men of Transiluania sought to hinder; who, conſpiring with the Tartarians, vndertook to deliuer them the whole Prouince, and to send the Prince captiue to Huſt, where they were incamped: whereupon they perſwaded the Prince, that the great Chancellor of Poland attended him on the confines of the Kingdome with a great Army, to treat with him vpon matters of importance, deliuering him counterfeit Letters from the Chancellor; whereunto giuing credit, he began his iourney: but being on the way, he was aduiſed by ſome that were more honeſt and faithfull, to proceed no further; and that he was not expected by the Polonians, but by the Tartarians, who were reſolued to depriue him of his eſtate. Being amazed at the newes, he retired with his company into a place of ſtrength, vntill he had drawne his forces together: and then he called an Aſſembly of all the Nobility to Clauſenbourg, diſſembling the treaſon intended against him; where at a banket he apprehended 14 of the conſpirators, and put them to death. After which, he carried open Arms against the Turks.

The Transiluanians conſpire against their Prince.

The league being concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Prince of Transiluania, the warre grew hot in diuerſe places, and the Chriſtians recouered Vaſcia with a rich prey. SINAN, reſoluing to go from Belgrade to Conſtantinople to ſalute the new Emperor, and to preſent him with the treaſure which he had taken, was intercepted by the Valachians, who defeated his troops, and took all his treaſure, he himſelf with ſome fewe others eſcaping the danger. MAHOMET hearing that the Valachians, being his tributaries, were now become his enemies, was much incenſed; ſending MICHAEL the Vaiuode (who was of that Nation) with great forces to inuade Valachia, and to keep it for himſelf. MICHAEL goes with his Army of Turks into Valachia: but, before he would attempt any thing, he attended the Tartarians coming out of Hungary; but firſt the Valachians and Tranſiluanians met with them before they could ioyn, and ſlue eight thouſand, the reſt being put to flight: and then they attended MICHAEL with great reſolution, who contained himſelf within his Camp. After which, CHAMOS the Tartarian, by the commandement of MAHOMET, entred Moldauia and Valachia with a great Army; whom AARON the Vaiuode fought withall in three ſeueral battels, and ſlue twelue thouſand Tartarians.

The fraudulent propoſitions of the Turks.

SINAN Baſha, being at Belgrade, called to him certain ſeruants of the Ambaſſador CRECOVITIVS, who (as you heard) died there miſerably in priſon; telling them, that if their maſter had liued, he would haue ſet him at liberty as he did them, hauing brought him thither onely to treat of a peace betwixt the Sultan and the Emperor: but he being dead, hee would ſend his ſeruants to CÆSAR to let him vnderſtand, that MAHOMET had giuen him charge to beſiege Vienna, the which he knew was farre more eaſie than Iauerine. He extolled his Emperours power, and diſgraced the Germans, wiſhing that the Emperor would in time aduiſe (before the Army ſhould march) how a peace might be made. He then ſent them to Buda to his ſon, being Gouerner of Greece; who, calling the Secretary before him, hee made many complaints of the wrong done to the Turks: he put them in hope of liberty, ſending in the mean time one to the Emperor, with conditions whereby he ſaid a peace might be concluded; that is to ſay, If the Emperor would reſtore all the Caſtles and Forts which he had taken, and their Territories; if the Chriſtians would leaue Siſſeck; if CÆSAR would not take into his protection the Tranſiluanians, Valachians and Moldauians; and, laſtly, if he would duely pay the annuall tribute that had been for many yeers omitted.

The Emperors anſwer to the Turks propoſitions.

Theſe conditions were giuen to one in writing, with this condition, that if he returned not with an anſwer in 25 daies, the reſt ſhould dy. BARLING returned from the Emperor with this anſwer, that he neuer had other intent but to maintain a firm peace with the Sultan, having alway ſought it with ſuch conditions, as their ſubiects might be freed from that fatall war. And making a repetition of their iniuries and the ſucceſſe, he ſaid, that the Beglerbey was much deceiued, if he thought the Roman Emperor were reduced to thoſe Streights, that he would accept of any conditions of peace, how vniuſt ſoeuer; and the Turks ſhould ſoon knowe, that he neither wanted force nor courage to defend himſelf, and to recouer that which had bin loſt by treachery: and as he had been alwaies carefull of the quiet and good of his ſubiects, and to auoide the effuſion of innocent blood, ſo would he not now be auerſe from a peace, if SINAN would reſtore thoſe places which he had taken. That the Tranſiluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians, had for many ages paſt, been vnited to the crowne of Hungary, as the members to the body: and therefore the Turke ſhould not take it ill, if the Emperour vndertooke their protection, but rather promiſe neuer to inuade thoſe Prouinces in hoſtile manner. If they performed this, and made ſatisfaction for the wrong done vnto his Ambaſſadour (which all Princes did dereſt) and ſet his ſeruants at libertie, there might be ſome meanes for a Peace, but if they did otherwiſe, there were no way of reconcilement.

Count Mandſfeld goes into Hungary to command the Chriſtian Army

CHARLES Earle of Mandsfeld, ſonne to PETER ERNEST (hauing ſpent many yeeres in the warres of Flanders and France) was by the Emperour (with the King of Spain's good liking) called into Hungary, to gouerne thoſe warres vnder the Arch-duke MATTHIAS: he carried with him two thouſand horſe, and ſix thouſand foote, moſt Wallons; with theſe forces he came to the Prague, where the Emperour did him much honour, after which he began to reform the martiall diſciplme, and to leade the Army with more circumſpection then formerly it had been. He marched, being accompanied by the Duke of Ferrara and Mantoa, and others of great note, from Vienna to Altenbourg, with fifty thouſand foote, and fifteene thouſand horſe, and laid ſiege to Strigonium, where at firſt aſſault he took the old town; the Turks flying into the new: then he planted his Ordinance, with the which he ſo battered the new Towne, and Saint THOMAS Fort, as a ſmall breach being made, they entred, and put all to the Sword: then planting three batteries, and making a large breach, he commanded an aſſault to be giuen to the Caſtle; but they were repulſt with great loſſe.

Strigonium beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The Beglarbie or Gouernour of Greece, drew together a great Army, to relieue the beſieged: approaching neere vnto the Chriſtians, MANDSFELD went forth to meete them, hauing put his Army in battaile: but the Baſha of Buda, ſeeing himſelfe inferior, both in valor and multitude, retired confuſedly, and the Chriſtians purſuing them, put the whole Army to flight; but comming againe to renew the battaile, the Chriſtians were diſordered and fled: Count MANDSFELD, knowing that he muſt either vanquiſh or raiſe the ſiege, reſolued to giue them battaile with his whole Army, in which (hauing made a great ſlaughter of the Turkes with his ordinance) both Armies comming to ioyne, he defeated them quite, and ſlew ſix thouſand; among whom died the Baſha of Iauerin and his ſon, and the Beglarby of Greece (being ſore wounded) fled to Buda.

The next day Count MANDSFELD ſummoned the Towne to yeeld, whereunto they anſwered: that although they deſpaired of all help, yet they had reſolued to preferre a glorious death, before an ignominious life; whereupon the Chriſtians (being incenſed with this anſwer) returned againe to a freſh charge. Count MANDSFELD did not liue to enioy the fruits of this victory; for, hauing ſpent his force and his ſpirits in the battaile, playing the part of a commander with his tongue, and of a ſouldier with his hands, ſweating and diſtempered, he called for drinke, ſo as he fell into a Fever, wherof he died ſoone after, at Gomorrha, before the yeelding of the Towne. The ſiege was ſtill continued with great violence; the Arch-duke MATHIAS comming to the Campe: ſo as in the end, being brought to deſpaire, they compounded to yield the Town, and the ſoldiers to depart with their ſwords by their ſides, euery one carrying a pack at his back.

Count Mandſfeld dies.

Before the yielding of the Towne SINAN Baſha prepared a great Army to inuade Valachia, Moldauia, and Tranſiluania: who hearing of his intent, raiſed an Army of twenty thouſand men, and charged the Turkes at the paſſage of a Riuer, where there was a long and furious battaile, being doubtfull to whom the victory would incline; but on the ſuddaine there came a ſupply of ſix thouſand horſe to the chriſtians, which did much relieue thoſe that were tired with fighting, by whoſe helpe they obteyned the victory, making a great ſlaughter of their enemies, and many being drowned in the Riuer of Dannow, the bridge breaking, with the weight of thoſe that fled. The Germane Chroniclers write, there were 25000 Turkes ſlaine, and halfe as many Chriſtians.

Sinan Baſha enters Tranſiluania twice.

SINAN hauing recouered a new Army of ſeuenty thouſand foote and horſe, he paſſed the Riuer of Dannow, vpon the confines of Moldauia, neere to the towne of Giorgum, lodging part of his Army in the Caſtles and Townes, vpon the borders of Valachia and Moldauia. Thither came vnto him HASAN Baſha, MICHAEL the expulſt Vaiuode of Tranſiluania, with many other Turkes and Tartarians of note. SINAN with the reſt of his Army went to Tergiuiſt, a famous famous Monastery; which he conuerted into a Castle, and fortified it with all things necessary; resoluing, not to depart before that he had subdued those Prouinces: but the euent proued otherwise.

In Hungary, HEBERSTEIN, Gouerner of part of that Country, burnt the Towns of Cheringa, Masiona and Bellabina; where he slue many Turks, and carried away many prisoners: among the which there were some of great authority. And at the same time the Haiducs took the Town of Wakaner on the other side of the riuer of Dannow, where they found a great prey. And about the same season, ALDOBRANDIN Generall of the Popes forces, and PALFI, Visigrade taken by the Turks. besieged the Town and Castle of Visigrade, lying betwixt Buda and Strigonium, vpon the right bank of the riuer Dannow, where in antient time the Crown of Hungary was vsually kept: this place the Turks held inuincible, neither could they force it in the yeer 1543, when as Strigonium was made subiect to the Turkish yoke; but two yeers after, the Christians abandoned it for want of victuals. Hauing planted their Ordinance, they battered it incessantly; and hauing made a large breach, the souldiers lodged vnder the wals: which the besieged perceiuing, they began to faint; which fear opinion increased that there was no reliefe to be expected. Wherefore, on the twenty fift of September, they made a signe of parley; and beeing admitted, they offred to yeeld both Town & Castle, so as they might haue the same conditions the Turks had at Strigonium; but it would not bee granted: onely they had leaue to depart with their liues, without Arms or baggage; which they accepted, and yeelded the place.

The Turks slain in Croatia. The Turks, which were vnder the command of the Basha of Bosna, had an intent to spoile Croatia neer to Petrina. The Christians liuing in those parts, hearing of their resolution, making a body of ten thousand souldiers, meant to encounter them. The Turks beeing twenty thousand (if that were true which themselues report) coming to fight, the Christians shewed such resolution and courage, that they slue the greatest part of the Turks, the rest fleeing away. The Christians returning from this expedition, their forces increased, many fresh supplies beeing comn vnto them: and there ioyned with them the horsemen of Croatia, Carinthia, and the neighbour Prouinces, and the Baron of Herbenstein, with certain Hungarian Troops. All these forces

Petrina besieged being vnited, they came to Petrina, which they battered for the space of two houres, and lost in the assault 120 men. And finding that they should not preuail without greater Ordinance (the which was hard to bring through the mountains) they desisted, and retired to Sisseck, there to consult what they had to do. The same night, one BRIBEG, very familiar with the Bege HVRSTAN, fled out of Petrina; giuing them to vnderstand, that the Bege being shot into the body, died soon after; that if they returnd to Petrina, without doubt they should take the town,

The Christians take Petrina. for that the Inhabitants were so amazed, that vpon sight of the enemie they would all forsake the Town. The Christians with this hope marched speedily away, and came to Petrina, which they found abandoned; the which they entred, and fortified with a good garrison, wherin they found ninety barrels of powder.

Whil'est that these things passed in Hungary, the quiet of Moldauia was disturbed by SAMOSCIVS the great Chancellor of Poland, who sought to expell the Vaiuode whom the Transiluanian had appointed, and to bring in a new, besieging the chief City of Moldauia. He was twice beaten and put to flight by the old Vaiuode: in which incounters the chief Authours of that counsell were slain, and the new Vaiuode expeld again. The Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN was then cald with his whole Army into Transiluania. This summer, not onely men, but euen the elements did fight against the Turkish Sultan: for, after many defeats, another mischief followed; for, Rhab being set on fire, most of the Towns victuals were burnt: and NADASTI, meeting with a conuoy of corne going to Rhab, hee slue the souldiers, and carried away all the corn.

After Count MANDSFELD's death, his Netherland and Walloon souldiers fel into a mutiny. MANDSFELD had brought them into a Countrey which did not abound with gold and siluer, like to the Belgick Prouinces; but desolate, exhausted and wasted, where there was nothing to be expected but blowes, wounds, and death. They often complained of this in his life time: but they durst not, by reason of his seuere discipline, threaten any open defection. Being now in a mutiny, the Captains laboured foureteen daies together to pacifie them, and to contain them in their duties. In the mean time, many fleeing away, some were brought back and imprisoned, others were slain by the peasants. On the tenth day of October, foure and twenty foot and horse came to Vienna: being let-in and lodged, they were sought for, and at length found. In the beginning they defended themselues valiantly; and one of them shotte himself himself through. At length they were taken, and deliuered ouer to the Iudge as Traitors.

MAHOMET, hauing receiued so many losses, especially by those who were wont to be his friends and confederates, was wonderfully transported with rage and indignation; sweating by his scepter, and by his Prophet MAHOMET, that he would reuenge those iniuries, and prosecute warre against the Transiluanians, Valachians and Moldauians, vntill that hee had slaine them all; sending forth into all places to leuie men, and to make prouision of corn and munition. SIGISMVND the Transiluanian, being aduertised heerof, fortified his Army with new supplies: he caused fiue troops of Silesian horsemen, which were vpon the way, to aduance; and, to haue the greater forces to encounter his enemie, hee granted to a certain people of his Country, called Dockeieri (who had resolued to forsake the Turk) their antient liberties, rights and priuiledges, giuing them withall great possessions; but, vpon these conditions, that during the wars they should entertain 40 800 armed men at their owne charge, and yeerly euery house should pay a doller, with a certain measure of wheat, oats and barley; and if the Prince had a son which did succeed him, then euery family to contribute a fat Ox. These conditions pleased them well; and withall they promised a good donatiue at the birth of a son. These things were proclaimed in the Camp of the Dockeieri; which all did confirm by oath: and hauing but 25000 men in their Army, they sent to leuie the other 15000, the which was soon effected. The Prince, finding in his Army 80000 foot and horse, left the delights of Court, and went to Camp; where his onely care was, how to intercept and ouerthrowe the enemy. Being aduertised by his spies, that SINAN and HASAN Bashaes, with the fugitiue Vaiuode of Moldauia, were encamped by Tergouista, and threatned vtter ruin to his Countries, the Prince resolued to fight with them. Wherefore, hauing commanded all to Arms, he put his Army in battell, and marched towards the enemie.

Mahomet and the Transiluanian prepare to Armes.

Beeing come neer to Tergouista, the Prince called a Councell, to resolue (by their aduice) what was fitteſt to be done. In the afternoon, two Christians (which had been freed from the Turks) were brought to the Prince; who tould him, that there had been such an amazement for two daies together in the Turks Camp, that no man could easily beleeue such an alteration: for they, which but fewe daies before had deuoured the Prince in hope, and had resolued to meet him with his whole Army, were now stricken with such fear, that, had not SINAN staied his Ianizaries within the Camp both by threats and promises, yea and by force, all had fled away: but some hundreds brake out in despite of SINAN. In the end, SINAM, no lesse terrified than the rest, fled with his whole Army, leauing in the Camp his tents, ordinance, warlike preparation and victuals; carrying nothing with him but what was most pretious. Hee left HASAN Basha and MICHAEL the Vaiuode in Tergouista with 4000 horse and foot, promising to send them speedy supplies: after which, hee fled in all haste to Bacaresta, a daies iourney off, to attend the euent; writing Letters presently to HASSAN, and aduising him if it were possible to defend the Castle, or else to prouide in time for his escape: which Letters were intercepted by the Christians.

Fear in the Turks Camp.

Sinan flies.

The Transiluanian, hearing that the Turks meant to send away 4000 Christians, men, women and children, by the bridge into Turkie, sent 500 choice foot men to pursue them, and to free the Christians; who got before the Turks, slue them all, and freed the captiues. The Prince of Transiluania entred SINAN's Camp, and enioyed what they had left. Then hee summoned HASAN to yeeld Tergouista; who, considering of SINAN's flight, of the great power of the Christians who had spoiled his Camp, resolued to yeeld the place, and to saue himself and his souldiers: but the Ianizaries (who were 2000 in number) would not consent to the Bashaes aduice, but prepared themselues for defense. The Transiluanian presently ouerthrew the wals, and assaulted the Town and Castle; the which within fewe houres hee forced, putting all the garrison to the sword: he spared the Basha (whom hee had taken with his owne hands); and MICHAEL the Vaiuode (who was turned Turk) was slain in the fight. SINAN a little before his flight had sent foure thousand men forth to spoil; who returning to the Camp (being ignorant of what had past) were slain by the Christians, losing all the booty they had taken in Valachia.

The Transiluanian takes Sinans Camp.

The Prince, leauing a good garrison in Tergouista, marched with the rest of his Army to Bucaresta, hoping to finde SINAN there. But he, hearing of the losse of Tergouista (doubting of his safety) left the place, with nine and thirty pieces of great ordinance, and great store of powder, victuals and other munition; and fledde to Zorza or Georgia. The Transiluanian took Bucaresta without any losse or labour; and sending some Troops of horse before, hee slew many Turkes in the flight, himselfe following SINAN with his whole Army: but before his comming hee had remoued his Camp toward the riuer Dannow; which seeking to passe, in this tumultuous flight the bridge brake, where many Turkes were drowned. SINAN himselfe was carried into an Island from whence the yeere before he had expelled the Christians, and in the night escaped by boat.

Sinans third fight.

Georgia taken by the Christians.

The Transiluanian after this happie victory, besieged Georgia: the which he battered continually, and hauing made a breach entred it by force; in which were slaine 30000 Turks which could not follow SINAN in his speedie flight: they found in it 40 peeces of Cannon, with such store of Armes, and munition, as would suffice two kingdomes. They took many ships loaden with stuffes and other commodities; many Captiues were freed, with which the Prince triumphing returned to Bucarest. It is written, that the Ottoman house for many ages, neuer receiued so great a losse. For which victories, the Prince commanded publike thankes to be giuen to God, throughout all the towns of Transiluania.

The Prince of Transiluania sends to the Pope.

SIGISMVND Prince of Transiluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and Earle of Doccai, wrote Letters vnto the Pope, sending him certaine Tartarian and Turkish ensignes, making a relation of the victories which he had gotten, by the ouerthrow of SINANS Army: wherewith the Pope was greatly pleased, promising vnto the Prince all assistance of men, counsell and mony: and if neede required he would send him his Army which was in Hungary. Soone after the Pope sent a Nobleman, to the King of Poland, to perswade him not to suffer his Chancellor, to molest the Transiluanian in Moldauia and Valachia, but especially to perswade Cardinal BATTORI, to forget the hatred which he had conceiued against his Nephew SIGISMVND, being most vnworthy in a man of the Church; and that he should aske the Prince forgiuenes both with tongue and hart. The Emperour sent an Embassador, with the like charge to the Polonian, and the Pope wrote his Letters of admonition to Cardinall BATTORI, and cited him to Rome.

The Pope sends to the King of Poland for the Transiluanian.

Simoscius troubles Moldauia.

SAMOSCIVS the Chancellor, puft vp with ambition, without respect of religion or honor, sought to effect his designes. He perswaded himselfe that Moldauia did of right belong vnto the Kingdome of Poland, perswading the King and the states to suffer him to inuade that prouince, to expell the old Vaiuode, and to constitute another at his pleasure; giuing them many reasons, which had more apparance then truth. The Transiluanian he said was inferior to the Turke in power; and therefore it was to be feared, hee would be expelled out of all his countries, and Moldauia become subiect to the Turkish tyranny: whereby Poland should haue a trecherous and troublesome neighbour. Wherefore it were better they should take it, who could better defend it, whereby the Turks might be kept farre from the Polonians: promising vnto himself such fauour with the Turkish Sultan, as the Polonians should easily enioy their desires in this point. The Polonians being perswaded with these and such like reasons, gaue him commandement to proceede: whereupon he expelled STEPHEN the old Vaiuode and subrogated a new, who should be for euer a tributarie client to the crowne of Poland. After this he sent to SINAN Basha, intreating him not to take it ill, that he had seized vpon Moldauia, and instituted a Vaiuode, but rather would get his institution confirmed by his potent Emperor: promising that Moldauia should be subiect vnto him, as it had been, and pay a greater yearely tribute. SINAN (whom ambition and pride made to dare any thing) answered the Chancellor, that it was not his Emperors pleasure, the Polonian should inuade Moldauia, and that the Sultan was able to defend it, without his helpe. That he had giuen it formerly vnto CZARI the Tartarian, who was now comming with many thousands of men, women and children, to enioy it; but yet the Chancellor desisted not from his enterprise. The Prince of Transiluania soone after (finding that the Polonians had some secret intelligence with the Turks) assisted STEPHEN the old Vaiuode of Moldauia with good troupes of horse and foote, to see if he could expell the Polonians and recouer his lost dignity. Coming to fright the Polonians had the victory: and STEPHEN defending himselfe valiantly hauing had two horses slaine vnder him, and being vpon the third, in the end was taken fighting: whom the Polonians afterward murdred cruelly.

The Turkish Emperour, hauing receiued so many ouerthrowes the yeere past, from SIGISMVND Prince of Transiluania, he resolued to bend all his forces against him; who (hearing of this Turkish preparation) assembled the estates of his Countrey; where by a generall consent they resolued to prepare to war, to repell this common enemy: and to the end that they might haue the Emperor an associate with them in this difficult war, he resolued to go to him. He came to Prague in Feb. where being met by the Emperors Nobles, he was conducted to the Arch-dukes Arch-dukes Palace. The Emperor, vnderstanding what preparations the Turk made, sent to the Princes Electors to require mony for the leuying of an Army; the which was granted, and forces were accordingly made ready: but there wanted some one of great authority to command it. ALFONSVS, Duke of Ferrara, offred to bee the Emperors Lieutenant, and to entertain eight thousand men for a yeer, if the Pope would grant the inuestiture of Ferrara to his brothers base son: whereto he would not yeeld. Wherefore the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN was made Generall, the Germans and Hungarians pressing it, for that they desired not to fight vnder a stranger which differed from them in tongue and manners.

An accord betwixt the Emperor and Sigismund.

The Emperor concluded with the Transiluanian, that, hauing gathered together a good Army, he would ioin with him; and he bound himself by secret Articles, to entertain euery yeer two thousand horse and three thousand foot in Transiluania: for the paiment wherof, he should giue monthly foure and twenty thousand dollers. And if SIGISMVND should bee expelled his Country by the Turkish Tyrant, then the Emperor did promise to giue him land in Silesia with an honourable pension: and the Popes Nuntio promised forty thousand duckets monthly, with some Italian Troops towards this warre. SIGISMVND hauing settled his affaires after this manner with the Emperor, he returned speedily vnto Vienna; where the people flocked in the streets, to see this young Prince who had wonne so many noble victories against the Turks.

In Croatia there is a kinde of people who knowe no other art but stealing; wherein they exceed all mortall men, being Christians in shew: these, being gathered together in Troops, had concluded with two Christian Renegadoes to surprise Cliffa, a very strong Fort in Illiria; the which they effected, and slue the garrison. The Turks presently drew their forces together to recouer this Town; where the Croatians annoyed them much, neither did the Basha of Bosna see any means to preuail but by treason or famine. The Besieged were so oppresst with hunger, that they sent word to the Emperors Lieutenant in Stiria, that if they were not presently relieued, famine would force them to yeeld; so as he presently gatherd an Army together, and prouided shipping with victuals, landing his men within foure miles of the Turks Camp, marching speedily to charge them; who, being terrified with their sudden approach, fled. The Illirians and Croatians who were in the fore-ward, breaking their ranks, fell to spoil; which the Basha perceiuing, commanded his men to return to the charge: in which, the Christians, who were the cause of this disorder, were slain; and the rest, beeing amazed, were put to shamefull flight. After which, Cliffa (despairing of all succours) yeelded, vpon condition to depart with bag and baggage.

The garison of Totta drew the Turks of Comorrha by a stratagem into an ambush; in which the Gouerner was slain, with all his Troops: and the same day NADASTI, who commanded in the lower Hungary for the Emperour, hauing lodged 1500 horse in a wood, sent some of his Troops to Iauerine to get some prey, and to draw out the Turks: who, following the Christians that fled, fell into the ambush, and were most of them put to the sword.

Lippa besieged and left by the Turks.

The last yeer, the Transiluanians hauing taken Lippa, the Turk sent forty thousand men to besiege it. The Transiluanian sent 5000 men to relieue it; who valiantly defended the Towne, and made great slaughter of their enemies. The Basha of Temesuarre fearfully raised his siege by night, leauing all his warlike instruments. The Hungarian and German Writers say, that there were 4000 Turks slain at this siege.

Themesuar besieged by the Christians.

Lippa being freed, the Transiluanian besieged, Themesuar sending forth 2000 horse and foot to discouer and spoil; these brought him word, that a certain Basha, with his wife and children, with great store of commodities, lodged in a poor Town, the which they scaled in the night, put the souldiers to the sword: gathering together the prisoners and spoils, they set fire on the Town, and departed. The garrison of Nicopolis, hearing which way the Christians marched, went to encounter them, where there was a cruell fight: but in the end the Christians had the victory, and slue 3000 Turks, and so returned to the Camp at Themesuar with their spoile and captiues. The Barbarians, drawing all their forces together, came to charge the Transiluanians, where at the first the victory was doubtfull: but in the end the Christians preuailed, hauing slain about fiue thousand of their enemies; but yet they were at length forced to raise the siege.

A great slaughter of the Turks.

MAHOMET conceiuing that his Commanders had either been negligent or vnfortunate in the warres, and resoluing to ruine the Christians, came in person to Belgrade, where he drew together an Army of 150000 men, with which he besieged Agria; the Gouerner NIARIVS hauing bin a little before supplied with men and victuals by the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN. There was a Town and two Castles: the old stood vpon the declining of a hill; and the new on the top. The Christians left the Town, and retired into the old Castle without any force; which the Turks hauing battered, they left this also, and fled into the new Castle, where they carried themselues no more valiantly than they had done before: for, after they had endured some assaults, and repulst the Turks, the souldiers would needs yeeld to haue their liues saued, contrary to the will of the Gouerner and Captains: but the Turks, violating their faith, hauing kept the Gouerner and other chief Commanders, slue all the souldiers, but such as impiously, to saue their liues, would abiure their religion.

The Archduke Maximilian fights with Mahomet.

The Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, Generall of the Emperors Army, hauing ioyned with the Prince of Transiluania and the Hungarians, and making an Army of 60000 men, resolued to giue battell to the Turks, contrary to the aduice of his counsell. After diuerse skirmishes the Turks past a riuer with part of their Army, and came in good order to charge the Christians; who attended them resolutely, and repulst them valiantly, forcing them after great slaughter to turn their backs, and repasse the riuer, the Christians following them euen vnto their Camp: where falling greedily to spoil, and busying themselues in MAHOMET'S Tent, to free the Gouerner of Agria from bonds, they were set vpon by CIGALA, who led the rereward of the Turkish Army, and put to the sword whil'st they were buse in spoiling; so as by their greedy desire they lost the glory of a famous victory. MAHOMET, hauing not been so fortunate in fight as he expected, and being weary of the Hungarian wars, returned to Constantinople to his delights and venery: and the Christian Army was dissolued, and went to garrison.

In the beginning of this yeer 1597, MAHOMET resolued to return again into Hungary as soon as the season of the yeer would serue, and to besiege Vienna: but all Turkie being oppressed with famine, and MAHOMET failing of a peace with the King of Persia, whereof they then treated at Constantinople, he was forced to desist from his resolued enterprise. And for that the defection of Transiluania, Valachia and Moldauia, did much trouble him, being very necessary for the feeding of his Countries and Armies, he therefore sent Ambassadors to the Prince of Transiluania with rich Presents, to the end hee might draw him from all league with the Christians. The Prince entertained them curteously; and in the beginning answered them doubtfully, to the end he might protract the warre, and discouer the enemies counsels: but hearing that the Turks were on foot, and marched towards Valachia, he drew his Army presently together, and charged them; at which encounter the Turks were in a manner all slain. After this exploit hee went with 40 coaches to Prague; where hauing had secret conference with the Emperor, hee receiued the Order of the golden Fleece, with many rich Presents; and then returnd into Transiluania, the Emperor hauing promised to assist him with 6000 foot before the end of May.

The Turk seeks to gaine the prince of Transiluania.

Exploites of the Christians.

In May, PALFI, NADASTI and BERSTEIN, Bohemians, with some of the Emperors forces, hauing by night forced one of the gates of Totta, a Castle in Hungary, they entred it without any losse, and slue the garrison. And the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, in August following, after six daies siege took Pappa; from whence he went to the siege of Iauerine: but hearing that the enemy came to relieue it with a good Army, he raised his siege, and went towards Vaccia; whereas MAHOMET Basha offred him battel: but the Imperialists being far weaker, they kept themselues within their Camp; which, MAHOMET attempted to force, and was shamefully repulst, with the losse of 700 Ianizaries, a Basha, and many of his choice horsemen. The next day, hauing by his messengers obtained a treaty of a counterfeit peace, with this subtile deuice he retired with his Army, and went to Buda. Soon after, the Turks returned to Totta or Totisa (taken a little before by the Christians) and laid siege vnto it. CHRISTOPHER WEIDA commanded in this Castle with 250 souldiers; who although he performed the duty of a good Captain with great valour and resolution, yet in the end he was forced to yeeld, and to prouide for his owne safety and his souldiers: for, the Turks hauing battered it continually, and made a breach, they gaue diuerse assaults, and attempted to force it; but they were alwaies repulst by the valour of the garrison. In the mean time they had vndermined one of the Bulwarks of the Castle, and blew it vp; which made a great breach. The souldiers beeing moued with this ruine, many of them being slain, some wounded, and some burnt with the fire, they perswaded their Captain not to cast himself and them away desperately: whereupon, in a tempestuous night they issued secretly by a postern gate, and went to the riuer Dannow. The enemy this while giues an assault, and enters the breach: but he found the Castle empty, the souldiers before their departure hauing laid a train of powder, which taking fire slue many of the Turks.

The Turkes recouer Totta.

In

In March 1598, the Earl of Swartzenbourg Lieutenant to the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, and the Baron of Palfi, laid a plot for the surprising of Iauerine: they brought ladders, bridges, and all other instruments of war, secretly by night to Comorrha, and prepared forces fit for such an enterprise, giuing to euery man his charge, exhorting the souldiers to abstain from spoiling, and to regard the general good of Christendom more than their owne profits. The Earl hauing prepared all things ready for the execution, finding the draw-bridge down, and the vtter gate open, they made fast their Petard to the inner gate, which they forced. The souldiers which were in guard cried To Arms, and discharged their Pieces: but the Christians entred, seising on the ports, ordinance, and places of strength, according to their directions. The Turks in this sudden amazement went to Arms: but they were all put to the sword, without respect of age or sex. The conflict lasted 5 houres; and the Turks fought with such obstinacy, that they willingly offred their throats to their enemies swords: the Basha, hauing defended himself long, was slain. SVARTZENBOVRG (hauing got this victory, not without the loss of much bloud) caused all the spoil to be gathered together, attending the Emperors pleasure; who, reserving only the ordinance and warlike preparation, commanded all the rest to be giuen to the souldiers.

Iauerine surprised by the Christians.

The fame of this vnexpected victory as it reuiued the spirits of the Christians, so it daunted the Turks, who relied much vpon this place; as appeared by certain words grauen in a stone, which were brought to the Emperor: that is to say, Iauerine a Towne of the Turks is the key which can open all the Towns and Forts of the Christians. SVARTZENBOVRG was made Gouerner of the Town, with a garrison of 10000 men; and PALFI FABACOVRT the Petardier, a French Gentleman, with others, was honoured by the Emperor with the dignity of Knighthood, and had great rewards.

In the mean time, SIGISMVND BATTORI Prince of Transiluania, who hitherto had fought against the Turks with great courage and valour, and faithfully entertained the league with the Emperor, whether now moued with the desire of a quieter life, or drawn by som other consideration, resolued to giue ouer the dominion of those three Prouinces to the Emperour; so as he might haue some duchy giuen him fit for his person within the bounds of the Empire. The Emperor accepted of this condition, and offred him a Duchy in Silesia; and the busnesse was concluded in April, conditionally that Transiluania, with all the Towns, Cities and subiects, should hereafter acknowledge the Emperor and the Princes of the house of Austria, for their lawfull Lords, and yeeld them all obedience due to their natural Princes; and that they should accept of the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, whom the Emperor had named, to be their Prince, and should enioy their religion as they formerly had done. This being concluded; the Prince, calling his Noble-men together, acquainted them with this action: and, freeing them of their oath of alleageance, he wisht them to obey the Emperor, and then went to possesse his Duchie.

The Prince of Transiluania resignes his Countries to the Emperor.

In May, SVARTZENBOVRG attempted to surprise Alba Regalis, but in vain. Hauing drawn together 8 Cornets of Austrian horse, ioining with them of Hungary, and some footmen out of Iauerine, he marched secretly towards the Town: but this proiect was discouered to the Turks, so as the same night they fortified the Towne with a stronger garrison, and kept good guards without it; so as the Christians vnderstood by their spies, whom they had sent to discouer, that there was small hope to take the Town. The Army was come within half a mile; and for that they would not return without some exploit, NADASTI was sent before with 150 horse to draw forth the enemy: whereupon, there salying forth 600 horse, they pursued NADASTI; who drawing them into an ambush, there were aboue 250 slain. The Turks, returning to Alba, came forth again with greater forces: whom SVARTZENBOVRG incountred, defeated and put to flight, hauing slain many, and taken some prisoners.

Alba Regalis attempted by the Christians in vain.

The Prince of Transiluania, hauing taken possession of his Duchy in Silesia, was not much pleased with that estate: but repenting him of his exchange, on the one and twentith of August disguising himself in a Friers habit, he retired secretly with two more in his company into Transiluania. And coming to Clausenbourg, he found his wife at her deuotion; whom hauing kindly saluted, he took a new oath of the Citizens, and carried himself for Lord as hee had formerly done. Then, sending messengers into all parts, hee aduertised them of his comming, requiring them to obey him as they had formerly done. He also sent Letters to the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, to whom the Emperor his brother had giuen the gouernment of those Prouinces; intimating, that whereas the Duchies of Opelia and Ratisbon, which the Emperor had exchanged with him, did in no sort equall his Countries, he had therefore great reason to return into Transiluania, and that he now held Clausenburg the chief city of that Prouince; that he neither could nor would yield it, or such other places as had continu'd in his power, or returnd vnder his command, but would endeauour to defend them from al forraine force; wherfore he intreated him to desist from his intended enterprise, & not to attempt any thing against him in Transiluania, but rather to bend his forces for the recouery of Agria, lest hee should force him by necessity (whil'st he seekes to defend himselfe and his subiects) to deserue ill of them, to whom he wished all good. Moreouer that he would honour the Emperour, and the whole house of Austria, with the maiesty of the Roman Empire; and would endeuor to do any thing that might tend to their profit and good. His wife did also accompany them with her Letters, by the which shee exhorted MAXIMILIAN, not to attempt any thing against her husband: which if he did, it would not onely be hurtfull, and dishonorable to himselfe, but also to the Emperour, and the whole Christian Common-wealth. Whil'st that the Transiluanian was busie in settling of his estate, the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN intercepted ceraine waggons loaden with siluer and other rich commodities, the which he caused to be brought to Cassouia: the Transiluanian taking this very ill, layed hold vpon certaine Commissioners of the Emperors, which were then in Transiluania, the which he said he would not release, vntill he had restitution. This was the cause of great warre, which not onely afflicted those Countries, but bred great fecurity to the Turks.

The estates of Germany in combustion.

The peace of Germany was much disquieted this yeere, by the Lowe Countries Army: for the Arch-duke vnder the command of MENDOZA Admirall of Castile, who had lodged his Army in Cleues, Westphalia, and the countries adjacent, taking many townes, and committing more then barbarous cruelties; the Duke of Cleues, who was a Prince of the Empire, complained to the Emperour and to the Princes and imperiall townes, of the insolencies committed by the Admirall and his Army: to whom the Emperour and the Princes sent often to demande restitution: which the Admirall neglecting, in the end the Princes raised an Army of 10000 foote and 3000 horse to force him to retire out of the quarters of Westphalia, and Munster; wherupon the Spaniard, fearing that this would draw all Germany into Armes, lest those countries, which they had spoiled.

Varadine beseged by the Turk in vaine.

MAHOMET to reuenge the losse of Iauerin sent OSMAR Basha with an Army of 60000 men to besiege Varadin a towne in Transiluania, in which MELCHIOR REDER a Silesian Gentleman, bred vp in Arms, commanded: who seeing the towne vnable to resist so great an Army, set it on fire, and retired himselfe with all the victuals and munition vnto the Castle, drawing in such inhabitants as would runne the same fortune, making them sweare, not to parly with the enemy nor to make any motion of yeelding, vpon paine of death, and he himself did likewise promise to dy with them. They indured a siege of six weekes, and repulst many sharpe assaults. The Historie commends him, to haue by his valor and diligence recompenced the losse of about 13000 Christians before Varadine, with the death of 13000 Turks, and forced the enemy to retire with shame and confusion to Buda. The Emperor to incourage the Nobility to the like vertue, honored REDER and his Lieutenant, with the order of Knighthood. On the other side, Snatzenbourg, and Palfi attempted Buda: they took the suburbes, with the fort of Potentiana vpon the Dannow; after which they battered the town, and made such a breach, as the inhabitants, women and children, pressed the Basha to enter into composition. But the Bashaes of Caramania, Natolia, and Bosna comming to relieue them, and the continuall raine hauing made their powder vnprofitable, they were content to retire their troupes in safety, hauing slaine 15000 Turks at Buda.

Buda attempted by the Christians in vaine.

1599.

SIGISMVND BATTORI Prince of Transiluania, in the beginning of March resigned all his countries, vnto Cardinall ANDREVV BATTORI, shewing a strange example of humane inconstancie: for a little before hauing sent an Embassador to CESAR, desiring him to free his subiects from their oath which they had taken, and to restore Varadine with the countrey adiacent; the Emperor refusing this, he then sent vnto him the Bishop of Alba Iulia, to renew the former contract, requiring to haue the iurisdiction of Drebnits in Morauia, added to his two Duchies in Silesia, with a yeerly pension of 50000 crowns, out of the Imperiall chamber: That the estates of Transiluania should be pardoned, for their breach of faith to the Emperour, and haue their liberties and priuiledges confirmed. But during the absence of his Embassador, he makes transaction with Cardinall ANDREVV, and causeth his subiects to swear obedience vnto him. This new Prince sent presently to GEORGE BASTA the Emperors Lieutenant in those parts, promising to ratifie whatsoeuer SIGISMVND's Embassador should conclude with the Emperour: That he would not attempt any thing, but what should be for the good of of the Christian Common-wealth, hoping that BASTA would take his actions in good part, and attempt nothing in hostile manner against him.

The proceedings of Cardinall Battori.

The Emperour was much distempered with these newes, sending presently to stay SIGISMVND's Ambassadors who were but newly departed from Prague, and to put them in custodie. The Ambassadors being comn to Terna, hearing what had past in Transiluania, resolued willingly to stay there and attend the Emperors pleasure. Cardinall BATTORI wrote Letters vnto the Emperour, by the which he promised to doe all good offices that might tend to his Maesties seruice, and the Peace of Christendome. The Emperor delaying to make an answere, commanded BASTA to draw what forces he could together. The Cardinall being in some doubt sent to BASTA, letting him vnderstand that he had neede of a Patron, by whose helpe he might defend his Countries, and therefore he desired that the Emperour would explaine himselfe, whether he would hold him as a friend and client, or as an Enemy: That there was a Turkish Ambassador then with him, who willingly offered him aide from his Emperour, & required but 10000 duckets for his yeerly tribute; yet he had rather ioyne his forces with other Christians, and doe good and faithfull seruice to the Emperour, then be guilty of betraying of Religion, and his countries liberty, to a cruell enemy; to which BASTA made no answere, but referred him vnto the Emperor.

The Tartarians propound a peace to the Emperor.

The Turke, seeing that the great warres he had against the Persians, did exhaust his treasure, and that the Christians daily surprised places, and slew his men; he was desirous to haue a peace with the weaker, that he might be able to encounter the stronger: He sent thirteene Tartarians to Vienna, to make an ouerture of peace; but this was to craue almes (as they say) by command: For, the Soldiers did not forbeare to spoyle the Countrey; and the Imperialists desired to haue all violences and acts of hostilitie to cease: so as they carried no satisfaction to the Turke; but were sent away without any answere. This contempt thrust the Tartarians into rage, breathing nothing but rage and furie, putting all, as they past, to fire and sword. A great conuoy with victuals, money, cloath of gold and siluer, and other sundry moueables, was comming forwards to Buda, for the furnishing of the new Basha and garrison.

A great booty taken from the Turkes.

ORSIPETER, Lieutenant to the Gouernor of Strigonium, set vpon them vnawares, and defeated them that guarded this conuoy; making himselfe rich, both in honor and spoile. This victory begot a second: The Fort of Walles was fallen; he marched thither, defeated the garrison and the Gouernor, freed them of Bischiac, and carried a great number of sheepe vnto his Garrison. SVVARTZENBOVRG, Generall of the Christians Army, is commended, for that he had alwaies his spirits banded to some new Stratagem. He had once failed to surprise Buda, and yet he would attempt it so often as he might aduance the Emperours affaires, by an honorable victory, ouer that strong Towne. He drew together twelue thousand men, and lodged them closely in a valley, that he might surprise it at the opening of the gate: But the enterprise being discouered, the suburbs smarted for the Towne; the enemy hauing no will to salie forth. And the next day he defeated a conuoy, which carried pay for the Garrison of Agria, slew 400 Turks, and toke the Bege, who was Gouernour of Hatuan. These victories made SVVARTZENBOVRG to attempt Buda the third time; but he failed to take the Town, though not the Basha; who, walking abroad, was surprised, and sent for a trophey to the Emperor, with certaine Ensignes, which the Barrons of Palfi and Madafi, had taken from the Tartarians.

The Turke desirous of a Peace.

The Turke was so oppresst, on the one side by the Christians, and on the other by the Persians, as he would willingly haue embraced a peace; but he would make it with such aduantage, as he seemed to want neither force nor meanes to encounter both Enemies. The Turke demanded to haue Iauerin, Fillec and Serchein, restored; and he offered nothing but Agria: wherupon the assembly brake off, without any effect; and presently after PALFI defeated seuen hundred Turkes; and the Hussars (which be Hungarian Knights) cut in peeces 3000 Tartarians neere to Fillec.

Cardinall Batori makes a league with the Turke, and the successe.

In the meane time Cardinall BATTORI, hauing gotten the gouernement of Transiluania, thrust on with blinde ambition, and the desire of command, treated with the Turke, and promised a certaine annuall tribute, so as he might be maintained in the possession of what he had vsurped. Doubtlesse the nature of man is blindely furious, and mad, being once transported with passion. The Pope foresaw the Cardinals ruine; and, by his Nuntio, laboured to retire him from temporall Armes to his profession: God beheld his enterprise, full of iniustice and treachery, and stirred vp a scourge to punish him. MICHAEL Vauoide, or Lord of Valachia, chia, who wholly depended vpon the Emperor, hauing leuied an Army of 30000 men entred into Transiluania and took Cronstar to stop the Polonians passage, who he thought would assist the Cardinall.

After which he came with his Army neere vnto the Cardinalls Camp, giuing him to vnderstand, that he came not to shedde Christian bloud, but would willingly spare it: but whereas he had refused to take an oath to the Emperor and to restore that which he had vsurped, and being forced by no necessitie, had craued aid from the Turk; for this cause if he did not presently yield himselfe into the Emperors power, he would prosecute him by Armes. The Cardinall refusing to performe this, the Vaiuode led his Army against him, and the Cardinal did the like; in the beginning the fight was furious, but the victory inclined to the Vaiuode, who sent to pursue the Cardinal being fled, and to bring him back: the Valachians ouertook the Cardinall in the mountaines, where they slew him and carried his head to the Vaiuode. Which being done he brought all Transiluania subiect vnto the Emperor, whose Embassadour was receiued by them, vpon condition to maintaine them in their rights & priuiledges. Al Transiluania set vp the victors ensignes, who fortifying himselfe in the strongest townes, ministred occasion to call the sincerity of his designes in question: which opinion was fortified when they saw the Turke seeke his friendship, by an Embassie which hee sent vnto him; but hee weakned that opinion by retayning the Embassadour, which the Turkish Emperour had sent vnto him, whether it were that he doubted some fraude, or that he ment by that policie to couer the malice of his heart: but he gaue some satisfaction, by putting to death certaine spies of the Bashas SERDER and deliuering the whole estate of Transiluania into the Emperors hands.

Cardinall Battori defeated and slaine.

The turkes send Embassadors to treat of a peace.

In October SERDER Basha made a great shew to affect peace, sending Embassadours to the Arch-duke MATHIAS: whereupon a place of treaty was appointed, in an Iland betwixt Strigonia and Visigrade, and Commissioners were sent on either side. The Turks demanded restitution of all those places which had beene taken by the Christians, the last fiue yeares, especially Strigonia. The Christians yeelded to all except Strigonia, which the Turks did vrge much, offring Agria in exchange. In the end, the Emperours Commissioners finding that the Turks meant nothing but fraude, they brake off the assembly and retired: yet soone after, SERDER Basha sought to renew the treaty againe, but it took no effect.

1600. The treachery of Michael the Vaiuode.

MICHAEL the Vaiuode of Valachia, hauing yeelded the estate of Transiluania vnto the Emperour, after the defeate of Cardinall BATTORI: The Turke knowing him to be a man of seruice, sought his friendship. And although that he indeuored to free himself from all shew of suspicion: yet GEORGE BASTA Lieutenant for the Emperor in Transiluania, had discouered certaine secret intelligences which he had with the Turke, whereof he gaue him notice. Soone after he gaue ouer his secret practices, & receiued the Turks Embassadors & his masters presents publikely: and caused them to be carried before them, entring into Cronstar with the Embassador. And to the end they should giue no sinister impression of his fidelity to the Emperour; he told his ministers, that his desire was to haue that action performed, in view of the whole towne; to the end they should not thinke, he would do any thing in secret to the preiudice of Christendome. And withall he intreated them to moue the Emperour, to reuoke BASTA's Commission, for the priuate quarrels that were betwixt them, and to substitute some other of a more tractable disposition.

His demands of the empire.

The Emperour being aduertised, that MICHAEL would escape from him if hee did not stay him by some meanes, he sent him thirty thousand crownes in gift: but he thinking it too smal a recompence for his seruices, told the Emperors agents that Transiluania did belong vnto him by hereditarie right; wherefore he demanded, that he might enioy it as his owne; and for satisfaction of his seruices, he should giue him Varadin, Hust, Nagban, and the confines of Hungary, with other demands which were so arrogant, and vnciuile, as they did purchase him deadly hatred and were the cause of his ruine. After which he ouerthrew SIGISMVND BATTORI who sought to enter into Transiluania againe, with IEREMI the Vaiuode of Moldauia; but being annoyed by the Chancellor of Poland in Valachia, he craued aide from the Lieutenant of the Imperiall Army in high Hungary, and promised the Emperour by his Letters, to serue him faithfully in this occurrent, so as he would but call BASTA out of Transiluania. The Emperor would not that his vassaile should capitulate with him. It was a president of bad consequence; and therefore he commanded him to obey BASTA. Afterwards hee grew hatefull to all the Polonians, BASTA pursued him, and surprised him being incamped at Visbourg with 18000 men, where he slew foure thousand, and chased him into the Mountaines, where he was reduced ced to that extremity, as he was forced to goe an humble suppliant to the Emperor, and to offer his wife and children for hostages.

Puppa betrayed by the garrison.

The Garrison of Puppa, consisting for the most part of Walloons and French, fell into a mutinie for their pay, hauing also some scarcity of victuals; they made one called La MOTT their Captaine, forcing their companions to signe their reuolt; they seized vpon MAROT their gouernor, and of the other Captaines: They set all the Turkes at liberty (who by the counsell of these Traitors, carried euery man his hoste prisoner to Alba Regalis, or to Vesperine) and withall, they promised to deliuer them SVVARTZENBOVRG, lieutenant Generall of the Imperiall Army, or to giue them meanes to take him at Zolnock, when he should come with their pay. MAROT the Gouernor found meanes to aduertise him hereof, and he went thither presently with nine thousand men; where, at his first comming, he tooke one of their Captaines, whom he caused to be fleyed aliue, and his head to be set vpon a Pike, to terrifie the rest; hee took from them a Basha, whereby they did hope to be relieued by the Turke; who could not assist them either with men or prouision: hunger prest them, and they grew desperate, hauing no hope of any humane aide; whereupon they salied out by night, and made a great slaughter in one of the Quarters; SVVARTZENBOVRG runnes thither to repaire this disorder, but he was ouerthrowne with a shot and slaine: his death caused great heauinesse in the Imperiall Army, and all Christendome had cause to lament his losse. These Wretches made a second salie, saying that before they would yeeld, they would feede vpon their Gouernour MAROT, and their other prisoners.

MELCHIOR REDER, who had wonne much honor in the defence of Varradine, had the charge of the Army, and pressed the siege, and the Traitors indured the last extremity. They had a posterne gate behinde, in which they did put all the hope of their safety, seeking to make dry a poole, which did inuiron the Towne of the one side; but for that the mudde would not easily carry them, they could not couer it so secretly, with hardles, strawe, reede, and such other materials, but REDER was aduertised. Hereupon he sent NADASTI the Earle of Thurne and Colonits: who ouertaking them neere vnto a Wood, brought some of them back prisoners, and slew La MOTT their Captaine, with some hundred others which would not yield; forcing the rest to keepe themselues within the Fort. The Gouernour MAROTT with certaine others, who had freed themselues from their bondes, came speedily vnto the Campe.

The cruell punishments of the Traitors to Puppa.

REDER then enters the town, kils some of the remainder, and reserues the rest for their deserued punishments, whom he sent into diuers garisons: and that by the horror of their example they might abhorre the like treacherie, some were impaled, others broken vpon the wheele, or rosted at a slowe fire, basted with Larde; others had their bowels pulled out of their bellies, and burnt before their eyes, their thighs, shoulders, and other parts being pinched with hotte pincers: Some had their hearts pulled out of their bodies aliue, others their throates and mouths stuft ful of Sulphur and Powder and then fired, and some were buried in the ground vp to the neck, and their heads bruised with bullets. And thus were those traitors cruelly tormented by order of martiall law.

Babottes yeelded basely to the Turkes.

Puppa, a fort of importance, being then preserued, Babottes could not so escape: the town was strong, and fortified with fiue hundred men, hauing store of all sorts of necessary prouision. But the Garrison (terrified by the descent of twelue thousand Ianitzaries, sent from Constantinople) yeelded it vpon the first attempt; and by their basenesse, made the losse of Canisa easy, the which followed to the preiudice of all Christendome. It was an ill president for the Gouernor of that place, being the strongest fort the Christians had in Stiria: an example the which, it may be, he would not so easily haue imitated, if the Gouernor of Babottes had receiued that punishment which martiall law inflicts vpon those that yeeld vp a place of importance, without extreame necessity; but the Christian Army, had neede of a commander of greater authority, who by his presence might containe both soldiers and Captaines in their duties.

The Duke of Mercœur, would not accept the charge of Lieutenant generall of the Armie of Hungary, but with the kings good liking: who hauing signified his pleasure, the Duke came into Hungary, and was saluted Lieutenant generall of the Army in Iauerin; an Army weake in forces, but strong in courage and resolution, to fight for the defence of Religion. He marched with fifteene thousand men, of diuers Nations, to relieue them, being resolued either to lodge in Canisa, or to die in the field. The first of October, he gaue a signe vnto the besieged of his comming, and sought to keep from his enemy the knowledge of his small Army; Canisa was beſieged by 50000 men vnder the command of the Vetzier Baſha. The Duke reſolues to hazard a battaile to relieue the Towne. The Vetzier, vnderſtanding, by his ſpies, the weakneſſe of the Dukes Army, aduiſed him, not to oppoſe his ſmall troups, againſt ſo great forces. The Duke made anſwere: That, he did not feare to aſſaile a greater number of Infidels, with few er Chriſtians; and, that God fauoured the iuſtice of his cauſe.

was

The Duke of Mercœur repels the Turks.

The Duke aduanced towards Caniſa, and the Vetzier attended him in his paſſage with a battalion of twenty thouſand men, which came to charge him with their accuſtomed cries. The Dukes Artillery amazed their furious clamours, ſtaid their heat, diminiſhed their numbers, and beat them backe towards their Trenches; the Duke, remaining maſter of the fielde, of two Cannons, and of many ſlaine and hurt. The next day hee ſeekes to draw them out of their Campe, and takes foureteene fielde pieces: and on the other ſide, the Turkes intercepted the Chriſtians victuals, comming unto them. The Vetzier, ſeeing that force could not prevaile, ſought to vanquiſh them by neceſſity. The Army being in great want, they cried out to retire: The Generall preached patience, and would not conſent unto a retreat, untill the Colonels and Captaines had confirmed their opinions under their hands. In their retreat there fell a ſodaine amazement among them, which put the army in diſorder: whereupon the Turkes arrived, and put many Germanes to the ſword. The Duke rallied his men together, and incouraged them rather to dye honourably, then by flight to fall into miſerable ſervitude. Thus, incouraged by the preſence of the General, they returned to the charge, repulſed the enemy, and made the retreat eaſie. The beſieged in Caniſa diſpaired of all ſuccours, and PARADIS the Governour was eaſily perſwaded by them to yeeld. Thus Caniſa, one of the chiefe bulwarks of Chriſtendome, was made ſubject to the tyranny of this barbarous enemy. PARADIS, preſenting himſelfe to the Duke of Mercœur, he ſent him to the Duke MATHIAS, who was Governour of the Countrey: And having no ſufficient reaſon to excuſe his cowardiſe, he was by the Emperors commandment condemned to have his right hand cut off, which had ſigned the rendition; and to loſe his head.

Caniſa taken by the Turks.

The Perſian intreats the Chriſtian Princes to war againſt the Turks.

This yeare the King of Perſia ſent his Embaſſadours to ſummon the Emperor, the Pope, the King of Spaine, and other Chriſtian Princes, to invade the Turkes eſtate with their joynt forces, promiſing to aſſaile him with 15000 horſe, and 60000 foote; and to grant free liberty of Religion and trafficke to their ſubjects in his kingdomes, ſo as they would not treat any peace with the Turke without comprehending him.

The Pope and Princes did thanke the Sophy for his affection to the good of Chriſtendome; exhorting him to be a meanes, that the great Duke of Muſcovie might give his conſent and aſſiſtance to this general enterprize. MAHOMET, advertiſed hereof, ſent his Phyſitian, a Chriſtian Renegado, into France, to intreat the King, to mediate a truce for him with the Chriſtian Emperor; and to call the Duke of Mercœur backe into France: for (ſaid hee) the Turkes do greatly apprehend one of their prophecies, which ſaith, that, The Sword of the French ſhall chaſe them out of Europe.

The Tranſilvanians calling an aſſembly at Clauſenbourge, SIGISMVND BATTORI was there proclaimed their lawfull Prince, by ſuch as favoured his party, and all men commanded to obey him, and the Imperialiſts were put in ſafe cuſtodie. They ſent into Moldavia, to intreat SIGISMVND to come and take poſſeſſion of his inheritance; and in the meane time they made ISCHIACK, an ambitious and cruell man, his Lievtenant Generall; who, in the beginning committed the wife and ſonne of MICHAELL the Vaivode of Valachia to priſon. BASTA, having no power to hinder this reſolution, nor the effects, demaunded leave of the Eſtates to retire; exhorting the Tranſilvanians to perſiſt in the fidelity which they did owe unto the Emperor. They, foreſeeing that this act would be diſpleaſing vnto him, ſent STEPHEN CARKESY vnto the Emperour; proteſting that they were very ſory for theſe alterations: that hauing no Prince vnder whom they might be more aſſured, they had again opened their Arms to SIGISMVND BATTORI: That they would alway yeeld that obedience and fidelity which they did owe vnto his Imperiall maieſty, and would not conclude any peace with the Turke, but vpon ſuch conditions as ſhould not be any way diſpleaſing vnto him.

Battori returns into Tranſilvania.

BATTORI comes into Tranſiluania: from whence by his Letters to BASTA, he laments the miſeries into which he had vndeſeruedly beene reduced. He craues pardon for that which had beene done in his abſence, to the preiudice of his maieſties ſeruice, and that he might be ſuffered to ſend his excuſes by an Embaſſador to the Emperour. BASTA anſwered him, that all depended vpon the Emperors pleaſure, whoſe commandement he attended. The Vaivode MICHAEL tooke the captiuity of his wife and ſonne impatiently. Hee pretended to be able to doe the Emperour great ſeruice, if he would aſſiſt him with ſome forces, hoping ſoone to reduce the whole Prouince to obedience. This Valachian had his deſignes apart, fortifying himſelfe vpon diuers occurrents, both with the Turke and Emperor: But to reiect the ſeruice of this Prince, were to thruſt him into furie; and make him either ſeeke vnto the Turke, or reconcile himſelfe with SIGISMVND, and ſo to croſſe the Emperours affaires with their joynt forces. The Emperour therefore furniſht him with men and money, to ioyne with BASTA, who had a watchfull eye ouer his actions, leſt he ſhould attempt ſomething to his maſters preiudice. They had drawne together twenty thouſand men, and camped vpon a mountaine, attending ſome horſe-men from Sileſia. SIGISMVND had eighteene thouſand horſe, and twenty two thouſand foote, with the which he reſolued to charge them before their ſupplies came; whereupon, both Armies ioyned battaile; where, after a bloody fight, BATTORI was ouerthrowne, with the loſſe of tenne thouſand men, forty peeces of great Ordinance, one hundred and tenne Enſignes, and all his baggage. After this, Clauſenbourg was taken, paying three moneths entertainement for the whole Army, and, likewiſe, receiuing a good Garriſon.

Battori def. ated by the Vaivode and Baſha.

The Valachian, in this battaile, performed the part of a faithfull ſeruant; but hee thought himſelfe rather borne to command, then to obey; and thruſt on by his naturall ambition, he continued, ſecretly, his fraudulent intelligences with the Turkes and Tartarians. BASTA informed the Emperour of all his actions, and namely of his rigour againſt the inhabitants of the champaigne Countrey, vnder colour to reuenge their diſloyalty to the Emperour. BASTA perſwaded him, in the Emperours name, not to blemiſh his generous and well deſeruing acts, with the infamous name of cruelty. To whom he anſwered, proudly; That he would no more obey his commandements, or the Emperours; And that he meant to enioy Tranſiluania, which he had gotten by his ſword and valour; doing many acts of abſolute power. Soone after, BASTA diſcouered by his owne Letters, that he treated with the Baſha of Themeſuar, and fought the friendſhippe of BATTORI, to deliuer the Imperiall Army into the Enemies hands. Hereupon the Councell ſent for him, meaning to ſend him vnto the Emperour; but refuſing to come, Colonell PETZ was commanded to inueſt his Quarter, with his regiment, and ſome other troups, who comming into the Valachians Tent, and telling him that he arreſted him as the Emperours priſoner, hee drew out his Sword, whereupon they preſently ſlew him, and cut off his Head.

The Vaivode Michael ſlaine.

They found in his Tent, Letters which did manifeſtly diſcouer his treacherous deſignes: the which being imparted to the Valachians (who began to mutine vpon his death) they confeſt that he had been iuſtly ſlaine. Moſt of them tooke a new oath to the Emperour, and inrolled themſelues vnder BASTA's Enſignes. BATTORI was againe defeated before Clauſenbourg, which he thought to ſurpriſe; and being purſued by BASTA, he fled, like a Vagabond, into the Mountaines and Deſerts.

The Duke of Mercœur having drawne together an Army of 18000 men, with Cannon and munition of warre, neceſſarie for a ſiege, gaue it out that he would attempt Buda, yet holding his enterpriſe ſo ſecret as the troups knew not where their Generall would imploy them: vntil that after the taking of ſome Caſtles by compoſition, they found themſelues in the ſuburbes of Alba Regalis, a ſmall towne, but of great importance, inuironed with a deepe mariſh, which made the approaches difficult. Hauing obſerued the ſituation, hee caſt vp a trench towards Buda, from whence they might be relieued; reſoluing firſt to aſſault the baſe towne and the ſuburbes: where hauing planted his petardes and appointed a ſcalado at the ſame inſtant, the ſouldiers entred with little loſſe, forcing the Turkes to retire into their chief Fort. Then hee made his approaches: and hauing planted his batterie, within ſix daies he made two ſmall breaches in the walles, commanding ROCHEVORME Marſhall of the Camp, with 1000 good ſouldiers to ſeeke a paſſage through the mariſh, to one of the breaches, euery one carying a fagot in his hand, meaning at the ſame inſtant to giue an aſſault to the other breach; ROCHEVORME was diſcouraged by the Countrey people, who aſſured him that there was no paſſage that way: but giuing no credit to their words, he ſent to diſcouer it, and they brought him word that the paſſage was difficult, but not impoſſible: whereupon at night they entred thoſe fennes which they found farre deeper then was related, almoſt with the hazard of their liues; but they vanquiſhed all difficulties, and came vnto the breach: which they entred, the Turks being buſie to defend the other; whereupon the towne was taken and moſt of them put to the ſword, the Alba Regalis beſieged by Duke Mercœur.

Castle, and a great part of the towne was blowne vp by certaine traines which the Turkes had layed. The which did so incense the victors, as they would not receive any to ransome, except the Basha, and some hundred souldiers, which were retired into a Fort; who, making shew to yeeld, had their liues granted them.

Alba Regalis inuested againe by the Persian.

The plague did much afflict the Dukes Army, who hadde retired two miles off, aswell to refresh it, as to obserue the countenance of the great VETZIER, who resolued in the absence of the christian generall to attempt to reduce that place vnder his obedience, before the ruines were repaired and the victuals supplied. The Duke aduertised that the Basha turned head towards Alba Regalis, he approached also with his troupes: and taking with him some 120 French horse, he put himselfe into the towne to assure them by his presence; where hee was presently inuested by 8000 horse, the whole Army (being 60000 men) following after. The Duke hauing giuing order for the most vrgent affaires of the towne, returned by night vnto his Army: the which did much reuiue their daunted spirits; where they performed braue exploites against the enemy, by their daily incounters and skirmishes, in which they took 9 Cannons and slew MEHEMET TICAIA a Basha, the Basha of Buda, 6 Saniacs, one CADIZ and many other men of note in the Army; whose heads were giuen in exchange, for many Christian prisoners. The rest of the Turkish Army being dispersed here and there, the Duke had liberty to assure his garrisons, and to returne to Viena with much honour.

Canisa besieged by the Arch-duke Ferdinand in vaine.

In the meane time the Arch-duke FERDINAND went to recouer Canisa (which had bene taken the yere before by the Turk) with an Army of 4500 horse, and 23000 foot: of which the Pope and Princes of Italy had sent 12000, vnder the commande of FRANCIS ALDOBRANDINE his Nephew, and the Duke of Mantua was Lieutenant Generall to the Archduke. Hauing planted their Cannon, they made a resonable breach, and summoned the besieged, with offer of all fauour, if they yeelded; but if they attended the extremity, they must expect no better vsage then they of Alba Regalis. Their example did nothing terrifie the Walloones, and Christians Renegades, which commanded in the place: they found easily by their weake attempts to force them, that either there was some trouble & badde intelligence in the Army, or want of that which was needfull to giue an assault; letting them vnderstand that they had no more feare then if their walles were freed. There was great confusion among the Italians: which troubled the whole Camp. The bridge, which they had made to passe couered ouer the ditch, was too weak and short. They were annoyed with raine, snow, and tempest; and many other difficulties were in their Camp, so as many souldiers died without helpe, and there was no apparance to stay any longer, without a totall ruine of the Army. Whereupon the Archduke FERDINAND resolued to retire, in the which he wonne lesse honour then in the siege; for wanting al things necessarie to draw away their Cannons they were forced to breake them, to burne their tents, and to abandon their sicke men, to the spoile of their enemies.

The Duke of Mercoeur hauing taken Alba Regalis the yeere before, it was now againe made subiect to the Turkish tyranny, whereas the garrison was all put to the sword; the gouernour laying the fault vpon the negligence of the Souldiers. The spoile was very great; in which they found all the old Ordinance, with twelue peeces new cast, an infinite number of Swords, forty tunne of powder, 200 tunne of meale, eightie of Bisket, with ten thousand Florens to pay the Garrison.

After the death of the Duke of Mercoeur, RVSOVRMBE was Generall of the Christian Army, preparing to relieue Alba Regalis, if he had not been aduertised of the losse. And hearing that the Turkes Army was dispersed (some gone against the Scribiano, and others into Transiluania, against BASTA) he marched directly to Buda, the chiefe towne in Hungary, with fiue thousand horse, and twenty thousand foote; hauing in his company the Duke of Neuers, a valiant Noble-man of France. At their first approach they attempted the base Towne, by land and water, and tooke it by night. Buda was diuided from Pesta, by the Riuer of Dannow, hauing a bridge whereby they might assist one another. The Christians resolued to cut off this bridge, the which they effected; and whilest the Turkes were busie in the defence of the Riuer, they took Pesta by Scalado, and put all they encountred to the Sword: the rest being retired into some places of strength, compounded for their Liues, Wiues and Children; and promised to cause them of Buda to doe the like; but there were more men, and they had greater courage.

Pesta taken by the christians.

The Turkes raise the siege of Buda.

The Turkish Army hearing hereof, posted presently back to saue Buda, leauing the designes of Transiluania. RVSOVRMB being thus surprised, purtes men into Pesta, and prepares for his retraite, of Transiluania. RVSVRMB being thus surprised, puts more men into Pesta & prepares for his retraite, hauing first battered the towne, and made a small breach, at which there were 2500 Christians slaine and wounded; and the Duke of Neuers performing all parts of a valiant Noble-man was shot in the left side, but it was not mortall. After which, the Army retired in safetie.

The Noblemen of Transiluania fauoured SIGISMVND BATTORI their naturall Lord: they seised vpon Bistrick and vowed to defend it against all assailants. BASTA went speedily to besiege it, battered their walles, and gaue an assault, but his men were repulsed with losse. To reuiue their courages he promised them the spoile of the towne. The inhabitants grew amazed: and apprehending the insolencies of conquerors, they declared that they would not indure the extremity of warre, for the pleasure of some ill affected to the Emperors seruice: they excused themselues to the General, that they had not consented to this rebellion, but by force, & demanded peace: the which he graunted, but with such conditions, as the Magistrates would not accept. Whereupon BASTA renewes his batterie, and prepares for a new assault; the souldiers growing resolute with the hope of a rich spoile.

The Transilanians oppose themselues against the Emperour.

BATTORI giues his word by an Embassadour, that hee would not make war against the Emperour, and that the citizens of Bistrick should submit themselues vpon reasonable conditions: whereupon he receiued the inhabitants, paying 30000 dallers for reparation, promising that all that would depart should be conducted to a place of safety with their goods, wiues and children. Vpon this assurance 300 men went out of the towne with 100 waggons; the which were spoiled by some of the Army. BASTA detesting this treachery made diligent search for the Authors, restored what could be found, and punished the chiefe with death.

BATTORI seeing his enterprises succeede ill, resolued to make his peace with the Emperor: and during this treaty (all things seeming to be quiet) MOYSES Duke of Zeccleria took Armes; and foreseeing that BASTA would besiege him in Visbourg, he layed an ambush for him. After some messages past on both sides, BASTA went and ioyned battaile with him, in the which he slew 3000 of his men and forced MOYSES to fly to the mountaines. BATTORI seeing this faction ouerthrowne, came speedily to BASTA, to purge himselfe of the reuolt of MOYSES: he entred with him into Visbourg, and submitted himselfe wholly into the Emperors power, and so Transiluania was for that time pacified.

Basta ouerthrowes Moises duke of Zeccleria.

This yeere the Emperor being daily annoyed with the incursions of Turkes and Tartarians into his Countries, he called a Diet at Ratisbone: whither he sent the Arch-duke MATHIAS his brother, with instructions not onely to acquaint the Princes and estates of the Empire, with the present necessities of the Turkish warres, and the daily incursions of the Tartarians; but also to require such aide as the turbulent estate of things did presently require: who after much consultation, granted a good supply of horse and foote.

COLLONITS a man of great seruice, and who had carried himselfe valiantly in the Hungarian warres, did this summer take two strong forts, and had put to rout 2000 Turkes neere to Comorrha, and sent thirteene ensignes to the Emperour: he beate the garrison of Canisa, and resolued to attempt the towne. There was a French-man in his Army a subtile fellow and daring any thing, who counterfeiting himselfe a Renegado, fled into Canisa and desired to be entertained by the Turkes; the which hauing easily obtained, hee laied traines of pouder in diuerse fit places, all which should take fire at one instant, so as when the Turkes were busie to quench it, COLLONITS might assault the Castle. The French-man performed what he had vndertaken, and the fire brake out with such violence as it consumed all the houses vpon the South and West parts, yea the carriages of their Ordinance: but the Turks neglected the fire & obserued the enemy; so as COLLONITS being out of hope to take the Castle, left it wasted vnto the Turks. By the like Stratagem, the Turks soon after fought to take Strigonium.

The enterprise of Collonits.

The estate of Transiluania was much troubled by the Zeeclerian; who thinking to reuenge his last affront, crept into fauour with the Turke, who promised to make him his Lieutenant generall, as soone as he should reduce that prouince, vnder the Turkish obedience and religion. With this hope, he had appointed him 150000 men, for the recouerie of Pesta and Strigonium: and nothing staied the progresse, but want of victuals in Turkey. Hauing receiued 10000 Tartarians, with a great number of Transiluanians, he besieged and took Visbourg, perswading all men to ioyne their Armes with his, vpon hopes of great fauour, and commanding the souldiers to abandon BASTA's Camp.

The exploits of Moises the Zeeclerian.

BASTA was weake both of men and money. RADVIEL the new Vaiuode of Valachia, remembring how BASTA had succored him in his necessity against the Tartarians, came speedily dily with 8000 men to requite him: without which succors, he was in danger to haue fallen into the hands of the Infidel. MOYSES. And BASTA armed speedily, to ioyne with the Valachian, that they might make the body of an Army. He attended two thousand Silesian horse: which; MOYSES resoluing to defeate, sent some part of his Army to seize vpon the passages, and to stop the entry into the Countrey. By chance, they encountred with 800 Valachians, led by Colonel MARSE: who, finding his troupes weake, retired, and left his Camp. MOYSES men triumphed very much at this petty victory: and, thinking that MARSE was farre retired, neglected their guards. But MARSE returned presently, and fell vpon them like a whirle-winde, putting many to the Sword: the rest he chased to Themesuar, sending 25 Ensigns to BASTA. MOYSES himself, present at this defeate, was slain; his body being found vpon search by the Valachians, and the Emperor aduertised thereof by BASTA.

Moyses the Sclerian defeated and ouerthrown by Colonel Marse.

ALBERT NASSIVS succeeded him: who, swimming in the Gulfes of Infidelitie, like to MOYSES, drew together 6000 Rebells, and other people of diuers Nations. BASTA sent to assaile him suddenly by his Caualry: who slew most of his men; himselfe escaping with some fewe. The generall Enemy of the Christian name, might haue been expelled Hungary, had the Emperor receiued the contribution money granted at the generall assembly of Ratisbone in March last, to entertaine an Army for six yeere and eight moneths. The Princes of Germany had freely offered their contributions. The collections might haue been made without grieuance or oppression. But as the rich sought to ease themselues, and to lay it vpon the weaker sort: so the effects did not second the hopes which were conceiued. Some did contribute more then was demanded: The Elector of Saxony gaue the Emperor twelue field pieces, with the furniture necessary for a yeer. The Duke of Brunswick sent 1000 horse and 2000 foot. Others assisted this publique cause, with the like bounty. Some also, vnder that pretext, haue extorted from their subiects farre greater summes then their taxe, imploying it to their own vse; to the dishonour of their order, and against the dignity of their ranke.

A great contribution granted at Ratisbone, ill managed.

Buda was much pressed with famine: they had eaten all their horses, and tumultuously carried away all the victuals in the Basha's house: which threatned some dangerous effect, if shortly they were not relieued with sufficient prouision. The great Vetzier brought them victuals: but, COLLONITS with his horse-men by land, and SVLTZ and ALTHEM with their foote-men vpon the Riuer, were alwaies watchfull to intercept it. Victuals were so scant, as if the second conuay had been lost, there had been no hope to haue furnished a third. In the end, the Vetzier put it into the Towne, but not without incounter and great losse of his men. And if SVLTZ, fearing some ambush, had not by force retired his men, who pursued the beginning of a victory, they were likely to haue reaped great benefit of that daies seruice: For these Barbarians carried with them one whole yeers entertainment, due to the Garrison of Buda. The Cham of Tartaria returned much discontented: For, the Vetzier had quarrelled with him, as if by his negligence he had hindred the victualing of Buda, carrying great forces with him, notwithstanding that the Vetzier intreated him to stay in Hungary, wherewith the Turkish Army was much weakened, and disabled to doe any great exploits this yeere. The Vetzier, after the victualing of Buda, sought to expell the Christians out of the Iland of Adonis, making great preparation both by ships and bridge, to transport their men. RVSORMBE incountred them with his troupes: where, after a long fight, they forced them to flie to their ships in confusion. The Christians followed them vnto the Riuer Dannow: the which for many daies after was died with Infidels blood: and they, which ran by troups into their vessels being ouerladen, were drowned. There was slain in this battail a Basha of great authority, the Bege of Belgrade, with many other of note, and 1500 Ianitzaries: but the number of the drowned was far greater. Finally, it was known by a certain turk, who after this conflict followed the Christian party, that of 4000 horse & 6000 foot there were scarce saued 1000; & those returned without Arms. The Vetzier began his retrait towards Belgrade, and gius means to the Christians to assaile Hatua; which hindred the victualing of Pesta. RVSORMBE, vpon his approach, summons the town; threatning them that if they yielded not willingly (but taken by assault) they should suffer the like miseries and indignities, as before time; where the Walloons had committed vnspeakeable inhumanities. The remembrance whereof made a great impression in these miscreants: whereupon, they yielded on condition to depart with their wiues & children, and what goods they could carry. It was a town reasonable strong, well stored of corn, pouder & cattell, with 24 peeces of Ordinance mounted.

Buda prest with famine.

Turks defeated.

Hatua taken by the christians.

MAHOMET the Turkish Emperor hauing receiued many losses and disgraces in Hungary, and troubled with the reuolts of Asia, he resolued to treate a peace with the Christians at what rate rate soeuer: hee gaue charge to the Vetzier, and to ACHMAT and MVRATH Bashaes, to move the Emperors Ministers thereunto. They had often treated, but the issue did shew they proceeded with fraude: to free them from which feare the Bashaes did write vnto the chiefe commanders, That their most mighty Emperour had a will to treate a firme and stable peace for the ease of the poore people and quiet of their estates: the which we in like manner did hartilie desire. The which if you neglect said they, many prouinces will be desolate. Whereupon Commissioners were sent by the Arch-duke MATHIAS, and they met in an Island aboue Pesta and Buda. The Turkes intreated that ALTHEM might go to Buda; where he was receiued with great shewes of ioy: to whome the Basha deliuered great presents for the Emperour, and the Arch-duke MATHIAS, which were very rare and rich, and likewise for himselfe and the other Commissioners. The Basha had reason to presse a peace MAHOMET being dead: and the new successor could not better settle his affaires, then by a peace, which his father had procured before his death. Whereupon the Basha of Buda wrote his Letters to ALTHEM, that ACHMAT succeeded MAHOMET his father, not onely in his estates, but in his intentions, for the settling of a good peace in Hungary; that he desired to vnderstand what had bin concluded, that he might ratifie it; that, if the businesse were not yet finished, they should vse all diligence to bring it to a good end: but yet for that time it took no effect. Yet on the twenty fift of Feb. they returnd to Pesta, with an intent to treat; whereas the Emperors Commissioners feasted them solemnly in Tents without the Town, being 600 in number: but, going to repass the riuer, they attempted to surprise Pesta with the help of the forces of Buda; but they were repulsed with shame and losse, leauing their ladders behinde them as witnesses of their treachery. The Bashaes disavowed the fact, and intreated the Christian Ambassadors to come the next day to Buda: but they were aduertised, that there was no safety for them. And thus the hope of this peace, which all Christendome expected, was lost.

Mahomet demands a peace of the Christians.

Death of Mahomet.

Achmats son desires to continue the treaty of peace.

After this, they went to Arms. ACHMAT promised to go in person to the conquest of Hungary, Valachia, Transiluania, Vienna and Austria. He sends SIGALA against the Persian, and giues the Vetzier the charge of the Hungarian warre. He commands the Beglerbey of Greece to leuie 80 000 men. He sends HASSAN Basha towards Belgrade to prouide victuals for the army. He drawes, from Egypt to Belgrade, an infinite quantity of bisket and powder: and it was conceited, that the Ottomans power was able to vanquish the King of Persia, and to prescribe a lawe to the King of Vienna (as he called him); but hee was deceiued in his accompt: for, the Persian defeated SIGALA, and took 80 Towns, with a great Country in Asia; who continuing the course of his victories, the Turk returns to his ordinary practices, and demandeth a peace of the Emperor: who although he knew there was little to be hoped for from so perfidious a Nation, yet he gaue charge to some in Hungary to hear vpon what conditions they would treat. The Bashaes demanded, that the Emperor should pay yeerly the tribute which had bin formerly paid; that he should send Presents to ACHMAT; that he should keep an Agent in Constaminople; that he should yeeld to him the places taken during this warre of Hungary, with the Countries of Transiluania and Valachia: which done, they would send to intreat the Sultane to restore Canisia. To which the Emperor answered: If they would haue a peace, he would willingly imbrace it, so as they would restore to him Agria and Canisia. I cannot abandon Transiluania, houlding it by a iust and lawfull title: as for Valachia, there might happely some means be propounded, which might be accepted by both parties; so as they spake nothing of any tribute, or of entertaining an ordinary Agent at the great Turks Port.

Achmats great preparation for war.

The Turks seek a peace, and their minde demands.

The Emperors answer was receiued with scorn from the Bashaes. The Vetzier approached with 10000 Ianitzaries, and a great number of Tartarians: they onely sought to diuert the Christians from all enterprises vntill their forces were arriued. IAGENREVTER a German, Gouerner of Pesta, hearing that the Vetzier had charge to recouer that town with other places; growing amazed, he packed vp his baggage, and retired without sight of any enemy, and went to Strigonium; hauing no other excuse for his desertion, but fear and amazement. ALTHEM the Gouerner put him in safe keeping vntill the Emperor had otherwise ordained. They of Hatua with the like basenes abandoned the Town: which made the Turks vndertake the siege of Strigonium; the which was valiantly defended. They endured many assaults with the like valour. The Ianitzaries, seeing there was nothing but blowes and death to be gotten at this siege so obstinately defended, they forced the Vetzier and SERDER Basha with threats to retire.

BELIOGEVSE, Lieutenant to BASTA, had brought the forces of Transilvania for the succours of Strigonium, to his Generall, foreseeing no enemy in the Country. But he had no sooner 1604. turned his back but a new combustion forced him to return: for, BOTSCAY ISTVAN, a Noble-man of that part, had made a great leuie of souldiers, and proclaimed himself Prince of Transiluania, and demanded aid from the Sultan for the conquest of the Country. BELIOYEVSE drawes what forces he can together, and ioyneth with the Earle of Tampieri; whose Troops, being three thousand horse, were of BOTSCAY's faction, and desirous to bee freed from the Imperiall yoke: who, when they came to fight, abandoned the Emperors partie, and went to BOTSCAY; yet the combat was long and furious. The Germans and Silesians performed their duties valiantly: but, wanting powder and shot, they were defeated; where ther were many braue men slain. BOTSCAY sent certain Ensignes to SERDER Basha; who in recompense qualified him with the title that he affected vnder the Turks authority, vpon condition that he should imploy his Arms to reduce the Prouince vnder his obedience, hee furnishing him with men and money.

The Imperialists defeated by Botscay in Transiluania.

LIPPAY, who had been taken in the battell, and wounded, became BOTSCAY his Lieutenant; who, in the beginning of his new authority, made proclamation, that whosoeuer would vndertake the defense of religion, should come and enroule themselues: so as in fewe daies an infinite number both of the Nobility and others came vnto them; all binding themselues by oath, not to carry Arms against the Emperor, nor for the Turk, but for the defense of religion. They seised vpon Cassouia, took an oath of the Citizens, expelled the Imperialists, seised vpon the Churches, draue away the Priests and Clergie, and laid wait to surprise BELIOYEVSE. BASTA, hearing of this combustion, posted thither with 14000 men, and summoned them by a Herald to return to their duties; but it was in vain: so as the enemy growing very strong, and winter approaching, he was forced to retire.

Achmat vexeth the propositions of peace.

ACHMAT, being much croft by the dissensions of his Bashaes in Asia, renewed the treatie of peace; and, to dispose the Christians thereto, hee was content that all prisoners should bee exchanged which had been taken for three yeers space, suffering his subjects to carry all kinde of merchandize to the Christian Towns. SERDER Basha made the ouerture vnto the chief Commanders in Hungary. At the same time, the King of Persia had sent an Ambassage with a small train to the Emperor and Princes of Christendome; protesting, that hee was resolued to aduance that warre with all his power, intreating them not to make any peace with ACHMAT, and offering money for to continue the war, and to send great forces to ouerthrowe their common enemy. ACHMAT grew jealous thereat, and entertained better correspondence with the Princes of Christendome than he had formerly done.

Botscay his demands.

The tumults increasing daily in Transiluania and Hungary, BASTA admonished BOTSCAY by his Letters to lay down Arms, and to draw the seditious multititude, to the Emperors obedience. BOTSCAY made answer, that he thought a peace might be made vpon these conditions: that the whole gouernment of Transiluania should be left to him; that he should be Lieutenant Generall in Hungary; that none but Hungarians should bee there in garrison; that the Walloons and French should be retired out of Hungary; that the Hungarians should bee maintained in their degrees and honours; that the souldiers should be duely paid; that there should be free exercise of the protestant religion; that BELIOYEVSE, and they which had bin the causes of their troubles, should be deliuered into their hands; that the Emperor should come in person to the States at Pounson; and that the Germans should contain themselues within their garrisons, and not go to the Viceroy. BASTA would make no answer to these demands, as being too rash.

The Haiduques (for, so all BOTSCAY's souldiers were called) continuing their enterprises, drew all the people of high Hungary and Transiluania into Arms: and BOTSCAY hauing the whole Country of Transiluania at his deuotion, he called the Estates of Hungary to a generall Assembly the last of April. As for BASTA, being sick; his souldiers, wanting pay, committed greater insolencies in Austria and Hungary, than the Turks: they mutined against their Generall, and offered to force his lodging; and the Haiduques and Turks spoiled and wasted the Countrey as farre as Vienna; so as many which dwelt aboad, were forced to retire themselues into the City.

Neither was Morauia free from these common calamities, the Haiduques entring and putting all to fire and sword, carrying away foure thousand prisoners to sell to the Turks. And in the midst of summer there was a troop of theeues entred into Stiria; who, finding no man to make resistance, spoyled the Countrey, carried away their goods, and forced the poore countrey men, to flie into Gretz. In this present calamitie and danger; the Earles of Serin, Nadasti and and Buda, who had fought so valiantly many yeares against the Turkes, for the Christian common-wealth, seeing themselues now reduced to the extremity of danger, yeelded themselues and their fortunes to the mercy of BOTSCAY: BASTA, hauing recouered his health, drew his Army together, and raised the siege at Oedembourg, a place in the higher Hungary, then went to Campe neere vnto Comorrha. During the siege of Neuheusell, vpon the Frontiers of Austria, and of Oedembourg, Hungary was wonderfully spoiled by the Haiduques, and likewise by the Turkes: Yet the Imperialists tooke heart and courage in many places, and there were many strong Townes and Forts which held for the Emperor in diuers Prouinces.

RADVIL the Vaiuode of Valachia, a partizan to the Emperor, went to field, and seized vpon the chiefe Fort which BOTSCAY had neer vnto Varadine, called Kercie, inuaded his partizans, burnt their houses and committed strange spoiles. BOTSCAY began to grow iealous of his Lieutenant LIPPAI, who was gouernor of Cassouia. Some, that enuied his aduancement, made BOTSCAY beleeue, that he went about to reconcile himselfe vnto the Emperor, and for assurance of his Faith, to yield Cassouia vnto his hands. He takes this aduice, for a presage of what might happen. To free himself from this feare, and to pull so troublesom a thorn out of his foot, he holds it the best course to take off LIPPAI's head, whom he caused to be executed, with 50 other Gentlemen of note, by the great Turk's consent seizing on 100000 Duckets, and seauen chaines of Gold, which LIPPAI had gotten being his Lieutenant.

Lippa Lieutenant to Botscay beheaded.

BASTA did still solicite BOTSCAY to forsake the Infidel; from whom he could expect nothing but false friendshippe, with a dangerous Catastrophe of his bad faith, which had been so often tried. The Arch-duke MATHIAS, sent commissioners vnto him in the Emperors name, to treate of a Peace: and he, to shewe himselfe a Prince that would not make the warre immortall in his owne countrey, referred this treaty to HELIE HASKAY; who, hauing conferred with the Emperors Commissioners, gaue them to vnderstand, that his master BOTSCAY would not refuse a Peace, if those conditions might be granted which had been propounded; demanding moreouer, that in the Senate of Hungary, there should be but one Bishoppe, which should be Chancellor; that no man should be forced in Religion; and that none should be preferred to Bishop-ricks, if they were not borne in Hungary, and Noble; and that al that was past should be pardoned & forgotten. If these things might be performed, he promised to procure a Peace betwixt the Emperor and the Turk, with the best conditions he might.

A parly of a Peace betwixt the Emperor and Botscay.

During this treaty which was somewhat long, ACHMAT sends a Basha to BOTSCAY with a present of eight hundred thousand Florens to maintaine the warres, with ten Horses of great price, and assurance not to faile him of his promise. In the meane time, BOTSCAY sends to the King of Polonia, to craue aide from him in this warre, which he made for the defence of Religion. The King accepted of his offered friendshippe: But, he could not approue his defection from a house to the which he was so neerely allied; yet he would acquaint his Lords with his propositions: who afterwards decreed in Councell, that no man should assist BOTSCAY, vpon paine of death. In the meane time BOTSCAYES seditious Army ioyned with the Turkes, being fifty thousand in their Campe, and besieged Strigonium in the end of August: they battered it with forty peeces of Ordinance continually during a moneths space. Hauing ouerthrowne all their defences, and slaine nine hundred of their best men, with the Earle of Oetinge, then they attempted the Castle: the which they fired in such sort, as the souldiers were scarce able to quench it. Whereupon, they came running to the Earle of Tampiere, importuning him to yeeld it vp: who refusing at the first, he perswaded them to remember their oath, and to continue constant with him in the defence of the towne: but seeing the Turkes presse the siege more violently, and the Souldiers to cast away their Armes, he was forced to compound: And so on the third of October, they yeelded vppe the Towne and Castle, vnto the Turkes.

Strigonium yelded to the Turks.

All the Nobility of Transiluania, Moldauia and Valachia, hauing sworne to BOTSCAY, who had an Army of twenty fiue thousand men, he resolued during the treaty of Peace to take in the other places of Hungary. The Arch-duke MATHIAS had sent one of his chiefe ministers vnto him; who returned with this charge: That the Hungarians required MATHIAS for their King; and that he should keepe his Seate at Possonia or Vienna, and gouerne the affaires of the kingdom in person: and if they could not obtaine this within one moneth, they would chuse themselues a King.

The Hungarians require Mathias for their King.

The Imperiall Army had lien long about Comorrha, vnder the command of Generall BASTA: But, they were not able to giue the Turkes Generall battaile, and to relieue Strigonium.

Winter approaching, the Turkes began to disband, and to retire towards Buda; and the Christians left their lodging neere vnto Comorrha. The 25 of Nouember, 14000 Turks came and charged a Regiment of Reistres, which made their retreite: But, the whole Army turning head, they fled back to the mountaines; but on the third of December, they came early in the morning, and charged the foreward: but seeing the whole Army aduance, they beganne to retire; and being pursued to the passage of a Riuer, there were 1500 slain and drowned. In this charge the Earle of Laual, a yong Nobleman of France, was shot; whereof he died, to the great griefe of the whole Army.

The death of the Earle of Laual.

The Duke of Brunswick besieged the City of Brunswick.

There was an antient quarrell depending betwixt the Duke of Brunswick and the Citie, touching the iurisdiction. The Duke had formerly attempted to take it, by a Stratagem; where he lost many men: and now desirous to haue his reuenge, knowing they stood watchfully vpon their guard for feare of surprise, he would try it by open force; and hauing raised a good Army came to inuest the Towne. The inhabitants grew amazed, and sent Ambassadors to the Duke: but they stood so stifly vpon their priuiledges, as the treaty was in vaine. They complained to the Imperiall Chamber; where they obtained Letters from the Emperour, commanding the Duke to giue ouer the siege, and to retire his Army, vpon paine of proscription: but he continued his siege. The Hanse-townes leuied forces to relieue the besieged. Ambassadors came from the States of lower-Germany: who concluded a Truce for a moneth; promising to doe their best indeauors to conclude this warre. The Emperor did likewise send his Ambassadors for the like effect: where, after some treaty, the Duke retired his Army, vpon certain conditions.

Iauerin attempted in vaine by the Turke.

This yeere in May, a Tower in the Castle of Buda was set on fire: the which, being full of powder, flew into the ayre, and slue and hurt about 800 persons in the ruines. In the end of the last yeere the Turkes beganne to treate of a Peace with the Imperialls: how pleasing it was vnto them, the Garrison of Iauerin did finde vpon the eighteenth of March. There was a day appointed at the Turkes desire, where both parties might meete to aduance the businesse: for which cause, there came not aboue fifty Turkes to the Gate, desiring to be let in. The Garrison, doubting no fraude, prepared to open the Gates; when as suddenly a Centinell espied three thousand Souldiers couered with a thick cloude: whereupon, he cried To armes, discouering the treachery of the enemies; who were forced to retire by the great Ordinance.

Toccai taken by the Haiduques.

Epper, a Towne holding for the Emperour, was so oppressed by the seditious Haiduques, as no victuals could enter into it; hoping that being prest by famine, and the want of all other necessaries, the Citizens would yeeld. By the same meanes they had taken Toccai not long before; whereas the famine was so great, as they not only boyled their bootes and shooes to make foode of, but the Garrison Souldiers had also slaine two children; and some of them had cast Lottes for the killing of themselues to make meate, vntill that extreame necessity forced them to yeeld.

On the fifteenth of Iune, the Turkish Garrison of Alba Regalis, ioyning with some other Troupes, made an incursion as farre as Mount Saint MARTIN: Where they defeated and tooke the Gouernor, and carried away many prisoners of all sexes and ages. The Gouernour of Breslay went presently to horse with his troupes; and pursued them with such speede, as hauing ouertaken them, hee fought with them, and slewe one thousand fiue hundred vpon the place: He carried away three thousand prisoners, and freed six thousand Christians from these Infidels.

Holi Haskies Letter to Vienna.

HASKIE (who had beene much imployed for the treaty of peace with BOTSCAY) wrote letters from Cassouia to Vienna, giuing them to vnderstand, that BOTSCAY could performe nothing touching the peace, without the consent of the States; who had often tould him, that They would rather seeke protection from the Turkes, then be subject to the seruitude of strange Governours: Yet hee would endeavour at the next assembly, to draw the States vnto him; so, as what had beene concluded at Vienna might not bee retracted: many fearing, that, what had beene promised for matter of Religion, would not bee obserued: and therfore they would not lay downe Armes, nor renounce the Turkes protection, vntill they had good assurance for the libertie of Religion, and their priuiledges. They would haue no strange Governour, with whom they could not confer; nor suffer Clergy men to give their voyces in matters of policy: wherefore hee thought it necessary, the Emperor should gratifie the Hungarians in this point; and leaving Transilvania to BOTSCAY, appoint such a Governour in Hungary as the States should require. That the conclusion of a peace with the Turkes, depended wholly upon a peace with

BOTSCAY

BOTSCAY, and the Hungarians; whereof there was no hope, vnlesse that BOTSCAY and the Estates of Hungary did finish the treaty.

The grand Seignior, being much troubled this yeare with the sedition in Asia, and the Persian warres; aduertised also of the treaties of peace betwixt the Emperor and BOTSCAY, hee sent his great Vetzier into Hungary, with charge to conclude a peace with the Emperor and the house of Austria. Being come to Buda, BOTSCAY sent Embassadors vnto him, to inform him fully of the propositions made for the peace of Hungary, betwixt the Emperors Deputies & his: And for that hee would not infringe the promise which hee had made to ACHMAT the grand Seignior, not to conclude any peace with the Emperor RODVLPH without his priuitie and consent, which hee now summoned him to imbrace, seeing that matters might be reconciled: hee intreated the Vetzier, not to alter the affaires by any new siege; and to containe his Turks within their campe and garrisons. The Vetzier, who came to no other end, was glad to see it so well aduanced: whereupon it was concluded, that BOTSCAY should send Embassadors to Vienna, to conclude this peace, and that of the Hungarians; and that the Emperor and the Vetzier should send some of quality, to make a truce, whilst that the Deputies of either side should meete, for the conclusion of a generall peace.

Articles of peace accorded in the Emperors name with Botscay and the Hungarians.

Embassadors came to Vienna, from BOTSCAY and the Hungarians, in September; and within few dayes after, the Articles of peace were signed by the Arch-duke MATHIAS, and them. First, that they should liue with liberty of conscience throughout all Hungary, where there should bee no exercise of any other Religion, but the Catholike, the Lutheran, and the Calvinist. Secondly, that the Archduke MATHIAS should bee Lieutenant generall for the Emperor, throughout all Hungary; and carie the title of Viceroy. Thirdly, that BOTSCAY should bee confirmed Prince of Transilvania, Earle of Sicules, and Palatine of high Hungary, to which principality and County, his heyres males should succeed; for want whereof, all should returne to the Emperors disposition. Fourthly, that hereafter the Palatine, Treasurer generall, and all the Receivers should bee chosen by the Estates of Hungary. Fiftly, that none should hould any benefit in Hungary but the natives. Sixtly, that there should be a generall abolition of all that had past during this last warre.

Deputies for the Emperor and Turkimen and conclude a generall peace.

In the meane time, a Truce was accorded betwixt the Arch-dukes Deputies, and the Vetziers, and euery one prepared to meete at the place appointed, neere vnto Comorrha: BOTSCAYES Ambassadors returned to Neuheusel, six French-leagues from Comorrha; to be, as it were, arbitrators of such differences as might arise. The place of conference, was halfe a league beneath Comorrha, in an Iland diuided in three parts by deepe Riuers, so as one could not go vnto another, but by boate; being thus chosen to auoide all treacherie. The Deputies for the Emperour, Grand-Segnior, and BOTSCAY, met often and treated, and in the end concluded a Peace for twenty yeers, contained in fifteen Articles; the which they signed the ninth of Nouember. The same day the Articles were signed, the Bassha of Buda made a stately feast vnto the Emperors Deputies, giuing to eyther of them a goodly horse, or some peeces of cloath of Gold, or of rare silkes. The same day, he sent three Posts to Constantinople, to aduertize the Sultan ACHMAT of this Peace; the which newes he receiued with so great ioy, as hee went presently to a Mosque to giue thanks to his MAHOMET, and the day following made a solemne feaste.

Botscay poysoned by his chancellor.

But BOTSCAY, after so many toyles and labours, was no sooner acknowledged Prince of Transiluania by the Emperor, but (in steade of enioying the Peace which he had propounded to himself, with hope to leaue a posterity to eternize the memory of his valor) CATTAY his Chancellor conspired to poyson him; hoping, by the death of his Prince, to make himselfe heir of his Estate: BOTSCAY hauing swallowed the poison, which made him die languishing, discouered that it was his Chancellors deede; whom he caused to be apprehended, and being conuicted he cut off his head in Cassouia, giuing that dignity to IAN IANVSI: but no preseruatiues could prolong his life, but soone after he must go giue an account to the Eternall, for so many ruines, and so much Christian blood, spilt in Hungary and Transiluania. The Haiduques which had been accustomed to liue by Armes, some hauing neither lands nor goods to feede them; and other knowing no trade and being now to old to learne any, could not subiect themselues to this peace; and, notwithstanding any commandements, they trouped together, liuing vpon the Peasant, and left nothing but desolation where they past: But being comn into the County of Bocotsi, hauing set fire vpon three villages, the Commons came vpon them with such furie, as there were many slaine of either side in diuers encounters.

BOTSCAY to redresse these disorders, had appointed an assembly of the estates of further Hungary, at Cassouia in December: but feeling his death approach, he could not assist, but gaue instructions to his Chancellor and others, what order they should obserue, in the assembly of the 1607 States after his death; and what they should do for the tranquillity of Hungary, and for the commerce betwixt the Hungarians and Transiluanians; charging them not to infringe any thing of
The death of Botscay. the peace made with the Emperour, and exhorting them to keepe their faith with him. And so he died, the 30 of December, being much lamented by them of his party: yet soone after forgetting his aduice, they made a change in Transiluania, for that he died without children.

Sigismund Ragotsi chosen Prince of Transiluania. The estates of Transiluania presently after the death of BOTSCAY assembled at Clausenburg, where they did chuse SIGISMVND RAGOTSI for their Prince, to whome they went presently and tooke the oath of alleageance in the great Church. After which, they sent Embassadors to the Arch-duke MATHIAS, who made their excuse for this election, humbly beseeching his Imperiall Maiesty to beleeue, that they had done it forced by necessity, and to preuent the practices of many Noble-men of Hungary and Transiluania, pretending to seize vpon that state: and that the election of RAGOTSI should be no hindrance, but that they would alway acknowledge the Emperour for their true Prince. This RAGOTSI was a man admirable in bounty, and who had not affected this election, but did accept it for the good of his countrey, and left it againe for the quiet thereof, as you shall heare hereafter.

Peace ill obserued in Hungary. The peace was ill obserued in Hungary of all sides. The Basha of Buda wrot vnto the Archduke MATHIAS, that he should be forced to take Arms if he did not hinder the courses of the Imperials, the which he should be very vnwilling to do, protesting to obserue the peace. The Imperiall garrisons continued their courses and Nohusel was sold and deliuered to COLLONITS.

Some discontented Haiduques trouped together, and ioyned their numbers with some Turkes, making a body of 15000 men, which spoiled all Hungary where they past. The Basha of Buda was the cause thereof, who gaue the commanders money to entertaine this mutinie. To preuent these disorders and the murmurings of the Barrons of Hungary, who desired to haue a King that might remaine in the countrey, and not at Prague in Bohemia, who by his presence might disperse all these new alterations, the Arch-duke MATHIAS appointed an Assembly in the Emperors name, whither the Deputies of Hungary came: and attending the Arch-duke MATHIAS long, in the end they made a solemne protestation, that hauing attended the said Arch-duke seauen weekes in vaine, they were forced to returne to them that sent them; that if pleased the Emperour to assigne another day for an assembly, and publish it, they would come: and if in the meane time their were any thing decreed contrary to the Articles of peace concluded at Viena, although the Emperour should ratifie it, they protested a nullity against all that should be done in their absence.

The proceedings of the Haiduques. The Nobility of Hungary resolued to take Armes against the rebellious Haiduques, and Turkes which were ioyned with them; and they sent to intreate the Basha of Buda to retire the Turkes. The Haiduques continued their hostilities, and proclaimed that they were friends to the Turkes, and enemies to the Germaines and Walloones: They sent to intreat HVMANOY Gouernor of Cassouia, to take the Diademe which had beene giuen to BOTSCAIE, and to be their King; but he scorned their offer: saying, I will haue no other King but CÆSAR: finally, continuing their spoiles (beeing assisted with some Cannon from the Bashaes of Buda and Agria and with 300000 duckets) they went to besiege Filech with 16000 men; BOSNIACK commanded in the place: who carried himselfe so valiantly against all their attemptes as he forced them to raise the siege.

An assembly at Viena. During the Assembly at Presbourg the Arch-duke MATHIAS had called together the estates of Austria to Viena, where there were Articles propounded vnto them in writing, touching the estate of the Countrey, whereon they were to conclude; but there were resolutions taken by the practices of the Arch-duke MATHIAS contrarie to the Emperours intention.

The answere of Ragotsi to the Palatine Embassadors. The King of Poland and his Palatines being at warres, the Palatines sent to ROGOTSI Prince of Transiluania for aide: who made them this answere; that it was a wicked thing to nourish warres betwixt Christians: That his Armes should neuer fight in a ciuile and vniust warre: that it was treacherous to Arme against ones Prince, and that they which did fight against their Soueraigne were detested by their posteritie, and their memory buried in infamy; as for such as aided rebels, they deserued to be called impious, a surname which I will by no meanes purchase: obey your King and God will blesse you.

A Diet, at Ratisbone, fruitelesse. This yeere in the beginning of Ianuary, there was a Diet assembled at Ratisbone in which the the Arch-duke FERDINAND of Gretz, did preside in the Emperors name; which bred some iealousie in the Arch-duke MATHIAS. All their deliberation was reduced to fiue Articles; whereof the first and principall was, To make prouision against the Turks, in whom there was little assurance for the entertainment of peace: and therefore he desired, that the Princes of the Empire would furnish yearly a certain contribution to resist the Turks practices when there should be cause, or that all the Estates of the Empire should entertaine 20000 foot and 4000 horse at their owne charge; or else, that they would yeerly lay by so much money as the entertainment of such an Army would amount vnto: but there was such dissension among the Deputies, that after foure months continuance they brake off, and concluded nothing.

The Arch-duke Mathias practiseth to make himself a Soueraign. During this Diet at Ratisbone, the Arch-duke MATHIAS practised by what meanes hee might make himself Soueraign of Austria, Stiria, Morauia, and of all that the Christians held in Hungary. Hee came to an Assembly of the Estates at Presbourg in the beginning of the yeere; where, to attain to his designe, he propounded to the Noble-men of Hungary, that it would be very profitable to vnite the Estates of Austria and Hungary by an offensiue and defensiue league; so as Deputies being appointed, it was concluded, that for the good of Austria and Hungary they should not alter any thing in the Articles of peace, made the yeer before at Vienna; and that an offensiue and defensiue league should be made betwixt the said Countries. The Articles of the resolution were set down by the Deputies, and they were signed by the Arch-duke MATHIAS, and proclaimed the first of February. The Arch-duke MATHIAS, beeing returned to Vienna, called the Estates of Austria together; to whom he imparted what had passed at Presbourg; and that what he had done was for fear that Hungary should be wrested from the Empire, as well by the Turks as by the Barons of Hungary, and that after this distraction the whole wars should fall vpon Austria; aduising them also to prouide money for the entertainment of the Army which he must leuie, if the rebellious Haiduques would not desist from Arms. The Estates gaue him great thanks, promising to follow and assist him with their liues and goods.

The Arch-duke MATHIAS (who knew that for the effecting of his designes he must haue a peace in Hungary as well with the Turk as with the discontented Haiduques) gaue charge vnto HELI HASKAY; that at one Instant he should take order with the Turks for the reforming of the disorders which had hapned since the peace, and to draw as many of the Haiduques as he could to his pay, to the end the rest should be forced to disperse themselues, or bee carefull to liue in peace: wherein HASKAY carried himself so politickly, that hee drew fifteen companies of horse to the Arch-dukes pay; and the rest in an Instant were scattered and dispersed. GABRIEL BATTORI, the right heir of the Princes of Transiluania, hauing retired himself to the Turk, was now restored to his principality. SIGISMVND RAGOTSI (who had bin chosen after the death of BOTSCAY) yeelded it willingly to him, and retired to Saventa; assuring BATTORI by Letters, that he had not accepted the election but to preuent the combustions among great men, who pretended to vsurp and trouble that state.

The Emperor fonde to the Arch-duke Mathias. The Arch-duke, seeing all things succeed according to his desire, sent commandement to haue all his Troops come to the vendez-vous vpon the Frontiers of Morauia by the foureteenth of April. The Emperor being aduertised of these leuies (which they gaue out was for that his Majesty did not ratifie the treaty of peace made at Vienna) he sent the Cardinall of Ditrichstein to the Arch-duke, with a ratification of the treaty; but with this clause, that hee would haue the offensiue and defensiue league, made betwixt the Estates of Hungary and Austria, dissolued: whereto the Arch-duke answered, it could not bee; and so returned the Cardinall with certain demands; who, finding that he had another designe than he made shew of, aduertised the Emperor, that he might prouide for his safety. The Emperor growes amazed: hee presently cals the States of Bohemia to Prague: he summons all his forces together, lodges them about his person, and craues aid from the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire. The Arch-duke, hearing that the Emperor had taken the alarum, came into Morauia ioining to Austria, with an army of 20000 old souldiers and 28 Cannon. He sent to the Estates of Bohemia, commanding euery Town to send two Deputies to Czasla, where they should vnderstand from his owne mouth the cause of his taking Armes. The Emperor, hearing this, exhorted them to perfist in their fidelity; so as no man went to Czasla, but the whole Country took Armes for the Emperor: who, hoping to stay him with his Army in Morauia, sent back the Cardinal to vnderstād his complaints, being accompanied by the Popes Nuntio, and the Ambassadors of diuerse Princes. But hee marched into the Country towards Czasla; where the Ambassadors of Saxony and Brandenburg came vnto him the ninth of May, intreating him not to passe any further, but to grant a truce for eight daies, to the end this trouble might be compounded: the which they could not obtaine by any importunities.

The Emperour in distresse.

The Arch-duke MATHIAS had a desire to see Prague; not as an humble Petitioner, but with a commanding power, being attended by 8000 horse, COLLONITS the Marshall of his Campe following with the rest of his Army. The poore Emperour was in a strange distresse: he had two enemies to incounter and fight withall; without the walles his owne brother, and within the towne the assembly of the estates of Bohemia. And the deputies were of diuerse religions; where they importuned him with many Articles, both concerning religion and the state: all which he was forced to graunt, except that which concerned religion, the which was referred to the next assembly at S. Michaell.

A conference at Debritz.

The Arch-duke vpon a safe conduct from the Emperour and the estates sent his Embassadours into Prague, who deliuered his demands in writing to the assembly: whereupon a conference was appointed at Debritz; where after much debate, the Emperor obtained a peace of his brother; but it was with the preiudice of his estate & honour: for he was forced to strippe off his clothes before he was dead, and to resigne vnto his brother the greatest part of his patrimoniall inheritance.

1608

A peace concluded betwixt the Emperor & Mathias.

This peace was concluded in 17 Articles: wherof the chiefe were, That he should yeeld the Realme of Hungary, and deliuer the Crowne vnto the Arch-duke MATHIAS, freeing the Hungarians of their oath. That he should yeeld presently all the Arch-duchie of Austria vnto him, and to his heires males. That if the Emperour died without issue male, the Arch-duke should succeed him in the Kingdom of Bohemia, and carrie presently in his titles, Designed king of Bohemia. And that he and his heires should haue the administration of Moravia, with the title of Marquesse, with diuerse others tending to the aduancement of the Arch-duke MATHIAS.

King Mathias enters into Vienna

This peace being confirmed, the Emperour sent the Crowne of Hungary, with all the Regall ornaments, to the Arch-dukes Campe: where they were receiued with great pompe. And thus the Archduke, king of Hungary being pleased, raised his Camp and returned to Viena: where he made a stately entry, and was receiued with great pompe by all the estates of the countrey; who assuring him of their fidelity and obedience, congratuled his new soueraignty, and he gaue them great thankes for their good affection. In October the estates of Austria were to take the oath of fidelity and alleageance to the king, as to their Arch-duke, the which was solemnely performed: but the protestants were not present, for that the king (by the aduice of the Arch-duke, LEOPOLD, of Cardinall MELIM the Popes Nuntio, and of Cardinal FORGATSI) had by an edict forbidden the exercise of the protestants religion in Austria. This bredde new troubles, for that the protestants assembled at Horne, and made their protestation, sending a petition vnto the King, signed by 150 Noblemen, gouernours and Captaines; writing also to the Catholikes that if they tooke the oath of allegeance vnto the said King Arch-duke, before the trouble of religion were pacified, they should not be able to excuse themselues to be the causes of the miseries that would ensue.

New troupes in Austria for religion.

The Ceremony being ended at Viena, King MATHIAS went to Presbourge, where on the 22 of October the Noble-men of Hungary receiued him with great state, there being aboue 10000 men in Armes, where soone after they presented diuerse Articles vnto him conformable vnto the edict of pacification made at Viena, but with some explication. The protestants of Austria, sent their requests vnto the estates of Hungary, letting them vnderstand, that king MATHIAS denying them the free exercise of their religion, they were forced to take Armes, requiring them to assist them with the succours which were promised by the offensiue and defensiue League.

The Protestants of Austria craue aide from the Hungarians.

The Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN was intreated by the Hungarians, to intercede in this difference; who hauing conferred with King MATHIAS, brought them answer, that the king had neuer any intent to trouble the peace of Austria: but as for the free exercise of the protestant religon within townes, that his maiesty could by no meanes graunt it, partly in regarde of his conscience, and partly for feare of his Holiness, and of the king of Spain: yet he had his maiesties word, that if the Protestants of Austria would lay downe their Armes, and ackowledge their fault, they should haue liberty of religion allowed them out of townes; and as for publike affaires his maiesty would aduance his subiects, without acception of religion. The Hungarians hauing receiued this answere, he perswaded them to lay downe Armes, and to submit themselues to the Kings will, refusing the aide which they desired; laying before them the dangers of of a doubtfull warre. The Protestants returned to Austria discontented, yet afterwards by the intercession of the Morauians and others, after some little combustion, they obtained a peace and part of that which they demanded.

Mathias crowned King of Hungary.

MATHIAS was proclaimed King of Hungary in Presbourg, the foureteenth of Nouember, HELY HASKAY being first chosen Palatine; and on the 19 day hee was solemnely crowned. After which, beginning to order the affaires of the kingdome, he was forced by the Hungarian Barrons, to dismisse all the Germanes which had any offices in Hungary, and to aduance others of the Countrey. It troubled him much, and his brother MAXIMILIAN that COLONITS should be depriued of his office of Marshal of Hungary, hauing done so great seruices for that crowne; but he was forced to indure it in regarde of peace. In the end of the yeere he returned to Viena, so as in seauen moneths the Arch-duke MATHIAS caused himselfe to be crowned king of Hungary, and acknowledged Arch-duke of Austria and Marques of Moravia, forcing the Emperor to make his Will before he was dead.

All Strangers displaced in Hungary.

This yeere the Turkes notwithstanding the peace, attempted to surprise Fileck. The Basha of Agria had corrupted ANDREVV DRAGO a Captaine within the Cittadell, who promised to deliuer it for 20000 Ioachins: the hour was appointed at midnight, when as DRACO should set certaine houses of fire; and whil'st that euery man should be busie to quench it, he should giue the Turkes entrie into the cittadell, and so into the towne. This enterprise was discouered, and DRACO quartered. The Basha of Buda also seised vpon aboue 400 villages, causing the inhabitants to take the oath of allegeance vnto the Turke. The Emperour as we haue said had giuen his brother MATHIAS what he demanded, and had pacified the estates of Bohemia as well as he could, suffering euery one to liue in the liberty of his religion, promising to set downe an order at the next assembly, which was this yeare in Ianuary. The Catholikes fought by all meanes to entertaine the Emperour in hatred with the Protestants, and to haue that disanulled, which had beene formerly granted; saying, that their opinions had beene condemned, and that the exercise of their religion was but by sufferance. The Protestants sent their Embassadors to the King of Hungary, and to the Electors and Princes of the Empire, to interceede for them to his maiesty, for the continuance of the free exercise of their religion.

The Basha of Agria attempts Fileck.

A combustion in Bohemia for religion.

The Emperour hauing forbidden the Protestants to make any assembly in the court of new Prague, they went vnto him, and besought him to appoint them a place where they might assemble, and to write their defence, and to present it vnto him, and to let the world know the instice of their demand the which they could not obtaine: So as on the eight of May, they resolued notwithstanding the Emperours prohibition, to goe and make their assembly in the court of new Prague; where they brake open the dores, and entred, putting themselues in defence, if any should come to assaile them. The Emperour hearing of this alteration, sent the first Burgraue of Prague with his chiefe officers, who said vnto them, that his Imperiall Maiesty had alwaies had a will to loue them as his faithfull subiects; and that he was resolued, shortly to call an assembly, and to end that controuersie touching the liberty of religions. The Protestants made answere by the Barron of Budouits, that they thanked his Imperiall Maiesty for his good will towards them; and besought him to beleeue that they had beene alwaies faithfull vnto him: yet they knew well what had beene treated hitherto in the states by some counsellors, who vnder pretext, of aduancing the Catholike religion, were the cause of these troubles which had followed; and they did hope to let his Maiesty vnderstand, that the end of such counsells and practices, could bring nothing but ruine to Bohemia, and the losse of his Realmes, and prouinces. As for the publication of the assemby of the estates, they desired it might be within three daies, to preuent many accidents which might happen. Both parties, both Catholikes and Protestants, remained 15 daies in continuall iealousie one of another, fearing surprises. But as soone as the Emperour had published the assembly, all was pacified, by reason of the Emperours declaration; whereby he did auow, that what the protestants had done, was for his seruice and the good of the Kingdome. At which assembly, there was free exercise of religion graunted to the Protestants, and Temples allowed them to preach in the vulgar tongue, declaring all them troublers of the publike peace, that should any way infringe it.

The troubles in Bohemia for religion pacified.

A complaint against the Iesuites.

The Iesuites were suspected to haue beene the cause of these broiles: both Catholikes and Protestants complained, and presented a petition vnto the King, that they being strangers, and come poore into Prague, had in a short time gotten great possessions, yet payed no tribute or contribution, neither bare any charge like vnto others: wherefore they required that hereafter they might beare the charges of the Common-wealth like others of the Clergie, that they should should not purchase any more, nor accept any donations, by testament or otherwise, without his Majesties permission.

The death of the duke of Iuliers and Cleues, and the pretendors.

In March, WILLIAM Duke of Iuliers, Cleues and Bergh, Earl of Mark and Rauenspourg, died without children: to whose succession there were many Princes and Noble-men pretended; which drew great miseries vpon those Countries. Among the Princes of Germany, were the Elector of Brandenbourg, who was issued from MARY ELEANOR, eldest sister vnto the said WILLIAM deceased. The Count Palatine of Newbourg descended from ANNE the second sister. The third Pretendent was the widow of the Duke of Deuxponts. The fourth was the Marquesse of Burgau, who married SIBILLE the fourth sister. The Elector of Saxony pretended these estates to belong to him as masculine fees of the Empire; and that they had been giuen to his Predecessors, and to their Successors for the seruices which they had done to the Empire and Emperor, in case the Duke of Cleues should dy without issue male. In France was the Duke of Neuers; who maintained, that he was the onely Prince which carried the name and Arms of Cleues; and the Earl of Maulaurier, who is the right heir of the house of Mark, whereof he carries the name and Arms. Euery one maintained his pretension, fortifying themselues by Arms, and ingaging their friends: the relation of which war I refer to diuers others which haue written thereof; the cause being yet vndecided.

In October, there arriued at Prague an Ambassador from the grand Seignior with many rich Presents to to the Emperor: among the which there was a goodly pauilion, set with many pretious stones, foure goodly horse, with rich caparisons, a Turkish habit whereon there was nothing to be seen but gold and stone, with certain other pretious stones. Hauing presented his Letters, and seen the Emperor confirm the truce, he returned with Presents.

1610 The prince of Anhalt sent ambassador to the Emperor from the princes of Germany.

About the same time, the Prince of Anhalt came Ambassador to the Emperor from the Princes and Estates of the Empire; giuing him to vnderstand by his Chancellor, that the Princes required to haue Donauerd in Suenia (which had been some yeers before taken by the Duke of Bauaria, by the vertue of the Emperors Letters of proscription) restored again to the Empire and to the former estate, some burdens being taken away; that justice might be duely administred, and the peace of religion confirmed; that Princes Ambassadors when they came, might be dispatched without delay; that sutes in Courts might be amended: and for that Princes Ambassadors had been much neglected in Court, they required that some Protestants might be chosen into the Senat and Councell. The Emperor heard the Prince willingly; yet excusing himself, that by reason of the troubles in Bohemia he could not then attend it, he promised that hee would soon giue the Princes and States satisfaction.

This yeer there was an attempt against the person of GABRIEL BATTORI, Prince of Transiluania, by a Noble-man of that Country, beeing induced thereto by a wicked religious man: whereof the Prince being aduertised, and of the day of the execution, he made shew to go forth to hunt, hauing first laid an ambush without the Town; into the which hee drew the vndertakers, who followed him to execute their enterprize: whereas some of them were cut in pieces; and among them the religious man. Some report, that BATTORI banisht the rest: and some being fled into Hungary, he wrote his Letters to GEORGE TVRSON, intreating him to cause them to be apprehended, lest they should attempt the like there, being incited by the Iesuits, and the hatred to religion.

Assembly of the protestants princes at Halle.

The spirit of diuision had set all Germanie on fire, and drawn them into factions, for the defense of the Pretendents to the Duchy of Iuliers, either party seeking to fortifie it self; for the effecting whereof, they made seuerall Assemblies. The Princes Protestants Noble-men, with the Deputies of fifteen Imperiall Towns, holding the part of the Elector of Brandenbourgh and Palatine of Neuebourg, mette at Halle in Suenia; where there assisted an Ambassadour from the French King, who offred them protection in the King his Masters name; and to assist them with 8000 foot and 2000 horse, with cannon and munition, vpon condition that they should not alter any thing in matter of religion within the Country of Iuliers, and that the Catholicks should be maintained in the same rights and priuiledges which they enioyed during the life of the last Duke.

The Emperors partizans assembled at Prestbourg.

At the same time, the Princes and Towns of Germany, houlding the Emperors part, assembled at Pirtzbourg in Franconia; where they resolued of the forces which euery one should furnish for the Army which they appointed to raise: after which, they beganne to leuie souldiers throughout all parts of Europe; what succeeded, you shall heerafter hear.

The protestant Princes, hauing concluded of their succours for the warre, published a declaration ration of the causes of their vnion; shewing, That their confederation was for the defence of the glory of the name of God, and the maintenance of iustice and peace in the Empire; and not contrary to their obedience which they did owe vnto the Emperor or against any estate of the holy Empire: beseeching his Imperiall Maiesty, and all the Electors, Princes, and States, not to giue credit to such as had malitiously published, that their vnion was made in contempt of the Imperiall Maiesty, and to oppresse the Roman religion, to prophane the monasteries, and to take againe with violence those goods which their predecessors had giuen to Churches, imployed in pious vses; and to trouble the peace of religion. Finally (relating the estate of the pretendents of Iuliers) they concluded that they were vnited with them, to the end they should not be by force molested in their iust possession of the estates of the house of Iuliers; intreating all Princes of the Empire, & others not to misconstrue their vnion; nor to hinder it, but rather to assist them, that all iealousies & distrusts being taken away, loue & concord may be firmly settled hereafter. 1610

An Assembly at Prague.

The Electors, Princes and Towns holding the Emperors party, which had bin assembled at Pirtzbourg, made another general assembly at Prague, in which assisted the Arch-dukes, MAXIMILIAN & FERDINAND of Austria. The propositions were reduced vnto 4. heads. 1. The reconciliation of the Emperor with his brother king MATHIAS. 2. The election of a King of the Romans. 3. The restitution of Donauerdt. 4. The composition of the trouble of IVLIERS. The king of Hungary sent his deputies to this assembly: from whom the Emperor demanded the restitution of Austria, & Morauia. The Elector of Cullen, the Arch-duke FERDINAND, and the Duke of Brunswick, went to Vienna to acquaint the King with the Emperours demand, and the proposition for the election of a king of the Romans. It was concluded in the assembly, that the Duke of Bauaria should leaue Donauerdt to its former liberty, without any exception, paying him his charges. And touching IVLIER's trouble, all the estates which had belonged to the last Duke IOHN WILLIAM, were conferd by the Emperor vpon the Elector of Saxony, and his house; conditionally that the house of Saxony should proue that they had more right to the said estates than the Princes pretending; that they should alter nothing in the exercise of the Catholick religion; that the said Elector should satisfie the demands of the Duke of Neuers and the Marquesse of Burgau, and should pay the charges disburst by the Emperor & the Arch-duke LEOPOLD in this war.

Articles of reconciliation betwixt the Emperor and King Mathias.

The third of Iuly a reconciliation was made betwixt the Emperor and his brother the king of Hungary, vpon these Articles. 1. That king MATHIAS should acknowledge his brother RODVLPHVS for Emperor, and the head of Christendome, king of Bohemia, Lord of the Marquisate of Morauia, and the first of the house of Austria. 2. That yearely the said king should send him 2000 vessels of wine and pay him 10000 florens. 3. That the said king nor the prouinces granted vnto him should not make any alliances without the consent of the Emperor. 4. That the king should demand pardon for those things which were past, of his Imperial maiesty; the which he should giue him, in a particular forme. 5. That the souldiers of either part should be dismist within one moneth. 6. That if it should be needful to make warre against the Turke, it should bee done by the Emperors authority. 7. That Germanes should be put in garrison in the forts of Hungary with the Hungarians: and that the Emperor should continue the ordinary paiment, which Bohemia did furnish for the intertainement of the said garrison. 8. That the Emperour and King should hereafter ioyne their forces, to punish rebellious subiects. 9. That if any of their officers did not cause the said Articles to be presently obserued, they should be depriued of their offices. 10. That the Electors & Princes assembled at Prague should subscribe the said Articles, and that they should be signed by either part. 11. That the county of Tiroll should be left wholly to the Emperor, and that neither king MATHIAS nor the Arch-dukes his brethren and cosins should pretend any title vnto it.

The Protestant Princes send to the Duke of Bauaria.

Soone after, the protestants Princes of Germany, who were vnited in the behalfe of the Princes pretending the succession of Iuliers, seeing that Duke MAXIMILIAN of Bauaria, the head of the vnion of the Catholike Princes, had leuied many souldiers, they sent an Embassie vnto him: where after many conferences, in the end they concluded, that by the first of November, the duke of Bauaria should dismis his Army; but for that the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had great troupes in his Bishoppricks of Passau and Strasbourg, he might put part of them into garrison to be ready vpon any new accident: moreouer that all acts of hostility should cease, betwixt the subiects of the Archbishop of Cullen, and the States of Iuliers: and if there should happen any difference betwixt the said parties, they should agree amiably, and not come to Armes.

The Emperor hauing giuen no order for the payment of LEOPOLD's Army (it hauing, committed great spoiles in the Bishoprick of Passau) they entred into Austria, where they committed barbarous cruelties, being led by ROMEO. Many thought that he would passe vnto Prague, to force the Emperor to pay his Army: Others were of opinion that LEOPOLD aspired to make himselfe King of the Romans, and that he would imploy this Army to that effect. King MATHIAS (who was then disarmed) found presently that it was against him: wherefore he sent for all his subiects and friends, and sought to crosse the Leopoldians enterprises: He wrote to the States of Bohemia, that he would neuer beleeue the Emperour would breake the Peace, so newly sworne; yet he intreated them, if neede were, to succour him in his necessity. The Leopoldians entred into Bohemia, and surprized Budweitz by policie and spoyled it, and then marched towards Prague. The Emperor (being required by the States) sent a Herauld to the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, with commandement to retire the Army to Cruman, and there to attend their pay.

1611 Leopolds army enters Austria.

Hauing deliuered his charge in secret to the Arch-duke, he was brought to ROMEO; who willed him to returne to Prague, and to assure them, that they were friends to all such as were faithfull subiects to the Emperour, and were in Armes only to defend his authority; and that being entred into Prague (the which they hoped to doe the next day) they would not wrong any man: After whose return, they marched to Prague. Many of the Emperors Councell had intelligence with the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, fearing King MATHIAS; and had gotten Armes into diuers Monasteries, prouiding for all occurrents. They were Armed, and had gotten a gate at their deuotion, to draw LEOPOLD's souldiers secretly into petty Prague; the which they surprised on the fifteenth of February early in the morning, by the treachery of the Porter: yet there was a great conflict in the Town, with losse on both sides; but, in the end, the Inhabitants were forced to yeeld. After which, the Castle of Prague was yeelded to LEOPOLD, causing himselfe to be declared the Emperors Lieutenant generall, taking the oath of fidelity from all the Souldiers. In the meane time, the Nobility and Souldiers within old and new Prague, resolued to make a sallie vpon the Leopoldians which were in petty Prague: and they, on the other side, threatned to set fire on the Town.

They surprise petty Prague.

On the 18 of February, the Emperor sent a commandement both to the Leopoldians, and to the States of Bohemia and Nobility, to present themselues the next day in the castle of Prague, and there to sweare all obedience, and fidelity to his imperiall Maiesty, and to promise not to offend one another by Armes. The Herald hauing published this command to the Lepoldians, the States would not suffer him to enter into the old Town; giuing him charge to tell the Emperor, that he should proclaim a cessation of Arms for three daies, to the end they might haue time to consult of their affaires. In the end, it was concluded, that the old and new town should giue 200000 Florens, so as LEOPOLD's Army would leaue petty Prague, and depart presently out of Bohemia. During these combustions, King MATHIAS drew together his friends and forces: he had then two great affaires in hand. For GABRIEL BATTORI Prince of Transiluania, in the beginning of this yeer, had surprised Hermestad by intelligence; carried away his Lieutenant prisoner; thrust out all his partizans; and placed 1300 Haiduques in Garrison. The which did much trouble MATHIAS, hoping to haue had his reuenge this summer; the which he might easily haue effected, the Vaiuode of Valachia and BATTORI being in warre. But the King running to the neerest fire, caused his troups to turne head towards Bohemia, to succour the States which craued his aide.

They of Prague compound with Leopolds army

The Prince of Transiluania surprifeth Hermistad.

The Emperor hearing that his brother MATHIAS was entred Bohemia with an Army of 18000 men, to succor the States; he sent them word by an Herald, that if they would not take some course for the payment of LEOPOLD's Army, that it might be discharged, he would depriue them of their liberties: But they, hearing of the Kings approach, refused his demaund. The Emperor, foreseeing the danger if these two Armies should meete, caused 300000 Florens to be giuen to pay the Army for three monethes: and so LEOPOLD retired away by night, and recouered the Frontiers of Bohemia.

Leopold with his Army returnes from Prague and out of Bohemia.

ROMEO, Lieutenant to the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, would not leaue Bohemia as he had done Prague, without the full payment of his Army. Whereupon, he fortifies himselfe within Budueis, and furnisheth it with victuals, Arms, and pouder: he melts the Bels to cast Ordinance; and fortifies himselfe so well, as they must compound with him, before they get him out. As for King MATHIAS; hearing that LEOPOLD was gone from Prague, he sent word vnto the States, that he would not arriue there before the 24 of March. Before which time, diuers of the Emp. Councell were imprisoned; & among others, FRANCIS DENNAGEL who was also also of secret counsel to the Arch-duke LEOPOLD. Being put to the Rack, he confest the Arch-dukes designes, and that he had beene sent by the Emperours to some Electors and Princes, to draw aide from them against King MATHIAS, they being at iarre: That LEOPOLDS resolution was to change many things not onely in the gouernment of Prague, but in the whole Empire, and that some great men of the Emperors Councel must be dismist. Whereunto DENNAGEL made answere; That it might be done in Italy, but that Bohemia was gouerned after another manner. That the Arch-dukes intention was to seize vpon all the townes of Bohemia, to vnite his forces with those of Bohemia, to defend the Emperour, and to imploy his Armes against King MATHIAS, whose entry into Bohemia they would hinder; And if this designe had succeeded, then by an Imperial edict they would haue forbidden the exercise of the Protestants religion throughout all Bohemia. He also confest that he was seruant to the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, and that he would gladly haue procured him the kingdom of Bohemia.

Demagels confession.

King MATHIAS hauing discouered his enemies counsells, marched on, and came within halfe a league of Prague; whither all the Nobility and others went to honour this rising sunne, leauing the sunne setting. He made his entry into Prague with great pompe: where after his arriuall the Emperour sent to congratulate his comming, by such of his Councel as he thought should be most pleasing vnto him. The Elector of Saxony aduised the states of Bohemia to bee well aduised in the pacifying of these troubles, and not to believe that the Emperour (who had so peaceably gouerned not onely Bohemia but the whole Empire these thirty fiue yeares) was the cause thereof; but that it proceeded from some busie and turbulent spirits, in the punishment of whom they must vse moderation; not chastizing the innocent with the culpable; That the lawes of Bohemia bee not violated, and the Imperiall Maiesty with the dignity of the Electors, and states of the Empire wronged: That all their counsells should tend to obey the Emperor onely, and not suffer his age to be oppresst with cares and discontents. By other priuate letters he aduertised HENRY IVLIERS Duke of Brunswick, not to abandon the Emperor, nor to suffer any thing to passe preiudicial to his Imperial maiesty, and admonished K. MATHIAS that al things proceeding with moderation, the house of Austria would be much contented.

The Duke of Saxony writes to the states of Bohemia.

The Emperour assembled the States of Bohemia vpon the twelfth of Aprill: where hee gaue them to vnderstand, that he could not conceale the brotherly affection which he bare to MATHIAS King of Hungary his first brother, and his successor designed in the Realme of Bohemia: he entreated them to resolue he might be crowned in his life time, as many of his predecessors had done to their successors; but with condition to suffer him to enioy the Realme during his life: As for certaine differences betwixt him and king MATHIAS, that they should treate thereof at the end of the Assembly. In the meane time he required them to giue him wherewith to entertaine the Imperiall Maiesty; That his officers might bee paied their wages; his counsellors imprisoned, set at liberty: And that all the power and royall authority in Bohemia should remaine to him.

The Emperour propositions to the States of Bohemia.

The estates in their Assembly drew many Articles, which king MATHIAS was to sweare before his coronation; And they were read in the presence of the Embassadors of Moravia: who also for themselues and the Silesians (who are incorporated to the crowne of Bohemia) presented their complaints and grieuances containing 49 Articles: And the inhabitants of Prague required the confirmation of eight Articles, before his coronation, the which concerned the priuate gouernment of their City: all which I am forced for breuity sake to omitt, and to referre the Reader to the originall, whereby hee may iudge what the estate of Bohemia might be after those demandes, the Emperour (who was the lawfull King) hauing nothing in a manner but the title. Hee had a good heart; but his body was growne old and weake: Hee had the the greatnesse of courage of his predecessors; but croft by fortune, hee is constrained to yeeld to that which they desire: And he that presseth him to this consent, we see him (being halfe forced) to quitt some of the flowers of the liberty of this crowne, to those which did him homage, before that heauen had taken away him, whose successor he had beene without condition. King MATHIAS hauing sworne to all their Articles, and the Emperour hauing freed all the subiects of Bohemia and incorporated prouinces, from their oath of allegeance, they proceeded to the Coronation of MATHIAS; whom the whole court and the inhabitants of Prague honoured much, hauing much desired it. And after the Coronation, certaine Deputies being appointed to end the differences betwixt the Emperour and King MATHIAS, they concluded (and signed vnto) these Articles: Firstly, That the Castle of Prague should remaine to the Emperour, and that the king should lodge neere vnto it, hauing the Church common to them both. Secondly, That the gouernour of the Castle and the guard should sweare fidelity to both; and if there were any change to be made, it should be left to the Emperours disposition. Thirdly, That the gouernment of the Empire should remaine in the Emperor, and that he should not be disquieted in any thing that concerned the Imperial iurisdiction. Fourthly, That the gouernment of Bohemia and the prouinces depending, should be left to King MATHIAS, to whome the Emperor should yeeld al the right he pretended; but as for the difference for the title of king of Bohemia it should be referred to the next Assembly of the States. Fifthly, That in regard of the Cession, which the Emperour made vnto king MATHIAS of Bohemia and the prouinces depending, he should pay yearely vnto his imperiall maiesty 300000 florens, at two equall payments. Sixtly, That the Emperour should enioy the Segniories, demeasus and reuenues of Budouits, Brandesi, Lissau, and Petzeran, during his life; the which he should by no meanes ingage, sell, or transport. Seauenthly, That the Emperor should haue liberty to dispose by his testament of 200000 florens. Eightly, That the king should effect his promise made to the Emperour, touching the county of TYROL, and should satisfie his brother ALBERT, for his interest in Austria. Ninthly, That the Emperor should recommend king MATHIAS to the Electors and Princes of the Empire to be aduanced to the Imperiall dignity. Tenthly, That at the next Diet they should labour by all meanes to obtaine contribution and succours against the Turke. Eleuenthly, That the priuiledges of the Arch-duchie of Austria should be deliuered into the Kings hands; with this condition, that if the Emperour had need, the king should assist him. Twelfthly, and lastly, That within one yeare the Emperour should giue the inuestiture of Bohemia to the said king.

Articles of accord betwixt the Emperor and K. Mathias.

Troubles at Aix.

The towne of Aix (whereas the Emperor receiues his first Crowne) was in great combustions by reason of religion. The Catholike magistrate, by vertue of the Emperours commandement, had hindred the exercise of the Protestant religion within the towne and territory; the which the others taking very impatiently, they fell into a tumult and took Armes, seising vpon the towne-house and whole town, and dispossest the Catholike magistrate. The Catholikes fledde to the Arch-duke ALBERT and to the Elector of Cullen, for support: And the Protestants sent presently to the Princes possessing Iuliers, for aide, and to send some men of note to reconcile their differences. In the end by the mediation of the French Kings Embassadours, there were certaine Articles set downe for their reconciliation, but they took no great effect.

Brunswick, proscribed by the Emperour.

The Duke of Brunswick had (as we haue said) besieged the city of Brunswick, but had left it by reason of the hope of a peace. This yeare the Duke was at the Emperours court, to pursue the proscription of the said towne, in case of disobedience. The Hanse-townes (fearing that his fauour in court would preuaile more then the iustice of their cause) intreated king MATHIAS by their Letters, to fauour the right of the towne of Brunswick. But the Duke preuailed: for hee obtained Letters patents for the proscription of the Senate and inhabitants of Brunswick, as violaters of the publike peace; declaring them guilty of treason, and all their goods confiscate to the Duke, if that within one yeare they did not submit themselues vnder his obedience. Whereunto the magistrate and citizens published a declaration, containing a protestation of their innocency.

An Assembly of Electors at Nurembourg.

About the end of September the Electors had called a Diet to Nurembourg: from whence they sent Ambassadors to the Emperour, who found not any person of quality but the Duke of Brunswick about his Maiesty. They acquainted him with the present estate of the Empire; telling him, That the Electors required, aboue all things, a reformation in iustice; That he should make choice of more faithfull officers and Counsellors then he formerly had done; That a general Diet might be called in the Spring following; That what King MATHIAS had done, was nothing pleasing vnto them; That the reason of the bad gouernment of the Common-weale, was, for that his imperiall Maiesty did not impart the important affaires of the Empire vnto them, as his predecessors haue vsually done. They also besought him, in the name of the said Electors, that if he had no will to stay in Bohemia; to let them vnderstand the time when he meant to depart, and the place where he would make his residence: And as for the Election of a King of Romanes, they would not treate thereof without his consent; yet, not wishing that the Empire should goe out of the house of Austria, they desired to know which of them he would haue to succeede him.

Propositions made by the Electors, to the Emperour.

The Emperors answere.

The Emperour made answere, That he had long proiected to appoint a successor in the Empire, but the troubles in Bohemia had diuerted him; That he desired before they did treate of of him that should succeede him, there should be a generall Diet, where he might assist; That he was of the Electors opinion, concerning the necessity to proceede to the Election of a King of the Romanes; but he aduised them to giue order, that he might tell them freely in the Assembly, what was necessary for the safety of the Common-weale. The Ambassadours being returned, with this answere, the Electors appointed a Diet to be held in Aprill following, in the yeere 1612, to choose a King of Romanes in the City of Franckford, after the accustomed manner.

The death of the Emperor Rodulph.

The Emperour RODVLPH growing sickly (in the end of December, after the old computation) with extreame paines in his Legges (the which increased daily) he yeelded his soule to God, on the tenth of Ianuary; hauing raigned Emperour aboue thirty fiue yeeres. They thought to haue kept his death secret, vntill the comming of King MATHIAS, and therefore they sent vppe his seruice at dinner time into his chamber, to the end no man should suspect it; but soone after, being known to TRANTMANSTORF, it was diuulged ouer all Prague, and in the meane time they sent Postes to aduertise King MATHIAS, and the Electors of the Empire.

THE LIFE OF MATHIAS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND NINETEENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

AFter the death of RODVLPHVS (according to the Golden Bull, made by the Emperour CHARLES the Fourth; in the yeere one thousand three hundred fifty six) the Emperour being dead, the Elector Palatine, and he of Saxony, were appointed Vicars, Gouernors, and administrators of the Empire, vntill there were a King of Romanes chosen to be Emperour; either of them gouerning in his seuerall Iurisdiction. The Electour of Mentz, according to his charge, gaue notice to all the Electors to meete at Franckford in May, to proceede to the Election of a King of the Romanes; whither all the Princes came with their Traines: where, omitting the Ceremonies which were obserued in that Assembly; In the end, they ioyntly concluded to choose King MATHIAS, for King of the Romanes; who was crowned on the fourteenth of Iune, in the said City of Franckford with the ordinary Ceremonies; and on the sixteenth of Iune, the Queen, his wife, was crowned Empresse, who was also of the house of Austria, and descended from the branch of Tyroll. The Ceremony of his Election and coronation being ended ended with great magnificency; the Electors, Princes and Noble-men left Franckford, to retire home vnto their houses.

1612

The Emperour hath no Towne in the Empire.

The Emperour, as Emperour and King of the Romanes, hath not any Citty or Towne within the Empire: The whole Territory of Germany, belongs to the Electors, Bishops, Abbats, Princes, Earles, Noble-men and Free Townes: yet if the Emperour had no place where to remaine but within the Empire, the Bishoppe of Bamberg is bound to giue him his Towne, and himselfe to retire to Villac. Wherefore the Emperour MATHIAS, who had kingdomes out of Germany, desiring to retire himselfe to Prague, the chiefe City of Bohemia, he parted from Franckford the three and twentith day of Iune, being accompanied by many Princes and Noble-men, and past by Nurembourg in the beginning of Iuly, where he had a very stately and magnificent reception. Before the Emperours departure from Franckford, the Citizens came and presented a Petition vnto him; whereby they required that they might be made acquainted with the priuiledges of the City, which had remained wholly in the custody of the Senate; That the Iewes, whose number exceeded, might be expelled; That there should be a course set downe for vsury, and a meale market erected in the City. To whom the Emperor gaue good words, and put them in hope: But when as after the Emperours departure, the Cittizens saw no point of their Petition performed, there grew a great dissension betwixt them and the Senate: the which would haue grown to a great combustion, if some wise and temperate men had not interposed themselues.

A controuersie at Franckford reconciled.

CÆSAR aduertised hereof, being yet at Nurembourg, he sent command to the Citizens to referre all controuersies to him; who made choice of the Archbishop of Mentz, and the Lantz-graue of Hesse, to heare the businesse, and to reconcile it; the which after many and troublesome treaties, by their wisedom and moderation, they pacified and gaue contentment to both parties.

The Emperour, leauing Germany, returned to Bohemia. The Estates, hearing of his comming to Prague, sent the Duke of Teschin with a thousand horse to receiue him, being accompanied by the Duke of Brunswick, and many Noble-men of Germany, who conducted him to the Cathedrall Church, and then to the Castle; where they made great shewes of ioy for his happy Election. Soone after, Ambassadours came vnto the Emperour from the Persians and Muscouites: The Persian, hauing deliuered his Kings Letters vnto the Emperour, he perswaded him to continue warres against the Turkes, as the deceased Emperour had promised; saying, That if he could preuaile nothing, he should then returne speedily home, his King hauing also resolued to conclude a Peace with the Turke; hauing made triall, to his griefe, that the Christians had made a peace with the Turkes, at such times as they might greatly haue annoyed them. The Muscouite Ambassadour said; That the Muscouite intreated his Maiesty, to be an Vmpire betwixt them and the King of Poland; that he would procure a Peace to those Countries, and prouide them a good and worthy Prince: That they had formerly required the King of Poland's sonne, to be their great Duke, and to that end and purpose they had diuers and sundry times, sent vnto the King: but when as they found that he had no such intent, but that vnder the pretext thereof, he might the more easily subdue them, they fell from him againe; and, ioyning battaile not farre from the City of Musco, they slew many Polonians; after which, they had an intent to call-in CHARLS, son to the King of Swethen; but, if the Emperour could by any other meanes prouide for them, they would most willingly obey him.

Ambassadors come from Persia & Muscouy, to Prague.

Newes came then to Court, of a controuersie growne betwixt NERONIVS the Emperours Ambassador at Constantinople and NASSVS Basha, about the confirmation of the Peace which had been made some yeeres before. The Ambassadour, perswading the Turkes to entertain the Peace which had been made, NASSVS Basha required him to shew wherin the Emperor had not been satisfied: To whom he answered, That the sixt Article of the Transaction had been violated; for that CÆSAR, as King of Hungary, hauing a lawfull Title vnto Transiluania, he required to haue that Article ratified; the which NASSVS denied, affirming that Transiluania did properly belong vnto the Sultan: vpon which point there grew a great contention betwixt them, whereby it appeared the Turkes sought nothing, but some colour to infringe the Peace.

The Emperour, being aduertized hereof, gaue answere vnto the Persian Ambassador, That he would by al means imbrace & entertain the friendship, which the king his master had desired of the deceased Emperour his brother: who, although he had resolued to continue the warre against the Turkes; yet, being hindred by the seditions of Hungary, he was then forced to make a Peace; but now seeing the Turkes (hauing seized vpon Moldauia and Valachia) to practise to inuade uade Transiluania, he would conferre with the Princes and States of the Empire, and aduertise the King what was to be done; perswading him in the meane time to continue the warres. He answered the Muscouites, that he would interpose his authority, for the making of a Peace, betwixt them and the king of Poland, and to prouide a great Duke for those Countries.

The Emperour appoints a Diet at Ratisbone.

Soone after, the Emperour sent his Letters to the Electors and Princes of the Empire, complaining of the Turkes iniustice, and shewing how dishonorable a thing it would be, for the Christian Common-wealth, to suffer so goodly a Prouince to be inuaded, and spoiled by them, without any opposition: writing also his Letters to the States and Imperiall Cities; That, being aduanced to the Empire, his first and chiefest care was to settle peace and tranquillity, and that iustice might be duly administred, and that all iealousies and distrusts being taken away by a firme and desired concord, the states of the Empire might be ready vpon all occasions, with their ioynt forces to resist the enemy of the christian name; specially when against the peace made with him (hauing gotten Moldauia and Valachia) he practised to make Transiluania subiect vnto him: the which being lost, Hungary, and the Empire would be in great danger; and that hauing made a peace with the Persian, he had not desisted to call the treaty of peace in question, and to make a challenge to Transiluania. Wherefore if he should violate the peace, it were necessary they should haue forces, and the sinewes of warre ready, by a bountifull and necessary contribution; for the effecting whereof he appointed a Diet to be held at Ratisbone on the 24 of Aprill, 1613.

The Emperor going from Prague to Viena, GABRIEL BATTORY Prince of Transiluania standing in feare of BETHLEM GABOR (who they said had craued aide against him of the Turkes) sent his Embassadors; and crauing the Emperours assistance, he promised him all subiection, and obedience: and withall he sent him many rich presents. Whereupon the Emperor aduertised the Basha of Buda, that this attempt of the Turkes did manifestly impugne the articles of peace, by the which it was prouided, that the state of Transiluania should not be molested. To which the Basha made answere, that the Christians had driuen away much cattell from Iacerin: That the king of Poland had violated the peace; and that it was to be feared, that he would seize vpon Transiluania with Valachia and Moldauia; and therefore his Emperour was not to bee blamed, if he did seize vpon this prouince, which did immediately belong vnto him. Soone after, the Emperours Embassadour at the Sultans Port gaue him to vnderstand, that he did nourish a monster, and that BATTORI had also sent Embassadours to the Sultan, and had secret treaties with the Bashaes. There came also vnto the Emperor certaine Deputies from the Saxons which liue in diuerse cities of Transiluania who stole away in rustick habits, lest they should haue beene discouered, complaining much of the tyranny and cruelty of BATTORI; and that contrarie to his faith, and the oath which he had taken, he had depriued them of their priuiledges, and had in a manner ruined them. That from the first yeare of his tyrannicall rule and gouernment, he had practised to extirpate and to root out the antient families of the Saxons, making a relation of all his insolencies and tyrannyes: the which I cannot set downe in particular, being tied to straighter bounds. They also vnderstood that BATTORI did craue fauour and aide from the Turkes against the Saxons of Transiluania, excusing himselfe that he had sent Embassadours to the Emperour, being forced thereunto by feare, and that he had sought to peruert and diuert the Emperors minde with presents. CÆSAR hearing all this, bidde them be of good hope, promising to prouide a remedy for their miseries, at the next Assemby of the States of Hungary and the Empire.

Battori sends a counterfeit Embassage to the Emperour.

The cruelties of Battory against the Saxons in Transiluania.

An assembly of the states in Hungary.

The Emperour called an Assembly of the states of Hungary at Possouia or Presbourg, whither he went in person, during whose absence SIGISMVND BATORY sometimes Prince of Transiluania, hauing liued some yeares a priuate life at Prague, died there of an apoplexie, where he was honourably enterred. At the assembly at Possonia, there was much contention, for admitting of Germane souldiers into their frontier garrisons of Hungary. There was great reason to indure it, for that Hungary could not be defended against the Turks without the helpe of Germans; and that an infinite number of all degrees and qualities, had lost their liues in Hungary, it being commonly called the Church-yard of the Germanes. The Hungarians refused to subscribe to this request: but in the end the maior part yeelded; but with a limitation, that both Germanes and Hungarians should be equally admitted; and whereas the Gouernour was a Germane, his Lieutennant should be a Hungarian, and that there should be an equality obserued in their paies; that Walloones, Italians, French-men, and other strangers, should bee held for spoilers rather then defenders of the countrey, and be wholly excluded. And after the conclusion of al this, the Emperors wife was crowned Queene of Hungary, with great pompe & state.

The Emperors wife crowned Queene of Hungary.

1613. The Turks meaning to war in Hungary, is diuerted by his rebels.

In the meane time, the Turks notwithstanding the peace had fired and spoyled many villages and carried away many Christians into captiuity; committing many actes of hostility, so as all men feared a new warre in Hungary; but it happened by the prouidence of God, that the people of Natolia in Asia brake out into rebellion, and burnt and spoiled many places: And in Arabia a certain seditious fellow vsurped the title of a King, hauing drawn vnto him 50000 Æthiopians, and seised on the strong Fort of Aden, vpon the red sea: this was a great prejudice to the Turks, and very beneficiall to the Portugals and Persians. Whereupon, the Sultan, beeing incensed with this new rebellion, and an indignity which the King of Persia had done him, reuoked his forces that were appointed for Transiluania, to be imployed against the rebels of Asia and the Persians; disposing of an Army in the garrisons of the Frontiers of Hungary, commanding them to contain themselues: so as at this time the Hungarians were freed from the feare of warre.

The day for the Assembly at Ratisbone being come, all the Princes and States of the Empire repaired thither, and went forth of the City to meet the Emperor; whom they conducted into the City with great pomp, as you may reade at large in diuerse Authors. In the beginning of this Assembly, the Emperor deliuered to them the chief points and reasons why he had called them; setting down at large the Turks practices to seise vpon Transiluania contrary vnto the Articles of peace; the spoils which he had done, and the preparations which hee had made for war: Moreouer, although there were no fear of the Turk, yet it was necessary to leuie money to supply the frontier garrisons with munition, and for the building of two new Forts in Canisia. Wherefore, he intreated the States, that, considering the common danger, they would consent to make some contribution for the fiue next succeeding yeers, recommending this to the Electors, Princes and States.

The Protestants prefer a petition of their grieuances to the Emperor.

Before they came to the conclusion of these heads, the Deputies of the protestant Electors, Princes and States of the Empire, presented a petition of their grieuances vnto him, requiring to be eased (as they had often done to the Emperor RODVLPHVS) but could not obtain it: But now, seeing that his Majesty did so much desire to settle a peace in the Empire, hee would also be carefull to remoue all obstacles that might hinder it; being the only thing they desired, that, being eased of their grieuances, they might liue friendly and quietly, with the rest of the Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Empire. After which, they made a particular relation of all their complaints, concluding again with a petition to the Emperor for the same; and that if they might be eased thereof, they promised to bee ready to aduance any thing that might concern the publike good or his Majesties dignity.

The Emperor made answer to the Protestants petition, that hee would take consideration thereof; yet admonishing them not to preferre their owne priuate interest before the generall good of the state: but they intreated him, that he would not take it in ill part if they preferred a petition of their grieuances; which they could not auoid, for that in the yeer 1608, when they would not take knowledge of their grieuances, the Diet proued fruitlesse. Thus they pressing relief, and the Emperor standing firm to his first answer, they forbare to come to the Assembly; so that nothing could be concluded. After which the Catholiques made a declaration for the defense of their league, and deliuered it to some of the Councell; wherin they inueighed much against the Protestants of the Vnion, and laboured to lay the blame of all the miseries on them, making a long repetition of their grieuances: which contentions troubled the whole assembly for a long time.

During these fruitlesse contentions at the Diet of Ratisbone, newes came vnto the Emperor, that the Turks had made an irruption into Transiluania. Wee haue formerly made mention of the tyranny of GABRIEL BATTORI in these Countries, and how much he had oppressed the Saxon Cities: wherefore, hauing by this means diuerted the mindes of the Nobility and others, BETHLEM GABOR, who (fleeing his cruelty) had liued hitherto in exile, imbracing this occasion, repaired to the grand Seignior, and solicited him to expell BATTORI out of Transiluania, and to substitute him in his place; promising to be his vassall and tributary, and to deliuer into his hands Lippa, Geneu, and certain other Forts. The Sultan, yeelding to his request, commanded SANDER Basha to expell BATTORI: whereupon, he entred Transiluania with a great Army, and took diuerse places, being accompanied by BETHLEM. BATTORI, aduertised heerof, sent ISTVAN his Generall with a great Army to encounter him: but, being terrified with their numbers, he returned, persuading BATTORI to prouide for his safety. There entred another Basha into Transiluania, by the straights of the mountains not farre farre from Cromstad, hauing defeated the Zecclerians who kept those passages; so as in a maner all Transiluania was in the Turks power. In the mean time, the Turks in Hungary forced many villages to take the oath of obedience to the Sultan; carrying away all their goods and cattell that refused it. The Basha of Agria hauing notice that they cried To Arms in Hungary, Bohemia and Silesia; to suppresse these insolencies, sent an Ambassador to Cassonia to FORTGATSI, Generall of the Army; assuring him, that all these things were vnknowne to him, and that hee was willing to entertain the peace with the King of Hungary & the Roman Empire; that BATTORI had been the cause of all these troubles; whom the Sultan required to haue punisht for his tyranny: but he would not attend and fight with the Turks, but fled vnto Varadine; saying, that hee did it to the end that hee should not fall away from the Emperor, whose aide hee had implored. 1613

The Palatine of Hungary and FORTGATSI sent him some succours, but not such as were able to restore him; and the rather, for that the whole Prouince depended now vpon BETHLEM GABOR: who soon after was appointed Prince of Transiluania by SANDER Basha; with this admonition, that being taught by the example of BATTORI, he should not follow his steps; that he should chuse his Counsellors out of Transiluania and Hungary, and should doo nothing without the Sultans priuity. He laboured to free the further Hungary from the fear of inuasion; the Basha writing to FORTGATSI, that he had onely charge from the Sultan, to expell BATTORI out of Transiluania.

The Emperors speech to the States at Ratisbone.

The Diet at Ratisbone hauing been prorogued vntill the thirtith of September, the Emperor came and made an ample relation of all that had past in Transiluania. He earnestly intreated all the Electors, Princes and States, that as he himself had so much preferred the publike good of the Empire, that leauing his owne hereditary Prouinces, he had come thither not without the hazard of his life by reason of the plague; so they would fall into consideration of their common danger, and raise a certain summe of money for forty moneths, to resist the common enemy; who, hearing of their readinesse, might be diuerted from his enterprises: but, after much debating of these businesses, the Assembly was prorogued till another meeting.

The Emperor remaining with his Court at Linтz, an Ambassador came from Muscouy; who, hauing deliuered his Presents, said, that MICHAEL FENDROVITIVS the great Duke of Muscouy, issued from the great Dukes of Muscouy, and chosen to that Empire by the generall consent of all the Nobles, desired to continue the loue and friendship which the Emperors his Predecessors had with that state; and that he would disswade the King of Poland from his vniust attempts against Muscouy; and be a means that (hauing released some Noble-men which hee held prisoners) he would liue in peace with them. The Emperor, promising to bee a mediator betwixt him and the King of Poland, dismist his Ambassador with rewards.

BATTORI continued at Varadine. The Gouerner of Toccay brought him succours in the King of Hungary's name; who, hearing what numbers hee had brought, said, that they would preuail nothing against the Turks forces; sending presently messengers to Tirnauia and other places for greater supplies. In the mean time he disdained the Gouerners company; resoluing if he could obtain no greater forces, to make his composition with the Turks, and to yield them that Fort for his restitution. The Gouerner, vnderstanding this, conferred with his friends; where they resolued to cut off this incumber, dealing with the Groom of his chamber to kill him as he slept: but when that succeeded not, he perswaded him to go out of the gates to view the Army; where he was shot by his owne souldiers. The tumult being ended, they took consultation with the Gouerner of Varadine to preserue the place for the Emperor: yet he perswaded them not to put any garrison into the Castle, lest the Turks should come and besiege it. Yet soon after, he yeelded it vp to BETHLEM GABOR.

Gabriel Battori, Prince of Transiluania, slain.

BATTORI being slain, the Turks left Transiluania. BETHLEM GABOR called the Estates to Clausenbourg: where they first of all restored all men that had been banished by BATTORI. They concluded free exercise of religion; that the Prince should acknowledge the Sultan for his superior; that he should entertain peace with his neighbours, especially the Roman Emperor; that he should make a league with the Princes of Moldauia and Valachia; that he should chuse his Councell out of three nations, and do nothing without their priuity; that he should maintain all the antient priuiledges; that he should maintain iustice; and that he should not hinder the free election of a Prince whom the Sultan should confirm. There were many other Articles concluded at this Assembly, which are too long to relate. After which, BETHLEM wrote Letters to the Palatine of Hungary, of all his proceedings in this action; concluding, ding that he was aduertiſed, there were ſome that preſumed to inuade ſome places belonging to that Prouince: the which he admoniſhed them not to attempt, ſeeing that he was ready to perform all good offices, to the Emperour, and King of Hungary: But, if they did continue in their deſignes, he would not diſſemble; but that he, and the Sultan in like manner, were bound by oath to defend them, who would haue as great a care as himſelf of the Prouince, and would neuer ſuffer any thing to be drawne away. Wherefore he intreated him, for the loue of his Countrey, and of Peace, to command all his Gouernours and Captaines, not to attempt any thing, whereby any combuſtions or alterations might ariſe, but euery man to enioy his owne in Peace.

Bethlem calles the States to Clausenbourg.

The Turke admoniſh the Staes of Tranſiluania to yeeld obedience to Bethlem

There were ſome yet remaining in Tranſiluania, who, allied to BATTORI, had raiſed ſome tumults; and ſome, deſirous to draw that Prouince to the Emperour, had taken Huſt and ſome other places in his name. The Sultan, hearing this, ſent his Lrters to the Noble-men and Srates, letting them vnderſtand, that when as Tranſiluania yeelded obedience to his predeceſſors and him, they liued in quiet; and had often craued aide from him, and obtained it; concluding that he had made BETHLEM GABOR their Prince, to gouerne the Prouince vnder his protection: But, hearing there were many things done on CÆSARS ſide againſt the Peace, and many Townes and Forts taken; he had fully reſolued not to ſpoile any Fort in Tranſiluania, nor to doe wrong to any man, nor yet to ſuffer any man to doe it, but would defend that Prouince with all his power. Wherefore he deſired the Emperour ſhould know, that if he would haue this Peace inuiolable, he ſhould preſently make reſtitution of the ſaid places, to the Prince of Tranſiluania, or elſe ſignifie his mind vnto him by Letters.

An Aſſembly made by the Emperor at Lintz.

The Emp. continuing at Lintz, cald an Aſſembly of his hereditary Countris & Prouinces, viz. Bohemians, Auſtrians, Stirians, Carinthians, Carniolans, Sileſians, Luſatians, Morauians, and Hungarians: To whom he propounded, that the Peace had been broken by the Turkes, by their many incurſions, carrying away men and cattell, and committing many other inſolencies in hoſtile manner: And the rather, that beſides Walachia, and Moldauia, they had now of late ſeized vpon Tranſiluania, and fortified it with Garriſons, vnder the command of BETHLEM GABOR; that they had aſſembled the Eſtates, and admoniſhed the Emperour by Letters not to meddle with it.

In the end, he made mention of BETHLEMS deſigne, hauing made himſelfe a vaſſaile to the Turkes, to the end the Prouince might be vnited vnto them. Wherefore conſidering how preiudiciall it was to the Chriſtian ſtate, and behoouefull for the Turkes, he held it neceſſary by all meanes to be recouered, ſeeing the time was very fit to make warre vpon either of them. It was further demanded, ſeeing the Sultan did challenge this Prouince as his owne, and would not ſuffer the Germanes, to preſcribe any lawes to the Tranſiluanians, what he ſhould anſwere in this point, That if a Turkiſh Ambaſſador, contrary to the expreſſe conditions of Peace, and inſtructed with no charge, ſhould come, and that the Sultan ſhould refuſe to confirm the ſixt Article of the Tranſaction; whether this Ambaſſadour were to be admitted, and his Letters to be accepted by the Emperour. The laſt queſtion was, whether they ſhould make a new Tranſaction with the Sultan, when as he would not ſtand to the firſt; and how they ſhould proceede in the buſineſſe of Moldauia, Walachia and Tranſiluania; and what they ſhould doe, if Hungary in like ſort ſhould be inuaded before an Aſſembly. The Hungarians made anſwere, that they thought it fit to deuiſe ſome meanes how the Tranſaction made betwixt the Sultan, and the deceaſed Emperor might ſtand firme, and the Emperours authority maintained; and as for future neceſſity, it was fit ſome meanes were prouided for neceſſary defence.

The Iewes expelled at Wormes.

The inhabitants of Wormes had many yeers complained of the intolerable vſury of the Iews: The Citizens deſired much to be freed from this vnneceſſary loade, and to be vnburthened of their Intereſts; intreating the Senate, to puniſh their frauds as it was fit. The Senate therefore, meaning to ſet downe ſome courſe, made a new Edict: but the Iewes deſiring to preuent them, ſent a Petition to the Emperour; who, deſiring to be better inſtructed in the cauſe, required to haue all the Acts ſent vnto him, with the priuiledges of the City concerning the Iewes, which had been granted by former Emperors.

In the meane time, the cauſe was referred to the imperiall Chamber; and a penall iniunction ſent, to pay againe vnto the Citizens, whatſoeuer they had exacted, contrary to the conſtitution of the Empire. In the end, there was a decree made, whereby the Senate was inioyned by the Emperours authority, vpon a penaltie of 10000 marks of Gold, preſently after the receite theof, to reduce all vſury, both future, and that which was paſt, and not paid, to fiue in in the hundred; and that they ſhould ſuffer them to make a defalcation of that which was paſt, vnleſſe they would incurre the ſaid penalty. This Edict was publiſhed in October the yeer before: which put the Citizens in good hope that all things would be well compounded. But, finding their hopes fruſtrate, in the end they reſolued to caſt all the Iewes out of Worms; the which they put in execution vpon the ſeuenth of April, being Eaſter Munday: at which time, ſome 300 of them coming together into the market place, they ſent ſeuenteen into the Iewes ſtreet, to let them vnderſtand, that they muſt preſently depart the City, carrying with them what they held moſt pretious, the reſt ſhould be put in Inuentory; and whatſoeuer they had recouered by iudgement, ſhould be reſtored to them. Hauing receiued this meſſage, they packed away within one houre, much lamenting their hard fortunes. The Magiſtrates blamed the Citizens for this attempt; and they conſtantly maintained the action: and after their departure they ruined their monuments, their Temple, and whatſoeuer belonged to the Iewiſh Ceremony. 1615

The peace reconfirmed betwixt the Emperor and the Turk.

In May, the Emperor being at Vienna, there came a Turkiſh Ambaſſador, attended with a great traine. Being brought to the Emperor, he deliuered his Preſents which were many, with his Letters; containing in ſubſtance, that the Sultan deſired much to maintain the peace with the Emperor; and that he ſhould ſend Commiſſioners to the Frontiers, as he would do, to take view of the wrongs which had been done on either ſide, and to make ſatisfaction. The Emperor, hauing heard his Ambaſſage, went to Prague, and left certain Counſellors to treat with him touching the confirmation of the peace; who ſaid, the Sultan had giuen him great charge to aduance it, for that, being ingaged in diuerſe warres, hee could not attend all together; that the ſonnes of EMIR, Gouerner of Saida, relying vpon the Perſians aid, had lately ſlaine the Baſha of Damaſco; and the ſonne of NASSVF Baſha had been ſtrangled in Aſia, where they put all to fire and ſword. The King of Perſia in like manner did not abſtain from Arms: and the Coſſacks of Polonia did much annoy his ſubiects. Being thus aſſaulted by many, he was forced to retire his ſouldiers out of Hungary to ſend them into Aſia, and to deſire a peace with the Emperor; the which was concluded vpon theſe conditions: that the treaty of peace, made in the yeer 1606, ſhould ſtand firm; and for that, ſince the time of that treaty, there had been many controuerſies for the ſpace of eight yeers, it was agreed, that the peace ſhould bee continued for twenty yeers longer; that, for 150 villages belonging to the Arch-biſhoprick of Strigonia, and had been formerly demanded by the Sultan, there ſhould be ſixty deliuered; that all controuerſies vpon the Frontiers ſhould be compounded within foure months by Commiſſioners; that the goods taken from the Turks at Pallantua by the Haiduques, ſhould be reſtored, and the Authors puniſhed; the priſoners on either ſide ſhould be releaſed, and the Forts built, during the laſt eight yeers ruined; that Prieſts, Ieſuits and Monks, might repair their Churches in the Turks Territories, and celebrate diuine ſeruice; that merchants might freely traffick to Conſtantinople, hauing the Emperors Letters-patents to ſhew to the Gouerners of the Frontiers and to the Ambaſſador and Conſull reſiding there; that the tribute once paid, the party might paſs on freely, and be no more queſtioned; that a merchant dying in the Turks Kingdom, his goods ſhould be deliuered to the Emperors Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople. Theſe Articles were ſigned by the Commiſſioners, and were to be confirmed by both the Emperors.

The Empire, after the peace concluded betwixt RODVLPHVS and Sultan ACHMAT, had not been afflicted with the heauy burden of forrain warres: yet was it not free from inteſtine combuſtions. The pretenſions for Iuliers had drawn all the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire, into factions: and the troubles of Brunſwick, with the mutinies of Branckford and Wormes, had much troubled the Quiet of Germany. The Duke of Brunſwick being dead, ther was hope of a reconciliation betwixt his ſonne and the City of Brunſwick, by the mediation of the Duke of Wittemberg: but, it taking no effect, the Duke preſently raiſed an Army, and beſieged it; and the Beſieged defended themſelues valiantly. The hanſe-towns raiſed forces to relieue them, vnder the conduct of the Earl of Solmes; who, approaching with his Troops, was aduertiſed from the Town, that, if they were not ſpeedily ſuccoured, they ſhould be forced to yeeld: whereupon, he reſolued to force his way by the ſword; which after a long fight hee effected, to the great comfort of the Townſ-men. After which, there was a truce made for ten daies, and in the end a peace concluded vpon certain Articles; which were confirmed by the Duke and the Citizens.

The City of Brunſwick beſieged by the Duke.

At the inauguration of the Emperor MATHIAS, there had been ſome controuerſie betwixt the Senate and the Citizens of Branckford; the which the Arch-biſhop of Mentz and the Lantzgraue of Heſſe compounded, vnder certain Articles: the which the Emperor ratified, and they they promiſed to obſerue. In the yeer 1614, they fell into new combuſtions; ſo as a multitude, led by ſome of the baſer ſort of the Citizens, came to the Senate-houſe, and forced the old magiſtrates to giue-ouer their places. The Emperor, being aduertiſed heerof, ſent a Herald with commandement to reſtore the old Senate: the which the Citizens refuſed to obey, continuing conſtant in that reſolution. The Emperor after this ſent a proſcription againſt the chiefe Authors of this mutiny: whereupon, diuerſe of them were apprehended, and ſeuen of the chiefe executed: ſome were whipt, and others baniſht; being all men of baſe quality.

The Citizens of Worms hauing expelled the Iews as you haue heard, and continued all night in Arms, the Magiſtrates ſent to the Elector Palatine (who hath alwaies had a right of protection ouer the City of Worms, and in acknowledgement whereof they do yeerly pay him a certain fee) intreating him to aſſiſt them to force the Burgeſſes to their duties. The Elector, conſidering the importance of this innouation, ſent forces preſently thither, inueſted the Towne, and planted the cannon. The Burgeſſes cried preſently To Arms: but the Magiſtrate pacifi'd them, letting them vnderſtand that they were no enemies, but their beſt friends; aſſuring them, that there ſhould be no wrong done to any man, nor their liberties infringed: whereupon, the gates were opened, and the guard thereof and of the wals giuen to the ſouldiers. After which, the Magiſtrates making ſearch for the heads of this mutiny, there were twelue apprehended and put in priſon. The next day, in the preſence of the Electors Commiſſioners, the Inhabitants took a new oath of obedience to the Magiſtrate: and the Magiſtrate in like maner took the oath of alleageance to the Emperor and Empire. And thus the mutiny at Worms was pacified without any diſorder or prejudice to any man.

Collonitz put in priſon by the Emperor.

The yeer before, SIGIFRIDE COLLONITZ (a man famous for the great ſeruices he had done the Empire againſt the Turk) hauing called the Bege of Strigonia to combate for that he had willingly ſuffred the Turks to ſpoil his lands, was brought in diſgrace with the Emperor, and committed to priſon at Newſtad: his ſeruants were put in cuſtody, and all his papers & ſecrets ſearched by the Emperors command. But, finding nothing wherewith to charge him, he was releaſed, promiſing to attempt nothing againſt the Emperor nor the houſe of Auſtria: but, ſeeking to be reuenged of thoſe which made ſpoil of his lands, hee was taken again by the ſouldiers of Landau, and brought wounded vnto Vienna; where hee was againe committed to priſon.

The Burgeſſes of Wormes, who had been committed to priſon for the former mutiny, did this yeer on the ſeuen and twentith of May receiue their Sentence, which was to this effect; that a Doctor of the Law, who had pleaded the Citizens cauſe during the tumult, ſhould binde himſelf by oath, not onely to depart the City, but alſo out of the Palatinate and the Biſhoprick of Spirer; and that he ſhould plead no more, and moreouer ſhould pay 1000 Florences for a fine: Of the priſoners, one of them ſhould be ſhut vp in his houſe during his life; yet he ſhould haue leaue to go to the Church to hear diuine ſeruice, and three ſhould be whipt and baniſhed the Empire.

The King of Spain renounceth his title to the Realm of Bohemia.

The Emperor MATHIAS, being without hope of any iſſue, was very careful to leaue a ſucceſſor in the Realm of Bohemia: wherefore he adopted FERDINAND Arch-duke of Auſtria for his ſonne, recommended him to the Noble-men, and ſought by all means to aduance him to that Kingdome. Hauing imparted this reſolution to the King of Spain, hee eaſily procured him to renounce his right; the which the Earle of Ognate the Kings Ambaſſador with the Emperor did by a ſolemn Act, in fauour of the Arch-duke FERDINAND: and the Arch-duke FERDINAND in like manner by a ſolemn Act did promiſe reſtitution thereof to the King of Spaine, if he or his Deſcendents of the right line ſhould dy without iſſue male: which ſeuerall Acts, being paſt at Prague, the Emperor did ratifie and confirm.

The States of Bohemia aſſembled at Prague.

The Emperor, hauing obtained this renunciation from the King of Spain, and from MAXIMILIAN and ALBERTVS his brethren, called an Aſſembly of the States at Prague: where the chief Chancellor made a ſpeech vnto them; that the Emperor, hauing found them ſo faithfull and ready to do him ſeruice, would not onely be thankfull vnto them during his life, but would alſo endeauour to ſettle a future peace in the Kingdome, all cauſes of diſcord beeing taken away. Conſidering therefore that he was mortall, and being dead the Realm with the Prouinces annexed ſhould be left without a King, whereby might follow dangerous innouations, he had therefore reſolued (after the example of his Predeceſſors) to prouide them a good and fit King. Wherefore, ſeeing that MAXIMILIAN and ALBERT his brethren were growne aged, and himſelf not likely to haue any heirs, he had thought it good to adopt the Arch-duke FERDINAND for his many good parts and vertues, that he might bee ſworn and ſolemnly crowned future King of Bohemia; and the rather, for that his brethren would not pretend any title to this Kingdom: and the whole houſe of Auſtria had giuen their conſents to his election. Wherefore hee deſired them to chuſe FERDINAND for their future King, and that they would appoint a certain day for his Coronation; giuing them to vnderſtand, that the Archduke FERDINAND was ready for his part to take the oath, to confirm their priuiledges, and perform all other things that former Kings were wont to do.

1617

The States, hauing conſulted on this propoſition, ſoon after on the ninth of Iune made anſwer to the Emperor; giuing him firſt of all great thanks for his ſingular care for the peace and tranquillity of the Realm of Bohemia, and highly extolling the rare vertues of the Arch-duke FERDINAND. In the end they concluded, that they had choſen the ſaid Arch-duke for their King of Bohemia, and that he ſhould be proclaimed vpon condition, that if his Maieſty ſhould dy without any lawful iſſue male, he ſhould then take vpon him the gouernment of the Realm: and the day of his Coronation was appointed on the 29 of Iune. Moreouer, it was added, that he ſhould confirm to the States before his Coronation by oath, to maintain all the priuiledges, charters, immunities, municipall rights, conſtitutions and cuſtomes, as the Emperor and his Predeceſſors had done; and for that this confirmation, during the Emperors life could not bee performed, but muſt neceſſarily be deferd til his death, he ſhould a month after deliuer it in writing to the chief Burgraue of Prague if he were then liuing, or to the firſt officer of the kingdome; Moreouer, before his Coronation he ſhould promiſe to the States by writing, that hee would not deal with the gouernment, nor attempt any thing without the Emperors conſent, and the chief officers and Senates; that he ſhould reſt content till the Emperors death, with the title of elect and crowned King of Bohemia: the which if he ſhould infringe, the States ſhould not be bound to yeeld him obedience. After which, the Archduke FERDINAAND was proclaimed King of Bohemia, and crowned with the accuſtomed ceremonies.

The Arch-duke Ferdinand choſen & crowned King of Bohemia.

This made the hundreth yeer compleat after that MARTIN LVTTHER had oppoſed the Romiſh doctrine, and propounded his queſtions at Wittemberg againſt TEZELIVS his indulgences, reducing all to the triall of Gods word. IOHN GEORGE, Elector of Saxony, a Princeful of zeal and religion, in memory heerof commanded a Iubile to be celebrate throghout all his Electorate; writing to the Diuines of Lipſick, that whereas 100 yeers before it had pleaſed God to ſtir vp MARTIN LVTHER publikly to oppoſe the Popiſh doctrines, and to begin to reform religion, which had hitherto bin maintaind in al his territories againſt their diueliſh practices; He had decreed by good aduice to inſtitute a ſolemn feaſt, to thank God; the which ſhould continue 3 daies, from October. 31, till Nouemb. 2, commanding them to giue publick notice in their pulpits, to the end the people might prepare themſelues accordingly; that vpon the Eue the Pſalms ſhould be ſung, and preparation made to receiue the Communion the next day; that on either of the feaſt daies they ſhould haue two Sermons, one in the morning, the other in the afternoon, and their Text ſpecially appointed out of the holy Scriptures to that vſe. Which Iubile was duely obſerued in Saxony; and in imitation thereof, at Heidelberg in the Palatinate, and in other Prouinces and Cities of the reformed religion, was celebrated with great ſolemnity: and there were pieces of gold and ſiluer coined, both by the Elector of Saxony, and by ſome other Towns, in memory of this ſolemnity.

In the end of this yeer, the States of Hungary were aſſembled at Poſſonia or Presbourg. The Emperor went to Vienna with his wife and whole Court: but not able to aſſiſt at this Aſſembly by reaſon of ſicknes, he commanded FERDINAND, King of Bohemia, to ſupply his place. The reaſon of this Aſſembly, was, to redreſſe many grieuances, and to chuſe a King who might ſucceed the Emperor: in which, relation was made to the States of the Emperors great loue to Hungary, and his deſire to haue bin there preſent, if his infirmities had not preuented his reſolution; telling them, that as the peacefull gouernment of that Kingdom had bin alwaies dear to him, ſo he would vſe all means, that (peace being ſettled at home and abroad) all interrupting occaſions might be taken away. And conſidering his great age, and the many infirmities which did accompany it, he feared that the eſtate of Hungary would bee very miſerable, if hee ſhould dy before a new King were choſen to ſucceed him, of whom the ſafety of the Country might depend; which otherwiſe might be ſubiect to popular tumults and the incurſions of their neighbours: the which the Emperour deſired might bee preuented. Imitating therefore his predeceſſors, he requeſted they would preuent the calamities of future times, by their preſent counſells, and chuſe a King to ſucceede him, and to take vpon him the gouernment of that 1618 Realme, if his Maiesty should dy without any lawfull issue male: for the effecting whereof, MAXIMILIAN, and ALBERT Arch-dukes of Austria his brethren had not onely renounc't al their pretensions by Letters to the crowne of Hungary, but had often intreated him, that (forasmuch as they were aged and without children) he would provide for the necessity of that kingdom, by some other meanes. Wherefore he held it iust, profitable, and fit for the good of the State, that FERDINAND king of Bohemia, his cosin Germane (whom his Maiesty for his excellent parts, had adopted for his son) should be chosen, proclaimed, and crowned king of Hungary by the States. Wherefore he intreated them louingly (the former reasons considered) that they would chuse and proclaime his deare chosen sonne, King FERDINAND, for king of Hungary; assuring the estates that King FERDINAND should promise faithfully by his reuersall Letters, not to meddle with the gouernment of that Realme, without his maiesties expresse wil, and the aduice of the Hungarians; but should content himself with the bare title of king of Hungary, vntill that his Imperiall maiesty should otherwise dispose or dy; and if he should attempt any thing to the contrary, the States should be freed from their oath of obedience. Moreouer: that he should do any thing for the confirmation of the priuiledges of the kingdom, liberties, immunities, and all other things thereunto belonging, as the Emperor, and other kings of Hungary his predecessors had formerly done.

Whil'st they are about this proposition at Possonia, the Protestant States of Bohemia, made an assembly at Prague, the Emperour being absent at Vienna, for that his Letters Patents had beene violated. The Archbishop of Prague, hauing caused some of the Protestant Churches to bee ruined, and the subiects who had complained thereof put in prison; some Counsellors which remained at Prague, excused the fact, maintaining that there was nothing done against the Emperors Letters, nor the prouinciall constitution. The Emperor being aduertised of this assembly, admonished them by his Letters to forbeare, hearing that this assembly was made against his person: That what had beene done by the Archbishop was by his command: That they had exceeded the boundes of his Maiesties graunt, and had presumed to take vpon them the protection of others subiects, in an vniust cause against his sentence: That they had complained of his Maiesties Letters for the abrogating of the transactions, and bringing in souldiers into Bohemia, whereby they bred iealousies in the ignorant people, and had brought him in hatred with his faithfull subiects; whereby many dangers, and tumults, might arise in his absence, which he neuer had expected from some of them: That they had abused his bounty, and exceeded his grant: And that it was their duties to preuent all innouations and combustions. He had therefore resolued, after due inquiry to punish the authors. In the meane time he commanded them to forbeare from all assemblies, vntil he himself were present, or did otherwise determine: That they should not meddle with other folkes business, nor minister any occasion of sedition and tumult.

The Emperour complaines of the Protestant States of Bohemia.

This admonition did so little preuaile, as the States were the more incensed, seeking by all meanes to aduance the Assembly, against those that opposed it. The day being come, and the States being assembled, with some of the Citizens, out of all the Tribes of Prague, there was a Sermon in the Bohemian tongue for the preseruation of Religion, and the Churches not onely in Prague, but through the whole kingdome against their malitious aduersaries who sought to subuert them. On the 23 of May, the Noblemen came on horseback to Court, euery one hauing a seruant with two pistols charged; where they deliuerd their grieuances before the councellors and chiefe officers of the kingdom. The chiefe Burgraue, and POPPELIVS the grand Prior of S. MARIES, did seeme to yeeld vnto their requests: but SLABATA chiefe Iudge of the prouince, and SMESANSIVS opposed themselues; wherefore the States calling away the other two, they took SLABATA, SMESANSIVS, with a Secretarie, and cast them headlong out at a window, into the court of the Castle, the which was very deepe, yet by the will of God they were preserued aliue. There grew presently in the castle a great amazement and tumult: whereupon some of the States, and among them the Earle of Thurn, went through the city on horseback, perswading the people not to feare, nor to attempt any thing, promising that no man should be wrongd; and that they would maintain what had been done, and presently aduertise the Emperor thereof. The people being pacified and the chiefe Burgraue conducted quietly to his lodging, the States did binde the officers of the castle, with the gouerner, and porters and all the inhabitants of the three townes of Prague, vnto them by oath: and meeting daily in the prouincial chamber, being guarded by 800 shot, they made a league, promising to fight against the common enemies of God, the King, and Religion; and in that cause to liue and dy; to which end they prouided for the leuying of a good Army.

Some of the Emperors counsellers cast out at a window in Prague.

Hauing

Hauing afterwards published an apology, and declared the reasons why they were forced to prepare for their defense, they sent Letters also to the confederate Princes and States of Silesia, Moravia and Lusatia; whereby they acquainted them with all things that had past, and craued their aid in their future necessity. 1618

Letters from the protestant states of Bohemia to the Emperor.

By the defense or Apology which they had published, his Imperiall Maiesty might vnderstand (said they) the reasons why they had attempted to punish SLABATA, SMESANCIVS and FABRITIVS, as troublers of the publick peace; who by their traiterous practices, sought to deprive them of all the liberties granted them, and confirmed by the Emperor RODOLPHVS and his Majesty, and of all liberty of religion; practising such dangerous factions, that they had been able to ouerthrowe the State if God had not preuented it; that they must necessarily proceed to the punishment of some other factious people of the same quality: whereof they thought good now to aduertise his Majesty, as hauing regard to the dangers which threatned him in particular, and them in generall, hauing means in some sort to preuent these dangerous conspiracies which tended to deprive his Majesty, of the Realm, and them his faithfull subjects of their liberties: They had sought the meanes to maintain the Realm of Bohemia belonging to his Imperiall Majesty: and for that the States could not alwaies continue vnited together at Prague, they had therefore chosen Directors of the State of the three Euangelicall Orders; that remaining still there, they might ordain what they thought necessary for the preseruation of the immunities and priuiledges which his Majesty had granted: wherefore they hoped his Maiesty would hold them excused, hauing not attempted any thing with an intent to offend him or any of his Catholick subjects that were louers of peace; being ready to imploy their liues and goods for the defense of his Imperiall Majesty their soueraign Lord.

The Iesuites expeld Bohemia.

After this, they made a decree against the Iesuits, as the Authors of all the miseries and afflictions which had hapned in Bohemia and in many other Realms & States of Christendom; comparing them to the Templars, and saying that they had incited murderers to kill Kings, which would not liue after their manner; that they meddled with affairs of State, and held all them hereticks which were not Roman Catholicks; that they had slanderously defamed the Protestant States, and had made an explication contrary to the Letters of pacification made in the yeer 1609; that they had drawn the whole Countrey into the hands of certain perfidious Catholicks, by whose practices the Country was in danger of ruine. For which causes, they banished them for euer out of the Realm of Bohemia; enioyning them to depart within eight daies, and neuer to return: and to keep them from spoil during the time prefixed, they set 50 musketiers before their Colledge and Church. As for the other religious Orders, the said States took them into their protection; and the Earl of Thurn prouided daily to haue the begging Friers & the Cappuchens supplied with victuals.

Letters from the Emperor to the protestant states of Bohemia:

The Emperor, hearing of these alterations, wrote to them, that he could not allow of that which they had done in the Castle of Prague against the Counsellers of State, before they had been accused and heard; that they ought not to haue made so great leuies of souldiers without his priuity (seeing that no man declared himself their enemy) nor by consequence to aduance the ruine of Innocents, who knew not to what end all this tended; wherefore he enioind them to dismisse their souldiers, and not to attempt any thing against the ordinances of the Realm; that he would not conceal, that, hearing of their preparation to Arms, he had also commanded leuies to be made, as well for the defense of the Realm of Bohemia and of his faithfull subiects, as for the maintenance of the rank & authority which he held: yet he assured himself, they would rather imbrace peace than war, and not force him by their disobedience to come to Arms; the which he would willingly forbear if they would performe their duties.

And to the princes and States of the Empire.

The Emperor, seeing he could preuail nothing by his Letters and declarations, and that the Protestant States of Bohemia prepared still to Arms, therefore wrote his Letters to the Electors, Princes, and other States of the Empire, thereby to hinder them from making any leuies in the said States; aduertising them of all that had hapned in the Castle of Prague; and that the authors of these combustions, disdaining all obedience, and making no account of his remonstrances, persisted still in in their first resolution; and that to the preiudice and contempt of his Imperiall Maiesty, and of his soueraign dignity of King of Bohemia, they leuied soldiers from all parts, yea in the Roman Empire: and for that they did it without his expresse command, and against the Edicts, he aduertised all the States of the Empire to take order that no leuies of souldiers should be made in the Towns and other places of the Empire.

The Bishop of Spire had for some yeers laboured to fortifie the Towne of Vdenheim, seated 1618 vpon the riuer of Rhine, with good walls, large ditches, and strong rampiers, against all externall inuasion. The Elector Palatine had often sought by perswasions to diuert him from this worke: and the City of Spire had a priuiledge, that no castle or fort should be built within three miles of their city. The report was that SPINOLA had beene the Author of this fortification; and that he would man it with a strong garrison; it standing very commodiously in a marish ground, to hinder the free passage of the riuer of Rhine: The vnited Princes and States of the Empire after their assembly at Hilburne, sent 4000 horse and foote with 1200 Pioners to this Castle; which (being yeelded vnto them, without any opposition) they raised and laied euen with the ground; the Elector Palatine soone after publishing a declaration of the reasons which had moued him thereunto.

Ferdinand chosen and crowned king of Hungary.

The Estates of Hungary proceeded slowly, and were in a manner in suspence, by reason of the troubles in Bohemia; yet in the end they proceeded to the Election of FERDINAND king of Bohemia for their King in Hungary; but with these conditions: That hee should religiously obserue and cause to bee inuiolably obserued all the liberties, immunities, priuiledges, statutes, rights, and customes, of the Kingdom with the conclusions and treaties of Vienna, with all the Articles comprehended therein, and all others concluded both before and after the Coronation of the Emperours Maiesty in the yeares 1608 and 1609. The which Articles, being many in number I here forbeare to set downe in particular, being tied to straighter bounds. Which Articles being ratified by the Emperor vnder his Letters Patents, they proceeded to his coronation according to the accustomed manner.

The Emperors letters to the directors of the States of Bohemia.

All things tending to Armes in Bohemia, the Emperour sent Letters vnto the Directors for the Protestants Estates, whereby he assured them of his fatherly loue and affection, and gaue them meanes to suppresse the disorders and combustions within the Realme; yet in the meane time he had beene aduertised of the attempts and violences committed by the Earle of Thurn, who marching with his Army to Budouitz, had summoned the Consuls and Senators, as hee had donne the Magistrates of Cromlau, to dismisse the Emperours garrison, and to yeeld the towne vnto him, if not hee would put all to fire and sword: That it was not fit that hee being Emperour should endure these indignities: Wherefore hee was forced to commaunde the Leaders of his Army to enter speedily into Bohemia, to defend his faithfull subiects from all oppression: whereof he thought good to aduertise them, that by the consideration of the ruines which would follow this war, they might desist from their enterprise, and thereby auoid the assured ruine, which threatned them and theirs.

The answere of the directors to the Emperors letters.

To this Letter the Directors made answere, protesting that the Earle of Thurn had not committed any spoiles about Budwitz; but onely aduertised the inhabitants not to entertaine any strange souldiers; That he could not doe lesse then signifie these defences vnto them, being conformable to the ordinances of the Realme; That in case they would dismisse their souldiers and receiue no new garrison into their towne, the estates would forget that which was past; But hauing made refusall, and declared themselues enemies to the countrey, it was no wonder if the Earle had vsed some threats, although he had no intent to hurt them: Whereof the towne of Cromlau was a good example, whereas they forced not any man, nor put any souldiers into the towne, for that they had obeyed, and dismist their garrison; and therefore it was not needfull, that the Emperour should draw an Army into Bohemia, in regard of Budwitz, hoping that hee would neuer willingly consent thereunto, nor giue way to the pernitious counsels of their enemies. After this there were other replyes and answeres, touching the bringing in of forces into Bohemia, which I cannot insist vpon.

The Protestants Army in Bohemia.

The Protestant States hauing assured themselues of many townes and places within the Realme, resolued to make two Armies: the one vnder the leading of the Earle of Thurn, which should ly about Budwitz and towards the frontiers of Austria, by the which the Emperours troupes might enter into Bohemia; the other vnder the commande of the Earle of Mandsfeldt to besiege and force some townes within the Realme, which would not submit themselues to the Protestants obedience. Finally their troupes increased daily both of Germane souldiers and other strangers of their religion: And the protestant States of Silesia had leuied 6000 horse and foote, for the guard (as they said) of their prouince; But in effect it was to enter into Bohemia and to succour their confederates.

The Emperours Army.

The Emperours Army consisted of 10000 horse and foote, with many commanders and Captaines: as the Earles of Bucheim, Tampierre, and Colalte, HENRY IVLES of Landemberg Prince of Saxony, Marada, and Molart. The Earle of Bucquoy was expected with some troupes

Troops, and should be Generall; the which in the beginning bred some iealousie, and crossed their designes. It was bruited they meant to besiege Prague; where the Inhabitants laboured daily in the fortifications of the new Town: yet this Army did nothing but preserue it self and Budvitz. The Earl of Tampierre had commandement from the Emperor to enter with his Army into Bohemia, and to crosse the Earl of Thurn's designes vpon Budvitz. Coming to Bistritz, it yeelded; into which he put a garrison, thinking to do the like at Neuhaus: but hee was preuented by a garrison the Earl of Thurn had put into the Town and Castle. Whereupon the souldiers fired the suburbs; giuing new occasion of discontent to the Protestants against the Emp. 1618

Exploits of the Emperors Army in Bohemia.

Some fewe daies after, he attempted to force Neuhaus by Petard: but he was forced to retire with the losse of 200 men. Notwithstanding this disgrace, he entred further into Bohemia, and took Pilgrum and Polna. He had a designe to seise on some place vpon the riuer Sasslaua, within 7 or 8 leagues of Prague, there to fortifie himself, and to be daily at the gates of that great city: but the Protestants meeting him neer that riuer, there was a great skirmish and many good soldiers slain of either side. The Earl of Tampierre was forced to retire for want of victuals; who in his return lost many men, slain by the Peasants. These exploits did incense the Protestants very much against the Emperour, for the ruines and the burnings which the Earles Haiduques had committed.

Cardinall Clesselius sent captiue into Tiroll.

But let vs come to Vienna. King FERDINAND being returned thither with the Arch-duke MAXIMIL. they tooke counsell to remoue Cardinall CLESELIVS from Court, sending him word to come vnto the Castle at two of the clock in the after-noone, on the 20 of Iuly: whereupon he took his Coach with the Popes Nuntio, hauing much priuate discourse with him; where being arriued, he dismist the Nuntio, and went towards the Arch-dukes Cabinet. Being met vpon the way, he was giuen to vnderstand that the Arch-duke was not well, and desired to be excused; and being led into another roome, he was told that the house of Austria had decreed (with the Popes consent) not to suffer him any longer in Court, for his bad gouernement in the Prouince, and many other causes: wherefore laying aside his Cardinals habit, he should take an ordinary black gowne (which was offered him) and should presently follow such as attended for him. The Cardinal (who could not auoide it by any protestations) was presently conueyed by a secret passage to a Coach, and so conducted vnto the confines of Stiria, and from thence to Tiroll, with 200 horse. His secretary and seruants (who attended for him in the Court) were cald into the Arch-dukes Cabinet, where being commanded to deliuer the Cardinals keyes, they were committed. This was done with such secrecy, as no man discouered it in Court, neither did the Cardinals seruants know it, vntill at night they saw their Lords house searcht, and his goods seized. The Cardinal being sent away; the King and the Arch-duke went vnto the Emperor, whom they made acquainted with what had past.

In Bohemia the Protestant States, seeing the insolencies which the Imperialists had committed, wrote vnto the Emperor, and to the Electors Palatine and of Saxony, and to the Protestant States of Silesia, to make their complaints of the insolencies and violences which had bin done: And they did also write vnto king FERDINAND, and to the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, to moue his Imperiall Maiesty to giue eare vnto a good Peace.

Princes and other States assist the Protestants of Bohemia.

All the Protestant Princes and States of Germany, or neighbors to Bohemia, assisted them with men, money, or counsell, except the Elector of Saxony; who did all good offices to reconcile this quarell, being a friend to the house of Austria. The Protestants of Morauia and Silesia in the beginning sent Ambassadors to the Emperor and the Protestant Directors at Prague. The Morauians imploied themselues effectually to procure a peace, and refused to aid the Protestants of Bohemia: but at the yeers end they changed their opinion. As for the Princes and Protestant States of Silesia, they made shew to haue a particular intereest in this war with the Bohemians; to whom they sent 6000 horse and foot. They publisht a declaration to iustifie their action; concluding, that they found this trouble was meerly by reason of the contrauentions and persecutions made for religion; the Catholicks hauing raised the Protestants Temples, and committed them to prison which had built them; that the Emperors Officers, of causes of religion made crimes of rebellion; that the Protestants of Bohemia had surprised Letters of the Iesuits; containing, that The time was come that Bohemia would be assured for the Catholicks, and that the Protestants would be depriued of their priuiledges; and the edicts for the peace of religion, reuoked: the which the said Iesuits had often preacht in their Sermons: that if the Princes and States of Silesia had knowne there had bin any other action against the Bohemians but for religion, they would not haue succoured them; desiring aboue all things to be most obedient to the Emperor.

The Electors and Protestant princes write to the Emperor.

The Prince of Orange and the States of the vnited Prouinces promiſed to aſſiſt them both with men and money. The Earl of Hohenlo or Hollock brought them goodly Troops out of the Duchie of Brunſwick. As for the Electors and Princes of the Vnion of Germany, who did much affect the Bohemians for their religion, they wrote to the Emperor, that experience and nature taught how precious a thing publike peace was; that they could neuer haue imagined, that his Imperiall Majeſty would haue ſuffred Bohemia to haue been engaged in ſo violent and cruell a warre, ſeeing there had been means to preſerue his royall authority, and to contain his ſubiects in obedience; that the ſucceſſe of ciuill warre was doubtfull, and the end ruinous and miſerable; that it was greatly to be feared, that this ciuill warre of Bohemia would ſet the neighbour-States on fire, and breed a great alteration during his Raign; that the queſtion being touching priuiledges granted to the Proteſtants of Bohemia for the liberty of their religion, they doubted not but if his Imperiall Maieſty would grant them a fauourable hearing, all things might be wel reconciled, ſeeing that many Electors and Princes offred to imploy themſelues: wherefore they intreated him to continue the propoſition of peace which they heard he had made, to pardon his ſubiects offenſes, to reſtrain his ſouldiers violences, and to quench the fire which was in his State; it being alſo to be feared, that the Turk, imbracing this occaſion of ciuill warre, would break the truce, and inuade the reſt of Hungary.

The Earl of Bucquoy enters into Bohemia.

Count BVCQVOY arriued in September with ſome Troops, and marched towards Budvitz; where, at his coming to the Army, he made a proclamation vpon pain of death, that none ſhould ſet fire vpon any place, nor commit any violence. They write, that, beeing at Vienna, it was tould him that the ruſtick and new ſouldiers of Bohemia would bee eaſily vanquiſhed: but he found the contrary, being at Budvitz; where there were two Armies, one of either ſide the riuer of Maloz: the which made the Earle to contain himſelf within his trenches.

Foure Arbitrators appointed by the Emperor to treat a peace in Bohemia.

The Emperor hauing reſolued to referre the difference betwixt him and the Proteſtants of Bohemia, to the arbitrement of foure perſons, two Catholiques, and two Proteſtants; that is to ſay, the Elector of Mentz and the Duke of Bauaria, Catholiques; and the Electors Palatine and of Saxony, Proteſtants: to them he wrote his Letters, intreating them to take ſome paines to reconcile this difference; appointing the place of their meeting to bee at Pilſen. The Elector of Saxony ſent one preſently to Prague, to exhort them to accommodate themſelues to the Emperors intention. To whom they anſwered, that they would willingly referre themſelues to thoſe foure Princes: but as for the place of meeting (hauing reſolued to beſiege Pilſen) they could not yeeld vnto it, the Inhabitants beeing Catholiques, and great enemies to the Proteſtants; deſiring him to conſider that the Directors abſenting themſelues, the Imperialiſts might make ſome enterpriſe vpon the Towns of Prague; whereof the ſurpriſe which the Earle of Tampierre had lately made of the Town and Caſtle of Cammits, was a ſufficient proof.

The Earl of Mandsfelds had commandement from the States to beſiege Pilſen; and the Inhabitants, ſeeing the Army approach, ſet fire on the ſuburbs. The Emperor heerupon wrote to the Elector of Saxony, and taxed the Bohemians to haue beſieged the Town, which he had appointed for the conference; deſiring, that the ſaid Electors Ambaſſador ſhould return to Prague, and propound a ſuſpenſion of Arms in the Electors name to preuent the forcing of Pilſen, and to reſolue with the Directors vpon the aſſurance of the conditions and the place of conference. The Electors Ambaſſador went to Prague, where he had nothing but words from the directors. The Duke of Bauaria wrote alſo vnto the ſaid States, that if they continued this ſiege, they would ſhew the contrary to that which they had formerly publiſhed in their apologie and proteſtation.

The directors reaſons for the ſiege of Pilſen.

The Proteſtants, growing then ſtrong, made anſwer to the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Bauaria, that they had not been well informed of the cauſes of the ſiege of Pilſen; the which they would not haue vndertaken, if there had not been great occaſions offred; that the Inhabitants of Pilſen had promiſed to ioin with them in friendſhip, and had broken their faith, ſuffring a new garriſon to come into their Town; which had ouerrun the whole Prouince, taken many Proteſtants of quality priſoners, ſpoiled the Country, and ruined the Farms of the Proteſtant Nobility; and ſeeing that no warning could diuert them from theſe acts of hoſtility, they had reſolued to preſent a ſiege to draw them to their duties: but they grew more inſolent, threatning to ruine all the Proteſtants houſes within the Prouince: Wherupon, they had giuen commandement to the Earle of Mandsfelt to preſſe the ſiege, that the Inhabitants might be forced to vnite themſelues with the other Towns of Bohemia, and to liue in peace.

The Earl of Thurn in the mean time going towards the Frontiers of Sileſia to ioine with the Mar-

Marqueſſe of Iagerndorff and the Sileſians, the Earle of Bucquoy made an enterpriſe vpon the Towne and Caſtle of Neuhaus, meaning to ſurprize it by night; but it ſucceeded not, for hee found the garriſon and inhabitants readie in Armes, ſo as hee durſt not attempt to batter it. The Earle of Thurn hauing ioyned with the Sileſians, being within twenty foure houres march, he returned with his troupes to Buduitz. The Earle of Thurn hauing recouered Pilgram, with all the places which TAMPIERRE had taken at his entrie into Bohemia, he made his Armie to turne head, to charge the Earle of Bucquoy in his lodging at Camnits; whereof beeing aduertiſed he cauſed his troupes preſently to returne towards Buduits: yet he could not doe it ſo ſpeedily, but the Proteſtants Fore-ward came to skirmiſh with the Rere-ward of the Imperialiſts, whereas BVCQVOY had ſome difficulty to retire his Cannon: and if he had not broken a bridge, and lodged ſome Harquebuziers in a wood, where the Proteſtants were to paſſe, he had beene in danger to haue beene defeated. The Proteſtants hauing paſt the wood, they returned againe to fight: the which was valiantly maintained on both ſides, during five houres ſpace; but if the night had not fauoured the Imperialiſts in their retrait, the Proteſtants had gotten an abſolute victory. The loſſe was equall: but the Proteſtants had the place of battaile, and 200 priſoners.

The Earle of Thurne comes to charge the Earle of Bucquoy.

Thirty waggons taken by the Proteſtants.

After this exploit the Earle of Thurne hearing there were 30 waggons comming from Viena to Buduitz, with a conuoy of 800 men, he laied an ambuſh for them: which charging them within a mile of Buduitz, they put the ſouldiers to flight, and took the waggons. The ſiege continued ſtill at Pilſen: where hauing made a breach they were vpon tearmes of compoſition, but the inhabitants grew obſtinate; whereupon MANDSFIELD doubted his batteries, and made a great breach right againſt a houſe which the Emperor RODVLPHVS had built; the which the ſouldiers took by aſſault and lodged there. Yet the inhabitants and garriſon annoyed them much from S. BARTHOLMEVVS Church, and began to ſet fire on their houſes to keep them from paſſing: ſo as all things tended to a great ruine and deſolation, if God in an inſtant had not mollified their hearts on either ſide.

Pilſen reduced vnder the obedience of the proteſtants.

The Proteſtant commanders forſeeing the ruine and inuitable loſſe of this towne, and the conſequence thereof, ſent to aduiſe the Burgeſſes and ſouldiers not to loſe themſelues, and that there was meanes to giue them an honourable compoſition: that the Burgeſſes ſhould bee preſerued in their goods and liberties, ioyning to the vnion of the Proteſtant eſtates, carrying all their Armes into the palace, an deliuering the keyes of the towne vnto the Earle MANDSFIELD: As for the ſouldiers (if they would not ſerue the States) they ſhould depart with their Armes and bee conducted to a place of ſafety: and ſo the towne was yeelded the next day vnto Count MANDSFIELD, and ſome of the ſouldiers followed the Proteſtants Army.

Cromlau taken by the Imperialiſts.

After the taking of Pilſen, all the towns of Bohemia yeelded to the Proteſtant Eſtates, except Buduitz, and ſome few places thereabouts, which were couered by the Imperiall Armie: and the Earle of Bucquoy extending his limits took Cromlau, which he mand with a good garriſon. Winter being farre aduanc't, the Directors lodged part of the Earle of Thurn's footmen in Newhaus and other townes neare to Buduitz and Cromlau. With the reſt (being in a manner all horſemen) the Earle tranſported the warres into Auſtria, making an incurſion within nine miles of Viena, where they ſpoiled many Burroughes, Monaſteries and Churches, and among others the Abbey of Swethall (which was a retreat for the Auſtrian Boot-halers) in the which they found a great bootie: they chaſed away the Abbot, who retired to Vienna; and hauing mann'd it with a good garriſon, they returned into Bohemia with great ſpoiles. The Emperour hearing that the Sileſians were in COVNT THVRN'S Foreward, hee wrote vnto the Princes and Proteſtant States of Sileſia, that he would neuer haue thought the Sileſians would haue attempted to come and ſpoile his faithfull ſubiects of Auſtria: That the Proteſtants of Bohemia hauing demanded ſuccours to defend themſelues, he would not beleeue that they would haue imployed them to wrong him out of Bohemia, and in the view of his capitall City of Auſtria: wherefore he aduiſed them to retire their troupes.

The Emperors complaint to the States of Sileſia.

The Sileſians deſiring to be ſatisfied in this point, The Proteſtants of Bohemia made them anſwere, that they were not to be blamed for this attempt, ſeeing that the Auſtrians had come into Bohemia, and committed horrible inſolencies, and carried away great ſpoiles; the Abbey of Swethal being their firſt retraite; ſo as they had reaſon to ſeize vpon that Abbey, to preuent their enemies entring into their countrey that way: That their enterpriſe to tranſport the warre into Auſtria, was done for two ends. The firſt to force their enemies to ſeeke a peace. The second, that there were many Protestants in Austria which desired to vnite themselues in the cause of religion with the Bohemians and Silesians, and to be assured of the liberty of Religion: That the same day they had receiued Letters from the States of Morauia, signifying, that they had dismist their Gouernor and his Lieutenant, being Roman Catholiques, and had established Protestants, and that they desired to vnite and combine themselues with all the other Protestants of the neighbour Countries, for the defence of Religion. That they also expected Letters from the Protestants of Austria, both aboue and beneath Ense, and their answere made vnto the Emperor: wherefore they intreated the said States, and Protestant Princes of Silesia, not to giue credit to their enemies, but to beleeue that the entry of their troups into Austria, concerned the generall good of the Protestants of all the neighbor Prouinces to Bohemia.

The Emperors demands to the Protestants of Austria.

The Protestants of Austria aboue the Riuer of Ene, hauing built a Fort vpon the Riuer of Danuow, to hinder the passage of the Forrest by the which they entred into Bohemia, the Duke of Bauaria and the Townesmen of Passau, gaue charge vnto their Agents to make their complaints vnto the Emperour: who at their requeast sent the chief Marshall of his Court to the said States, to perswade them to raze that Fort, to leaue a free passage into Bohemia by the Forrest; to carry themselues louingly and friendly towards the Earle of Bucquoy, Generall of the Imperiall Army at Budweitz; to relieue him with corne and victuals, and to suffer the Souldiers to passe freely from Bohemia into Austria, and from Austria into Bohemia. Thereunto the said States made a long answere; That the Fort was built vpon the lands of Austria, with no intent to offend any man, but only for the defence of the Countrey. That they were not resolued to open the passage by the Forrest, by reason of the Neighborhood of the Bohemians. That it would be dangerous vnto them to haue any familiarity with Count BVCQVOY, seeing they were so neere to the Bohemians, who might easily inuade and spoile their Countrey, as they had threatned by their Letters. As for the victuall and munition which was demanded for the Armie, they were ready to supply him, so as the Earle would send for it and fetch it at his own perill.

1. Answere.

1619 2. Answere.

The Protestant States of lower Austria, being prest by the Emperour to make head and resist the Bohemians, and to preferre the publique good before their owne priuate Intrest, touching the point of Religion: they made answere, That they had great cause to complaine of the Catholiques, for that they could not enioy the free exercise of their Religion, granted by the deceased Emperour MAXIMILIAN: That they could hardly beleeue that his Imperiall Maiesty would euer haue attempted a warr against the Bohemians, without the generall consent of the States of Austria, and without their approbation being then assembled, and hauing not made them acquainted with the causes of that Assembly: That whatsoeuer concerned this warre of Bohemia, was kept hidden from them as a mystery, and that the Earle of Bucquoy Generall of the Army, and the chiefe officers being strangers, it had giuen them cause of discontent and iealousie: For that they could not obtaine from the Catholiques an answere to their iust demand, for the free exercise of their Religion: That they doubted not if they had taken aduice at the generall Assembly of the States of Austria before the beginning of this warre, all the ensuing miseries had not happened; as might be verified by former presidents: That his Maiesty refusing in this action to follow the antient presidents, and to giue care vnto the wholsom counsell of the Electors and Princes, it was reasonable that the miseries which had happened should be imputed to those which gaue him counsell to warre, who should now finde meanes to free their countrey from so many afflictions: That they would not aduize his Imperiall Maiesty to begin a warre, knowing that the end is alwaies doubtfull, and the errors irreparable: much lesse to such a warre as this, in the which we may behold plainely the ruine of Bohemia, with the ouerthrowe of Iustice, of the Lawes, and all good constitutions, and which drawes after it all sorts of miseries: That to diuert all these great calamities, and more, which threatned those Countries, they could giue his Maiesty no better aduice, then to make choice of some worthy personages of the States of Austria, to send them vnto the Directors of Bohemia, to exhort them to abstaine from all acts of hostility; and that his Maiesty for his part would doe the like, and then call a generall Assembly of the States of Bohemia, and there to consult of the meanes to settle a peace in their countrey.

An enterprise vpon Cromlau.

On the 8 of Ianuary the Protestants had an enterprise vpon Cromlau, where the Hungarians were in Garrison: who were aduertized of this plot, and were in Arms; so as they returned to their quarter neere to Newhaus, without any exploit. In this returne, the Earle of Bucquoy sallied forth of Budweitz with 1000 horse, to giue them the chase: but he found opposition and sharpe incounters, so as the Protestants forced the Imperialists to retire towards Budweitz: Some write that that there were slaine of both sides 500 men, and that the losse was equall.

In the beginning of the yeere, the Emperour wrote his Letters to the Directors of Bohemia, to induce them to a suspension of Armes; and the Elector of Saxony (to whom the Emperor had referred the conditions) sent his Ambassadour also to the Directors, to know their will: But, they excused themselues, that they could not giue any answere, without the aduice of the States of Silesia: Yet afterwards they sent him an answere, and intreated him to consider well how this suspension might be made, and vpon what assurance, that it should not be violated: For, all these troubles (said they) hay no other beginning, but for promises made and not obserued: That the Earle of Bucquoy, Generall of the Army, was a stranger, and had no dignity in the Romane Empire: That hauing many times transgrest euen the Emperors commandements, and continued the burnings in Bohemia, he might when he pleased breake the suspension: And that in the last troubles of Austria, during the Truce, the Earle of Tampierre had transgrest; to whom they only made a verball reprehension. Hereupon the Elector of Saxony, seeing the Emperor with the States of Morauia, Silesia and Austria, desire a treaty for the concluding a peace with the Bohemians; he appointed the place of meeting in the Town of Egra, on the foureteenth of April: whereof he aduertised the Directors of Bohemia. 1619.

Proscription of the Earle Mandsfeldt.

The Emperor was much incensed against Count ERNEST of Mandsfeldt, who had commanded the Protestants Army at the siege of Pilsen: whereupon, hee caused a proscription or banishment to be set vp against him in all the publike places of Vienna; intimating, that whereas by the Imperiall constitutions, all men of what dignity or quality soeuer were forbidden to carry Armes against the Emperor, or against any State of the Empire vpon paine of Proscription; to the end that the Peace of the Empire might be the more religiously obserued: yet it was notorious, that ERNEST of Mandsfelds had not only leuied souldiers without his priuity, conducted them into Bohemia, and imployed them against his faithfull subiects; but also had besieged and forced the Towne of Pilsen, whereby he had incurred the punishments inflicted by the said constitutions: Wherefore according to the same he declared him a Proscript and banished man, abandoning his life and goods to him that could take them.

The death of the Emperor Mathias.

The Directors of Bohemia, being aduertised that they leuied in Flanders six thousand Foote and two thousand Horse for the Emperour, they sent forth a commandement, That all Bohemians, hauing attained the age of twenty yeers, should be ready in Armes; the Caualiers with two horses, and the Souldiers with their Musket or Harquebuze, and reduce themselues into companies. Moreouer, they gaue them to vnderstand, that touching the suspension propounded by the Emperour, there had been nothing concluded by the Elector of Saxony, who had only said that the Assembly to treate of a Peace should be held at Egra, and that they should begin by a suspension of Armes; the which was not very certain to be concluded, for that the Earle of Tampierre, hauing leuied new troupes, had renewed his incursions; putting all to fire and sword as he past, and that comming into the towne of Graessen, and not able to take the Castle, he had set fire of the Town. On the tenth of March one thousand six hundred nineteen, the Emperour MATHIAS died in his Castle at Vienna, being sixty two yeers old and fifteene daies. After which FREDERICK the Elector Palatine, and the Electors of Saxony, being Viceroyes of the Empire during the vacancy, wrote their Letters vnto all the Princes and States of the Empire, in their seuerall Iurisdictions, for the maintenance of the Peace of the Empire, vntill the Election of a new Emperor.

The Earle of Thurn enters Morauia.

The Protestant States of Bohemia, by their decree, had expelled the Iesuites out of Prague, and out of the whole Realme, who retired to Brin in Morauia, which is a member of the Crown of Bohemia: Into the which the old Earle of Thurn was now entred with an Army, to draw them into an offensiue and defensiue league with the Bohemians; vnder fauour of whose Armes the Protestants of Morauia sent their Deputies to an assembly at Znaim. The Cardinall of Dietrichstein, who was great Master and Captaine generall of Morauia for FERDINAND, had called an assembly of the Catholique States at Brin, and with the said Cardinall ioyned the Senate, the Prince of Lichtenstein, the Baron of Tzerotine and others, who would gladly haue maintained their Faith to FERDINAND, but they wanted forces to make good their authority: For the Burgesses and Towne-house enclined to the Protestants, whose deputies came with a conuoy of 800 horse from Znaim to the gates of Brin; where they entred the third of May, and went presently to Councell: and soon after the Townesmen went to Arms, drawing in 7 Cornets of German horse-men: Then they seized vpon the keyes of the Towne, the Ports, Bulwarkes, and all the approaches.

After

1619 After this, the Proteſtant States came from Councell to the market-place: Where inuironed by the Towne-men they inuited one another to take an Oath there publikely in the ſight of heauen, to maintaine the liberty of Religion, the authority of the States and their priuiledges. From thence they went to the Cardinall, to the Prince of Liechtenſtein, Tzerotin, and other Noblemen Catholiques, being in their ſeuerall lodgings: who ſeeing this alteration and apprehending the danger, gaue them to vnderſtand, that they deſired Peace, and to maintain themſelues vnited with the Proteſtants, for the preſeruation of the authority of the States. But this could not ſatisfie them: For in the end they commanded the Cardinall to forbeare to call himſelfe Captaine generall of Morauia, or to execute the charge, which he promiſed to doe; and alſo to ſend back his Commiſſion to King FERDINAND, and to remaine vnited to the will of the States: And it is written that the ſame night of the third of May, they ſent a Commandement vnto the Cardinall and to TZEROTIN, not to goe out of their lodgings vpon paine of death, placing guards about them.

Cardinal Dittrichſtein and Tzerotin, detained priſoners by the Proteſtants.

The next day, they changed all the officers, depoſed the Papiſticall Senators, and placed Proteſtants. In the end, they made an irreuocable Decree to baniſh the Ieſuites out of Brin and Morauia, as the Bohemians had formerly done: And on the laſt of Iuly following, a generall Lengue was concluded betweene the Proteſtants of Bohemia, Sileſia, Morauia and Luſatia, vpon certain Articles, which are too long to relate.

The Ieſuites expelled Morauia.

The Directors had reſolued to preſſe the States of Morauia to chaſe the Ieſuites out of their Prouince, for two reaſons which moued them. Firſt, That ſince they had been chaſed out of Bohemia, they had practiſed to breake the vnion and correſpondency which the State of Bohemia had with the States of Morauia, and their neighbours: And Secondly, That they animated the people to hold good for the houſe of Auſtria. Whereupon, the Directors of Bohemia made a Proclamation in Brin with the conſent of the Magiſtrate, that the Ieſuites ſhould depart out of Morauia within fifteen daies, vpon paine of corporall puniſhment: But, for that it was not made in the name of the States of Morauia, the Ieſuites regarded it not. Whereupon the Directors of Bohemia ſent two Commiſſaries, who (fauoured by the Magiſtrates of Brin) went directly to the Ieſuits Colledge; and finding them ready to ſit downe to dinner, commanded them in the name of the States of Bohemia to depart the Towne preſently. The Ieſuits deſired leaue to take their refection: which being denied, they were forced to pack vp their baggage and begon. Before they were a league out of Brin their Colledge was on fire, and burnt with ſuch violence as it was wholly conſumed, and ſome twenty houſes adioyning. The Proteſtants ſaid that it was a practice of the Ieſuits to ruine the Towne of Brin: and the Ieſuites on the other ſide affirmed, that the Proteſtants had ſet it on fire to incenſe the people, to maſſacre both them and the Catholiques.

The exploits of the Imperials.

The Earle of Thurne after the Emperours death vpon an aduertiſement giuen him by the Proteſtants of Auſtria, of an enterpriſe vpon Vienna (which they held aſſured by reaſon of the great intelligence they had with them of their Religion) being entred into Auſtria, hee was aduertized vpon the way that the enterpriſe was diſcouered: which made him returne into Bohemia, hauing receiued ſome loſſe by the Imperialiſts. The Earle of Bucquoy, being in Budwitz, with ſome forces more then ordinary, hauing receiued the Troupes of Hungary, and 1000 horſe from the Low-countries, he reſolued to goe out Budvitz with his Army to aſſaile the Caſtle of Natolic; the which being ſummoned yeelded preſently: After which, he went and forced the quarter of Count MANDSFELDT, and defeated all his troupes being 3000 men; at which charge they tooke ſeuen Enſignes, two Cornets, the one being Count MAMDSFELDTS, three peeces of Ordinance, eight or nine hundred ſlain, one thouſand foure hundred priſoners; among which there was a Captaine of Horſe, ſeuen of foote, foure Lieutenants, ſix Enſignes, and the Sergeant Maior to Count MANDSFELDT: And ſo hauing taken a great booty, they returned to Budvitz: Herupon the Proteſtants, being with their Army within two leagues of Budvitz, retired in order of battaile, towards Verinau and Newhaus.

Count Manſfelts quarter forced by Bucquoy.

The Directors of Bohemia, ſeeing the Imperialiſts fortified, and to haue had good ſucceſſe in ſome enterpriſes, they ſent vnto the Proteſtant States of Morauia, Auſtria, Sileſia, and Germany, for ſuccors: and withall they wrote Letters vnto BETHLEM GABOR Prince of Tranſiluania, acquainting him with the eſtate of their affaires, and the cauſe of their warres; intreating him to aſſiſt them in the generall defenſe of Religion. To whom he made a long anſwere; aſſuring them, that for the pacifying of thoſe combuſtions in Chriſtendome, he would not be an idle ſpectator, but would imploy both heart and hand, to find out fit and holſome remedies: But Bethlems Letters to the Directors of Bohemia.

But for that his Countrey lies in the very mouth of the Turke, who in his Connſells (like vnto the waues of the Sea) is neuer quiet, but ſtill watchfull vpon the leaſt diſcord of Chriſtians (and the rather now, when as all things were pacified in Aſia and Perſia) to take from them all meanes to annoy, and to inuade the neighbour Prouinces, and (the diuiſion of Chriſtians being ſpeedily ſuppreſt) to ſettle a more firm ſecurity, he had propounded vnto himſelfe two things: The one, to procure the fauour and good liking of the Ottoman Emperour, for the working of this reconciliation; the other, that he might truely vnderſtand the ſtate and intent of the States of Bohemia: wherefore by the Prouidence of God, theſe occaſions did ſo concurre, as he vnderſtood by their Letters of the ſeuenth of Auguſt, how they ſtood affected vnto him; And in like manner, on the ſeuenteenth of the ſame moneth, he had receiued from the Sultan, his conſent and fauour (beyond his expectation) for the preſeruation of Chriſtian affaires. Whereupon, he promiſed to be with an Army the next moneth vpon the confines of Morauia, vnleſſe ſome great cauſe ſhould ſtay him in Hungary; perſwading them to preſerue their forces together; and not to hazard any battaile before his comming. 1619

Bethlin goes with an Army into Hungary.

The Directors hauing ſent an Ambaſſadour with Letters in anſwere of his; vpon the receipt thereof, hee preſently gathered together a great Army at Clauſenbourg: with the which, he marched into the higher Hungary, with eighteene Cannon: Where, the people being terrified, hee reconciled the Noble-men vnto him, HVMANOI only excepted; who, being too weake to make reſiſtance, fled into Poland.

Caſſouia taken.

He ſent part of his Army to beſiege Caſſouia: the which being vnable to make reſiſtance, and out of hope of all ſuccors, yielded vnto him, taking an Oath to BETHLIN, and the States of Hungary. This ſtrooke a great terror into the Hungarians, and made the Ieſuites and Clergy-men to flie the Countrie.

THE LIFE OF FERDINAND THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND TWENTITH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

()

THE death of the Emperour MATHIAS being publiſhed; the Elector, Archbiſhop of Mentz, Chancellor of Germany (according to the duty of his charge) gaue notice thereof to the reſt of the Electors of the Empire; and appointed a day for their meeting at Franckford vpon Mein, on the tenth of Iuly this yeere one thouſand ſix hundred nineteene, for the chooſing of a new King of Romans: Whither, FERDINAND King of Bohemia, with the Electors of Mentz, Cullen and Treues came in perſon: but, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Marqueſſe of Brandenbourg, ſent their Ambaſſadors. Before they fell to the Election, they entred into conſultation touching the combuſtions of Bohemia; writing Letters to the Directors, importing that they were deſirous to imploy their beſt care and endeuors to compound the diſſenſions which had growne betwixt them and the deceaſed Emperour MATHIAS, and their new king

The Electors meete at Frankford to chooſe a king of Romans.

FERDI-

1619 They write vnto the Directors of Bohemia.

FERDINAND, according to right and equity, and to settle a desired peace in the kingdome; entreating them to com to Ratisbon the 20 of Nouemb. following, remouing al impediments which might make the treaty difficult; and in the meane time to abstaine from all acts of hostility: but receiuing no answere, they gaue them to vnderstand by other Letters, that FERDINAND (being chosen Emperor) had promised to be present at the treaty of Ratisbone, or to send his Ambassadours: wherefore they thought good to admonish them, that they might prepare themselues accordingly; and so moderate their counsels, as all extremities being layed aside, all men might conceiue an vndoubted hope of the conclusion of a peace.

The Bohemians oppose against Ferdinand touching the Electorship.

The Directors of Bohemia were carefull to send 3 Ambassadors to Franckfort to the election; but, they were not suffered to enter into the towne: whereupon, they retired to Hannaw: from whence they wrote Letters vnto the Elector of Mentz, intimating, that King FERDINAND had no right to the Electorship of Bohemia, for that he had neuer beene in actuall possession of that kingdome; neither had the summation beene made immediately to the residence of Prague as it ought to haue beene, but was sent directly to Viena. Wherefore they humbly entreated him to impart their Letter vnto the rest of the Electors, and take order that the Diet assigned might be suspended and deferred vntill the troubles and combustions were pacified, and the point of Election decided: If not, that they would be pleased to call the States of the Crowne of Bohemia to the Diet, for that they pretended a proprietarie right to the Election. But, this preuailed nothing with the Ecclesiasticall Electors; who would needs proceede to an Election: so as on the 18 of August, FERDINAND was chosen King of Romanes, and crowned the 30 with the accustomed solemnity.

Ferdinand crowned king of Romanes.

This Emperour was called Arc-hduke of Austria of Grets in Stiria, to distinguish the Families. For, the Emperour FERDINAND the First had three sonnes. MAIMELIAN, the eldest (who succeeded him in the Empire) had diuerse sons; all which were stiled Arch-dukes of Austria, without any distinction. FERDINAND, his second son, was intituled Arch-duke of Austria of Grets; from whom this Emperour now liuing, descends. And CHARLES, the third son to FERDINAND the First, was Arch-duke of Austria of Inspruck.

These ciuill warres of Bohemia troubled the mindes of many Christian Princes, fearing that this distraction would open a gappe for the barbarous Turk to aduance his conquests in Christendome. Our Kings Maiesty of great Britannie (who hath alwaies been a Prince of peace) desirous to see these dangerous warres suppresst in the breeding, by some good accord; sent an honourable Embassie by the Lord HAYS, Viscount of Doncaster, now Earle of Carlile, to FERDINAND newly chosen Emperour, to treate of a reconciliation betwixt him and his subjects of Bohemia; but it did not sort with his Maiesties religious intent and desire; for in the Interim, the States of Bohemia (being distasted with the reiection of their Ambassadours at Franckfort, and before the receit of the Electors Letters after the Emperors Electors) being assembled together in Prague with the Deputies of the incorporated Prouinces, concluded and protested by oath, neuer to acknowledge FERDINAND for their King, resoluing to proceede to a new Election; so as on the 26 of August Stilo vetere they made choise of FREDERICK the Fift Elector Palatine of the Rhine to be their King; whereof they aduertised him by Letters, and that he had beene solemnlie proclaimed; yet he would not presently accept of this election, without the aduice of the Princes and Protestant States of the vnion in Germany; whom he entreated to meete at Rottemburg, to assist him with their counsells: where they were all of opinion, that he should accept of this dignity, as necessarie for the generall good of Germany, and of other Princes and States their confederates.

The Bohemians reiected king Ferdinand and chose the Elector Palatine.

The manner of the Electors acceptance of the Crowne of Bohemia.

The manner of the Bohemians proceeding to winne the Elector Palatine to allow of their Election and to accept of the Crowne, hath not been written so particularly by any Author, as I haue receiued it by the relation of a worthy iudicious Knight, who was in those parts, and informed himselfe curiously of euery circumstance how it past. The States of Bohemia (as he saith) hauing made choice of the Elector Palatine to be their King, sent their Ambassadours vnto him being at Heidelberg in the lower Palatinate: whom although he entertained well; yet he gaue them a dilatorie answere, being not yet fully resolued: which was the cause of a meeting at Walfaxon in the vpper Palatinate, betwixt the Elector Palatine and the Directors of Bohemia. At this assembly, the Elector seemed not vnwilling to embrace so braue and free an offer: yet he held it not fit to accept thereof suddenly and rashly; knowing well to what cares, toiles, and danger, this dignity was subject: and therefore he entreated them to haue patience and to respite him for a time, vntill he had acquainted the King of great Britannie his father-in-law, with with their Election; whose approbation he much desired in the acceptance therof: whereupon he sent CHRISTOPHER, Baron of Done, as his Ambassador, to acquaint his Maiesty with their proceedings; promising, vpon his returne, to giue them a direct answere. 1619

The Lords of Bohemia held themselues no way safe, vntill they had preuailed with the Elector Palatin, and wonne him to accept of that Crowne; being conceited that if he were once crowned, not only himself, but all his friends and allies would imploy their forces, and be engaged in their defence. Whereupon, they took aduice, what persons they might treate withall, and who had greatest power and interest in the affection of the Elector: In the end they fell vpon CHRISTIAN, Prince of Anhalt, to whom they made such golden promises both for himselfe and for all such as depended vpon him, as he forgot the dutie of a true and faithfull counsellor, and became one of their partie; preuailing so much by his perswasions with the Elector Palatin, as he yeelded suddenly to accept of the Crowne of Bohemia, before the arriuall of his Ambassadour into England.

The Elector Accepts of the Crown of Bohemia.

The offers which the Bohemians made to the Prince of Anhalt and the rest, were, That the Prince should be Generall of all the Army: That CHRISTOPHER, Baron of Done, should be Chamberlaine of Bohemia; That TOTHOSIVS, his brother (who was afterwards sent hither as Ambassadour) should haue the best marriage in Bohemia; and (which was worst of all) that the Earle of Holoch should be made Lieutenant generall of the Army. These great offers drew all these great persons (who aymed at their owne priuate ends) to the Bohemians purposes: Besides, they gaue way to others in both the Palatinats, to come into those places which these men had formerly enioyed. The King being crowned, and these men possessed of those places, they did as needy greedy men vse to doe, looking only to their owne profit, and neglected wholly the honour of the King and safety of the State; still disgracing Count THVRN and Count MANDSFELDT, who were the only men that euer gaue good counsels, or performed any worthy and generous Act during the warre.

The newes of the Electors suddaine acceptance of the Crowne of Bohemia, were very distastefull to our kings Maiesty, the Prince Palatines father in law; who held it a president of dangerous consequence for all Christian Kings; to auow this suddaine translation of a Crowne by the authority of the people; nor yet warrantable by the word of God, to transferre a Crowne vpon any pretext of Religion, being bound to obey our kings and temporall superiors whatsoeuer they be: and therefore he protested to remaine Newter touching the affaires of the kingdom of Bohemia.

The Emperour, after his coronation, went to Ausbourg: and from thence (being accompanied by the Duke of Bauaria) he came to Munich, the Dukes chiefe place of residence; where he had a princely reception. During his abode there, as some write, he had much conference with the Duke, touching the warres of Bohemia; promising, that if he would assist him in those warres, he would giue him the Electorshippe of the Rhyne and the vpper Palatinat, for a reward of his labour: and for such summes of money as he should disburse, he ingaged vnto him lands in the vpper Austria. This was a sweet baite, able to moue any ambitious Prince to forget all the ties & bonds of blood and consanguinity, vpon hope to adde a Princely title to his own dignity, and a large extent of land to his Territories. You may presume by the future euents what their conclusion then was: After which the Emperour went to Gretz and so to Vienna.

The Emperors promise to the D. of Bauaria.

In the meane time before the Emperours returne into Austria BVCQVOY hauing taken Pisseck in Bohemia, he resolued to goe to Thabor: But, being preuented by the Bohemians, hee went and encampt at Merovits. The Bohemians followed him, and campt opposite vnto him, obseruing all his enterprises; so as they had many skirmishes: And the fourth of September, a troupe of Spaniards, going somwhat farre from the Campe, were charged by the Bohemians, and siue hundred of them slaine. Thus the two Armies lay encamped; when as suddenly BVCQVOY receiued aduertisement, from the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, of the vnexpected comming of BETHLIN GABOR into Hungary; commanding him to man his chiefe Castles and Townes, and to returne into Austria: But, before his departure out of Bohemia he took the Castle of Resemberg; and hauing fortified all the passages he left the Countrey. After which, the Bohemians sent part of their Army to recouer Bechin: the which they forced with the petard, slew most of the Garrison; and took the Gouernor with his Lieutenant, and sent them to Prague. After which, they recouered Thin, which BVCQVOY had formerly taken: and in the meane time the Earle of Tampierre had taken Lundebourg in Moravia for the Emperor; but with great losse of his men.

Bucquoy goes out of Bohemia.

1620 GABOR, hauing settled all things at Cassonia to his will, sent RHEDI and SETSCHIVS with 1800 men, and twelue peeces of Ordinance to Fillec and other places; which yielded vnto them. Then writing their Letters to other townes vpon the Frontiers, they exhorted them to submit themselues willingly to the Transiluanian; assuring them that this expedition was made with the knowledge and consent of many States of the Christian Common-Wealth. After which, they subdued Vaccia, Tirnau, Neutra, Nouigrade, Possinga, and others: The Haiduques of Iermath deliuered vp their Gouernour with the Fort. After which, Neuheusal yeelded, and the Gouernor was sent bound to Cassouia. The Palatine of Hungary wrote his Letters to BETHLIN GABOR, exhorting him to remember his Faith to the Romane Empire and his common Countrey, and to desist from his enterprises. And withall, writing to RHEDI, he wisht him to consider how great the powers of the Kings of Spaine and France were, who were so strictly allied to the house of Austria, and that the Electors of the Empire (some fewe excepted) would vndoubtedly send succours to CÆSAR. Whereunto they answered, that they doubted not of the forces of the Kings of Spaine and France, or of the assistance of the Electors of Germany; but they did hope before their comming all should be finished, and their dinner made ready.

The Palatine of Hungary exhorts Bethlin to desist.

In the meane time there was an Assembly of the Princes and States, held at Preslaue in Silesia, for the confirmation of that which had been concluded by the States of Bohemia at Prague; where they had concluded, that King FERDINAND, now chosen Roman Emperour, had depriued himselfe of the kingdome of Bohemia and the rest of the Prouinces, and that the States and all the subiects were freed from their oath of obedience; whereby they had recouered their right to choose a new King; whereupon they had elected FREDERICK, the fift of that name, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bauaria, and Elector of the sacred Empire, for their King. This was confirmed by all the States of Silesia; who exacted a solemn Oath from the Clergie of Preslaue, that they should faithfully obserue and keepe what-soeuer had beene formerly decreed in the Assembly at Prague, and liue a quiet life, free from all practices against the Protestants: That they should attempt nothing against the Emperours Letters-patents, touching the excercise of Religion; that they should respect no mans fauour, nor hatred: that they should not be diuerted from their Oath with any intreaties, or rewardes, promises, or threats; nor with any absolutions, treaties, constitutions of Councels, or Decrees Not to keep Faith with Heretiques, or any other exception whatsoeuer. All which they did wittingly and willingly renounce, vnder the penalty ordained by God and the Magistrates, and the losse of all their benefices, faculties, and goods which they held in Silesia.

The Elector Palatine hauing settled his affaires in the Palatinate, and committed the ciuil gouernement to IOHN Duke of Dupons, a Prince of that house, and the affairs of warre to IOHN Earle of Nassau the elder; he went with the Princesse his wife, and children and his whole Court to Amberge, from whence he certified the Elector of Saxony by his Letters, of his resolution, and of the reasons which had induced him to accept thereof. To whom the Elector of Saxony made a generall answere; concluding, that he referred all to the prouidence and will of God, wishing with all his heart, that he might imbrace such counsell, as might be fitting for his Electorall and Kingly dignity, profitable to his subiects, honourable to the whole Empire, helpefull to the kingdome of Bohemia and the annexed Prouinces, and might tend to the procuring of a Peace, and the auoiding of all ruine and desolation. In the meane time, he would pray vnto Almighty God to diuert all danger from the bounds of the Empire, and that no occasion might be giuen the Turks, to obtaine that which hitherto they could not do by Arms.

In the beginning of October, a Collonell called GOLTSTEINE, entred Bohemia with 400 shotte, committing infinite insolencies and spoiles in the territory of Saser: where the Countrey-men fell vpon them, and slew most part. Count BVCQVOY, being called out of Bohemia by the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, presently took Horne a Towne in the lower Austria, and left it againe, and then marcht to Suam, a Towne in Morauia, with nine thousand Horse and Foote; which hee presently summoned: but the Garrison prepared for defence; and he, hearing that twelue thousand Hungarians and Transiluanians drew neere, marched away by night, and went to ioyne with the Earle of Tampierre. In the meane time, the Transiluanians ioyned with the Bohemians, and Morauians; and certaine companies of the Hungarians left the Earle of Tampietre, to goe vnto the Transiluanians.

The Transiluanians ioyne with the Bohemians.

A great fight betwixt the Imperials and the protestants.

The Earle of Thurn, seeing himselfe thus fortified, hauing six and twenty thousand men in his Army; resolued, with RHEDIUS Generall of the Transiluanians, to goe and fight fight with Count BVCQVOY; who, finding his forces too weak, left his first lodging, and went and encamped at the outward bridge of the riuer of Danuow: whither the Archduke LEOPOLD came from Vienna to view the Army. The enemy came with great fury vpon the reareward, and slue fiue hundred of the Earle of Tampierre's men. LEOPOLD presst Count BVCQVOY to fight: but he, finding his counsell to be very dangerous, contained himselfe within his Camp. In the euening they began to skirmish; the which continued almost till midnight; their ordinance playing continually, with no small losse on either side. In the morning, the Fight beganne againe very furiously; where many were slaine and murdered by the ordinance. The Earle of Bucquoy had a great losse in his Camp, there being three barrells of powder set on fire by negligence and carelessesse, and very many slaine and drowned in the riuer. The Fight continued vntill it was night: but, being ouerpressed by the Bohemians, they abandoned a Fort at the end of the bridge, and retired vnto the other side, breaking the bridge after them. The number of the dead bodies was vncertaine: but there were very many carried the next day vnto Vienna in waggons, whereof most died soon after. Count BVCQVOY was shotte into the arme; and his Lieutenant Generall had three seuerall wounds, but they were not mortall. 1619.

BETHLIN GABOR in the mean time marcht with a great Army to Presburg, taking in the way the Castle of Petronel, the which he burnt. The newes heerof being brought vnto Vienna, they sent three companies of foot with three piece of ordinance by boat; which entred the suburbs of Preisbourg on the 13 of October. The night was very tempestuous, rainy and windy; and the Transiluanians imbraced this occasion, and surprised the souldiers, who slept without fear; whereof most of them were slain, and their Commander with some few others fled away. The suburbs being surprised, BETHLIN summoned the Palatine to answer him, whether he would defend the Town and Castle, or yeeld it without force. Hauing some daies granted to consult with PALFI and other Noble-men; being not able to defend it, he resolued to yeeld it. Bethlin takes Presbourg.

In the mean time, the new elect King of Bohemia, with his wife, children, and whole train, came to Walsacken; whither the Ambassadors of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces came vnto him: whereas one, in the name of all the rest, deliuered the reasons why they had reiected the Emperors gouernment in Bohemia, and made choice of him to be their King; giuing him many thanks for his acceptance, and praying for his happy and long continuance. Which ended, he deliuered vnto them his reuersall Letters: by the which he promised before his Coronation to take the oath after the example of his predecessors Kings of Bohemia, to confirme all the priuiledges, immunities, liberties, rights, statutes, and the antient laudable customes of Bohemia; and especially the Charter granted by the Emperor RODVLPH the Second, as king of Bohemia, to the States and Inhabitants of the said Realm, for the free exercise of their religion, or whatsoeuer else might concern the good of the Realm and the incorporated Prouinces: which Letters of reuersall were confirmed vnder his hand and seal; these being receiued by the Deputies, they returned to Egra. After which, the King with his Queen and whole Court past on, and arriued at Prague the last of October.

I may not omit the Elector Palatines course before his going into Bohemia. Hauing met with diuerse of the confederate Princes at Rottenbourg, before his departure hee sent to the Arch-bishop and Elector of Mentz; to whom he propounded, that whereas it had pleased God that he had been lately chosen King of Bohemia, and was resolued to accept thereof, he desired to know of his Grace, in what tearms his estate stood with the Electorall house of Mentz; and whether that correspondency which had for a long time been maintained betwixt both houses, should continue still firm and inuiolable: and whereas the Prince Palatine vnderstood, that there were good forces neer at hand, hee demanded whither they went, and whether his Grace would vouchsafe them passage. To these the Elector of Mentz answered, that he would obserue the antient correspondency which the Electors of Mentz haue had with the Electors Palatines, inuiolaby in all lawfull things; that touching that which concerned the tumults in Bohemia, hee was appointed no Iudge, neither did they concern him; as for the Army, he knew nothing certain: that hitherto he had denied no man passage, and continued still in the same minde, so as they gaue good security according to the constitutions of the Roman Empire, to repair all damages: yet he would conferre touching this Article with the other Electors. And soon after, the Vicar generall or Gouerner of Heidelberg had staid all the reuenues of the Clergy, which they of Mentz, Spire, Wormes, and the Teuton Knights hold in the Palatinate. The Palatine to the Archbishop of Mentz, and his answere.

The Elector of Mentz, being moued with the many complaints of the Clergie, sent vnto the 1619 Vicar generall and the Councell of the Palatinate, to expostulate with them for the seizure of the Clergies rents; adding withall, that hitherto there had not onely a good concord been maintained betwixt the Electorall house of Mentz and the Palatinate; but, before the departure of the Prince Elector Palatine to Prague, he had sent an Ambassadour for the confirmation and future maintenance of the said correspondency betwixt both houses, so as he neuer expected this prohibition would haue been made by so good a neighbour. Whereunto they made answere, That they were not ignorant of the promises made on either side; but, being aduertised that the Clergy had promised a great summe of money to the Crowne of Spaine, for the oppression of the Bohemians, to whom the Elector Palatine was especially bound; for this consideration they had granted this inhibition of Ecclesiasticall rents, neither were they to be blamed, nor any man of iudgement would thinke it fit for aide to go vnto forrain Princes, out of the territories of their owne Prince, to subdue the Bohemians, and their Lo. the PALATINE: If therefore the Elector of Mentz, and others whom it concerned, would take a course that there should be no aides sent to preiudice the Bohemians, and their Lord the Palatine; then no other resolution might be expected: And soon after the Elector of Mentz, hauing written other Letters to the Elector Palatine, freed the Clergy from this inhibition.

A complaint.

The answere of Counsellors of the Elector Palatine, to the Elector of Mentz.

The King of Bohemia (as we haue said) being comn to Prague on the last of October, was met by the Directors and Nobility, with certain troups of horse and foot, and so was conducted into the Citty, they being all in Arms; where he was receiued with great ioy and acclamations. After which, it was decreed by the generall States of Bohemia, That the king should receiue a moity of the tributes, rents, and contributions; and the Queen, a fourth part; and euery man should pay his due, yeerly, at the feast of S. GEORGE: That the Directors should be freed from their Oath, and giue an account vnto the Assembly, of such money as they had disbursed for the Common-weale; That the Directors and Gouernors for the kingdom, should yield the gouernment of Arms vnto the king, who should imploy them for the defence of himselfe, the kingdom, and incorporated Prouinces; vsing yet the aduice of the Governors of the Realm and Prouinces; That Commissioners should be sent out, to examine what harms had bin done in the Countries, that consideration might be had therof at the next State-assembly, &c. MANDSFELDT, meaning to recouer certain places which BVCQVOY had taken, marcht to Wintzenburg; where, the Gouernor refusing to yield vpon summons, the Earle forced a Port with the Petard; where, entring, he put all the garrison to the sword, except some fewe that were taken prisoners: After which, diuers towns and Castles yeelded willingly, the garrisons departing to Budwitz. Then the Earl marcht to Praguditz, where the garrison put themselues in defence; but he took the town by force. On the 24 of October the Army marcht to Wodean: which they knowing was but weakely mand, and that two Noblemen of Bohemia (which had serued the Emperor) were retired into the town, hauing stopt all the passages, they sought to force it; but the garrison made great resistance: yet the next day the Gouernor compounded to depart: the which was willingly granted, so as the two Noblemen might be deliuered vnto them, who were sent to Prague, and committed to prison.

A decree made.

Diuers townes recouered by the Protestants of Bohemia.

All things in the meane time were made ready for the coronation at Prague; a Theater was erected in the Temple; no suspected person admitted; all cloysters and corners searcht for feare of treason; the Chanons and Clergy men remoued out of the Cathedrall Church, and another appointed them for diuine seruice, and a weekely stipend allowed them: They changed the Armes of the kingdome vpon the new-gate; and for those of the house of Austria which stood vpon the breast of the Lion of Bohemia, they set the armes of the Palatinate. All things being thus in a readinesse, FREDERICK was crowned King the fourth of Nouember, all the Citizens and souldiers being in Armes. The office was performed by the Administrator and an Elder, who supplied the places of Bishoppes in that action, the which was performed with great pompe and zeale. The particularities whereof you may reade at large in GOTARDVS. And on the seuenth of Nouember the Lady ELIZABETH, wife to King FREDERICK was in like manner crowned with the same ceremonies. After which, the King made publike declaration of the causes which had moued him to take vpon him the gouernement of Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces, sending it to all Christian Princes and States; and withall, writing particular Letters, That he had receiued the gouernement and Crowne of Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces, with the accustomed solemnities, and the generall applause of all the States and people; That no priuate profit of his owne had induced him thereunto; but, a desire to free the afflicted from a generall ruine had moued him to take vpon him their Protectiprotection; and that he would equally defend both Catholiques and Protestants, in the free exercise of their Religion; hoping they would ioyfully allow of his dignity, and not faile to assist him, with their counsel and aide, against the inuasion of his Enemies. 1619

On the tenth of November there came an Ambassador from BETHLIN GABOR and the States of Hungary to Prague, who propounded certaine Articles to the Councell. First, They required that there should be a perpetuall League concluded betwixt Hungary, Transiluania, and Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces; and that they should fight with their ioynt forces for the common good. 2. That no Prouince should conclude a Peace or begin a war, without the priuity and consent of the rest; and that they should not make any peace with the house of Austria, to the preiudice of the other part: But if they would make any league with other Kings, Princes or States, it should be with the consent of the rest. 3. That they should continue the warre against the house of Austria, at the common charge of the Prouinces. 4. That whereas BETHLIN GABOR had assisted the Bohemians with his Army, to his great charge, and at their request; in consideration thereof, they should pay him 100000 Dollers. 5. That it being necessary in this dangerous Estate of affaires, that the limits and forts should be well mand against the Turkes inuasions; they required (for that the benefit redounded to the whole Christian World) that the Crowne of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, should pay yeerely 300000 Dollers. 6. That it was necessary, Ambassadors were sent in the name of the new King and States, with others from Hungary, to the Sultans Port; and that the Prince of Transiluania was ready to vndertake that Ambassie. 7. That, whereas the treasure of Hungary was much exhausted, they required that the hereditary lands of the house of Austria (which in time might be conquered, in Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, and other places) should be annexed to the Crowne of Hungary. 8. That if the Polonians should attempt any thing against Transiluania and Hungary, in fauour of the Emperour; then all the Prouinces, especially Silesia, should bee bound to send aide vnto that Prince. 9. That the States should moue their King to confirme the said Articles; and that they should giue caution for the performance thereof: and they in like manner should receiue assurance from them.

Ambassador from the Transiluanian and Hungarian to the States of Bohemia.

Propositions.

The King of Bohemia (before his going to the Assembly at Nurem; hauing heard the Prince of Transiluania's Ambassadour) made answere, that he could not presently giue him a full resolution; for that some of their demands concerned the whole Romane Empire: That as concerning the League, the Earle of Hohenloe should come presently to the States at Presbourg with full power and authority to conferre with them touching the raising or leuying of a great Summe of money. With which answere the Ambassadour returned forthwith to Presbourg.

The King of Poland sent vnto the Bohemians to solicite them to a Peace with the Emperour, and they returned him in wrighting a declaration of their reiection; perswading the King and the States of Polonia, to remember their old treaties, and not to attempt any thing against them. Some Counsellors perswaded the King not to engage himselfe in these combustions; nor to attempt any thing against the Realme of Bohemia or the incorporated Prouinces: That hee should remember, that when as Polonia was on fire with intestine warres, they contained themselues: That they entertained friendshippe with the Turkes and Tartarians: That the Hungarians, the English, the vnited Prouinces, the Danes, with many other Princes and States were their confederates: In so much that it appeared plainely the warre would bee long and bloody, and dangerous for Poland, if they ingaged themselues in it.

The Polonians perswade their King not to aide the Emperor.

In the meane time, there being rumours of great preparations for warre in Polonia, and that HVMAN OI (who fled thither from Hungary) would inuade Silesia, Moravia, or Hungary, with a great Army; they commanded euery twentith man in Silesia to take Armes, and had eight thousand choice men alwaies in readinesse. The lower Austria was wonderfully afflicted by the insolency of Souldiers, and the inhabitants were forced to flie with their wiues and children. About Vienna, the Earles of BVCQVOY and TAMPIERRE, spoiled and burnt many villages, that they might not be of any vse to the enemy; which bred a great dearth in Vienna, especially when it came to be besieged. BVCQVOY and TAMPIERRE, hearing that the gouernor of Heinbourg had been defeated by the Hungarians, they went to succour him with 6000 horse and foot, where there was a great encounter and many slaine on either side; after which they returned to Vienna: but there were 1600 Hungarians forsooke them, and went to their Countrey-men.

The miserable State of lower Austria.

The fire of these ciuill and intestine warres of Bohemia, beganne to flame out in Germany; the Electors, Princes and Imperiall Cities and States grew into factions, and made particular Assemblies, to prouide forces to support their parties; eyther pretending a feare to be supplanted in their religion. And although I am tied to strict bounds, and cannot relate actions at large, considering the copiousnes of my subject, and the short time this Emperour hath yet raigned, vnlesse I should make it exceed the liues of many of his Predecessors; yet, to giue the Reader the better satisfaction, I hould it fit to set downe in particular how they were cantoned, as you may judge by their particular Assemblies.

Assembly of the Protestant Princes at Nuremb.

The Electors, Princes, and Protestant States of the Vnion, met at Nuremburg in Nouember; whither came in person the Elector Palatine newly chosen King of Bohemia, AVGVSTVS and FREDERICK Palatines of Newburg, IOHN ERNEST Duke of Saxony, WEIMAR, with his two brethren, ERNEST of Brandenburg, Marquesse of Olnosbach or Amsbach, with his brother; IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Wittemberg, with his two brethren; MAVRICE Lantzgraue of Hesse, and FREDERICK Marquess of Baden: the rest sent their Ambassadors; namely, the Elector of Brandenburg, the Duke of Deuxponts, the Marquesse of Culmbach, the Prince of Lunbourg, the Duke of Brunswick, the Marquesse of Baden, the Earls of Veterouia, the Earles of Francouia, the Earl of Oetingen, and in the name of the Nobles and Knights. There came also Deputies from the Imperiall Cities; as, Strausbourg, Francfort, Nuremburg, Wormes, Vlme, Spire, Rottembourg, Hall, Nordlingen, Landau, Vimpfen, Buren, and from the Protestants of the higher & lower Austria: all these fauoured the Bohemian party.

The Catholique Princes & States assembly at Virsbourg.

The Electors, Princes, and Catholique States which adhered to the Emperor, met at Virsbourg in Franconia: whither came Ambassadors from the Emperor, from the Electors of Mentz, Cullen and Treues, from the Dukes of Bauaria and Lorrain, from the Palatine of Newbourg, and from many Princes, Bishops, Abbats and Prelates; as, those of Saltzbourg, Ausbourg, Virsbourg, Rotuil, Wormes, Spire, Heildesheim, Constance, Strausbourg, Passaw, Ratisbone, Erisingen, Basle, Munster, Paterborn, Liege, Fuld, Elwangen, Kepten, and others. Thither came also Agents for the king of Spain. In this Assembly, the means how to maintain peace in Germany were treated of, and how to defend themselues against the Arms of the Protestant Princes, and what leuies euerie one should make; so as it seemed all tended to warre in Germany, both parties beeing much incensed.

The Emperor sends to the Assembly at Nuremberg.

The Emperor sent the Earl of Hohensollern to the assembly at Nuremberg; who, making a long relation to them of the troubles of Bohemia, and of his Majesties peaceable inclination, exhorted the Electors, Princes and States there assembled, to giue credit to his words and promises, rather than to false impostures and slanders; and not to suffer themselues to bee corrupted by the false reports of the Bohemians; but rather to imploy their counsels and care to preuent so many miseries as would vndoubtedly growe in the Kingdome of Bohemia, if matters continued in the same estate they then were: the which might giue a great aduantage to the Enemie of Christendome, and be very dangerous for the Empire. Wherefore, they should direct their consultations to some good end, so as the honour of the Imperiall Majesty might be preserued; who protested, not to do any thing that were not iust and honest, and worthy of his Imperiall grace and fauour; promising to recompense the pains and merits of such as had imploi'd themselues to end so great occasions of trouble.

Their answere.

Heerto the Assembly at Nuremberg made answer, that they were glad of his Maiesties good resolution, conformable to theirs, which was onely to preuent the miserable estate of the sacred Empire. They made repetition of the dissensions of the Empire, and of the grieuances of the Protestants; which I must for breuities sake omit. But, touching the affairs of Bohemia, they said that they were not to be blamed, if, seeing the Catholiques begin motions of warre, they were carefull of the welfare of their subiects, and prepared themselues to some kinde of defense; knowing, that they are not onely bound to chase away the danger out of the frontiers of their Country, but also to succour the Protestants; yea, euen the Elector Palatine FREDERICK, chosen King of Bohemia, especially when he shall be molested in his lawfull inheritance and seigneuries in Germany; being bound thereto by the Imperiall constitutions, and by their Vnion.

They therefore besought his Imperiall Majesty to dispose his counsels for the pacifying of the present troubles in Bohemia, and to be carefull that no disaster might fall vpon the Empire. As for them, they would neuer suffer themselues to be wonne by any contrary perswasion; hoping, that his Majesty would not giue ear to those which were more desirous to entertain forrain rain forces in the Empire, than to seek the safety and authority of the Emperor; and that hee should rather giue eare to the iust reasons of so many Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire, then vnto the discourses of certaine men, who breathed nothing but warre, and a desire to ruine and roote out those whom they falsely called Heretiques. 1619

An Apologie made for the Emperor.

By this answer the earl of Hoensolemn finding that this assembly at Nuremburg was wholly bent to support the Elector Palatine in the possession of his new Election to the Crowne of Bohemia against the Emperour; he made a long Apology, and presented it to the same Assembly. It contained a short relation of all the troubles of Bohemia, during the life of the Emperour MATHIAS, with answeres to their oppositions against the admission of King FERDINAND to the Election of a new Emperour, and to their declaration touching their reiection of FERDINAND, and their Election of a new king: finally, his conclusion was, that the States of Bohemia had no free Election to chuse a king if any male or female of the blood royall were liuing, which hath beene the occasion of all their warres: a point which I will not decide, but leaue it to ENEAS SILVIVS DV BRAVIVS, and others which haue written learnedly thereof.

Exploites of the Transsiluanian.

The Prince of Transsiluania after the assembly at Presbourg, made an incursion with his Army towards Viena, putting all to the sword: He took Eberstorf, with other townes and villages, spoiling some and wasting the rest by fire, and then returned to Presbourg. In their retrait, they write that Count BVCQVOY and TAMPIERRE charged the Rereward, and slew 2000 Hungarians.

The Emperor requires an oath from the States of high Austria.

The Emperour commanded the States of high Austria, to send their Deputies to court, to take their dew oath of allegeance, whereby they might preuent the imminent danger, and giue no cause of greater miseries: But they delaying to make any answere, he sent other Letters vnto them, signifying, That they had not onely forborne to send him an answere, but had also made an incursion into the lower Austria, and surprised certaine townes; which were apparant signes of hostility. Wherefore he admonisht them againe to send their Deputies to take the oath; to call back their souldiers; and to desist from their enterprises; if not, he would vse other remedies. About that time there came out of the Duchie of Milan, into the Bishopprick of Passau (hauing past the Alpes through Swisserland) 9000 souldiers, leauing behinde them mournefull marks of their bloudy cruelty; who hauing no meanes to passe into the vpper Austria, the countrey-men hauing stopt vp the passages; part of them past into Bohemia towards Budwitz, vnder the leading of Don BELTHAZER: who being entred, caused the Kings edict to be set vp in all places written to this sense; That it was knowne to all men, how that his subiects of Bohemia, partly through their owne malice, and partly by the perswasion of others, had runne into rebellion, violated the oath which they had taken to him, being their elected and crowned King, and had presumed to chuse them another King, and settle him in his throne. Wherefore to preserue his right and to defend his subiects from ruine, he had beene constrained to send in new forces; That he doubted not but there were many who either not pleased with these attempts, or changing their opinions, would performe their due obedience to their lawfull King; admonishing all others, that remembring the oath whereunto they were bound, and hauing a care of their wiues, children and families, they should speedily returne to their obedience, and giue in their names, to such commanders as hee should haue in the Countrey, and thereby preserue themselues from ruine; promising pardon to all that should demaund it in this manner.

The Emperors edict against the Bohemians.

Vienna besieged by the Hungarians and Bohemians.

The Emperour being come to Viena, the Hungarians and Bohemians marcht with a great Army towards the City; they took Eberstorf, and then laied siege vnto Viena, spoiling all the townes and villages round about. The Countrey people flying into the City, there grew a great dearth of corne, which made the enemy hope that in short time they should force them to yield by famine. In the meane time HVNNAVOI made an irruption into Hungary with 8000 Polonians: but he was incountred by RAGOTZI, whom the Prince of Transsiluania had left at Cassouia, and receiued a great ouerthrow. Then ioyning with Radul, and the Earle of Alsbem, being in all three or foure thousand men, they encountred the Polonians againe: where there was a cruell combat, the which continued almost the whole night, there being slaine on either part three thousand men. The Polonians retiring, made a shew of of flight; whereupon the Hungarian footfell presently to spoil: but the Polonians returning suddenly (the Hungarian horsmen flying away) they were for the most part slaine. RAGOTSI hauing escaped, cried presently To Armes, to repaire this losse: and BETHLIN being aduertised thereof, he forbare to presse Bethlin Gabor leaueth Viena.

Vienna; and sending part of his Army into Hungary, to Rheda, he returned to Presbourg, having taken Edenbourg, and mand it with a garrison of 400 men.

The States of the vpper and lower Austria, had many consultations for their defence against the incursions of BETHLIN GABOR Prince of Transiluania. Vnder the pretext of this defence, the Protestant States leuied forces: and hauing drawne together some thousands of horse and foote, they seized vpon Lipsa, which they ruined for that the citizens had made resistance. After which they took Sibilsberg, Leisdorf and Bechling; and then they marcht to the Monastery of Melcha, which was very well fortified. The Abbat offered certain thousands of florens, to haue his monastery spared, but he could not preuaile: they hauing three seuerall batteries, they cut off the water from the Garrison: and the souldiers which fetcht it from the riuer of Dannow, were much annoyed by the shott; but it was relieued by BVCQVOY. Not long before, the Earle of Mandsfield had recouered Pisseck, after a moneths siege, being valiantly defended by Don MARTINO a Spaniard; who was taken prisoner with diuerse other Captaines, and sent to Pilsen. The souldiers, being 400 in number, and many of them sick, were let goe freely with their baggage, and conducted to the frontiers of Austria. Pisseck being taken after this manner, the Emperors souldiers left all the garrison towns in Bohemia (except Budwitz & CROMLAV) retiring into places of more safety, and carrying with them what they had gotten. There was such a stink in Pisseck, by reason of the dead carcases of men and beasts, that both souldiers and citizens were forced to leaue the towne: the which, MANDSFIELD caused to be repaired, and manned with a good garrison.

Diuers townes taken by the Protestants.

BETHLIN GABOR (as we haue said) being retired towards Presbourg to resist the inuasion of HVMANOI, and the Bohemians being gone towards Morauia; Count BVCQVOY, embracing this occasion, followed the Hungarians towards Presbourg: Where hauing taken some places which had reuolted from the Emperour, he slew one thousand fiue hundred Hungarians. And the Emperour, hearing there was some small difference betwixt the Hungarians & Bohemians, sent his Commissioners to the Hungarians to perswade them to obedience, and to dissuade them from entring into League with the Bohemians. During these seuerall actions in seuerall places, the prouinciall States of Morauia met at Olmus; whereas they seised vpon all the goods of the Clergy, amounting to many millions, and put all the plate which was in the Romane Catholike Temples into coyne; wherewith they payed their souldiers. And the States of Lusatia were also assembled to prouide for the necessity of the prouince: who with the protestants of Austria (hearing that there were 12000 souldiers come out of Italy to Passau for the Emperour) drew all their forces towards those frontiers for their defence.

Assembly of the States of Morauia & Lusatia.

The King of Poland, meaning to assist the Emperour conditionally, made a declaration; That for as much as the troubles of Bohemia concerned Religion, and that the Bohemians with their confederats, had expelled a Bishoppe out of Silesia, and burthened the Clergy contrary to their priuiledges, liberties, and immunities; he was therefore resolued to assist the Emperour with thirty thousand Souldiers. But if the Bohemians and Silesians would restore their Bishop, Clergy; and other Romane Catholiques to their former dignitie, and maintaine them in their priuiledges, and withall reuerse what they had done against the house of Austria; he was then resolued not to meddle any more in those quarrels; yet, notwithstanding, he kept his forces ready, attending a finall resolution of the Bohemians.

The Poland promiseth to aid the Emperour conditionally.

In the beginning of Nouember, certaine troupes of the Earle of BVCQVOY's meaning to surprise Odenbourg, BETHLIN GABOR posted thither, and entred the Town, and mand it with two thousand Hungarians. That moneth, IOHN CHARLES the Emperours eldest sonne died at Gretz; and within few daies after, IOHN SIGISMVND Marquesse of Brandenbourg left this life. On the one and twentith of this moneth, all the images in the Church of the Castle of Prague, were demolished by the kings commandement; and on Christmasse day, the kings Preacher made a Sermon, prouing by the sacred Scriptures, That images were not to be allowed in Temples: After which, the King, with his brother, and the whole Court, receiued the Communion.

On the seuen and twentith of Nouember, the Lady ELIZABETH, Queene of Bohemia, was deliuered of a sonne, to the great ioy of his maiesty, and the whole court. The chiefe officers of the Crowne of Bohemia came vnto the King to congratulate the birth of his new heire, all the Bells rung, and the ordinance of the towne often discharged. This yeare in December the Earle of Fustemberg Ambassadour from the Emperour arriued at Paris, where he was receiued with great state, defrayed at the Kings charge and serued by his officers. 1620 his Ambassage was, To demand aid and assistance from the King against the Elector Palatine who had inuaded his Realm of Bohemia; from the which the Duke of Bouillon by his Letters did seek to dissuade the King; shewing, that those troubles grew not from any question of religion, but from matter of State; hoping withall, that his Maiesty would not fauour and assist the house of Austria against a Prince of the Electorall house of the Palatine, alwaies allied vnto his Crown and house; by whom the Kings, his Predecessors, and especially his father of happy memory, had been assisted in the defense of his house and person, and of his lawfull succession. The King desired to let the Emperor and German Princes knowe, that if he intermeddled in their quarels, it should be onely (after the manner of his Predecessors) in sending an honourable Embassie; which, visiting the Emperor, and the Princes and States of the Empire of both the Vnions, should labour to reconcile the troubles of Bohemia, and the combustions which began to growe in Germany among the Princes. 1620

The Emperor had great succors promised him by the King of Spain: and the Pope commanded a great contribution to be made by the Clergy throughout all Italy, Spain, Brabant, Flanders, and other Prouinces, for the payment of the Emperors Army. And in the mean time the Elector of Saxony (lest he should seem to be too secure) took order for the leuying of certain troops of horse and foot, and the prouiding of sufficient Commanders. Count BVCQVOY, making an expedition towards the vpper Austria, took the Town of Lipsa, being without a garrison.

Before his coming, STARENBERG, chief Gouerner of that Prouince, hauing left the siege of the Monastery of Melcha, marched towards the Frontier with his Army, to attend Count BVCQVOY. The peasants in the mean time, coming from the vpper part, moued with the zeal of religion, slue and put to slight all the Italians which remaind of BALTHAZAR's forces. The lower Austria was much afflicted with hunger and other miseries. The States of vpper Austria were prest daily to come to Vienna to take the oath, the Emperor offring them victuals and a safe conduct: but they protracted the time from day to day. In the mean time, the Hungarians, with the Bohemians and incorporated Prouinces, being assembled at Presbourg, they concluded a perpetuall league vpon certain Articles; which I am forced to omit to auoid tediousnes.

A league concluded betwixt Hungarians and Bohemians.

The Arch-duke LEOPOLD went from Vienna into Alsatia; where he leuied many troops of horse and foot for the Duke of Bauaria: and, there coming into those parts fiue hundred Venetians which desired passage, they were denied it, and sent to the Duke of Bauaria to serue in his Army. There were also great forces leuied for the Emperor and Duke of Bauaria in the Bishoprick of Cullen and the Territories adjacent. To preuent these leuies, the States of the vnited Prouinces wrote to the Electors of Cullen and Treues, exhorting them not to suffer any thing to be attempted against their confederates, especially against the Elector Palatine and his Territories, vnlesse they would haue the like done in their jurisdiction. Part of these forces when they could not get passage through Hassia and the County of Nassau, they entred into Francconia, where they were forced to stay some weeks, being hindred by the Princes of the Vnion: and in the end they were constrained to repasse the riuer of Rhine, and to return the same way they came. The Duke of Bauaria, being aduertised heerof, he sent to the Deputies of the vnited Princes and States: where there was a transaction made for the passage of these Troops, the number whereof was certainly knowne; and that the vnited Princes and States should haue also free liberty to passe through Bauaria. The conditions were, that they should passe away within three or foure daies; the footmen by the Dioceese of Bamberg, and the horsemen by Wisburg: that the Army should commit no insolencies in the estates of the vnited Princes: that they should march on with speed towards Bauaria, and should pay for that which they took in their passage.

After this, there followed a truce betwixt the Emperor and BETHLIN GABOR Prince of Transiluania, the which should continue till the Feast of Saint MICHAEL following, that the Realm of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces should be comprehended in that truce if they would; and all troubles ceasing, a treaty should bee made for the conclusion of a peace: that, during the truce, all things should remain in the same state they were in, and BETHLIN should hould the Countries, Castles, Forts and Towns which he had subdued, vntill it were otherwise disposed of; that an Assembly should be appointed at Neuheusall by the Emperors consent and authority, and there all grieuances repaired, and all dissensions betwixt the Emperor and the States of the Kingdome compounded; that the commerce should be free in all places, and the passages open; that the souldiers of Polonia should forbear to enter into the Realme of

The Arch-duke Leopold raiseth forces in Loraine.

This yeer in Ianuary (for, they begin to account the yeer from the birth of CHRIST) the States of Austria met again at Horn; where the Emperor sent to presse them to take the oath of alleageance: whereto they consented, so as the souldiers might be dismissed, the league betwixt Hungary and Bohemia confirmed, and a firm peace concluded; if not, they were not bound to do any more. About the same time, the Arch-duke LEOPOLD searcht all the store-houses in Alsatia, drew out great store of ordinance, and caused many troupes of horse and foot to be leuied. He gaue commission to raise 1500 horse in Loraine, and some thousands of foot there, and on the the frontiers of France; and appointed money for the paiment thereof.

In February, the Emperour held a secret Councell at Vienna; where there assisted the Popes Nuntio, the Embassadors of Spaine and Florence, the Earles of Bucquoy and Tampierre, with other Commanders at warre; where they consulted of a new enterprise against Bohemia: For the recouery of which Countrie, the Emperor protested, that he would spend the last drop of his bloud; and the rather, for that the Florentine Embassadour had brought eight hundred Souldiers to his Maiestie; and moreouer, there was promised from Spaine, Italy and the Lowe-countries three millions of gold, with the which the Emperor thought to performe great matters. During this consultation, Niclasbourg in Morauia was besieged by the Morauians; and in the end the towne was taken; but, the Castle held out, and was battered continually for sixteene daies together. The Cardinall of Dietherichstein, was much perplexed, and grieued, pressing the Emperour to send forces to relieue this towne, for that the Emperour and others had carried much wealth into it, as into a place of safety. Whereupon, the Earles of Bucquoy and Tampierre, resoluing to take it from the enemy, cast a long bridge ouer the riuer of Dannow: but they were so hindred by great frosts and cold that they were forced to desist from their enterprise.

Niclasburg taken by the Morauians.

This moneth of February, the King of Bohemia went into Morauia, being accompanied by his brother and other Princes: he made his entrey into Brin; where he was receiued with great pompe by the Senate and States, who conducted him to the Iesuites Church: where hauing heard Diuine seruice, he went to the Palace, and their receiued the oath from the States, and confirmed all their priuiledges: after which he took his way towards Silesia. He was scarce gon out of Morauia, but there entred 4000 Cossaques from Dolonia: yet they staied not long there, but marcht day and night vntill they came into Austria, sending some which knew the Countrie, to discouer, breaking all the bridges behinde them as they past. In their passage, they spoiled many villages and townes; and among others, Meserits, where at that time there was celebrated a very solmne mariage: but, they mart'd the feast, and carried away their ornaments; which they sold afterwards at Viena for a little money.

The Horsemen of Morauia, being aduertised hereof somewhat too late, followed them with all speed; and, ouertaking them in Austria about midnight, neere vnto the banks of Dannow, they slew 1000 of them, the rest passing ouer the Riuer vnto Vienna. These Souldiers afterwards committed horrible murders and spoiles in the lower Austria: they wasted fiftie villages belonging to the Protestants; forcing many of the inhabitants to fly into the woods with their wiues and Children, where they perished with hunger and cold. It was reported, that 8000 more followed them. Whereupon, the Silesians and Morauians went to Armes, and sent to Bethlin for aide: who gaue notice to the King of Polonia, that if he attempted any thing against him or his confederates, he would cause the Turkes and Tartarians to inuade Polonia: and withall he sent word vnto Viena, that vnlesse they discharged the Cossaques (whom they had drawne in, contrary to the truce) he would presently assist the oppressed with 16000 Hungarians.

At the same time Count BVCQVOY (hauing receiued some losse by the Bohemians at Chiese) went with 8000 horse and foote to Langelos; where ther were seuen companies of the Earle of Mandsfeldts in garrison, he himselfe being gone to Prague. Comming to the towne hee sent some troupes before, and laid the rest in ambush: The garrison salying forth fell into this ambush, where there was a great fight: but the Bohemian horsemen being dispersst, there were 900 footemen slaine, where the Imperialls also lost 400 men.

Some write that this enterprise of the Earle of Bucquoi's was vpon a quarter of the Bohemians Army, where the Barron of Fettz Marshall of the Army commanded, and who in the charge was slaine and their troupes put to rout; That there were slaine vpon the place 600 horsemen and 300 foote, among which were many Noblemen, Captaines & Commanders, and namely a Duke

Duke of Saxony who serued the Bohemian party. There were almost 300 prisoners taken; most gentlemen and officers, and as they write BVCQOIS losse was very small.

Some few daies after, they charged a troupe of the Earle of Holochs and slew 600. So pursuing their victories, they forced Laam, and slew 200 which were there in garrison. The Earle of Tampierre, hearing of this successe, ioyned his forces with Count BVCQVOY: and then they resolued to goe to Prague, commanding the souldiers to make sufficient prouision of poulder and victuall for six daies. But the Prince of Anhalt, hauing presently gathered together the Bohemian and Morauian forces at Egenbourg, stopt all the passages; commanding all the officers and souldiers which were in Prague, to return to the Camp within 24 houres. The Spaniards, which came vnder BALTHAZAR, made an incursion towards Wodian, and Pragodits, spoiling the countrey with fire and sword. After which they went to besiege Muldau: but, the garrison, not able to keepe it, yeelded it vpon composition. Whereupon, there was a new commandement, that euery twentith man in Bohemia should be alwaies ready in Armes.

The king of Bohemia enters Vratislania.

FREDERICK K. of Bohemia comming to Pressau, the Princes and Noblemen of Silesia met him with a great traine: entring into the City, there marcht before three Senators, with many citizens, who had presented him with the keys of their City by their aduocate; after whom, followed the Gentlemen of Presslaue; then the Barons, and after them, the Princes of Silesia: After whom came the kings brother, betwixt the Duke of Lignits, and the Marquesse of Iagerndorf. The Marshall of the Realme, carrying a sword, marcht alone: and the King followed him; and after him, the whole Traine. There were 50 shott at the gate: and all the Citizens were in Armes euen to the Kings court. Comming to the market place, there was a triumphant Arch, with very rare musick. From whence, the king was conducted to S. ELIZABETH'S Church; where he was entertained by the chiefe Pastor, with an Oration in Latin: and hauing heard Diuine seruice he went vnto the Palace; where, on the seauen and twentith of February, he receiued an oath of the Noblemen; and the day following, foure Chanons, the Abbats and Priors of the monasteries, came to court and took the same oath: after whom, the citizens did the like. All this being happily performed, and certaine Deputies being appointed by the Princes of Silesia to go in Embassage to Constantinople and Poland, in the behalfe of the Realme of Bohemia and the incorporated prouinces; the king hauing viewed the city and the bishopps Palace, and confirmed all their priuiledges, he prepared to goe vnto Lusatia: but, hearing of Count BVCQVOI's attempts, he deferd that Iourney and returned to Prague.

Count Bucquoy defeated by the Prince of Anhalt.

The Bohemians hauing resolued to assemble the States at Prague, by the kings commandement; the Emperour resolued to doe the like at Buduitz, to hinder and direct the assembly, meaning to prosecute all the States which should not come to Buduitz with fire and sword, and in like manner to besiege Prague. BVCQVOY and TAMPIERRE marched forward with their Army meaning to seize vpon Horne, and the Castle of Echenberg, places neere adioyning; but being ready to assaile the castle, the States of that prouince thinking it would be very preiudiciall vnto them, entreated the Prince of Anhalt (Generall for the king of Bohemia) to releeue the said Castle: who although he were inferior in number to the Imperialists, yet knowing how much it did import, hee resolued to stop BVCQVOIS passage towards Buduitz: to which end he marched forward with his Army being fortified with certaine troupes which came vnto him, so as he was esteemed to haue 12000 men. The 10 of March the Armies met and ioyned battaile. BVCQVOY thought to terrifie the Bohemians with a stratagem, causing the bodies of trees to be laid vpon cariages, as if he had had many Cannons; which at the first fight amased the horsmen: but hauing discouered his sleight by their neerer approach, they charged valiantly. The Prince of Anhalt vsed another policie, causing his Artillery to be charged with smal shot behinde his horsemen; who were commanded after they had set vpon the enemy, to open their rankes in the middest: which being speedily executed according to direction, all their ordinance was discharged together, which made a great spoile vpon the enemies horsmen, and forced their Army to retire into a wood. Whereupon the P. of Anhalt, finding his aduantage, planted his ordinance vpon certaine hils, which did so annoy the enemy as he forced them to leaue the wood, and at their comming out pursued them so hotly, as they were forced to fly to Crembs a Towne 15 English miles from thence: the pursuit continued diuers daies. By report of prisoners they lost aboue 2000 men most Polonians and Cossacks, with their munition, baggage, bullets for Cannon and many horses. The Sergeant Maior of the Army was slaine, with the Generall of the Cossaques with his Lieutenant, and diuerse other Captaines and officers: The Earle of Tampierres horse was slaine vnder him, and hee was relieued by a Cossaque who mounted 1620 mounted him vpon his owne. At his coming to Vienna he made great complaints to the Emperor of Count BVCQVOY; who they write was so much grieued for this losse, that hee would not for three daies together speak with any man. It is thought, the Bohemians lost not aboue 100 men in that fight, and some hurt.

An assembly of the States at Pragut. In the mean time, there was an Assembly of the States at Prague; where they consulted of the confirmation of the league with the States of Hungary and the Prince of Transiluania, and to offer it to other Princes and States, for the sending of an Ambassie vnto the Turks Port, and to make a perpetuall peace with the Sultan; to prouide for the charges and presents of this Ambassie; to prouide money for the necessary defense of the frontier Forts in Hungary euery yeer, for the punishing of those traiterous rebels of the Country, which refused to acknowledge the King for their head; for the repelling of the enemies forces, and refuting of Edicts published within the Realm; for the prouiding of present money (after the example of the vnited Belgick States) for the paiment of souldiers; for the prouiding of a storehouse with arms, victuals and horses for publike seruice; for the making of hospitals for sick and wounded souldiers; to make a necessary prouision against all vnexpected irruptions, to prohibit the insolency of souldiers, to reform the prouinciall constitutions, to appoint a place for the keeping of the Crown and Regall ornaments, and to assign reuenues for the King, after the presidents of former Kings and Princes.

An edict against the King of Bohemia. This yeer in February, the Emperor sent forth an Edict against the election and crowning of the Elector Palatine K. of Bohemia; in the which, after a long deduction of the troubles and tragedies committed in Bohemia, and of the insolency and rebellion (as he tearms it) of the Bohemians, both against his Predecessor the Emperor MATHIAS and himself, notwithstanding their fatherly care and affection to the good of their subjects, and their desire to reduce them to their obedience by all milde and friendly courses; which they had obstinately refused, and (contrary to all law and equity) had rejected him for their King, and chosen them another: this their election by his Imperiall and Royall authority he disannulled, and declared void and of no effect; protesting before God and the world, to bend all his thoughts and means to recouer the Prouinces vsurped from him by force and rebellion, and to reuenge his Imperiall and Royall Majesty so much wronged in his authority. Lastly, he implored the fauour and aid of all Kings, Princes, and Christian Potentates, to whom the newes of this dangerous example of the rebellion of these traiterous subiects should come. But chiefly he exhorted and required the Electors of the sacred Empire, with the Princes and States thereof (much wronged in this election, made against all iustice) to giue him aid and assistance, promising to require them with the like fauour and curtesie, and to imploy his Imperiall authority for the defense of their estates & segniories.

Assembly of the Catholick Electors at Mulhus. This yeer, the Electors and Princes of the Empire, adhering to the Emperor, assembled at Mulhus in Thuringia: whither came in person the Electors of Mentz, Cullen and Saxony; and he of Treues sent his Ambassador: the like did the Duke of Bauaria, and LEVVES Lantzgraue of Hesse. Being come together, they treated of the means to free the Empire from so many dangers which seemed to threaten her ruine; sending their Letters to all the Princes, States and Imperiall Towns whom they held opposite to the Emperor; namely, to the Elector Palatine (whom they did not stile King of Bohemia in their superscription) to the States of Bohemia and incorporated Prouinces, to the Princes of the Vnion, to the States of Austria, to the Earles of the Vetterauia, to them of the country of Suevia, to the whole Nobility of the Rhine, Franconia and Suevia, and to the Imperiall Towns of Nurembourg, Strausbourg, Vlme, Spire and Wormes (all, Estates depending vpon the Empire) and likewise vnto the States of Hungary: All which Letters were dated vpon the eleuenth day of March, and did wholly concerne the great troubles of Bohemia.

Their Letters to the States of the Vnion.

To the King of Bohemia. In their Letters to the Elector Palatine King of Bohemia, they made a relation of his acceptance of that Crown, contrary to their former admonition and expectation; whereby he had approued the Bohemians attempts against the Emperor whom they had wholly reiected. They exhorted him to consider of the great error he had committed, being the first Elector; who had neuer been wronged by the Emperor, but rather honoured; hauing chosen him with the other Electors to treat of the peace of Bohemia: the which charge he had accepted, and often promised to perform; being his duty to aid the Emperor, his fellow Elector, and to endeuour by all means to see peace maintained throughout all the States of the Empire; wishing him to consider what preiudice might befall the Roman Empire and the neighbour Kingdomes, especially cially that of Bohemia, by this reiection and the new Election, which could neuer be approued either by God or men. That his posterity thereby would receiue infamy, and his family in generall danger. Lastly, they exhorted him, that as a Christian Prince born of German blood, and an Elector, to consider carefully of these things, and not to giue way to these miseries, but rather applie his counsels, that the Bohemians might lay down Armes; that all leuies of Souldiers might cease; That Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces might be restored to the Emperor; That all things might be againe compounded by a friendly Peace, according to the wishes and desires of all good men; and that he, being Elector, would make it appeare to the World, that he had more regard to the safety of his Countrey, then his own particular. 1620

To the States of Bohemia. The Electors Letters, to the States of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, were to the same effect; wishing them to giue way to their wholsome admonitions, and not to giue care to those who (rather seeking a remedy for their crimes and offences in confusion) had more respect to their priuate profit, then to the publique good of their Countrey: which if they did, it was to be feared that the other States, faithfull to the Empire, by the Emperours commandement, would seeke meanes to reuenge the losse of that kingdome of Bohemia, and free the Empire from danger and ruine.

To the Princes of the Vnion. Their Letters to the Princes of the Vnion did import; that They did not beleeue that, being Princes, they were pleased with these combustions, hoping they would not doe any thing which might encrease them, or hinder the Emperour from recouering his Realme of Bohemia; being bound, by the constitutions of the Empire, to assist the Emperor as soueraign head of the Christian World; That it was a dangerous thing, if they allowed of this reiection, and the new Election which the Bohemians had made; That if they continued these troubles, not only Bohemia would be ruined, but also Hungary lost; and, in the end, Germany it selfe exposed to the spoile of the Barbarians, at the tyrannous discretion of the Turke. In the end, they entreated them so to employ themselues, both to the Elector Palatine and the States of Bohemia; that the miseries, which threatned these Realmes, Prouinces, and Frontiers of the Empire, might be diuerted; and that the complaint might not passe to their posterity, that they had beene the cause that their country had been shamefully reduced vnder the yoak of the Ottoman seruitude.

The Electors Answeres. FREDERICK Elector Palatine, chosen King of Bohemia, made answere to the Electors Letters, whereby he complaines that they had not giuen him the Title and qualitie of King; That the Emperor could not be iudge and partie in his owne cause; That they should forbeare to counsell him any more to quitte the Realme of Bohemia, and that they should assure themselues he would not forget any thing to preserue the right of his vocation to the said crowne.

The States answere. The States of Bohemia made answere; That by the Letters sent (as well to their King lawfully chosen, crowned, anointed and sworne, as to them and the States of the incorporated Prouinces) appeared how diuerslie the Electors and Princes assembled at Mulhus, had thought of the State of Bohemia, after so many publications made by Letters and Apologies, which iustified the equity of their cause; That they had seene threates made to their King, and them contained in the said Letters: But the question being now not only touching the preseruation of their Countrey and Liberty, but also their Religion and Consciences; they would not resolue alone, but as all things had been formerly managed by their common consent with the incorporated Prouinces, so they would attend to send them an ample answere, with their ioynt aduice. What answere the Protestant Princes made vnto their Letter, you shall heare hereafter from the Assembly at Vlme.

After that vnfortunate battaile with the Prince of Anhalt; the Earle of Bucquoy, being returned to Cremau, the Cossaques went to their ordinary spoiling in the lower Austria: where, sparing neither Catholiques nor Protestants, they grew so odious to all men, that their owne fellow Souldiers, namely the Wallons, slew some of them, and carried some Captiues to Cremau, for the Sacriledges which they had committed. The Emperor, publishing another Edict, commanded the States of Austria to appeare at Viena on the 8 of Aprill, there to take the Oath of obedience; saying, that he had now obtained from the Arch-duke ALBERT, a full cession of his right; threatning, that he would hold them for treacherous contemners, if they appeared not, and would force them to obedience. The soldiers, which had remained in Veteraua; and could get no passage, cam into the territory of Treues, being very troublesom to the inhabitants: and, seeking in vain to passe into the territory of Cullen, the Peasants armed withstood them: and though they had set some villages on fire; yet they, neglecting the fire, slew many of them, and put the rest to flight. Many which had got passage, being come to the confines of Bauaria, fel in-1620 to a mutinie, who tearing their colours asunder, went to the Marquess of Onolzbacs camp, and most of the rest returned home.

The Marquesse of Durlac commanding the Army for the Princes of the Vnion, went and planted his Camp betwixt Brisac and Fribourg, giuing notice to the neighbour States, that he had receiued commandement not to suffer any souldiers to passe into Asasia. There went before in this expedition, three troupes of horse, with foure peece of ordinance, and 100 Carts full of Armes. Then followed foure troupes of Armed men foure companies of foote, with 70 Carts with Armes, and then three troupes of horse, with 150 waggons loaden with Armes and other warlike instruments; amongst which there were some waggons with six wheeles to turne euery way. Soone after, the Arch-duke LEOPOLD sent to craue passage for these troupes: to whom the Marquesse made answere, that it was not in him to graunt; that they must goe to Onolzbacs, and that hauing obtained leaue there he would not oppose.

The Christening of the Kings sonne at Pragne.

The Christning of the Kings Sonne of Bohemia, was performed with great solemnity on the last of March. There were present the King himselfe, his brother, two Princes of the house of Saxony, the Prince of Anhalt, the Earle of Hohenlo, with many other Noblemen. There were Deputies sent to be the Godfathers for the Duchie of Silesia for BETHLIN GABOR Prince of Transiluania, for the States of Bohemia, and for the Marquisates of Moravia and Lusatia.

The Emperors monitoriall Letters to the King of Bohemia.

On the thirtith of Aprill, the Emperour sent out his monitoriall Letters to the Elector Palatine, for that the Bohemians had chosen him their king: where after relation of the whole proceeding of these Bohemian troubles, by his absolute power and Imperiall authority he did enioin & expresse commande the Elector Palatine, vpon paine of his indignation, and the rigor of Iustice, and the lawes and constitutions of the sacred Empire, to lay downe Armes and cease from al Acts of hostility towards his Imperial and Royall Maiesty; and by the first of Iune next comming without all delay to relinquish all pretensions and wholly to abandon the said Realme of Bohemia. And if after that time expired, the said Count Palatine should continue obstinate and refractarie, he was then resolued to proceede against him according to the constitutions and ordinances of the Empire. And to the end he should not haue any excuse or pretend any cause of ignorance, he sent vnto him a copie of the said Letters.

There were also three other Monitoriall letters. The first directed to the Protestant Princes and States of the Empire which did adhere to the Bohemian party; containing, that against the Edicts of the deceased Emperor MATHIAS, some Princes and Estates of the Empire fauoured his rebellious subiects of Bohemia, and assisted their new King vnlawfully chosen, with men and money: and contrariwise would not giue passage to such soldiers as he had leuied for his iust defence, and to recouer his realm: To preuent the which he might iustly in this rebellion execute that which was ordained by the Imperial constitutions: But he preferred his clemency before rigour, admonishing them to abandon this faction, especially of the Elector Palatine their pretended head, and rather striue to maintaine the imperiall authority.

To the Colonels and Captaines of the Bohemian partie.

The second Letter, was to all the Colonels, Captains and Officers at war, following the Bohemian party, enioining them to abandon it, & to return vnto their houses, vpon paine of proscription and the losse of life and goods. And in the third, he admonished the Imperiall Townes, that hauing bin aduertised that som of them did aid his rebels of Bohemia and the Palatine there head, with men, monie and means, and to that end had leauied contributions vpon the inhabitants of their Towns (a just subiect for the which they had incurred the penalties of the Imperiall constitutions) preferring his clemency before his iustice, he admonisheth them hereafter to giue no succors nor aide in any sort whatsoeuer to the said Elector Palatine & Bohemians, vpon paine to incurre the said Imperiall punishments.

The Prince Palatins answere to the monitoriall Letter.

To this declaration or monitoriall Letter of the Emperor, the Palatine chosen King of Bohemia made an ample answere, conteining diuers points, which in breefe are these: That the Emperour hath not any right to the crowne of Bohemia but so farre fourth as it is a fee of the Empire. That the iudges of the Emperours court are no competent iudges in the cause of the Bohemians, neither can they determine of the right of the Princes and States of the Empire. That the Emperour cannot cause his pretensions to the crowne of Bohemia to bee decided before his counsellors, but must seeke the iurisdiction of his aduerse partie and there demaund iudgement: when as any one commenceth an action against the Emperour as he is Emperour the action is iudged by the Elector Palatine. The Emperor according to the constitutions of the Empire cannot denounce banishment or proscription before the parties be first heard. The Elector Palatine as King of Bohemia is not bound to obey the Emperours monitoriall Letters.

This

This he thought good to make knowne vnto the world, as he ought, for his necessarie defence: That he hoped that such as should know the vanity of this the Emperours Edict wold not vndertake the execution therof, if he commanded any, nor imploy the charge, but rather refuse it; remembring what one owes vnto another being vniustly oppressed in the Empire: that is, that they should repell all violence from their Prouinces, and do their best indeuours to maintaine the Countrey in peace: which he required of all the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire. 1620.

The State of Bohemia declar the kings son his successor after his death.

On the twentie eightth of Aprill the States of Bauaria hauing ratified the league betweene them and the Hungarians; in the presence of TVRSO Ambassadour to Prince BETHLIN and the States of Hungary; it was propounded in councell, that their King hauing a sonne of six yeares of age, he should be declared King of Bohemia, after the decease of his Father; the which would for euer assure the peace, preuent all troubles, and settle the State of Bohemia: The which the Deputies aswell of the States of Bohemia, as of the incorporated prouinces thought expedient to be done: whereupon they made a decree which they caused to be proclaimed. Their King was so well pleased with this declaration made in fauour of his Sonne, as feasting the States the next night at supper, hee caused all the Cannon at Prague to bee discharged in signe of ioy.

A sedition at Tabor pacified.

Soone after there happened a strange sedition at Tabor in Bohemia; for many thousands of Pesants being drawne together, demaunded either to be discharged from souldiers, or that they should prescribe them lawes whereby they should abstaine from all force and violence to their wiues and children. Commissioners were sent from Prague who reduced them to their duties. They also required to be freed from all impositions, alleaging that it was offered them by the Emperor; the which they verified by Letters which they produced: Moreouer, that part of the Iesuits goods and others, which had beene wholly confiscated, should bee appropriated vnto them. The first point of their demande was granted, and likewise the third: As for the second it was refered to another consultation: By which meanes they were pacified, & returned to their countrey labours; many of them enrolled themselues and became souldiers.

MANDSFIELD seeing his troupes encreased by 2000 Hungarians, made a roade towards Buduitz, where he tooke great store of Cattell, and entered into the Abbey of Guldencrone and took the Towne of Thein: the Hungarians, committed great insolencies, and entreated the Monks and Churchmen very roughly.

The Bohemians defeated Carstein.

The warre continuing in the lower Austria, the Earle of Tampierre of the Imperiall party, hearing that 5 companies of Bohemian foote and 2 of horse were lodged in Carstein, he went from the Imperiall Army with 1000 horse and 1500 shot, making such speede, as entring the Towne by night, he put all to sword which he found in Armes. Some seeking to saue themselues in the Castle, he pursued them so hotly, as the bridge being drawne many casting themselues into the ditch to auoide the sword were drowned. On the other side the Bohemians encountring a great number of Cossaques seeking for spoile after their accustomed manner in Gillesdorf, they charged them so furiously as there were 200 slaine vpon the place and the booty recouered.

The Cossaques defeated.

The Wallons and Cossaques of the Emperors partie, running between the frontiers of Hungary and Moravia, surprised Marcoucen, belonging to the Baron of Landau, which they wholly spoiled. Soone after on the eightth of Iune, the Baron recovered it againe, and put all the Imperiall Garrison to the sword. In like manner the Moravians being aduertised that in Sonneberg there lodged a Conuoy of many cartes which went vnto the Imperiall Army vnder the escorte of 200 souldiers, who beeing so neere vnto their Army, thought themselues to bee secure, they made such speede as they surprised the towne by breake of day, slew all which made resistance and carried the conuoy to the Bohemians Army.

A Conuoy of the Imperials taken.

Lower Austrias complaints to the Emp.

The Inhabitants of the lower Austria, bearing the whole burthen of the watre and sustaining great losses by both parties, made the States of that Countrey to send Deputies to Viena, to present a Petition vnto the Emperour, shewing their complaints against the ruines, spoiles, burnings, murders and rapes, committed by the Wallons and Cossaques: and therein they represented the ruine of Stoccerau which was wholly inhabited by catholikes, and did belong to his Imperial Maiesty, whereas on the fourth of May after that the Wallons & Cossaques had committed all the villanies that can be spoken, they set fire on the towne and ruined it quite. They knew well his Imperiall Maiesty was not the cause of these miseries, but they besought him by the mercy of God and by the wounds of our Saiuour IESVS CHRIST, that taking pitty of his subiects, he would be pleased hereafter to free them from souldiers, that they 1620 they might once againe taste of Peace and quietnesse; but the Deputies, which presented this petition, were forced to return without answer, for that they ioined in league with the Bohemians, & would not take the oath of allegance to the Emperor; whereto they had bin oft called.

The Earle of Strum, hauing leuied 500 horse in the Territories of the vnited Prouinces for the Bohemian party, marching through Westphalia, he was set vpon by the Peasants of the country, who defeated part of his Troops: yet he continued on his journey with the rest, and came into Bohemia. Soon after, IOHN ERNEST of Saxony, Prince of Weimar, hauing also leuied in the same Countries 200 horse and 2000 foot for the Bohemians, found not any one to oppose his passage, but onely the Earl of Bucheim; who (being not able to make head) was forced to let him passe towards Bohemia: where he arriued without any let, and had his Quarter neer to Egra; where the Peasants, discontent with such guests, would haue risen.

About the same time, Colonell GRAY, a Scottish Knight, leuied a Regiment of 2200 foot, Voluntaries, English and Scottish, for the King of Bohemia's seruice. They landed at Hamburg in a manner all together, of which there were not aboue eight hundred Scots. They marched vnarmed, and, most, without Swords, through the Duke of Luneburg's Countrey, where they found good vsage; then they passed the Riuer of Elbe into the Marquisate of Brandenburg's, where they had very kinde entertainement, and so continued their iourney without any crosse (but by their own diuisions) vntill they came into Lusatia, where they receeiued their Armes, and so passed into Bohemia.

Ambassadors sent from the French King into Germany.

The French-king being desired (by the Earle of Tustembourg the Emperors Ambassador, as we haue related, in the end of the last yeere) to giue his Maiesty aide and assistance; being resolued to procure Peace, and reconcile the troubles in Germany, rather then to adde matter which might entertaine the warre; he made choice of the Duke of Angoulesme, Earle of Annergne, base son to CHARLES the 9, to goe into Germany as his extraordinary Ambassadour, accompanied with the Baron of Bethunes and the Abbat of Preaux; to goe aswell to the Protestant Princes and States (who are all antient Allies to the Crowne of France) as to the Emperour; to exhort them, first, to take some course that the said Protestant Princes and States, on the one side, and the Catholique Princes and States on the other, might not fall to warre as it was very likely; and that they might only giue succor to the Emperor, or the Bohemians, according to their affections, and that within the Realme of Bohemia and Austria, and not else-where. And, Secondly, to labor for some good reconciliation between the Emperor, and the States of Bohemia, and the Elector Palatine, whom they had chosen for their King.

Assembly of the Protestant princes at Vlm.

These Ambassadors, being honorably attended with 400 horse, parted, in May, and arriued at Vlme the sixt of Iune, where the Protestant Princes of the Vnion were then assembled. The French Ambassadors, comming into the Assembly, and hauing the place of precedence giuen them; the Duke of Angoulesme gaue them to vnderstand, that the king had commanded them to visite all in particular, and to assure them of his loue as his good friends and Allies, and to let them know, That, hearing of the contributions in in Germany, he was desirous (like vnto other kings his predecessors) to be a mediator in their controuersies, and to let them know, as a most iust Prince, that after he had giuen Peace to his owne subiects, he would be most glad if hee might procure it to his good friends, neighbours and Allies, whom he coniured to contribute what was necessary for their parts; considering, that if the Generall suffer by the fury of ciuill warres, whereas Religion and temporall interests haue a share, with greater reason reason priuate men shall be much oppressed: A feare which should touch you neere; seeing, that besides the miseries which are prepared for you by this present danger, the successe is most perillous and without remedy, but by reconciliation; the which vndoubtedly will come out of season if you suffer the Enemy of Christendome to make vse of your diuisions: It is in you, my Masters, to lay open vnto vs the meanes of your rest and Peace: the which we will gladly embrace, aswel to performe the commandement of the King our Master, as to discharge our Consciences for the generall good of all Christendom, & the particular affection we beare to all your interests.

Their answer.

The Princes hauing giuen thanks to the most Christian King, for his loue and affection towards them for the Peace of Germany; there were many propositions made, touching the grieuances which they suffered, and whereof they had often complained to his Imperiall Maiesty, and to the Catholique Princes, whereof they gaue instructions to the said Ambassadours, which was the subiect of a second speech, made by the Duke of Angoulesme on this manner: My Masters, It were superfluous to offer any new matter on his Maiesties behalfe; seeing that his intentions being so good, and his assurances so certaine, there wants not any thing, but that his his good offices might be seconded with a happy encounter, for the good and quiet of all Germany, which must be furthered by the iust and reasonable propositions of the parties interessed, and not to stand vpon such things, which only seeme to colour the pretences of warre, and to make it not only more bloody, but also lesse iust in their eyes, which, hauing no passion vnto the businesse but the generall good, might rightly condemne them: That if the King had beleeued, that, from the complaints of the vnited and correspondent Princes and States, these present troubles would haue sprung, he would not haue failed to haue carefully embraced any occasion to haue vsed all good offices for remedy thereof; well remembring himselfe of the good affection and seruices which they haue done to his Crowne: Which, the more easilie they may beleeue, seeing that (following the glorious actions of his Ancestors) as well in the case of Wesell, as that of Gulich, he had contributed all the power and authority he had; and ioyned it with the king of great Brittaine; which had surely brought forth a profitable agreement for both parties, had not both the one and the other seemed vnwilling to make any vse thereof: a subiect, verily, which might haue occasioned the King to slight the course of their affaires; but that his bounty and goodnesse hath herein surpassed all common sense; for that being yet willing to doe the like through all Christendome, he hath now sent vs to procure the Peace and rest of all these people which are in combustion, and whose ruine is very neere if it be not preuented. That to stand talking of grieuances past, will no way prouide for the cause present; and yet we will willingly receiue your memorialls, which promise to giue all your assistance therein: which, when the Emperour shall deserre, the businesse will not be decided without an Assembly of both parties; in which, each forming his complaints, it will rather be a renuing of the causes of diuision, then a re-establishment of former order: That herein there is question of a Crowne taken from off the head of a Prince who was in possession thereof; here is the ground of the businesse whereupon depend eth not only the Peace of Germany, but may prooue the opening of a gappe vnto the generall enemy of the Christian Faith: That the leuying of Armes by the neighbour Princes on either part, doe intend the defence of the Palatinate: That verily it would not be iust the Emperor should be Iudge in his owne cause, and inuade the Palatinate, and forcibly appropriate it vnto himselfe, without any other subiect then by vertue of the Imperiall Ban. But, in this Action, we must carefully obserue by the progresse of the businesse, who shall be in fault; from whom shall proceede the first offence; and, in a word, bend the eyes of equity and not of passion vpon the first motiue of these calamities. For, although it may be alleaged that the Elector Palatine (without any practice of his) hath been chosen by the States of Bohemia for their King: yet it doth not follow, that, in receiuing it, the Emperor hath not a iust cause to seeke a remedy for this mischiefe which so neerely toucheth him, transferring it vpon him from whom he receiued it; seeing it depended vpon the free will of the Elector Palatine, to refuse or accept the Crowne as others had done: yea, BETHLIN GABOR Prince of Transiluania, shewed himselfe more staid; seeing, that refusing the Title of King, he only admitted of that of Prince; lesse significant, but as powerfull: That for these reasons wee neede not doubt that the Emperour and all his house will sooner lose all they haue, then leaue things at this stay: That the enemies of your Peace and quiet will be very glad that the troubles of Bohemia happen to hazard that Crowne, whereby they may haue meanes to inuade that which is next at hand and most commodious: That the forraine forces, whereof you make reckoning, some of them are without vigour, and the other without power; seeing that opposition in Arms will impeach the one, and the other will want meanes to entertaine those which they haue leuied: That the zeale alone which we beare to their good, according to our Kings commandement, hath giuen vs this freedome of speech, which we pray you to accept as from your most affectionate friends and well wishers, as we haue fauourably receiued what was presented vnto vs by the Elector PALATIN's Deputie: vnto whom if our Presence might be ought auaileable, and the causes why we doe not visit him were removed, we should be verie glad to assure him by word of mouth, of the King his good intention, and of the good affection which in particular we all should haue, to do him seruice, as we will make knowne when occasion shall serue; assuring you that we will be euer readie to be of the like mind towards you all.

The Duke of Bauaria Generall for the Catholiques, sends to the Assembly at Vlme.

The Duke of Bauaria, Generall of the vnited Catholikes in Germany, hauing sent his Ambassador to Vlme, they began to treat of the meanes how to maintaine the peace in the Empire, and that the Armies leuied by the Catholikes vnited and the Protestant Princes (whereof the Marquesse of Anspach was Generall) should not encounter: In th'end by the mediation of the French Ambassadors, after a moneths consultation, an accord was made, as you shall heare hereafter.

1620 There had beene leuied manie troupes of Horſe and Foote by the Catholike Vnion, and the commandement of the Arch-duke LEOPOLD Biſhop of Strasbourg and Paſſaw, to the number of ſix or ſeuen thouſand Foote, and one thouſand fiue hundred horſe, in the Countries of Trenes, Mentz, Luxenbourg, Alſatia, Lorain, and euen in Flanders: But, GEORGE FREDERICK of Brandenbourg, Marqueſſe of Durlach (whoſe lands ly neere vnto Strasbourg) as Lieutenant to the Princes of the vnion, prepared himſelfe to oppoſe their paſſage which they would make at Briſach, betwixt Baſile and Strasbourg; and, hauing gathered ſome forces together, he went and encamped on the other ſide of the Rhine. The Arch-duke LEOPOLD, aduertiſed of this contradiction, ſent him many Letters; but had no other anſwere, but that he muſt obtaine a paſſage from the Marqueſſe of Ansbach, Generall for their Vnion; which obtained, he would not hinder them: So as the Arch-duke was forced to ſend vnto the Marqueſſe; who, with the other Germane Princes (who are very warie in their reſolutions) ſeeing that the Emperour had written vnto them, that all the ſouldiers ſhould paſſe without doing any wrong vnto their Territories; they gaue charge vnto the Marqueſſe of Durlach, to ſuffer them to paſſe, according to the conſtitutions of the Empire: whereupon the paſſage was open for their troups, being ſeuen or eight thouſand men, who marched ſpeedily towards Bauaria.

The Marqueſſe of Durlach in Armes to ſtop the Catholiques.

The Proteſtants anſwere.

At the ſame time the Princes of the Vnion, aſſembled at Vlme, made anſwere to the Letters ſent from the Electors and Princes aſſembled at Mulhus, to this effect; That the troubles and diſſenſions happened in Bohemia, and which had ſpred farther, had amazed them, for the danger which might befall the whole Empire; wiſhing they had not happened or were pacified; That they had fore-ſeene theſe inconueniences when the Bohemians were reiected at the Election of the Emperour, and were not ſuffered to enter into Franckfort: Which, being done contrary to the law of Nations, had incenſed them, and giuen them occaſion to chooſe another King; That, matters being as they were, there was no remedy: they were grieued, and left the euent to God, who would call them to an account that were the cauſe of ſo many miſeries; That it was a fearefull thing (as euery man might conceiue) when as in matters which concern Conſcience they found no eaſe, and yet they would haue been glad they had applied milder remedies, to this euill, then that of Warre; being willing to haue imployed themſelues therein, if they had thought their labours would haue been taken in good part. To iudge whether the reiection or election of a new King had been done according to the laws of the Countrey; they could not doe it, being a point of too high a ſtraine; neither would they, by their cenſure, preiudice the whole Romane Empire, leauing that buſineſſe: yet, notwithſtanding, they would preſerue the authority of the Emperour, wherein their Vnion might aſſiſt him; That it had been more expedient for the Empire, if the Electors and Princes had ſuppreſt all complaints, ſettled a generall peace, and reconciled the troubles of Bohemia; That they were doubtfull whether the threats, publiſhed againſt them, might bring any remedy; Finally, they did not ſee what might be deſired more of them which directed all their actions to the glory of God, to the preſeruation of the Empire, and that Iuſtice and concord might be maintained throughout all Germany.

The Duke of Bauaria, hauing drawne his Army together, being twenty fiue thouſand Foot and Horſe, paſſed the Riuer of Dannow at Oonauerd. The Marqueſſe of Ansbach, Generall for the Vnion, hauing thirteene thouſand Horſe and Foote, marched towards them, being fortified by ſome other troupes from Virtemberg and Vlme: The two Armies came ſo neere together that they might talke one to another: In the meane time, this accord was made at Vlme, by the mediation of the Ambaſſadors of France;

n Accord beeen the Princes of the Vnion, the Catholiques, made at Vlme.

We, MAXIMILIAN Duke of Bauaria, Count Palatine of the Rhine; and We, IOACHIN ERNEST, Marqueſſe of Ansbach and Brandenburg, make knowne to all men, that conſidering the diſorders, miſeries and calamities which are crept into the Roman Empire and neighbour Nations by means of combuſtions and wars, threatning a totall ruine and deſolation; by means whereof, not onely the Electors, Princes, and Catholick States vnited, but alſo the Proteſtants haue taken occaſion to make Leuies and prepare to warre: the which hath bred a bad intelligence betwixt them, mixt with iealouſie and diſtruſt; with this perſwaſion, that this raiſing of Forces by the Vnions, is to moleſt one another, and ſo to diſturb the common peace of the Empire, and to bring it to the extremities of warre: To preuent the which, and to take away all occaſions of bad intelligence, iealouſie and diſtruſt; by the mediation of the Ambaſſadors of the French King, they concluded theſe Articles following:

First, We promiſe for our ſelues in particular, and for all the Electors, Princes and States aſſociated ſociated of both the Vnions, that not any of them (vpon any cauſe or pretext whatſoeuer) ſhall aſſaile or moleſt by way of hoſtility, force and armes, the perſons and territories of the other party, nor innouate any thing concerning religion and the publique peace. 1620.

Secondly, it was agreed, that if any one vpon vrgent neceſſity ſhould require free paſſage (giuing good and ſufficient caution, according to the conſtitutions of the Empire) for defenſe of his perſon and ſubiects, it ſhould not be denied, prouided the demand were made in time and place, and not ſuddenly when they are vpon the Frontiers, or entred into another mans Country; which would be an oppreſſion to their ſubiects.

Thirdly, the Duke of Bauaria and the Catholick States vnited did exclude out of this Treaty the Kingdom of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, and did onely comprehend the principalities, lands, countries and ſegniories belonging to the Electors, Princes, and States of both Vnions; yea, the Palatinate and other lands adiacent and annexed by ſucceſſiue right, in regard of the good intelligence and correſpondency which was between the ſaid Palatinate and the other principalities (the continuance whereof is in a manner aſſured): and the ſaid Treaty ſhall not extend further, or haue any other interpretation.

And We, IOACHIN ERNEST Marqueſſe of Ansbach, with the Electors, Princes and States vnited, referre our ſelues wholly to the declaration which the Electors, Princes, and Catholique States haue made, as alſo to the exception of the Realm of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces; not meaning to comprehend them in this Treaty, leauing thoſe affairs to their ordinary courſe.

Fourthly, it is agreed, that in regard of the ſhortnes of time, and the abſence of the greateſt and ſoundeſt part of the States of the Empire, both Catholiques and Proteſtants, they ſhall deferre the reſtitution and compenſation of loſſes and oppreſſions hapned by reaſon of Leuies of ſouldiers, to a more conuenient time.

After this accord, the French Ambaſſadors with their whole train embarked vpon the Dannow the ſixt of Iuly, and arriued at Vienna the twentith; where they found a hundred caroches attending them, euery one hauing ſix horſes, which conducted them to their lodgings. As for their audience with the Emperor, their ſtay at Vienna, their mediation to accommodate the affairs of Hungary with BETHLIN GABOR, it belongs to the following Hiſtory.

In the beginning of Iune and during the aſſembly at Vlmes formerly ſpoken of, diuers reports went throughout all Germany of the preparation of 2 royall Armies to be leuied in Flanders: the one vnder the leading of Marqueſſe SPINOLA conſiſting of 30000 men for the conqueſt of the Palatinate; the other of 12000 foote and 3000 horſe vnder the conduct of Don LOVIS de Velaſco to oppoſe the Prince of Orenge and the States of Holland, in caſe they ſhould vndertake any thing in SPINOLA's abſence vpon thoſe places which the Spaniard holds in Cleueland or vpon the Archbiſhoprick of Cullen.

Vpon report of the diligence which SPINOLA made to compoſe his Army for to goe into the Palatinate, the two Armies wee formerly ſaid were encamped neere vnto one another vpon the other ſide of the Dannow; to wit, that of the Duke of Bauaria which was of 25000 at Vending: and the other of the Coreſpondent Princes led by the Marqueſſe of Anſpach conſiſting of 15000 at Langenau neere Vlmes, raiſed their Camps: and turning taile one vpon another, the Duke of Bauaria marched along the Danube into Auſtria: and the Marqueſſe of Anſpach aduanced to get the Rhine, to the end he might come into the Palatinate to defend it if it were inuaded. What followed you ſhall heare hereafter.

Souldiers come to the Emperors ſeruice into Auſtria.

The Emperour hauing receiued great forces both of horſe and foote which had beene leuied in Croatia, Iſtria and Carinthia, with thoſe which were ſent him from Italy; and the Duke of Bauaria approaching the frontiers of vpper Auſtria, deſiring (before he would vſe extremities againſt the Proteſtants of Auſtria) to know whether they would perſiſt in their rebellion, he ſent them his monitoriall Letters, importing, That the Proteſtants of the lower Auſtria hauing confirmed the League with the Bohemians (which was contrarie to all diuine and humane lawes and the conſtitutions of the Empire) againſt him and the Princes of his howſe, there was no reaſon he ſhould make any fauourable anſwere, to their petitions, if they did not firſt deſiſt from the ſaid league with the Bohemians, and acknowledge it by ſome loyall action. Wherefore his Imperiall Maieſty deſired that without any further delay, the Catholike States ſhould come to Vienna, and the Proteſtants ſend their Deputies, to witneſſe vnto him by a publike Act that they renounced the confederation and League of the Bohemians: This done, he would anſwere their petition to their contentment.

1620 Protestants the lower Austria renounce the consideration of the Bohemians.

Then the lower Austrians seeing no colour of using any more delayes, perceiuing the forces of the Emperour ready to execute his will vpon them, both the one and the other sent their Deputies to Viena. The Protestants presented vnto his Imperiall Maiesty, their Act of renuntiation of association with the Bohemians, and besought him to giue them equality with the Catholiks and free exercise of religion throughout all Austria.

The Emperour vses them his word for the free exercise of the profession of Ausbourg.

Vppon this supplication they had answere, that they ought not to doubt, but that his Imperiall Maiesty would be a father vnto his faithfull and loyall States, and that he would spend his life to preserue and maintaine them in peace one with another; And as for what concerned the free exercise of the confession of Ausbourg in Austria, he gaue them his word it should be obserued as it had been in the time of the deceased Emperour MATHIAS his predecessor.

The Duke of Bauaria enters with his Army into the vpper Austria.

Hauing receiued this answere, the States of the lower Austria, both Catholikes and Protestants which were at Viena, staied there to take the hereditary oath vnto the Emperour as Archduke of Austria. As for the vpper Austria, the Protestant States were assembled at Lintz to oppose themselues against the Duke of Bauaria: who before he would vndertake anything against them, sent a Commissary to let them vnderstand that hee was aduanced with his Army by the Emperours commandement to reduce them to their obedience, requiring them to renounce the League they had made with the Bohemians, and to take the hereditarie oath of allegeance, giuing them only fiue daies to resolue. In the meane time he sent HASLANG the chiefe Captaine of his guards with 1500 horse and a regiment of foote into the vpper Austria: where hauing defeated 300 souldiers and many Pesants neer to the castle of Hagen, he burnt the village where they were fortified: the Castle yeelded by composition.

The Castle of Starnberg was also summoned, and the Captain threatned to be hanged if hee yeelded not presently: wherewith being terrified, he gaue vp the place; and so did many other Castles and Churches whither the Protestants had retired themselues.

The Duke of Lauuemburg slaine by Pesants.

At the same time, ERNEST LEWES Duke of Saxony, of the house of Lauuemburg, going down the Dannow by boat, hauing landed at Aschar foure miles from Lintz, and telling certain peasants that they should shortly haue other guests, they fell violently vpon him, and murdered him.

The Protestant States of the vpper Austria, assembled at Lintz, sent to Count MANSFELT Marshall of the Bohemian Army, to intreat him to come thither in respect of the danger they feared, in regard the Duke of Bauaria was so neer them with his Army. To whom he made answer, that, being so weak of men, he could not aid them; but that daily he expected greater forces, and then he would most willingly come vnto them: whereof he aduertised the King of Bohemia, giuing him aduice what was to be done for the fortifying of the Country; but his aduice was not followed, there being enuy and iealousies between the Commanders of the Bohemian Army. In the mean time, the Austracians seeing no hope of relief, and that their ruine was apparant if they made any shew of resistance against the Duke of Bauaria's great forces, that they had no expert Commanders, and that their confederates of Bohemia would not bee able to releeue them; they sent their Deputies to the Duke of Bauaria to craue pardon, and to intercede for them to the Emperor, that they might be intreated like to those of the lower Austria, and that they would renounce their confederation with the Bohemians. Answer was made them, that they should return to Lintz, abandon the Castle, dismisse their souldiers, and that euerie man should retire to his house.

Submission of the Protestants of the vpper Austria assembled at Lintz.

They of Lintz heerupon hauing taken vp the chains which crosse the riuer of Dannow, they not onely opened the passage, but exhorted all the people not to resist the Duke of Bauaria, lest they should cast oil into the fire. Thus, the Duke of Bauaria, hauing taken the chief Forts and Towns which the Protestants held, seised vpon all the passages, and defeated about eight hundred men which would haue ioyned with the States troupes: he entred Lintz with his Army the fourth of August, where the States excused themselues aswell as they could, promised to yeeld obedience, and took the oath of alleageance.

Lintz yeelded to the Duke of Bauaria.

Meane while, the Bohemian Army lay at Thymes, where they framed their camp and spent all the moneth of August vnprofitablie: during which staie the souldiers grew discontented for their pay, and Count MANDSFIELD much more, both for the vaine promises he had receiued from the directors and officers at Pragne, whereby he had beene disappointed of meanes to effect his designes, and disabled to doe any seruice for the crowne of Bohemia in time to come; as also for an affront he had receiued in Austria, which was after this manner: The Barron of Feltz Marshall of the Army hauing beene slaine (as you haue formerly heard) Count MANDS-

Discontentment of Count Mandsfield & his troupes.

FIELD

FIELD, Generall of the Artillery, pretended the place due to him by the order of war: whereupon, he wrote to his Maiesty, to the Officers, and to the Prince of Anhalt Lord Generall for the same; the which was granted him, and he executed the place of Marshall of the Camp at Egenbourg, during the space of two or three weeks, without any contradiction. 1620

Soon after, the Generall, coming one day to visit him, could him, that in truth he had been made Marshall of the Bohemian Army; but, as touching the office of Marshall of the royall army, it was reserued for the Earl of Hohenlo or Hollack: whereupon, complaining of that wrong, he grew so discontent, that he desired the Prince to giue him leaue to depart, and to withdraw himself elsewhere; the which he could not then obtain. Shortly after, the Prince of Anhalt came again to visit him, perswading him to rest satisfied with that office limited as aforesaid, and to suffer Count HOHENLO to execute the charge of Marshall of the Army Royall: the which he wholly refused; saying, that if hee were but Marshall of the Bohemian Army, hee would go thither, and obey Count HOHENLO as Lieutenant Generall: and for that there were many braue Commanders in the Army, there was no great need of him; beseeching the the Prince again to doo him the fauour as to giue him leaue to depart: which he did. Count MANSFELD, being much altered with these discontents, and still oppressed with enuy, resolued to retire himself. To this end he wrote to the King and the States; who made him a gracious answer, perswading him to continue their friend, and not to abandon them in so dangerous a time: yet after much importunity, and many messages sent by him, in the end they decreed, that he should presently receiue two months pay for his souldiers, who should be intreated like to those of the Royall Army; that he should execute his office of Lord Marshall as the Baron of Feltz had done, and not attend the command of any other than the Lord Generall: whereupon he resolued to continue in his Maiesties seruice till the end of October. So matters rested yet his malitious enemies laid a foule aspersion vpon him, that hee meant to turn his coat and serue the Emperor; the which was generally bruited, and supported in Court: but the King would neuer harbour it in his thought, but still perswaded the Lord Marshal not to respect such malitious reports, assuring him of his royall fauour. I haue been bould to make this little digression, to shew what iealousie and diuision was among the Commanders of the Bohemian Army; which no doubt was very preiudiciall to the Kings affairs and to the State.

A generall Assembly of the States of Hungary.

We haue formerly made mention, that at the truce made between the Emperor and Prince BETHLIN, it was concluded, that an Assembly of the States of Hungary should bee held at Neuheusal, to treat of the means how to reconcile the dissensions betwixt his Imperiall Maiesty and the States. It began in July; whereas Prince BETHLIN propounded the Articles following: that He BETHLIN GABOR, Prince of Hungary and Transiluania, desired nothing more than to settle a peace in the troubled estate of Hungary, and the liberty of religion: and to shew that he desired nothing but peace, he had refused the Crown which had been presented to him; that the ground of a peace was to ratifie the league with the Bohemians; that the truce made with the Emperor, and that which should be treated of in that present Assembly, might help much to a peace; that during the truce he had iustly assisted the confederates, seeing that the Emperor had refused them a truce at their request. As for the resolutions they were to take with the Emperors Ambassadors, he desired the States to aduise speedily; that he had alwaies desired peace, but sincere and without fraud; that to obtain it, he was com to assist his confederates miserably oppressed and afflicted; that the Emperor desired not peace but warre, the which appeared by many signes; yea, for that his souldiers the Cossaques had entred into Hungary, and ruined diuerse places with fire and sword:

Propositions made to the States of Hungary by Beth. Gabor.

That the Emperor hauing stopped and denied all passage to the Deputies of Bohemia and Austria, they ought not to treat of any peace with him, but of warre; that they should aduise by what means they might conueniently begin it and continue it; how to finde money, which is the sinewes of warre, to repair the Frontiers, and furnish them with things necessary; to send Ambassadors to the Turk, lest that the States being imployed elsewhere, they might receiue some losse and preiudice that way; that it being lawfull for the States according to the lawes to punish their bad affected Country-men who had done great harm to the confederates, they should do iustice.

The Emperor sent Ambassadors to this Assembly. They demanded to haue the league, made between the Bohemians and their new chosen King with the States of Hungary and the Prince BETHLEM, broken: but it was in vain. The Ambassadors of France which were at Vienna, sent also Letters to this Assembly, making offer of their endeauour to reconcile the differences between betweene the Emperor and them. But Prince BETHLIN made answer, that there was no appearance of speaking of peace, seeing that his Imperiall Maiesty hauing so great forces on foote, would employ them whil'st they entertained them with an accord. It was therefore concluded in this assembly, at the request of the Ambassadors of Bohemia, that they should send 10000 Hungarians to succour the Bohemians against so many Armies as were falling vpon their Countrey, the which was speedily put in execution: That there should be no continuance of Truce with the Emperour; the which being ended, they should beginne warre in Austria against the Imperialls; to diuert the Army marching into Bohemia: and that BETHLIN changing the name of Prince of Hungary which he had assumed in the beginning, should take that of King and be crowned at Presbourg in October. It is written, that the Turkes Ambassadours assured the assembly that the Sultan would giue consent to this coronation; but the cheefe Noblemen of Hungary Catholikes opposed themselues, and continued constant to the Emperor.

The Bohemians, seeing Austria wholly reduced vnder the Emperors obedience, thought that the Duke of Bauaria and the Earle of Bucquoy ioining their forces, and making an Armie of 50000 men, would enter into Bohemia: They sawe that the succours which they expected at need from the vnited Princes of Germany, would be diuerted to defend the Palatinate against Spinola's Army: that all their Forces were but 20000 men (besides 10000 Hungarians which came to their aide) commanded by CHRISTIAN, Prince of Anhalt, Generall of their Armie; in the which there were many Noble-men, but few good Commanders. Yet notwithstanding, they were of opinion that with these forces they should be able to hinder the Imperiall Armie from performing any great matter, if they did furnish their Frontire Townes with men, monie and munition, to staie them at some Seege, which is commonly the ruine of great Armies: whereupon they commanded Count MANSFELD to march with all his Forces to assure the Frontiers of Bohemia against the Duke of Bauaria; assuring him that all the Countrie was in Armes, and that great numbers of horse and foote were commanded to ioine with him, neere to Glatz and Taux; but marching thither with his Troupes, he found not anie: and complaining vnto the Officers, they made an excuse that they had been countermanded and imploied in other places against Don BALTHAZARS forces. MANSFELD being disappointed of succours & followed close by the enemy, fearing they should take the way of Pilsen before him, he resolued to retire thither, which he did in the end of September. He found the Towne full of wants, the fortifications little aduanced, few labourers, and no money to supplie all; wherewith he presently acquainted the officers & with the danger if they were not speedily supplied: he requested them to send him some munition, whereby he might be enabled to hould out a siege, and money to satisfie the officer and souldier; who being already discontented, it was to bee feared they might fall into a mutinie, to the great preiudice of the place and cause. To these Letters he had a faire answere, but no effects. In the meane time Count MANSFELD fortified the Towne all he could, drawing-in what prouision he might. The enemy was not idle but grew daily stronger, taking Podnian, Prachadits, Winterberg, and Pisech with great effusion of bloud: ofter which, Scottenhofen, Taux, and Glatta yeelded by composition.

The Bohemians send Embassadores to the Elector of Saxony.

The Elector of Saxonie, who made great preparation to Armes, did much perplex the Bohmians; for being assailed by him vpon the North side, when as the Imperialls should enter vpon the South, they should then be shut vp betwixt them. Whereupon they presently sent Ambassadors to the said Elector, with particular instructions, to induce the Estates of his Countrie to diuert him from attempting anie thing in fauour of the Emperor, from whom he had receiued Letters for the execution of the proscription against them, giuing him authority to doe what he should thinke fit; to take Townes, punish rebels, and pardon those which should returne to their duties and take the oath due to his Maiesty, and not to forget any thing for the recouerie of the Realme, and setling all in peace. The Ambassadours of Bohemia being at Dresda with the Elector, they entreated his highnes to giue their King and the States of Bohemia that contentment as to declare vnto them his intention, touching the Letters of execution sent vnto him from the Emperour, and whether he desired not to remaine Newter as hee had hitherto done. The Elector made a long repetition vnto them of the progresse of these troubles; concluding in the end, that he had accepted of this commission in regarde of his duty: hoping that it might bee executed without force or hostile attempts, if they would shew themselues disposed vnto peace rather then to warre; That his onely aime was to maintaine peace, true religion, the priuiledges of the Realme, and the Imperiall and Royall authority; That if the Protestants amongst them had the like affection, it was the meanes to attaine vnto that end; That the Protestants stants of high Austria had lately made proof thereof; who, accepting of the Emperors pardon, had by the same means obtained the exercise of true religion, with all their priuiledges and immunities, and freed themselues from a thousand miseries which follow warre. But if they did persist in their resolution, and continued the war (which he could not hinder) yet they should alwaies remember his faithfull aduice: and if affairs succeeded otherwise than they expected, he was to be excused, hauing shewed himself as well affected to their good as to that of his own subiects. 1620

Marquesse SPINOLA hauing leuied a goodly Army in the Arch-dukes Territories vnder the Emperors commission, but with the King of Spain's mony, it bred a iealousie in all the Princes of Germany, that it was to inuade the palatinat, & such princes as did assist him. The K. of great Britanne, although he would not meddle with the affairs of Bohemia, yet alwaies carefull to preserue his daughters dowry in the Palatinate, and the inheritance of her children who had neuer offended, sent an Ambassador expressly to the Arch-duke being at Brussels, to bee informed of the subiect of this great preparation: to whom answer was made, that these forces were leuied in the name of the King of Spain, and that he might learn the cause from Marquess SPINOLA; who, being demanded, made answer, that in the Letter which he had receiued from Spain, hee had found the Commission, but might not open it till he came to the place of Arms; wherfore if it pleased him to be there, he would impart it to him. Marquesse Spinola marcheth towards the palatinate.

In the mean time, on the eighth of August, he took his leaue of the Arch-dukes, and on the seuenteenth came to Aix la Chapelle; where he attended his munition and carriages comming from Antwerp, consisting of 350 wagons loaden with pouder, bullets, boats to make bridges, and all other munition of warre. He had forty cannons that came from Macklin, all with the Emperors Arms prepared for this Army; ouens of brasse, and milles vpon wagons sufficient to make bread for 20000 men in foure and twenty houres. All things being ready, he parted from Aix the one and twentith of August towards Confluence; where he mustered his whole Army, being six and twenty thousand foot and foure thousand horse. Then hee opened his Commission, wherewith he acquainted the English Embassador; which contained a declaration to make warre against all those which should be confederate and allied to the Bohemians, rebels to his Imperiall Maiesty. Hauing giuen his souldiers two months pay, he past the Rhine vpon a bridge of boats at Saint Sebastians: the which being presently taken vp again, coming to the head of the Army, he made an Oration to the Captains and souldiers, exhorting them to carry themselues valiantly; this warre being for the defense of the Catholique faith and house of Austria: whereupon, they all cried out, God saue the house of Austria, and discharged their muskets. His commission.

From Saint Sebastians, neer to Confluence, he wrote particular Letters to MAVRICE Lantzgraue of Hesse, and to some other Princes of the Vnion, aduertising them of his going into the Palatinate, and that they should assist the Emperour in his iust cause, or remaine Neuters: In doing so, they nor their subiects should receiue any harme from his Armie: After which, hee marched towards Franckfort. The Princes of the Vnion (who attended him in the Palatinate vpon this side the Rhine, with an Army of twenty two thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse) hearing that he had passed the Rhine at Confluence, thought that he had a designe vpon Franckfort and the Palatinate beyond the Rhine; which made them to turne the head of their Army in all haste to passe the riuer of Rhyne, vpon a bridge of boates at Oppenheim; which Towne SPINOLA took soone after (the Princes being marched towards Wormes, fearing it should be besieged) being yielded by 800 men there ingarrison, who departed without Arms. There was found store of Munition, Wine, Graine, and other commodities, sufficient for the Army for halfe a yeere; with much moueables, Tents, Pauillions, and other Implements. This Towne of Oppenheim, is a very easie passage vpon the Riuer of Rhine, for entraunce into the vpper Palatinate. He writes to some Princes of the Vnion.

Whilest that SPINOLA busied himselfe to fortifie Oppenheim, he sent forth his Commaunders with Troupes, like Harbengers with Chalke in their hands, to marke out his lodgings, as if he had feared no Enemy. Don CARLO de Colonia, Gouernour of Maestric, and now Ambassador in England, went to Creutzenac; which yeelded by composition. Don GONZALES de Cordua, seized vpon Canb, Bacrac, and the Castle of Pelst; and towards the Riuer of Mozelle, Don IAQVES MESSIA, also, with his Regiment of Spaniards, tooke Tarbach and other places of importance: In these places, so taken, they put in Garrison some six thousand men: which the Arch-duke ALBERT vnderstanding, and desiring that thereby the Army might not be diminished, He takes townes in the palatinate 1620 nished, he sent a supply of 6000 vnder the leading of Mounsieur de la MOTTERIE Gouernour of Mastric.

Sir Horatio Vere sent to the Palatinate with English Forces.

Our King's Maiesty, being assured that SPINOLA meant to inuade the Palatinate, and desirous to preserue the inheritance of his grandchildren if it were possible, suffred a regiment of 2200 Voluntaries to be leuied vnder the command of that worthy Knight Sir HORATIO VERE their Generall for the Palatinate; beeing followed by two honourable persons, the Earls of Oxford and Essex with priuate commands, and diuerse gallant Knights and Gentlemen.

These Troops past into Holland; where hauing receiued their apparell and Armes, they marched vp the Rhine till they came right against Wesel; whereas the Prince of Orange encamped with his Army, not far from Don LEWES de Velasco, who lay aboue Wesel with 12000 foot and 3000 horse, obseruing one anothers actions. The Prince, doubting that the passage of Lippe would not be very safe for those Troops which should go into the Palatinate, caused a bridge of boats to be made ouer the Rhine right against his Camp; where the English past ouer with Count HENRY of Nassaw, who (as some affirm) had 1500 horse and fiue hundred foot. After which, the Prince of Orange passed into an Iland lying between Cullen and Bone: where hee built a Fort called Pfaffen-mutz, which might haue the command of the riuer, and annoy those Towns.

They passe the riuer of Rhine with Count Henry of Nassaw.

SPINOLA, hearing that Count HENRY and Sir HORATIO VERE marched with their Troops, had a desire to encounter them and cut them off in their passage (and for that intent he passed the Rhine with 9000 foot and 3000 horse) and likewise to see, whether they of Franckfort would giue them passage through their Town, contrary to their promise: but he was deceiued in his expectation, by reason of their speedy march (going some times twenty miles a day and more) and taking their way aboue Franckfort by the County of Hannaw: and so they drew neer to Wormes, where they passed the riuer, and in the end ioyned with the Princes of the Vnion.

The Army of the Vnion prepares to fight with Spinola.

The day after the coming of the English and Prince HENRY to the Army of the Vnion, there was great expectation of a battell, for that Marquesse SPINOLA had drawn his Army out of his strength, and could not well retire to his trenches without fighting, for that the Princes Army lay so neer them. The Commanders therefore resolued to giue him battell: whereupon the whole Army was put in order, the foreward being giuen to Sir HORATIO VERE with his English Troops, being seconded by Count HENRY with his horse. Euery souldier prepared himselfe to fight with great resolution, the English being incourag'd by their preacher; who tould them the cause was iust, they fought for God and religion, for the honour of their Country, and to maintain the right of their Soueraign's daughter and her children. His speech so inflamed the resolute souldiers, that they cast vp their caps for ioy, attending but the signall for battell; but, their courages were soon danted: for, the Marquesse of Ansbach, the Generall (insteed of crying To Arms) caused a retreit to be sounded; whereby the enemy had occasion to recouer his trenches, to the generall grief of the English. He pretended this reason, That the day was too far spent: but, by the opinion of such as were there, they lost a fair aduantage, and almost the hope of an assured victory; their Army being far greater than SPINOLA's, his forces being diuided. This retreit much blemished the reputation of the Marquesse: of whom men spake diuersly; some tearming him a coward, others saying he was corrupted, and had betraid the Army: but, doubtlesse, it much hindred the Palatinate's affaires, and gaue the enemie means to aduance his conquests; the Army of the Vnion retiring to Wormes, where they were incampt: but soon after, it being winter, and the German heat abated, their army was garisoned.

Prince BETHLIN, possessing Presbourg, and willing to bring the war on this side of the riuer Dannow towards Vienna, had caused a bridge of boats to bee made there, with a Fort at the end thereof: vpon which hauing past his Army, consisting of 10000 men, and his cannon, he went and besieged Hambourg, but the intelligence which he had with the townsmen being discouerd, he planted his batteries to win it by force: but, after a breach made, and foure assaults giuen, with the losse of a thousand Hungarians, he raised his siege, and retired to Volrburg.

When the Imperials perceiued Prince BETHLIN's purpose to bring the war neer Vienna, for that he had passed the Dannow, there was a goodly enterprise propounded in the Emperors Councell (if it had happily succeeded) to go and break the bridge of boats at Presbourg: and whil'st Prince BETHLIN was on this side of the Dannow (where he had no Town of retreit, or means speedily to repasse it if this bridge were broken) to force the Castle and Towne of Presbourg; The Earl of Dampierre propounded this exploit so easily to be effected, that the execution

cution therof was committed to him, though many held it a dangerous attempt: but he, hauing a great spirit thirsting after fame, and iudging this would be a good means to reduce all Hungary to the Emperors obedience by attempting onely this hazard, could by no meanes bee diswaded. 1620

The execution of this enterprise being then resolued; the Troops of ANHALT, leuied in the Country of Treues in the Spring, were embarked aboue Vienna at Grifenstein and Cornebourg, together with those Troops which were alwaies attending the said Earl, which were composed of French, Walloons and other Nations. Foure Coluerings, twelue Petards, powder, wilde fire, and other necessary munitions were embarked at Vienna; so as his Army was held to bee eight thousand foot, forty shippes and boats, and two thousand horse, which came through the lower Austria: neither could the extreamity of the weather on the riuer of Dannow, nor the sinking of three boats laden with men and munition, lost vnder the bridge of Vienna, feare him from this enterprise.

Those which were embarked aboue Vienna being come thither the 8 of October, TAMPIERRE set sail to go to Presbourg. When they were come beneath Hainburg, one of his boats wherin there were 200 musketiers was sunk: and thinking to arriue by break of day within two miles of Presbourg to put himself on shore, it was nine of the clock before he had landed all his troops. At his first approach he seised vpon the suburbs, forced the Fort built vpon the riuer of Dannow, and brake the bridge of boats. All which succeeding well, he resolued to attempt the Castle by Petard; conceiuing that if it might be taken, the towne could not long hould out. But being aduanced before the Countercarfe with fiftie musketiers and one of his Colonells called ESPAGNE, the Morauians which were within discouering him, shotte vpon him without intermission: eight of his men were slaine neere vnto him, and a musket shot carried his hat from his head. Heerupon they tould him, that he was knowne and leuelled at from a certaine loop-hole; which caused him to retire: but as he went off he was shot into the reines of the back; and beeing led away by two of his souldiers, one of them was slain, and the Earl shot into the right side; which slue him out-right: whereupon, his Troops, growing amazed, retired with more confusion than good speed; which those of Presbourg perceiuing, the Hungarians issued out and slue a hundred or sixscore of the hindmost of them: from whom they recouered the Earls body.

Tampiere slain by two musket shot.

Prince BETHLIN being comn again before Hainburg, and hauing won the same, hee appointed this place for the French Ambassadors to meet at; who had sent vnto him to knowe if he would vse their help for the pacifying of the troubles. And knowing that they parted the sixt of October to repair vnto him, he sent them a conuoy of foure hundred horse: which beeing defeated and put to flight between that place and Vienna by the Imperialists, he forbare not for all that to send forth another conuoy somewhat stronger than the former, and to receiue and entertaine them two miles short of Hainbourg, by two hundred Gentlemen attired in cloth of gould, and with many precious iewels; who presented them with the Princes caroaches, in the which they were conducted with no lesse than an hundred torches forgh on to their lodgings.

French Ambassadors magnificently received at Hambourg.

On the morrow, the day of their Audience, they were with magnificence led vnto the Castle through all the souldiers of the guard cloathed in blew, and found the Prince in the Hal of the castle accompanied with 200 Gentlemen apparelled after the Turkish fashion with long robes of veluet and cloath of gold lined with sables; who after their reception conducted them vnto his Cabinet: what passed in this first audience and in a second afterwards, is not knowne. A few daies after they returned vnto Viena; where they endeauoured themselues by all meanes to reconcile and bring to an end those cruell warres, not onely with Prince BETHLIN and the Hungarians, but also with the Elector Palatine king of Bohemia: and to that end they sent one to Prague (who had beene alwaies Agent for France in the Palatines court at Heidleberg before he had accepted the crowne of Bohemia) to treate with Sir Richard Weston, and Sir Edward Conaway, now Counsellors of State (who were sent Ambassadors from his Maiestie vnto his Sonne in lawe, and had charge to employ themselues seriously for the pacifying of those troubles) touching these alterations, and to vnderstand from them what course they would take for the attaining vnto a peace. But the battaile being lost within few dayes after by the king of Bohemia, it changed the face of all those good intentions to treat of peace.

Whil'st they staied yet at Hainbourg, this Prince sent for the body of the Earle of Tampierre from Presbourg, and caused it to bee very honourably interred. The Baron de Prener, 1620. taking his charge, assembled 6000 foot of his routed Army, and all the horse; with which hee staid the courses of the Hungarians and Transiluanians, which made their incursions euen to the gates of Vienna. Let vs now obserue what past in the other places, and what in the mean time the Elector of Saxonie doth in Lusatia, and the Duke of Bauaria and the Earle BVCQVOY in Bohemia.

The Elector of Saxony enters to Lusatia, to execute the Emperors Ban.

The Elector of Saxony, hauing composed his Army of 20000 men with great store of cannon and munition for war, to begin the execution of the Imperiall Ban in Lusatia, he sent to the States of that Prouince IAQVES GRVNTHALL, one of his Counsellers, to publish an assembly of the States of that Prouince in the Town of Bautsen on the seuenth of September, old stile, that he might communicate to the Emperors commission.

Whereof FREDERICK Elector Palatine being aduertised; as king of Bohemia and Marqueese of Lusatia, he sent to forbidd ADOLPH of Gersdorf, Gouernour of the prouince, to make any such conuocation. And withall gaue Commission to the Marqueese of Iagerndorf of Brandeburg, to enter into Lusatia with 6000 men to reserue it against the forces of the duke of Saxony: which hee executed with such diligence, as he was sooner at the gates of Bautsen then they had any newes of his comming: where being entred, hee seised vpon ADOLPH of Gersdorf and GRVNTHALL with AVGVSTIN SCHMID, Agent for his Imperiall Maiesty: and some other Deputies which were already come to Bautsen. This done and hauing left 2000 men in garrison at Bautsen, and a new Gouernour, he went to Gorlitz where he did the like and in other places of this Prouince. Which the Elector of Saxony vnderstanding, he enters into Lusatia with his Army, and layeth seege to Bautsen, where he was 3 weekes before it: and then taking it by force at the fift assault, he caused 40 of the principall rebels to be hangd. Thus was Lusatia reduced, and the Marqueese of Iagerndorf constrained to withdraw himself into Silesia, hauing attempted in vaine to releeue the Towne.

The Duke of Bauaria after his taking of Linтz as is aforesaid, hauing no more to do in Austria, and his Imperial Maiesty being also desirous that the 2 Armies, that is to say, his own which the Earl of Bucquoy conducted, and was then vpon the frontiers of Austria & Morauia, and the D. of Bauaria's might ioin together, to enter into Bohemia and march towards Prague: He turned about the head of his Armie towards Snethall and went and ioined it with the Earle of Bucquoy.

Before he enters into Bohemia, hee sent the Emperors Letters-patents to the States; and by his owne he exhorts them to accept of the grace offred to them, to appear before him, to satisfie his Imperiall Maiesties Commandement; to prouide better for their Kingdome, to receiue their lawfull King so liberall and benigne; and to preuent greater miseries, if they loued their owne good.

To these letters the States of Bohemia made answer the 30. of August, sending back th'originall of the Emperors Letters pattents; Letting him vnderstand, that they would defend their party, to the hazard of their goods and liues: That they committed to God th'euent, and did yet notwithstanding hope, that he whom they neuer had offended, but euer reputed as a friend, and a worthy and prudent Prince of the Empire, would not suffer himselfe to be perswaded to vse anie act of hostility against them and their Kingdome.

The Bohemians Army retires towards Prague.

The Bohemians, seeing their Army nothing equall to the Emperors and the Duke of Bauaria's being ioined, they cause it to return out of Austria into Bohemia, to vnite all their forces with the 10000 Hungarians which Prince BETHLIN had sent to their succours. The Prince of Anhalt in his retreit put garrisons into all places, and augmented those which were weak, that they might make some opposition against the Imperialists: but their Armies being thus ioined, those which made anie resistance found but bad vsage.

The Bauarians and Bucquois exoloits in Bohemia. Taking of Horne.

For after the taking of Horne, they made so happie a progresse in Bohemia, that the Towne of Wortsmits hauing been succoured by them (which the Prince of Anhalt in his retreat would haue forced) all the places between it and Budwitz were reduced to the obedience of the Imperiall Maiesty. The 25 of September they encamped before Budna, which they constrained to yeeld, hauing for a space held out with great resolution: From hence the Earle of Bucquoy went and assailed Phrahalits, which he tooke by force, as also Pisca which sawe both the Armies before her gates; and in the end being also forced, they held on their course to Prague, and in the way recouered the towns of Risemberg, Sellestemhof, and the fort of Walern which MANSFELD formerly held, with Stratonitz, Glatau, Chiffenhotten, Gratzien, Schimising, Witterberg, Mabren and Grimbach, all places of Note, to assure their passage towards Prague, from whence both Armies were but two daies iourney. About the 10. of Octob. the Emperors army with the Bauarians, began began to shew themselues before Pilsen, and very neer the Town. Their out-works were not yet defensible, neither had they forces sufficient to man them; besides many other discommodities which often happen where mony wants: so as if the enemy at that instant had attempted the place with his great forces, he had vndoubtedly carried it; or putte it to great extremity. MANSFELD intermitted no time to fortifie his works, and borrowed what mony he could, to content the souldiers; so as within fewe daies the works were in defense. The King was comm with his Army to Rokezan, two leagues from Pilsen, towards Prague, being 24000 men, besides 10000 Hungarians. 1620

Bucquoy seeks to corrupte Mansfeld.

Count BVCQVOY, seeing MANSFELD's resolution, and that to force it would both lose time and very many braue men, sought to get it by policy, hauing good intelligence how all things were managed amongst the chief men of that party, and of the discontent giuen to MANDSFELD; knowing, that nothing can sooner put a Noble spirit from his posture, than enuy. He therefore studies how to gain him that was most potent in that place, houlding himself sure to effect it. His deuice was to send IOACHIN de Carpzo a Lieutenant, Colonel of one of MANSFELD'S regiments (who had been taken prisoner the yeer before by the enemy) to perswade him to leaue the place to the Emperor, in consideration of a great summe of money which he promised him. The Messenger accepts the Commission, and deliuers what hee had in charge to MANSFELD; who sent him presently to the Prince of Anhalt, who caused him oft to be examined. MANSFELD by his Maiesties consent gaue ear to BVCQVOY, and offers to treat with him; but on this condition, that restitution should be made to Captain LENSTAVV, whose Troops had been spoiled contrary to the capitulation of TAVX, by BVCQVOYS souldiers; who, to further this treaty, endeuoured what he could to giue LINSTAVV satisfaction; wherein he spent much time: but, finding these practices not to preuail, he resolued to attempt it by force, and to giue a generall assault; yet, changing his minde, he departed with his whole Army about the 21 of October, and so marched towards Prague. His rere-ward beeing lodged but half an houres march from Pilsen; the next day the Earl of Hohenlo came with all the Kings horse, as well Germans as Hungarians, and 3000 musketiers within one houres march of Pilsen; where Count MANSFELD meeting him, he propounded a means how to cut off the enemies Rere: that if it would please him to aduance his Troops, he would also ioin with him with the best he had in Pilsen; and so, charging the enemy together, they should cyther defeat his Rere-ward, or else greatly distresse it: but the Earl thought it better to turn back and take the passage, to intercept the enemies way to Prague. In the end of October the two armies lodged within a league one of another; where there were daily skirmishes with various succesee, according to the fortune of war: and so drawing daily neerer and neerer together, it was conceiued that BVCQVOY would hazard a battell. Whereupon, the Prince of Anhalt inuited MANSFELD to come and attend his pleasure; who thanked him, and assured him he would not fail to perform his command; assuring himself, he should be entertained as Marshal of the field, to command according to his charge; desiring his Highnes to send him word speedily, what his resolution was, and to that effect sent a particular messenger with Letters: but before he could be heard and dispatcht, the ouerthrowe of the Army decided the question.

The battell of Prague.

The Imperiall Army aduanced still, and no day past without some action. On the fourth of Nouember the Earl of Bucquoy was lightly hurt with a shot; which was so troublesome to him, that he could not well ride on horseback. On the 6 and 7 daies the Armies were within cannon shot one of another. Coming within half a league of Prague, vpon Sunday morning the eight day of the moneth the battell was fought; which I cannot relate in particular, being forced to vse brevity.

The Imperialists being resolued to fight, the Duke of Bauaria tooke the right wing, and Count BVCQVOY took the left; who, sitting armed in his caroach, went from squadron to squadron to harten and encourage them to carry themselues valiantly. The Baron of Tilly, who was the Leader of the left point, hauing passed a little bridge and marish ground with the Bauarian Troops, was so welcomed and entertained by the Bohemians, that he was forced to send for all the Bauarian Troops in the fore-ward to come to succour and assist him: all which being ioyned, and vnder the Bohemians, the whole Imperiall Army was constrained in the like manner to march vpon the left hand; so as they were much annoyed, and receiued great losse by the Bohemians Artillery; which did so beat into a Battallion of Walloons, and the whole body of the Bauarian horse, that they were routed and put to flight. The danger wherein the fore-ward of the Bauarians and the Baron of Tilly were ingaged, forced Count BVCQVOY, to secound them; who (notwithstanding that he was wounded and weak) went to horseback to

The Bohemian Armie defeated at Prague. danger, he chused his Battillions to march directly against the Bohemians Army; who receiued them so gallantly, that they were in some disorder and ready to disband, if Count BVCQVOY had not ioined all the squadrons into one body, and charged so courageously, as hauing ouerthrowne 2000 Hungarians which were in the fore-ward; and the Duke of Bauaria at the same instant causing the right wing of the Imperiall Army to aduance, charged the left of the Bohemians; who presently abandoned their artillery, and were put to rout: some write, there were 3000 slain vpon the place, and aboue 2000 drowned, most of them Hungarians, which thought to passe through the riuer of Molda which diuides the Towns of Prague. The Imperialists tooke ten cannon, 135 Ensignes, with many Cornets, hauing lost (as they write) not aboue 400 men.

Another diuersion of the battell. Thus I finde this vnfortunate battell written by some Authors: but LANDORPIVS maketh the losse far greater on the Bohemian side. It is an old and true Saying, Plus valet oculatus testis vnus quam auriti decem, One ey-witnes is of more waight than ten which speak by hear-say: for, fame increaseth as it flees. I haue therefore thought good to set down what I receiu'd from a discreet Gentleman, an Actor in that daies seruice, and hath deliuered it on his reputation.

The two Armies hauing coasted one another for diuerse daies together, about the end of October, the Bohemians came and lodged at Rockenzan; and the Imperials encampt in a wood so neer them, that they plaied continually one vpon another with their great and small shot; so as diuerse were slain and hurt: among which, one of the Barons of Dona of the Bohemian party was lost; and Count BVCQVOY on the other side wounded: but the Imperials, hauing resolued to march towards Prague, raised their Camp in the night; which the Bohemians perceiuing, marcht away with all speed to get betwixt them and Prague; which they happily performed: for, on the day of the battell (which was Sunday) hauing marcht 8 miles, the Army cam to a place within a mile of Prague, of great aduantage, called the white Hill; where they incamped, and ranged their Army, finding the Imperiall Army aduanced with a resolution to fight. The Bohemians had a great aduantage of the ground: for, their cannon might beat into their enemies troops from the Hill; so as at their first approach they were much disordered, and lost many men: besides, the Imperials had a marish ground and a bridge to passe; where the Bohemians had planted 3 peeces of Ordinance, with 700 musketiers to guard it: which passage if they had maintained, and kept their posture on the Hill, in the opinion of all martiall men they could not haue lost the victory. But the first step to their ouerthrowe was the indiscretion or perfidiousnes of the Earl of Hohenlo or Holloc, Lieutenant Generall of the Bohemian Army, who drew away the musketiers which were set to guard the passage of the bridge; so as the Imperiall, imbracing this oportunity, past ouer their troops, and turnd those 3 peeces on the Bohemians.

After this, they marched with great resolution to the charge. The yong Prince of Anhalt on the right hand aduanced with a great squadron of horse to encounter them: but they were scattered; yet not so routed, but he gathered his Troops again together to giue a new charge, thinking to be seconded by the Hungarians which were behinde him: where his Troops were ouerthrowne, for that the Hungarians neuer aduanced to assist him, but fled presently without striking stroke. Whereupon, the whole Army on that side fell into a confusion, euery man abandoning his rank, and running away: onely the Morauians, commanded by the young Earle of Schlik, fought valiantly, and were most of them slain or taken prisoners. On the left hand the Earl of Strum, Lieutenant Colonel to C. MANSFELD's regiment of horse, charged valiantly with 3 of his companies and some others who helpt him, on a regiment of the enimies foot, and beat them down to the bottom of the hill: but, being oppresst with multitudes, and left by the Hungarians who were to second him, he was forc't to get off as well as he could. The Prince of Anhalt, with HOLOC his Lieutenant, fled with the first to carry newes to Prague of this disaster. The old Earl of Thurn followed, but with more honour and better testimonies of his valour. The King of Bohemia (who had bin a month together with the Army, and came but the day before the battell to Prague) was now going forth after dinner to view his Army, ignorant of what had past. Being som 12 score from the Town, he saw the Hungarians fleeing so fast, that he was forced to retire spedily, or else his person had been in danger to be oppressed by the multitude that fled. Touching the losse he affirms confidently, there were not aboue 3000 slain; wherof most of them, fleeing into the out-works of the Town (the gates being shut) were there slaine by the enemy; that there were fewe drown'd in passing the riuer vpon floats of timber, and that the the enemies losse was no lesse than theirs. There were some companies of horse and foot which had retired themselues into Starpark, neer adioining to their Camp; the which that night or the next day morning were either slain or taken prisoners: among which, ther was the yong Prince of Anhalt, Captain of the Kings guard, and other Commanders; who, sending a Drumme to Count BVCQVOY, craued fair Quarter: which granted, they yeelded themselues prisoners. 1620

In this great confusion and amazement, the King with his Queen and Court left the Castle which is in petty Prague, and retired into the old Town. The ould Earle of Thurn with other Commanders perswaded the King to stay in the Town and defend it, wanting neither men, victuall, nor munition; which they might well haue done: but the King, considering that his souldiers were danted with this ouerthrowe, that the Inhabitants were light and inconstant, and would adhere to the stronger, that he was in a weak Town, and a victorious enemy at the gates, who no doubt would imploy all his forces to make his victory absolute; resolued to retire himself, and giue way to necessity: so as the next day after the battell he left the Town by seuen of the clock in the morning; the Queen taking her caroche with her young son but nine moneths old, who was born in Prague. Coming to the Port, they found it shut, and the Burgers in Arms, refusing to let them passe; it may be with a hope to make their peace the better with the enemy vpon their retention: but by the perswasions of the Burgraue and Chancellor of Bohemia who did accompany them, they opened the gates. Presently after, the Queen took horse, they being accompanied by Sir RICH. WESTON and Sir EDVVARD CONNOVVAY, Ambassadors there for his Maiesty, the old Prince of Anhalt, two Dukes, of Saxony, of Weymar, the Earle of Hollock, the old Earl of Thurn, the Earl of Lauall, son to the Duke of Tremouille, a French-man, the Burgraue of Prague, and the Chancellor, with many others. That night they went to Limpurg, 30 English miles from Prague: where they arriued late, and entred with much difficulty; a long iourney for a Queen great with childe and vnfit to trauell, hauing no time to rest or refresh herself by the way. The next day they departed from Limpurg towards Silesia, and after eight daies came to Preslaw: during which, that Noble and vertuous Queen suffred hunger, cold, the extremity of bad lodging (lying some nights on straw) the apprehension of a pursuing enemy, and the losse of plate and goods which were spoiled by their own souldiers that followd them: yet she bore all these crosses and afflictions with a generous resolution, to the admiration of all.

The Imperialists pursue the King of Bohemia. The Duke of Bauaria and Count BVCQVOY entring into Prague the next day, they sent certain troops towards Brandiz fifteen miles off (a place of pleasure belonging to the Kings of Bohemia) to pursue them, thinking to finde the Queen there by reason of her disability to trauel; where hearing what course they had taken, and how far they were aduanced, they left pursuing them, and spent their time in spoiling of that place and the country thereabout. His Maiesties Ambassadors took their leaue of the King and Queen going from Limpurg; from whence they gaue the Duke of Bauaria to vnderstand, that according to their duties they had accompanied the King their Masters daughter to Limpurg; desiring to haue a safe conduct to return to Prague, which he sent them: where finding no means to treat with a victorious enemy vpon any good tearms of peace, they returned towards England.

The towns of Prague submit to the Emperor. After this famous victory the two Generals marched directly to Prague. In the mean time, the Catholiques wrote to the Duke of Bauaria, that they gaue God thanks that hee had giuen him victory; that they would reioice to see him come triumphing into their Towns; that they offred to him both their goods and liues, and that they freely yeelded themselues, beseeching him to exempt them from pillage and spoil. His Highnes receiued them with all curtesie; and made a proclamation that no souldier vpon pain of death should depart from his colours; and if any disbanded, their Officers should be hanged for them. The next day the souldiers began to scale the wals; but the Duke staid their insolency, and set guards at the gates of petty Prague, and vpon all the approaches. The Inhabitants of the old Town dispatcht a trumpet to his Highnes, beseeching him to grant them three dayes space, in which time they hoped to giue such answer as should content him: yet he would not hear their demand; but sent them word, that he would not grant them so much as three houres, but would haue them presently come forth into the field; where like a Conquerer he would attend them to receiue the obedience due vnto his Imperiall Maiesty, in view of all the Army. The which they performed: and the 4000 souldiers which were there in garrison, submitted themselues, and were receiued into grace.

After dinner the next day, the Duke of Bauaria and the Earle of Bucquoy entred the town with great solemnity: and coming to the Capuchins Church, they gaue God thanks for this victory and vnhoped-for conquest. The Officers, who had bin dismist from their charges, came to do their duties with teares of ioy. They write, that after this reduction of the three Townes of Prague, the gates were kept shut the space of six daies, to seek for the chief Authors of FERDINANDS reiection: all that were found to be of that faction were spoiled, of what Religion soeuer. The Caluinists (who enclined most to the Elector Palatine) were entreated in the like manner, and depriued of the free exercise of their Religion: As for the Lutherans of the confession of Ausbourg, they were maintained. The wife and sonne of the Earle of Thurne, were committed to prison, with many others. After the reduction of Prague, many Townes of Bohemia came and brought their keyes to the Generals, with all sorts of submission; there onely remained Pilsen and Tabor, where Count MANDSFELDT commaunded, with great Garrisons. The Generals, hauing restored the States to their antient places, they caused them to write vnto the Count MANDSFELDT, and to his Captaines and Souldiers, which were in Pilsen; perswading them to yeeld vp the Towne, with other places, vnto his imperiall Maiesty, and they should receiue a certaine sum of money in hand, and the rest afterwards: Moreouer, that seeing the King was now retired out of Bohemia, it was in the power of the said States to discharge him; seeing they had entertained him into their seruice, and to them hee had taken his Oath. This offer did some-what stagger them; yet, considering that these were not the same States which had entertained them (for, they were of the Religion; and these, Catholicks) they thought it not fit to giue eare vnto them: Wherfore he wrote to the King, & to the prince of Anhalt of all these proceedings, made a Truce with the enemy, entred into treaty with him; and to that end sent IERONIMO de la Porta, to Prague.

The Imperialls labor to haue Pilsen yeelded.

After this famous victory obtained by the Imperialists, and the reduction of Prague; the Iesuites (who had retired themselues to Vienna) returned to their Colledge; where they washed ouer their Temple and Altar with holy-water, and sanctified it with great Ceremonies: The like was done to the Church in the Castle; where the Images, the yeere before, had been beaten downe by the Protestants. And, about the same time, the States of Bohemia, to shew their obsequiousnesse to the Emperour, and their inconstancy to their new elected King (whom they had lately chosen with such eagernesse) being forced, as it seemes by necessity, to submit themselues vnto the crosse; wrote a long perswasiue Letter to the States of Moravia, and renounced their confederation, perswading them to doe the like, and to obey his imperiall Maiesty in all things; with this commination, that if they should not giue eare to their aduice, but be the occasion of greater mischiefes, they would then prosecute them as publique Enemies: But all this preuayled little with the Moravians, at that time, who proceeded in their hostile attempts.

The States of Bohemia renounce all confederations with the Moravians.

The Baron of Tilly being made Gouernour of Prague with a Garrison of 6000 Soldiers, the Inhabitants were quite disarmed: and, winter comming-on, the Generals, seeing no enemy in field, separated their Armies by troupes; some going to refresh themselues, and others into Moravia. The Earle of Bucquoy had aduice giuen him to take some rest for the recouery of his health. And the Duke of Bauaria tooke his way towardes Munich, there to passe the Winter.

The Emperours proscription against the Elector Palatine, and others.

In the moneth of Ianuary one thousand six hundred twenty one (for then they begin their computation) the Emperour sent forth a declaration of Proscription against the Elector Palatine, King of Bohemia, the Marquesse of Iagerndorf, the Prince of Anhalt, the Earle of Hohenlo, and the Authors of the Bohemian reuolt: where, after a repetition of what had past, hee concludes; that desiring to preuent the like enterprises in time to come, made against the lawes of the sacred Empire, by this Our present declaration of our imperial power, We haue disannulled and reuoked all priuiledges, grants, concessions, rights and graces, granted heretofore vnto the said States of Bohemia, as well by our selues, as by the deceased Emperours and Kings of Bohemia our predecessors; and likewise haue decreed against all those which shall be found to haue procured, counselled and fauoured the said reuolt, and drawne our subiects to warre against vs; to be proceeded against them, according to the constitutions of the Empire; declaring them fallen from all estates, honours, and prerogatiues, and vnworthy for euer of our grace and pardon. As for the Count Palatine of the Rhine, who hath vsurped vpon vs the Title of King of Bohemia, hath made himselfe head of our rebellious subiects, drawne forces from all parts, and wonne vnto him many officers and States of the Empire, whom he hath caused to enter into league to ruine our Authority, and to inuade our hereditary estates; We haue, by this our declaration, condemned the said Count Palatine, and declared him faln from all his Estates, namely, from the dignity of Elector, and other honours of the Empire which he did enioy; as also IOHN GEORGE

GEORGE the elder Marques of Brandebourg and Iagerndorf, Prince CHRISTIAN of Anhalt, GEORGE FREDERICK Earle of Hohenlo, and others which haue fauoured him in his designes, adheared vnto his faction, entred into league with him against vs, and assisted him with their Armes and persons in this enterprise. 1621.

Also there was another proscription in particular sent out against IOHN GEORGE the elder Marques of Iagerndorf, CHRISTIAN prince of Anhalt, & GEORGE FREDERICK earle of Hohenlo of the same Tenure: commanding all the subiects of the Empire vpon paine of the losse of life, honour, and goods, not to assist the three banished men aboue named, or to succour them secretly or openly, not to lodge them, feede them or furnish them with any secret retrait, or suffer them to escape; discharging them from all faith, homage, allyance, or intelligence which they might haue with any of them.

Great Leuies of souldiers made by the Imperialists.

The Emperour, the Elector of Saxony, and the Duke of Bauaria, made great leauies of men in their States and countries, aswell to assaile these places in Bohemia which would not yeeld obedience to the Emperour being vnder the commande of Count MANDSFELD, as also in Silesia and Hungary: yet they did not forbeare to talke of peace and to hould assemblies in diuers places vpon that subiect.

A conference procured by the French Ambassadors.

As for the continuation of the conference with Prince BETHLIN and the States of Hungary; it was so laboured by the Ambassadours of France, as at length it was assigned in the towne of Hainbourg (which the Imperialists had recouered) whither BETHLIN GABOR with the states of Hungary should send their Deputies to treat with the Emperors. On the 25 of Ianuary the French Embassadors with fiue Deputies from the Emperour came to Hainbourg; and the next day there arrived six Commissioners from Hungary. They write, that all the difficulty of the accord consisted on two points: first, that the Emperour would put his subiects of all nations into the forts of Hungary, and the States would haue none but natiues of the countrey. And, Secondlie, touching the restitution of Ecclesiasticall goods.

Marquesse SPINOLA, notwithstanding the coldnesse of the winter, took many places in the Palatinate, and drew great summes of money from the lands of the Prindes of the Vnion. They say that the Countess of Hannau made a composition for 18000 Ricks dollers; and that the Earles and other Noblemen of Veteravia paid the like summe. The Protestant Princes held an assembly at Hailbrun: where they consulted of the meanes to make their peace with the Emperor, and to preserue the lower Palatinate from vtter ruine: necessity forced them, for that the Protestant Townes had sent them word that they would contribute no more: neither did they come to the assembly, or send any Deputies but one from Vlme; seeking euery one in particular to make his peace with the Emperour: namely, those of Nuremberg and Vlme, who had sent their Deputies to Viena to that end. The Catholike States assembled also at Ausbourg in the moneth of Februarie: whither the three Ecclesiasticall Electors sent their Ambassadours, besides many Archbishops, Bishops and Prelates; but this assembly did not produce a peace nor stay the apparant ruine of Germany.

The Protestant Princes assemble at Heilbrun.

In the meane time, Count MANDSFELD was in Bohemia alone, without any support, means or money to pay his souldiers: hauing settled his affaires there aswell as he could, he retired with his horsemen into the vpper Palatinate; where he supplied his wants as hee thought good: from thence, he went to the assembly of the Princes at Hailbrun with a small traine and some hopes to draw succours from them: but, after some stay, he returned without any thing but bare hopes, preuailing nothing with such as seemed friends to the cause, and whom the losse of that kingdom might concerne.

Mandsfelds proceedings in Bohemia.

The enemy during the time of his absence (preuailing nothing by force) sought to supplant him by policie. IERONIMO De la Porta, lying in Prague for his maister, became a Traytor, being corrupted by their faire promises: And as formerly, in the absence of Count MANDSFELD, he had sought to vndermine the fidelity of the Captaines by secret Letters: so now hee laboured to effect it by his ambitious practices; in which designe, Colonell FRANCK (who was Gouernour of Tabor, and had the chiefe commmande vnder Count MANDSFELD) was much engaged; giuing free accesse vnto all men on the aduerse partie to enter into Pilsen with as great familiarity as could bee with friends of the same party. Hauing, after his returne from Hailbrun to Amberg, discouered these practices in Pilsen, he wrote vnto them to continue constant, assuring them he would finde meanes to gett them their pay and relieue their necessities. Hereupon, his Auditor, called LOMBNGER, came from Prague, who tould the Lord Marshall that hee must haue a larger commission to continue the treaty.

1621 Whereupon, one was drawne, and his instructions renued; adding vnto the former Articles, that the vpper Palatinate should be comprised in the said treaty. With this commission, he was sent to Prague, hauing charge to looke carefully to the enemies designes in regard of a speciall treaty they intended with the captaines; and that he should perswade them to continue constant in his Maiesties seruice: he held him honest, for that he had found him faithfull in other seruices: But he had supt the poyson of infidelity out of PORTA his cuppe; and they both became Traitors to their maister. By whose meanes, the Captaines compounded secretly with the enemy for the yeelding vp of Pilsen, as you shall heare hereafter.

The Turke in the beginning of this warre had demanded of Prince BETHLIN the guarde of the townes of Vaccia and Nehusol, vpon diuers considerations, touching the warre which was made in Hungary: but he (although the Turkes vassall) fearing the Basha of Temesuar, who long since hath had a purpose to depriue him of Transiluania, and foreseeing that if the Turk should hould Valaccia vpon the Dannbe and Nehusol which is neere the Carpatean Mountaines which deuide Poland from Hungaria, hee should finde himselfe shut vp betweene the Turke and the Polander; he had alwaies borne the Turke in hand hee should haue Vaccia, but neuer had any minde to effect it, because of his particular interest. But now his present weakenesse and of his confederates, after the losse of such a Battaile, made him procure the Hungarians to deliuer vp Vaccia into the Turkes hands for two reasons: first, to the end the Turke (who had lately gotten a victory vpon the Polonians in Moldauia) should not attempt any thing in Transiluania and Hungary whil'st that he was busied against the Imperialists: Secondly, to draw succours from the Turke if fortune should still fauour the Imperialls, and that they should enter into Hungary. For these considerations Vaccia was deliuered vnto the Turk at his instance.

The State of Hungary was full of combustions in the end of the yeare 1620; many great personages desired to be reconciled to the Emperor, their lawfull king: but the greater number being Protestants (as BVDIANY and the Earle of Serin) who held themselues irreconciliable to the house of Austria, desired rather to call-in the Turk and be vnder his protection, then to vnite themselues with the Christians. Meane while, the Emp. by his declaration disannulled the Election of Prince BETHLIN to the crowne of Hungary, as vniust, violent, seditious, and contrarie to the lawes and customes of the Realme, and therefore without force and effect; making voide also whatsoeuer had beene concluded in the assemblies of Presbourg and Nehusol to the preiudice of his royall rights, the State of the Clergy, and the antient lawes and liberty of the crowne of Hungary: and withal he did reuoke the Title which he had giuen him of Prince of Hungary.

The Emperors declaration against Prince Bethlin Gabor

When the Emperour published this edict, BETHLIN GABOR came to Presbourg: from whence he sent many troupes to the frontieres of Hungary, Morauia, and Austria to ioyne with the Baron of Landau a Morauian Protestant, who committed great spoiles vpon the Catholikes. Many of the greatest of Bohemia which had escaped from the battaile of Prague, and fled into Morauia, ioyned with him, amongst others the Earle of Thurne, to make head against the Imperialls which pursued them after their victory. On the other side of the Dannow, Prince BETHLIN hauing repaired the bridge of boates at Presbourg (which TAMPIERRE had broken) he with his partisans, sent diuers troupes to spoile and burne the Countrey, euen vnto the gates of Vienna. But the Baron of Prener who had succeeded Tampierre made head against them, slew many of their men, and forced them to retire. In the meane time BETHLIN carried the crowne of Hungary and the Royall Ornaments from Presbourg to Tirnau, and from thence to Altenfol vpon the riuer of Gran neere to Nehusol, in the vpper Hungary; whereof men haue written diuersly: but most men were of opinion that he desired to keepe it in his possession, seeing that he had beene chosen king of Hungary; a dignity which he would preserue vntill death: and that his often sending to Vienna for a conference at Hainbourg (at the instance of the French Ambassadours) was not with any intent he had to make any accord with the Emperour, but by this delay to fortifie himselfe with his partizans and the Turke, and to draw downe the Tartarians; and also to attend the resolution which should be taken by the Elector Palatine and the Princes and States of Silesia and Morania in their assembly; to whom he had sent a confident messenger to exhorte them to continue in their confederation and to make head against the Imperialls, promising them al the assistance that both he and his friends could make. Let vs see then what the Prince and States of Silesia did resolue vpon in their assembly, being requested on the one side by the Elector Palatine and BETHLIN GABOR to continue their league: and on the other by the elector of Saxony to vnite themselues vnder the obedience of his imperial Maiesty.

Bethlin Gabor carrieth the crowne of Hungary from Presbourg.

We

We haue formerly made mention of the siege and taking of Bautsen, by the Elector of Saxony; who, being entred the Towne, assigned a day for the renuing of the oath of Allegeance, the which was performed with great ceremonies: The Senate and Burgesses, entring, made their submission vpon their knees; then deliuering the keyes of the Towne and Castle into the Electors hands, being Deputie for the Emperour, as Marqueste of Lusatia, they were admitted to take the Oath: which done, the Elector told them that he had receiued their Oath in his Maiesties name; who would protect them in the liberty of their Religion; and maintaine their priuiledges; and as for himselfe, he would be alwaies careful of their protection.

1621 The Inhabitants of Bautsen, Inhabit themselues to the Elector of Saxony.

The Elector, camping at Bautsen, the Marqueste of Ingerndorfe lay with his forces at Gorlitz in Silesia, being but halfe a daies iourney off, yet they were diuided by the Riuer of Neis, betwixt whom there were daily skirmishes; but the Electors Army was greater, and he had more Cannon; yet Ingerndorfe made head against him, and stopt his entry into Silesia: for, the Inhabitants of Gorlitz hauing refused to receiue a Garrison from the Marqueste of Ingerndorf, they also made answere to the Electors Letters (who perswaded them to receiue him into their Towne) that they would not suffer any one to enter to ouer-master them, being sufficiently warned by the losse of Bautsen: But after the losse of the Battaile of Prague, the Palatines party, in Silesia, began to decline much, and the Elector took diuers Towns. After the taking of Guben in view of the Marqueste; winter growing on, and being more annoyed with cold and snow then with any Enemy, he returned with his Army to Bautsen: from whence he wrote to the Princes and States of Silesia, assembled at Preslaue, to resolue what answere they should giue to the Elector Palatine; and to diuers deputies, who exhorted them to continue their League: He laid before them the miseries and calamities which had befallen Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, by reason of the ciuill wars; and what paines he had taken, from the beginning, to quench that fier, both with the Emperor MATHIAS (beseeching him to preferre his clemency, before the rigor of Iustice) and with the States of Bohemia; putting them in minde of the obedience they ought vnto their King: labouring also with the other Princes Electors, to procure a conference, thereby to pacifie these troubles by arbitrement, and reconcile the soueraigne Prince to his subiects; which tooke no effect: The Bohemians reiecting all meanes to treate of Peace, and disauowing the Emperour FERDINAND their lawfull King, made choyce of another: whereupon the Emperour had sent him a commission to reduce them to obedience by Armes, whereof he sent them a copie, exhorting them to consider; First, how long their Countrey had been afflicted with ciuill warres; Secondly, what bad succesSe the Bohemians had had in their Arms during these Troubles; Thirdly, that God had witnest by the memorable victory at Prague, that hee is the protector of lawfull Princes; And fourthly, that they would, with one consent, take wise counsells to preserue their deere Countrey from the ruines which threatned it; the which they might now doe by obeying his Maiesties commission, accepting his pardon, and acknowledging him Duke of Silesia, he which they had done before these miserable troubles, hauing taken the oath Allegeance vnto him, as their true and lawfull Prince.

Substance of the Electors Letters to the States of Silesia.

He protested that he had no other desire but to see them in their former Estate; freed from the continuance of so many ruines, and to enioy their priuiledges by the free exercise of Religion, the which his Maiesty had confirmed vnto them at his comming vnto the soueraignty of Silesia: But if they continued obstinate in their leagues and former resolutions, he could not but lament the miseries which would follow; being resolute to continue constant and faithfull to his Imperiall Maiesty, and to doe his best endeuour to maintaine the obedience due to the lawfull Magistrate, and that nothing should bee attempted to the preiudice of the Empire.

These Letters of the Elector of Saxony, and the copy of his Commission being read in the Assembly of the Princes and States of Silesia, those of the imperiall Party were of aduice, that, considering the state of affaires, it was expedient to send an Ambassadour vnto the Elector of Saxony, to treate of their agreement: The others were of opinion that it was not fit to make too much haste; but, contrari-wise, to make new leuies of Souldiers in the name of the States, to make it appeare, in case they should enter into treaty with the Elector of Sax. that it was neyther for feare nor weakenesse: And to send word vnto all the Townes of Silesia and the higher Lusatia, to haue great care, and in no wise to disunite themselues; because that in all treaties and accords, the preseruation of priuiledges promised in generall, is better maintained then by particular yeeldings. This later aduice was followed: So as the Elector of Sax. hauing summoned 1621 moned Gorlitz and Sittau to yeeld obedience vnto the Emperour, leſt they ſhould fall into the misfortune of thoſe of Bautſen: he was anſwered, that the States of Sileſia and the Deputies of the higher Luſatia were at Preſlau to reſolue touching the Letters which he had ſent them, beſeeching him in the meane time not to attempt any thing againſt their townes.

At the ſame time, Count BVCQVOY, Generall of the Imperiall Army, marching out of Bohemia, by the frontiers of Morauia and the Lower Auſtria, beſieged and took Iglaw and Trebnitz, frontier townes of Morauia. He forced Znaim with many other places to yeeld obedience to the Emperor: the which did ſo amaze the garriſons and ſouldiers which the Baron of Landan held in many places in the lower Auſtria, that they abandoned them to retire themſelues into Hungary; whither the ſaid Baron himſelfe in the end was forced to fly.

The States of Morauia aſſembled at Brin (who after the loſſe of the battaile of Prague could not reſolue to ſend vnto the Emperour to make their peace, for that the Earle of Thurn newly returned out of Hungary ſtayed them with promiſes of a mighty Army which Prince BETHLIN ſhould bring to ſuccour all the confederates) ſeeing the Imperiall Army vpon the frontiers; they ſent the Earle of Sherotin with diuers others to Viena, to let his Maieſty vnderſtand, That they had long time delayed to enter into league with the Bohemians and Hungarians: which they had not done, if they had not been forced by the Earle of Thurn, who was called in by ſome few which were Authors of the rebellion. 2. That they humbly beſought him to impart his clemencie to all his faithfull ſubiects, the States and inhabitants of Morauia. 3. To maintaine them in their priuiledges and the liberty of religion: And fourthly, to receiue with the like clemency and grace all the Captaines and ſouldiers which had been entertained by the ſaid States; who altogether proteſted to be euer obedient to his Imperiall Maieſty, and to ſpend the laſt drop of their bloud in his ſeruice. To whom the Emperour made anſwere, That forgetting what was paſt he receiued them as his other ſubiects into his protection, and would maintaine them in all their priuiledges and the liberty of religion: but, ſeeing there were ſome few which were the Authors of the rebellion, That the Commiſſarie, whom he ſhould depute to be his Lieutenant in Morauia, ſhould cauſe information to be made againſt them; after which the States ſhould vnderſtand his pleaſure. The Deputies being returned, the Inhabitants of Brin and Oldnitz (the two chiefe townes of Morauia) tooke a new oath of fealty to the Emperour; and ſo did the ſouldiers whom they had entertained: who, being muſtered and receiuing pay in the Emperours name, went and ioyned themſelues with Count BVCQVOY, who beſieged Zradiſch; which he took and thereby ſtopped the paſſage betweene Hungaria and Morauia: ſo as BETHLIN GABOR could not ſend the ſuccours which he had promiſed to the Elector Palatine; who was much afflicted for the newes of this reunion, as you may iudge by the following Letter written to the Earle of Thurne which was intercepted.

The States of Morauia yeelde obedience to the Emperour.

I haue receiued Letters from Morauia with great griefe: the ſouldiers being in mutiny for want of pay: the States haue ſent to the Emperour to make their accord; but God be thanked the affaires in Sileſia are in better tearms. The Princes are reſolute & haue decreed to leuie new forces; blaming the Morauians for their perfidiouſneſſe. And for my parte, I doubt not but in ſhort time they will receiue the due reward of their raſhnes. I did not conſtraine the Bohemians and Morauians to chuſe mee for their King. I could haue liued content in mine owne Countrey: yet for all the paines and trauaile I haue taken; theſe for whom I haue ventred my life and goods, and the liues and goods of my friends and ſubiects, leaue mee, and euen now treate about yeelding themſelues vnto another. What right they haue to do this, I will leaue to the iudgement of the whole world. I may truly ſay, that neither couetouſneſs nor ambition cauſed me to come into Bohemia: and I hope, God will ſo guide me by his grace, as the ſuffering of ſo many calamities ſhall neuer make mee doe any thing againſt my conſcience or honour.

The fame of the happie ſucceſſe of the Imperiall Armies in Bohemia, Morauia and Luſatia, cauſed the Sileſians (which bare affection to the houſe of Auſtria) to take hart vnto them and ſpeak boldly in Preſlau. The princes & States of Sileſia being aduertiſed that the imperial armie was vpon their frontiers, they held it neceſſarie for them to preuent the ruine of their countrie, and to enter into treaty with the Elector of Saxony; vnto whom his Imperiall Maieſty had giuen ſuch commiſſion as is before ſaid: whereupon they concluded, to ſend vnto the King of Bohemia this reſolution following.

The reſolution of the States of Sileſia.

After that your Royall Maieſty (our moſt gracious Lord) had had many conſultations with vs your faithfull Nobles & States of Sileſia touching the eſtate of our preſent affaires, and the enemies proceedings to cut off the aſſiſtance which the Sileſians might expect from Morauia and and other their confederats; and hauing cauſe hereafter to feare the comming of ſo powerfull an Army into our Countrey, vnprouided of ſouldiers to make any reſiſtance: It hath ſeemed 1621 expedient (wee ſhould aduertiſe you that it is needefull for vs to treate with the Elector of Saxony his Imperial Maieſties Commiſſarie: which we cannot doe vnleſſe you giue way vnto the neceſſity of the time; retyring your ſelfe, for your better ſecurity, into ſome ſuch place as you ſhall thinke fitteſt. We hope, your royall Maieſty will not take in ill part this aduice which the Princes and States of Sileſia do giue you, and who proteſt to continue conſtant and loyall ſubiects vnto you; but rather attribute it to the ineuitable neceſſity of the time. Meane while, your Maieſty may take order how to be relieued with ſuccors from your owne Subiects and friends. And whereas your Maieſty hath deſired, that if we treate with the Elector of Saxony, you might be alſo comprehended; you may beleeue that your faithfull Nobles and States will let your Maieſty vnderſtand all which ſhall paſſe in that treaty. We alſo beſeech you to think of the confederation made with the Hungarians, and not to ſee vs plunged into the like miſerie as the Morauians which haue been threatned by the Turks and Tartars: As for the 3 moneths pay which your Maieſty deſires, as well for the muſtering of 1000 horſe of his troups, as for his foot-men, it ſhall be reſolued on in our firſt Aſſembly, and your Maieſty acquainted with our reſolution; the Princes and States deſiring nothing ſo much, as to continue faithfull vnto you, and conſtant in their obedience.

On the morrow, the King ſent them his anſwere in writing; That he had receiued their reſolution by their Deputies, and perceiued thereby their good intention, and the affection they bare vnto him; praying them to beleeue that his was no leſſe: That hauing obſerued the daily falling away of the Morauians, and that the Prouinces incorporated vnto Bohemia, in that turbulent eſtate whereunto things were brought, could not for the preſent reſiſt the Emperours power, it was neceſſary he ſhould withdraw himſelfe into ſome place of ſafety, not farre from them; where he might obſerue what was done, and prouide ſufficient forces to defend them, giuing way vnto the Embaſſie they ſhould ſend to the Elector of Saxony. The Elector Palatines anſwere to the States.

Before the king of Bohemia made his retreit out of Sileſia, he ſent the Earle of Hohenlo to the Elector of Saxony, to propound a Truce vnto him for the obtaining of a Peace; with Letters to this effect:

I doubt not but you haue ſeene the declarations of the cauſes, for the which I haue accepted the Crowne of Bohemia: I haue not done it by force nor practice; but fearing the Realme ſhould fall into the hand of ſtrangers, and the Empire receiue prejudice. I cannot beleeue but God called me to the gouernement thereof, to the end they ſhould not be deprined of the free exerciſe of Religion, and their priuiledges; but I haue accepted it chiefly for two reaſons: Firſt, that it might not be hereditary; and, to the great preiudice of the Electors, fall into the hands of the houſe of Spaine: And Secondly, that the election of the king of Romanes, to be Emperour, might, by moſt voices, be in the power of the Proteſtants; whereby they ſhould no more feare to be vnder the yoake of the Romane Catholiques. I was confident that all the Electors and Proteſtant Princes would allowe of my intention, and finde meanes to ſatisfie the aduerſe parties; and that I ſhould be maintained in the poſſeſſion of the ſame Realme, by ſome good accord. I haue neuer refuſed to enter into treaty; but ſeeing my ſelfe fruſtrate of my deſire, I haue been forced to take Armes to defend my ſelfe againſt the forces of Spaine, and the Catholique league: But being ſtill deſirous of Peace, I haue thought good to ſend the Earle of Hohenlo vnto you, to treate of the meanes whereby the Empire might be in quiet, his hereditary Countries (which the Spaniards had inuaded) reſtored, all grieuances taken away, free exerciſe of Religion maintained, with the free election of the Realme of Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces; and to prouide for the defence of Hungary and Poland; to the end the Empire might not thereby receiue any danger. To attain vnto the which, I haue giuen charge vnto the Earle of Hohenlo to propound a generall Truce vnto you for a moneth or two, throughout the whole Empire, the Realme of Bohemia, and the incorporated Prouinces; During the which time, there might bee ſome courſe taken to treate of a generall Peace. His Letter to the D. of Saxony

The Elector of Saxony made anſwere; That he would not diſpute of the cauſes which had made him to accept the Crowne of Bohemia; but he would tell him freely that he had neuer approued of the proceedings of the Bohemians, and had written vnto him to diſſwade him from it, fore-ſeeing that in this action ſome Princes would ſtand Newters, and others would follow the Emperour; That the Bohemians could not in Conſcience proceede to a new Election; The anſwere.

1621 their king whom they had crowned and anointed being aliue: that hee had alwaies desired he should not haue engaged himselfe in the Bohemian affaires, nor trouble the Emperour in the Countries which he enioyed: and that he should haue giuen credit to his counsell and to the aduice of many Princes who had alwaies desired his happinesse; but seeing he could not be diuerted from the acceptance of the crowne of Bohemia, he had left it to the will of God and time, doing his best endeauour to comfort the Emperour in his afflictions, vntill the memorable victory of Prague; whereby it appeared that God would protect the lawfull Magistrate. That he could not denie but the Empire was in great danger, and that this war of Bohemia might open a gate to lett in the Turke to become maister of the frontier townes in Hungary. That hee was the cause of all these miseries; the which might haue been avoided if hee had giuen way to his exhortation, and reiected that great desire to raigne: That to preuent all these dangers and ruines, hemust take a good and free resolution to renounce the realme of Bohemia and the incorporated prouinces, to submit himselfe to the Emperour and to craue pardon: but if he did not take this course, it was to be feared he would draw himself and all his friends into great extremities; the Emperour being resolued to pursue his victory.

The King of Bohemia finding no meanes to moouе the Elector of Saxony to procure a truce, and finding that the Princes of Silesia had deputed the Duke of Munsterberg and fiue other men of quality, to the Elector of Saxony; he resolued to retire himselfe into Brandebourg, a prouince ioyning vnto Silesia; the which he did. It is written, that the Princes & States of Silesia before his departure sent the Duke of Oschatz vnto him with a present of 80000 florens, and are much commended for the good offices they did him in his aduersity.

Propositions made by the Deputies of Silesia to the Elector of Saxony.

The Deputies which were sent from the States of Silesia to the Elector of Saxony deliuered Articles vnto him. 1. That they craued pardon of his Imperiall Maiesty, and besought him to impart his grace and clemencie vnto them. 2. That they would alwaies acknowledge his Imperiall Maiesty, for their lawfull Soueraigne, and King. 3. That they would confirme it by a new oath. 4. That they would defend the Romane Catholikes and their rights. 5. That they would contribute 100000 duckets to pay the souldiers leuied for the guarde of Silesia, and renounce their new confederation.

Hereunto, the Elector made answere: 1. That by vertue of the Emperors commission, hee would take the Princes and States of Silesia into his protection. 2. That he would be a suter for their pardon and solicite the confirmation of their priuiledges. And, 3. If the Silesians did discharge their troupes, his Imperiall Maiesty would reuoke his. As for himselfe he promised them, That, if after the oath of allegeance taken and their due obedience performed to his Imperiall Maiesty, they were in any sort molested in the free exercise of their religion according to the confession of Ausbourg, he would then assist them with all ayde and support. After 5 weekes treaty at Dresda in Misnia (where the Elector keepes his court) and often sending to the Emperor, who by no meanes would haue the Elector Palatine, the Marques of Iagerndorf, the Prince of Anhalt, nor the Earle of Hohenlo comprehended; In the end, the Articles of peace and reunion for the prouince of Silesia were concluded the eighth of February.

Articles of the Silesians reunion to the Emperor.

1. The Princes and States of the vpper and lower Silesia should be pardoned for what was past during the troubles, and no man questioned or punished. 2. They should loue and honor the Emperour FERDINAND their King anointed and crowned and soueraigne Duke of Silesia, and should take a new oath of allegeance vnto him. 3. That they should within one yeare pay 300000 florens at three seuerall termes for the entertainment of the Emperours troupes. 4. That they should renounce the oath which they had taken to the Elector Palatine, and should haue no farther intelligence with him. They should deliuer into the Electors hands the league made with Bohemia, Moravia, Transiluania, Hungary, and others, the which should be cancelled. 5. They should discharge their souldiers, and reteine but 1000 horse and 3000 foote for their defence vntil the troubles were ended; the which vpon no occasion should be employed against his Imperiall Maiesty or the Elector. 6. That the Elector should recall away his troupes which he had then in the principality of Sagen. 7. That his highnes would intercede to his Imperiall Maiesty, That all graunts made vnto the Silesians with their liberties and priuiledges should stand in force; All greeuances repaired; The commerce allowed with the Moraians and Bohemians; All goods restored to the true owners; And the Catholikes maintained in their churches, monasteries and possessions. 8. If happely the Protestants should receiue any opposition in the liberty of their religion, then his highnes promised to vndertake their protection & defence. 9. If CHRISTIAN, Duke of Lignitz as Generall of Silesia according to his promise would hee be comprehended in that Treaty of peace, he might do it within six weeks, else it was in his maiesties power to dispose. 10. That IOHN GEORGE of Brandenbourg, Marquesse of Iagerndorf, and CHRISTIAN Prince of Anhalt, who had been formerly proscribed by the Emperor, should not be comprehended in that Treaty; the which was signed by the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Munsterberg with great ceremonies. 1621

Let vs now look vpon the estate of Bohemia. The Towns of Pilsen and Tabor would not be reduced vnder the Emperors obedience: they depended vpon the will of the Gouernours who were become Masters. Count MANSFELD was in Pilsen, as you haue heard; and Colonell FRANCK in Tabor: whom MANSFELD had placed there as his Lieutenant, making incursions into the Country, and committing great spoils, seising on Tochau, Falquenau and Elenbogen: which he fortified with garrisons. After this (as I haue formerly related) he went to Heilbrun; where he propounded to the protestant Princes, that, if he might haue men & mony, he would reuiue the Elector Palatine's party in Bohemia, and prepare work for the enemy for fiue yeers: that his Imperiall Maiesty had offred him a great summe of mony to leaue Bohemia, and yeeld vp what he held there; but he had refused it, and would continue constant to death, and maintaine the faith he had giuen the Elector. They write, that he found their intentions in this Assembly contrary to his; they aiming onely at the means how to reconcile themselues to the Emperor, and preserue their estates.

The King of Bohemia, hearing what MANSFELD had done in Bohemia in his absence, wrote to him in February after this manner: I haue receiued much contentment to hear of the military exploits you haue performd since my departure from Bohemia, of your perseuerance in the oath of fidelity you haue taken, and of so many Towns and Castles you haue made subiect to my obedience. I will assure you, that I will neuer yeeld vp my Realm of Bohemia which I haue gotten by so lawfull an election; but will imploy all my means, and that of my friends, to recouer that by Arms which they haue wrested from me by force: for the effecting whereof, I will speedily send you both men and money. I hope, with the help of God, and the powerfull succours of some Princes my friends, to do that shortly which shall be pleasing to God, terrible to my enemies, to the good of religion, and memorable to the whole world. You shall finde me a Prince who will acknowledge your seruices with honourable fauours. The King of Bohemias Letter to G. Mansfeld.

TILLY being left in Prague with 6000 men to preserue the Town and Country, the souldiers grew so insolent in their prosperity, that the Captains could hardly keep them in obedience: to preuent the which, and to restrain the incursions of MANSFELD'S troops vpon the riuer of Egra, the Baron of Tilly sent forth part of his Troops to take some small Forts where the Mansfeldians were lodged: but being not able to recouer Falkenaw and Elenbogen, they were put in garrison in the neighbour Towns, to stop their courses.

The Emperor, hauing sent out his Letters of proscription against the Elector Palatine and the rest as you haue heard, appointed commissioners to proceed criminally against the Authors of the troubles of Bohemia, according to the rigor of the lawes and constitutions of the Empire. Some of them were fled into Hungary; and others were retired with the Elector Palatine: som were dead, and many had been apprehended at the taking of Prague, and committed vnto prison. Commissioners appointed to proceed against the authors of the troubles of Bohemia.

Ther were twelue Commissioners appointed to make their Processe; who, coming to Prague in February, did personally adiourn all that had absented themselues after the victory of Prague, and had not taken the oath of allegeance to his Imperial Maiesty, that within six months they should return & submit themselues to the iudgement should be giuen against them in regard of their rebellion; with this clause, that appearing or not, they would proceed to iudgement: and the heirs of those that were dead were summoned to appear to hear the prisoners examination, and the information against their parents deceased: you shall hear their execution in Iune next.

The first of February, the Emperor sent forth foure executoriall Letters of Proscription against the Elector Palatine, the Marquesse of Iagerndorf, the Prince of Anhalt, and the Earle of Hohenlo. The first against the Elector, for the lower Palatinate, was directed to the Arch-duke ALBERT of Austria, Prince of Flanders: the second for the vpper Palatinate, to the Duke of Bauaria; that against the Marquesse of Iagerndorf and the Prince of Anhalt, to the Elector of Saxony; and the fourth against the Earle of Hohenlo, to the Bishoppes of Bamberg and Virsberg; all foure Commissions beeing of one tenor, onely the names changed: whereby hee commanded them to execute his Letters of Proscription against the before-named FREDERICK (who, as he said, tearmed himself Count Palatine) his adherents and fauourers, and to do what- Executoriall Letters against the Elector Palatine & others.

soeuer they should think fit for the settling of a publique peace in the Roman Empire, and the 1621 preseruing of his Imperiall authority. Wherefore, he enioined all men to hold the said FREDERICK for a condemned person; not to suffer him in their Territories and Countries; not to giue him any succour or counsell vpon any pretext whatsoeuer; not to relieue or conuerse with him, nor to suffer their subiects to do it either publickly or secretly; but to assist his Commissary in the execution of his Commission.

The King of Bohemias Letter to the vnited princes.

After the losse of that infortunate battell of Prague, the Elector Palatine had written to all his allies and confederates, imputing the cause of that losse to the want of men and money which had been promised, and that he could neuer perswade the Protestants to ioin their forces to his, and make them equall to the Catholiques. In his Letter to the Princes of the Vnion, he prayed God not to suffer them to be daunted nor deiected, and to giue them grace to take good resolutions; that the vnited Princes had now more cause to resolue to warre and to ioin all their forces together, like to the Catholique Romane league, and to attempt with all their power to chase SPINOLA out of the Empire and the lower Palatinate, a Country which was hereditary vnto himself and his brother LEWYS PHILIP; that the Treaty of Vlmes, although it was made in fauour of the Catholique league, could not preiudice them, but rather open a way for the good of all Protestants and the preseruation of religion and liberty; that hee doubted not but the Spaniards, seeing Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces subiugated, would draw their victorious Armies into the Empire, hould Diets by force, prescribe lawes to the Protestants, and constrain them to restore the reuenues which had belonged to the Roman Clergie, and bring vnder their yoke all the Countries of the protestant Electors: wherefore they should resolue to follow the example of the Elector MAVRICE, and prepare themselues to warre, to shake off this yoke rather than to admit it; reason it selfe perswading them to continue their Vnion: the Imperiall Cities should also remember what hath been done by the enemy in Bohemia and Austria; and beleeue, that if their Vnion did not subsist, they should not onely bee depriued of their wealth, but also forced to entertain and feed souldiers, endure cittadels, and be reduced into seruitude ten times more than during the Vnion; that if the Bohemians would haue imploied towards the charges of the war but the tenth part of that which they haue since lost, they had easily preuented the miseries which haue fallen on them: wherefore he entreated them to consider of all these things, to haue his cause and that of the reformed protestants in recommendation, and to defend his hereditary Countries: the which they should do speedily, that they might transfer the war into their countries who had been the causes of so many miseries.

The King of great Britannie perswades the Princes to continue their vnio.

Some Authors also write, that our King's Maiesty sent to the Princes of the Vnion to giue them to vnderstand, that this losse should not cause their disunion, but rather make them resolue seriously to the continuation thereof: for his part he would neuer fail to assist them with men and money; whereto he was bound for the preseruation of the Palatinate, which was the patrimony of his grand-children.

About the end of September 1620, LEWYS of Hesse, Lantzgraue of Darmstat, had written to the Princes of the Vnion to perswade them to consider of the means whereby peace might be settled in the Empire, and they reconciled to his Imperiall Maiesty. To whom they made this answer; that The Princes of the Vnion had neuer opposed themselues to the Emperor, but had alwaies honoured him; that they had faithfully obserued the Treaty of Vlme, and had not participated any thing with the troubles of Bohemia: and yet SPINOLA had not forborne to inuade many places belonging to the Princes and States vnited, who neuer had any thing common with the Bohemians; where the Spaniard had vsed great exactions, which had forc't them to take Arms: that the Lantzgraue should presse his Imperial Maiesty, to the end that SPINOLA with his forces might leaue the Territories of the Empire, whereby euery man might return to his owne house, which would be the onely means to settle a peace.

The Elector of Mentz, and the Lantzgraue of Darmstat made Commissioners to the Emperor. The Emperors Letters to the Imperial towns.

The Emperor, knowing that the vnion of the Princes and States which had begun in the yeer 1610, was to end in May following, wrote to the Imperiall Towns and Cities of this Vnion, admonishing them to leaue it, and not continue it. He sent these Letters to the Elector of Mentz, and to LEWYS Lantzgraue of Hesse of Darmstat, to see them conuaied, and to require an answer; making them his Commissioners to treat with all the Princes and States that should reunite themselues with his Imperiall Maiesty. His Letters to the Imperial cities contain'd, that he doubted not but they were well informed why LEWYS had perswaded the Princes of the Vnion to submit themselues, and to giue eare to some accord, for the settling of a Peace in their Coun-

Countrey; That hitherto God had giuen him many victories, and might by the same fauour hope for greater, being assisted by his kinsfolks and friends; yet, for the loue and fatherly affe- 1621 ction he bare to Germany their common Countrey, he was more enclined to Peace then Warre; so as they would giue way to his admonitions; That the commendable designe of the Lantzgraue, to procure some accomodation, had been very pleasing vnto him: Wherefore he exhorted them to forbeare to entertaine the Warre which was made in the Palatinate, vnder the name of the Princes of the Vnion; and withall, aduised them not to recontinue their Vnion, which as he vnderstood was to end in May following; hoping that they would giue no more aide nor counsell for the continuance of such cruel war. And therfore he offered them pardon for all that had been done against him or his predecessors; promising to receiue them all into his grace and fauor, and not to suffer any one to be cald in question directly or indirectly, or receiue any losse from himselfe, his cosen the king of Spain, or from any other Prince of the house of Austria: but contrariwise he would giue order that they should not be molested by garrisons or his Armies; but would defend and protect them in all necessary occasions. Moreouer, that he would confirm all their priuiledges and immunities made for the Peace of Religion, and the State; hauing giuen full power to his commissioners to treate with them, and to giue them all necessary assurances.

Their answere.

These Letters being sent to Nuremberg and other Imperiall townes by the said Commissioners which had accompanied them, with their owne; They of Nuremberg made answere, that during the present troubles in the Empire they could not haue receiued any thing more pleasing then his Maiesties Letter, seeing that the things promised in them, should be confirmed by such worthy Princes. That they had also vnderstood that many townes had receiued the like Letters and sent their Deputies vnto them; That for their parts they would acquaint the towns of Franconia their associates with his Maiesties intention, and speedily send their answere; desiring nothing more, then to continue obedient and faithfull to the Empire.

Westhof and Osthof taken by Spinola, & after burnt by the Princes.

SPINOLA, notwithstanding the sharpenes of the winter, had sent the Generall of his horse into the Palatinate, on the other side of the Rhine; where he had taken some places, and forced many Noblemen, Protestants, along the riuer of Mein, to compound and giue him great sums of money, to auoide their apparant ruine. The Marques of Olnesbac, or Anspach, Generall for the Princes of the Vnion (who wintred with his troups at Wormes and thereabouts) being gone to their Assembly at Heilbrun, and hauing put 300 horse & foot in garrison, into Westhof: SPINOLA resolued to take this lodging from him; for the effecting whereof, on the 15 of March, hauing drawn together 2000 horse, with 4000 foot; he marched in one night with 6 cannons to Westhof, the which he took in 8 houres: The souldiers were sent out disarmed with white wands: the Captains and officers were put to ransome: the Inhabitants paid 16000 Florens; and they of Osthof 10000. Then he returned to Crutzenac, carrying with him 6 of the Burgers of Westhof, who were also put to ransome. This prize being reported to the Marquesse of Ansbach, he returned speedily to Wormes, from whence he sent the Earle of Solms with certain troups to Osthof and Westhof; but, hearing that SPINOLA was to returne and fortifie himself there, they burnt these 2 towns; to the great grief and lamentation of the poore inhabitants. About this time, there was an Assembly of the Protestants at Segenberg, in Holsatia; where the king of Denmarke, and the Elector Palatine were in person; others sent their Ambassadors, as the king of Swethland, the Elector of Brandenbourg, from the Princes of the Vnion, and the States of the vnited Prouinces; from the Dukes of Brunswick, Holsatia, Lunebourg, Mecklebourg and Pomerania, with other Earls & States of the Circle of the lower Saxony, which began and ended in March: They haue written diuersly of their conclusion in this Assembly. Some hold that it was resolued to assist the Elector Palatine with 2000 foot, and 6000 horse, to chase SPINOLA out of the Palatinate; but it took no effect. Others haue written, and with more apparance of truth, that the king of Denmarke vndertook to send an Ambassador to Vienna, to beseech his Imperial Maiesty to reuoke the Proscription thundred out against the Elector Palatine, and to restore him to all his Estates and dignities; which would be the meanes to attaine vnto a firme Peace throughout the whole Empire. (This Ambassi was sent to Vienna, and wee shall heare what answere the Emperour made) And secondly, that the said King should write to SPINOLA to exhort him to retire out of the Palatinat, and the Territories of the Empire, the which he did as followeth.

An Assembly of Protestants in Holsatia.

Letters of the K. of Denmarke to Spinola.

I haue vnderstood with much griefe and affliction of minde, by Letters from many Princes of the Empire, my Cozins, Allies and Friends, that you are entred, with an Army, into the heart of the Empire, and the midst of high Germany; whereas you haue taken many towns, ca-

1621 ſtles and forts in the Palatinate by force, and continue the like violence againſt the countries & territories of many other Princes, Earls, States and Towns of the Empire; yea, againſt thoſe which belong to Widows and Orphans, who haue no waies offended the Emperor; exacting grieuous contributions: which hath made the neighbor Princes grow jealous, leſt you ſhould vſe the like violence againſt them, their countries, and territories, as they haue bin threatned by you, if they would not diſcharge the garriſons they entertained for the ſafety of their places & countries, if they did not renounce their vnions and leagues (which haue bin alwais allowd by Diuine and humane laws, and eſpecially by the golden Bull of CHARLS the 4) and did not giue free paſſage to your Army, both by water & land, and through your towns, caſtles, forts & paſſages, according to your will and pleaſure. Theſe proceedings are not only repugnant to the imperial conſtitutions, the liberty of Germany, and the publique Peace; but alſo to the Letters-patents which his imperial Maieſty hath cauſed to be publiſhed for the publique ſafety: wherfore it was not to be ſuffered, that the States of the Empire, our coſins, and kinſ-folke, hauing done wrong to no man, ſhould be abandoned for want of defence, vnder the yoake of an vniuſt oppreſſion: And therfore we entreate you louingly, that we may haue no cauſe to vndertake their iuſt defence to free them from the violence which they ſuffer; but that you would deſiſt from all theſe inuaſions, and abandon that which hath been taken by force from the States of the Empire, and reſtore it to their Princes & Lords: which done, poſterity will commend you to haue bin a wiſe and prudent Prince, and all the Princes of the Empire, and my ſelf will thanke you.

As for the Aſſembly of the Catholique Princes and States held at Ansbourg, and that of the Princes of the Vnion at Heilbrun, and their concluſions; may be ſeen in this Letter following, written by one of the aſſembly of Ansbourg.

I am returned from the Diet at Ansbourg the 19 of March, where the Princes and Catholique States of the Empire haue been aſſembled the ſpace of 7 weekes: We haue reſolued a continuance of contribution for a defenſiue warre, ſo long as the troubles ſhall continue; for the which there ſhall be an aduance of 10 moneths, for the entertainment of 12000 foot, and 3000 horſe, vnder the Duke of Bauaria their Generall. I can aſſure you that the ſaid Princes and Catholique States are ſo well reſolued as they were neuer; and that if they had bin of the like minde ſome fewe yeers ſince, the Proteſtant States had been at a low Eb. They being aſſembled at Heilbrun, ſent an Ambaſſage to our Aſſembly; the ſubiect was, that hauing no other aime nor intent but Peace, which they called the obſeruation of the treaty of Vlme; the Catholikes haue graunted them the ſaid obſeruation. They are all vpon the point of reconciling themſelues vnto the Emperor & to abandon the Elector Palatine. My L. Biſhop of Spire ſtands vpon his guard on the defenſiue; becauſe he is aſſured the ſaid proteſtant Princes crie out againſt his Fort of Vdenheim, hauing cauſed the Elector of Mentz and D. of Bauaria to be moued to perſwade him to giue ouer that new fortification; but they haue giuen them anſwere in writing, ſhewing the iuſt occaſions and rights, for the which the ſaid Biſhop had reaſon to ſeek the aſſurance and quiet of his country, after ſo many oppreſſions and wrongs which he had endured from his neighbours.

In the beginning of March, the Princes of the Vnion, and the Imperiall Townes of their partie, began to reconcile themſelues vnto the Emperour, promiſing to giue no more ſuccour vnto the Elector Palatine, and not to prolong their Vnion, nor to make any new. There were ſome of them which treated for their owne particular, being thereunto preſſed; and the reſt in generall. And thus you ſee, that all they which had adviſed and perſwaded the Elector Palatine to accept of the Crowne of Bohemia, for the generall good of Germanie, as they pretended, and ſo ingaged him in a moſt dangerous war, contrary to the will and advice of his beſt friend, when as hee might have lived happie and peacefull daies in his owne Country, much honoured and reſpected; doe now, after ſome frownes of fortune, abandon him and his, baſely and cowardly, to the affronts and oppreſſion of a proud and inſolent enemy; who, no doubt, in time will make them know the danger of their diſ-union, and repent their raſh reſolutions.

Maurice Lantz-graue of Heſſe ſubmits himſelfe to the Emperor.

MAVRICE, Lantzgrave of Heſſe, ſeeing SPINOLA'S expedition in the Palatinate; and his Armie readie vpon the firſt occaſion to enter into his country; the tediouſneſs of the Princes in their reſolution to treate with the Emperour; and that hee ſhould bee the firſt in danger: he was alſo the firſt which ſent vnto the Emperors Commiſſioners, and to Marquis SPINOLA, touching his re-union. The place of treaty was at Bingen; where, after many conſultations of their Deputies, in the end theſe Articles following were concluded.

First, that Prince MAVRICE, Lantzgrave, ſhould promiſe, not to attempt by himſelfe or any other, any act of hoſtility againſt his Imperiall Majeſtie, or his Armie; and not to giue any aſſiſtance aſſiſtance, directly or indirectly, of men, money, munition, victuals, or counſell to the Count Palatine; nor to the united Princes, and other Kings, Electors, Princes, and Eſtates which had relieved the ſaid Palatine, and the Palatinate, the Realme of Bohemia, and other Provinces incorporate. 2. That the ſaid Lantzgrave ſhoud withdraw his Troupes and Souldiers from the Princes Armie, and from the Palatinate. 3 That by the fourteenth of May (which would be the expiration of their Vnion) he ſhould ſend an Ambaſſadour expreſly to giue notice to the other Princes, that he did renounce the ſaid Vnion, or any other new Vnion which might bee made, againſt his Imperiall Maieſty, to ſuccour the Palatine and Palatinate, and ſhould keepe theſe preſent Articles inuiolable. 4. That Marqueſſe SPINOLA ſhould alſo promiſe, that neither he nor his Army ſhould commit any act of hoſtility, make any cruption, nor exact any contribution vpon the Lands, Principality and Segniories of the ſaid Lantz-graue MAVRICE, nor vpon his vaſſailes, Miniſters and ſubiects, nor their goods, moueable or immoueable; but ſhould keepe them from all moleſtations, and ſuffer them to liue in Peace, both for Religion and policie, according to the Imperiall conſtitutions: But if any of the ſaid Lantz-graues ſubiects ſhould doe contrary to this tranſaction, they ſhould be excepted. And laſtly, that this Treaty ſhould be ſigned by Marqueſſe SPINOLA, and the Lantz-graue MAVRICE, and that within three moneths the ſaid Marqueſſe ſhould cauſe it to be ſigned and ratified by the Emperor, and the Arch-duke ALBERT: which he ſhould deliuer to the Lantz-graue, and in the meane time theſe Articles which were concluded, the 23 of March, ſhould be obſerued.

Straſbourg, Vlme and Nurembourg renounce the Vnion.

The three chiefe Imperiall proteſtant Cities, Straſbourg, Vlme, and Nuremboug, hauing at the ſame time ſent their priuate Deputies to the Elector of Mentz, and the Lantz-graue LEVVES, treated of their reconciliation with the Emperor, and promiſed to renounce the Vnion of the Correſpondents: which was concluded and ſigned the 9 of Aprill, and proclaimed afterwards in their Cities.

They of Wormes feared a ſiege, for the great preparations which SPINOLA made, ſo as they carried what they had, moſt pretious, to Spire, as to a place of refuge: They would gladly haue imitated Straſbourg and Vlme, but the Princes of the Vnion were too neere them; who, deſiring to treate in generall, had ſent their Ambaſſadours to the Emperour: but conſidering that the ſtate of their affaires required a more ſpeedy remedy then the return of the ſaid Ambaſſadors, there was a meeting appointed betwixt the Lantz-graue LEVVES, and the Marqueſs of Olnosbach, Generall of the Vnion, and IOHN FREDERICK D. of Virtemberg, at Veinheim; where, after many diſcourſes of the means to treate an accord for the Peace of Germany, the D. of Virtemberg went alone to Wormes, to impart it to the Marqueſs of Baden; from whence, being returned, they went all to Mentz; whither SPINOLA alſo came, and the Articles following for the Peace and re-vnion of the Princes and States correſpondents were concluded and ſigned the 12 of Aprill. First, it is agreed betwixt the aboue named Princes, that they ſhall forbeare to vſe any acts of hoſtility one againſt another; that the Princes and States of the Vnion, and their Souldiers ſhall not offer any wrong to the Marqueſs SPINOLA or his Army and troups; nor to thoſe places which he hath made ſubiect to his obedience, or to any which are comprehended in this treatie, their countries and ſtates. 2. They ſhall not giue any ſuccors of money or men, to FREDE. Count Palatin of the Rhyn, be it directly or indirectly, by themſelues or by others in any ſort whatſoeuer. 3. They ſhall not continue the Vnion hertofore made by them; neither in favor of the Palatine, nor hatred of his Imperiall Ma.: Nor ſhall make any new; but they ſhall retire their troups out of the Palatinat by the 14 of May next to come; whether they belong to priuat perſons or to the general, and they ſhall al continue faithful to his imperial Ma. 4. The Marqueſs SPINOLA doth alſo promiſe not to vſe or cauſe to be vſed, any hoſtility againſt the Princes and vnited States Proteſtants, their ſoldiers, officers, ſubiects, caſtles, towns, and territories. 5. That in this treaty of Peace ſhall be comprehended, as well thoſe mentioned in the Treaty of Vlme, as all the other Electors, Princes, States and Knights of the Empire; except the country & territories of the houſe of Iuliers. 6. Touching the Count P. FREDERICK the Mar. SPINOLA, hauing been required by the king of great Britan not to execute his commiſſion againſt the countries which remained vnder the Palatins obedience, till the end of the vnion, which ſhould expire the 14 of May, nor againſt his ſubiects or their goods; he promiſed that no Act of hoſtility ſhould be committed by him or any other vntill that day; conditionally, that the Princes & vnited States ſhall take order that the particular troups now in the Palatinat and neighbor places, ſhall not attempt ought againſt the ſaid SPINOLA or his Army, nor the Townes and places which hee now holdeth, or againſt any State of the Empire that is

The Princes of the Vnion, reconciled to the Emperor.

1621 faithfull to his Maiesty. Seuenthly, and to the end that the neighbour Princes and States and their subiects may not be wronged by the Souldiers of either party; the Princes aboue named promise, euery one for themselues, to hinder all incursions, robberies, and thefts, and to assure the high-waies for the free liberty of commerce. These Articles being signed and sealed by all the Princes; SPINOLA hauing promised to cause them to be signed and ratified by his Imperiall Maiesty, and the Arch-duke ALBERT; the Electour of Mentz made them a stately Feast: and on the morrow after, SPINOLA did the like with great magnificence.

But afterwards it was added to the said treaty; that if the King of Great-Brittaine should demand that the suspension against the execution of the Palatinat should be prolonged till the second of Iune; that SPINOLA would yeeld vnto it, so as his Maiesty did promise that his sonne in law should not attempt any thing against those places which he held, nor against his Army. Moreouer, if the Kings Letters could not come by the foureteenth of May; that the Marquesse of Olnosbach, hauing giuen notice thereof to Marquesse SPINOLA, and if he required a longer delay of ten daies, that he would grant it: the which was again signed by the two Generals SPINOLA and BRANDENBOVRG OLNSBACH.

After these treaties of Peace, MAVRICE Lantz-graue of Hesse retired his souldies from the Army of the vnited Princes; and they also countermanded their troups which were in the Palatinate vnder the command of CNIPHVS; so as for the guard thereof, there remained no Germanes but OBERTRANT with his horse, Sir HORATIO VERE with his English, and some Troops of Holland, who were lodged in Heidelberg, Manheim, and Frankendale, where they fortified themselues against the enemies attempts, as well as time and their meanes would giue them leaue.

A bruite dispersed ouer all Germany touching a great Army which was leuied in Denmarke and the lower Saxony, in fauour of the Palatine, was the subiect of this following Letter; written by the Elector of Mentz, to FREDERICK VLRICK Duke of Brunswick. Being aduertised from many parts that there are greate numbers of souldiers leuied in the circle of the lower Saxony to go into the Palatinate; I thought good to aduertise you of the treaty of pacification which hath been made betwixt the Marquesse SPINOLA on the one side, and the Marquesse of Olnosbach, with other of the confederate Princes on the other; whereby a Truce is concluded for the Palatinate, as you may see by the Articles I send you. There is no man of iudgement but foresees, if these souldiers (leuied in base Saxony) shall goe into the Palatinate, that all the paines so many Princes haue taken to settle a Peace in Germany, and Truce in the Palatinate, will be vaine and without any fruite; if we returne againe to warre, and that the fire of ciuill dissension be againe reuiued. We coniure and intreate you so to deale with the Princes and States of Saxony, that nothing may bee attempted which may minister subiect to breake the treaty of Peace; in which you and all the Princes and States of the Empire are comprehended: you shall herein doe a commendable worke for the good of the common-weale, whereof we thought good to aduertise you, &c. this 24 of Aprill.

Letter from Elector of Mentz to the D. of Brunswic.

The Emperour wrote also at the same time to the Duke of Brunswic, concerning the same subiect, as also against those which had published in the lower Saxony, that SPINOLA's intent was to march thither to dispossesse the Princes of that circle of the Arch-bishopricks and Ecclesiasticall reuenues which they held: the which his Maiesty, by his Letters, did auerre to be a slaunder; assuring him that his Maiesty would maintaine the Peace as well in causes of Religion, as of State, according to the Letters of assurance which he had caused to be published at his comming to the Empire: and as for the excesse committed by SPINOLA's Army, against some Princes and places in Veteravia, and vpon the Rhine; he had written vnto him to make satisfaction for the same, and to forbid the doing of the like hereafter: wherefore he aduised him not to beleeue such false reports, but rather to giue credit to the words and promises of his Imperiall Maiesty; to keepe himselfe in Peace and not to enter into an vnnecessarie charge; seeing the intention of his Maiesty was like that of his predecessors, desiring nothing more then to continue his good affection vnto the Princes and States of the Empire.

The proceedings of Bohemia.

Let vs now returne into Bohemia, and see what exploits were done there during the moneths of March, Aprill, May, and Iune. The Emperour had caused two Armies to be leuied, the one on this side of the riuer of Molda, towards Pilsen, whereof the Baron of Tilly was Generall, to besiege such places as held yet for MANDSFELD; and the other beyond the Riuer, commanded by Don BALTHAZAR, to set vpon Tabor. MANDSFELD was returned from Heilbrun into into the vpper Palatinate to leuie new Troops, and to attend others which the Duke of Weimar leuied vpon his Lands by order from the Elector Palatine, to ioyn with him, and succour those places which held yet for him in Bohemia. The enemy made profit of his absence; and by the treachery of Colonell FRANCK, IERONIMO de Porta, and LEMINGER his owne instruments and seruants, TILLY entred into a particular Treaty with the Captaines for the yeelding vp of Pilsen, while that in outward shew he seemd to desire a Treaty with Count MANSFELD: so as the Captains, hauing already past the bounds of duty, beganne to speak more openly. They wrote to their Commander Count MANSFELD, that they purposed to expect no longer, but would either bee presently paid or assured of their pay; and, if they had not a speedy resolution, would prouide for themselues. 1621

His Auditor LEMINGER, after conference with Monsieur TILLY about his last Commission, returned to the Lord Marshall without any effect; excusing it, that hee was sent back with threats, and denied audience; pretending, that the enemy took it ill, that, changing the Contents of his first Commission, he had inserted this last Article concerning the vpper Palatinate (as you haue heard) which had no dependency vpon Bohemia. Beeing now assured of the Captains dispositions, he had no will to treat with the Lord Marshall; it being onely to entertain time, and to stay him from further proceeding. LEMINGER, aduertising him of this secret Treaty, and that his Captains inclined to the Emperors party, did what hee could to procure mony to satisfie these traitors: but, all was in vain; for, those whom hee trusted most, betraid him: and the Letter which he sent to Pilsen to diuert the Officers from so foule a fact, was intercepted by the enemy, and not deliuered; so as on the twenty sixt of March, the treaty that had been long a-working was concluded at Mies betwixt the Baron of Tilly, Generall of the Emperors Army, and the Captains of the Garrison of Pilsen: where it was assured, that in regard of their absolute departure from the said Town, the Captains should receiue 140000 florens from his Imperiall Maiesty to be diuided equally among the seuen companies of the Regiment. Colonell FRANCK made his treaty apart, and got a promise of 3000 pound sterling for the restitution of Tabor; that all the souldiers, which would retire to Count MANDSFELD, should be conducted to a place of safety with their Ensignes, Arms and baggage; that in going forth, they should not molest the Clergy nor Inhabitants in any sort; and that they should leaue all the cannon and munition within the Town in the same estate they were. Thus was Pilsen presently deliuered, and these merchants receiued the price of their accursed sale; and euery one departed whither he pleased. Pilsen sould by the treachery of the Captains.

The Lord Marshall, after the conclusion of this Treaty, wrote kinde Letters, thinking to draw them into the Palatinate: but, their guilty consciences would not suffer them to appeare before him. His Auditor LEMINGER, hauing receiued 4000 Ricks dollers (the hire of his periury) thought to conueigh it secretly through the Palatinate; thinking by his wit so to iustifie the rest of his actions, that the Lord Marshall should receiue good satisfaction: but he soon discouered his money and his villany; causing both the money and the man to be attached, and made him to be questioned at a Marshals Court: where, being condemned to dy, he was executed according to martiall law.

Colonell FRANCK grew much amazed at his imprisonment. The Lord Marshall, beeing come to Amberg, called him before the Earl of Solms, Lieutenant Gouerner of the vpper Palatinate, and the Lords of the Councell, to clear himself concerning the yeelding vp of Pilsen. Being summoned by the Lord Marshall, he came thither in his caroach; but was surprised with such fear, that he returned presently with all speed, leauing both caroach, seruants and baggage behinde him. He got to Nuremberg, from thence to Regensburg, and after to Tabor, where hee hoped to be receiued by the garrison: but he was preuented by the vigilancy of the Lord Marshall, who sent a command to the contrary. Finding himself thus frustrate of his expectation, he went and staid some time in the enemies Camp, and then retired to Prague to make his apology. Some well-willers to Colonell FRANCK, who presume to know him and his actions well, and were imployed in those warres, said that these are scandalous aspersions laid vpon him without cause. They confesse, that he gaue way to the enemies Captains and Officers to come familiarly into Pilsen, where they had all good reception; which was only to prolong the treaty by delaies, that in the mean time they might gette some relief from the King of Bohemia or Count MANSFELD: but they absolutely deny, that hee made any composition for himself vpon the yeelding vp of the Town. They also confesse, that he retired himself secretly from Amberg: and the reason was, for that, seeing how LEMINGER was intreated, he feared the like like although he had not deserued it. And touching his retiring to Tabor, they say he came thither during the time it was besieged, and past through the enemies Camp by night; where, coming to the Port, they would not receiue him, hauing been formerly aduertised to the contrary from Count MANSFELD; that in the morning the enemy discouered him, and took him prisoner: with whom he continued till the Town was yeelded, and then was released, it being one of their conditions, because they then held him for an honest man. Thus haue I written the opinions on both sides touching Colonell FRANCK; the censure whereof I leaue to the iudicious Reader. 1621

The enemy seeing himself freed of this thorn, being master of Pilsen which had so much annoyed them; Generall TILLY led his Army to ioin with the Troops of Saxony which were come to the riuer of Egra, and had forced a Town of the same name to declare it self for the Emperor, and receiue a garrison: which Town is the proper inheritance of the Elector Palatine. There remained no more on that side but Falkenaw and Elenbogen. They went first to Falkenaw, where Colonell GRAY commanded with certain companies of English and others: they battered and assaulted it diuerse times; so as the Colonell, hauing defended it many daies, and performed the part of a braue souldier, was forced to treat and depart with Arms and baggage. This place being yeelded, there remained nothing in those Quarters but Elenbogen; being not great, yet strongly situated by nature. There were in it three companies of good souldiers, besides the Citizens, which were much affected to the Kings party. Count HENRY of Ottemberg, a braue and generous yong Noble-man, commanded in the Town by the appoyntment of the Lord Marshall. The siege began the second of April, and continued till the six and twentith with as much resolution and obstinacy as could be deuised, imploying all their forces and stratagems. The cannon plaid continually, and they shot balles of wilde-fire incessantly: yet, notwithstanding all their fury, they within the Town, encouraged by their yong Earle to continue constant in his Maiesties seruice, were not tired with any labour; but, the more the enemy pressed vpon them, the more resolutely they carried themselues to repell them: so as, had they not wanted pouder, without doubt they had made good the place. The Lord Marshall, during the siege, did what he could possibly to succour them; still giuing aduice to the Earle, that (in case he saw himself pressed before that succours came) he should treat in time, rather than be brought to extreamity, and lose the hope of an honourable composition to saue the Troops. About the six and twentith of April the Lord Marshall went with his Army (which was but small) with an intent to raise the siege at what rate soeuer. His Fore-ward entring into Bohemia, they had newes that the Town was yeelded vpon composition, the Gouerner beeing forced by the forenamed want and other inconueniences. The Articles were honourable: that the garrison should depart with bag and bagagge, bullets in the mouth, matches light, drums beating, colours fleeing, &c: but the enemy (accustomed to break his faith to those of the religion) vsed them as they had done others before at Tacchau; for, as the souldiers came out, they spoiled them one after another: which particular losse was very sensible to the poor souldiers. Elenbogen being lost, the Lord Marshall retired again into the vpper Palatinat to go on with his Leuies of souldiers, and to prepare himself for some better designe. Some write, that the Inhabitants of Elenbogen were taxed at 100000 florens by TILLY to redeem their Towne from spoil, and that he seised on the chief Burgesses till the summe were paid.

At the same time Don BALTHAZAR forced the garrisons of Varling and Clingenberg to yield those two places to him, vpon condition that the souldiers should not thrust themselues into Tabor, but depart out of Bohemia, and should be conducted to the higher Palatinate with all safety: which was duely performed. There now remained no more in Bohemia but Tabor and Pitingaw, which fortified themselues to endure a siege wherwith Don BALTHAZAR threatned them: you shall hereafter hear what passed there. Let vs now see the executions of iustice which were done at Prague both vpon the Directors and the chief Authors of those combustions and troubles.

We haue formerly related how that his Imperiall Maiesty had appointed the Earl of Lichtenstein and other Commissioners to proceed against the Authors of the Bohemian troubles. On the three and twentith of April, a Sentence was giuen against the deceased (who were then named) in the presence of their heires; whereby they were conuicted of high treason, and their memory for euer condemned, and their goods confiscate to his Imperiall Maiesty, as King of Bohemia: yet their condemnation should not touch their kinsfolks with any note of infamy; the which his Maiesty of his speciall grace would haue inserted.

On

On the 13 of May, IOHN ANDREVV Earle of Schlic (one of the greatest Lords of Bohemia and chief of those combustions) being retired to certaine lands he had vpon the riuer of Egria, and from thence into Voytland; he was encountred by the Elector of Saxonie's horsemen, who carried him prisoner to Dresda: which being knowne vnto the Emperour, he sent to demande him of the Elector. Whereupon, he was deliuered to his Commissarie; who conducted him to Prague vnder sure guard: where his processe was made with the other prisoners, they being in all forty fiue: whereof seuen were condemned to perpetuall imprisonment in Prague; two to be sent in chaines to Iauerin; two to remaine in prison for a yeere: three were to be hanged: three to be whipt and banished for euer, and one to haue his tongue nailed to a Post for an hours space, and to be banished for euer to Iauerin: All the rest were to lose their heads, and many of them to haue their right hands cut off, and set vpon the towres of the bridge. All their lands and goods were by the same iudgement confiscate to his Imperiall Maiesty; onely their wiues dowries excepted. 1621

The condemnation of the prisoners of Prague.

The manner of their execution I will be bould to relate more particularly, because it was somewhat extraordinarie. After their condemnation they were returned to prison: where euery man had liberty to visit them, and conferre with them. They were all Lutherans, except one Baron (who was a Caluinist) and a Captaine which was a Romish Catholike. There was a scaffold built in the accustomed place neere vnto the Towne-house, foure elles high and twenty two spaces square, and bourded round about. This scaffold was afterwards couered with black cloth: vpon the which, on the day of execution, there was a man set in a long black robe and his face couered, holding a Crucifix in his hand, to present it to euery one of the condemned as he should come vp on the scaffold. There were two others attired in like manner to receiue the condemned as they went to dy, and to spred before them a black cloth, whereon they kneeled when they were executed; and, thirdly, six men in like attire with their faces couered, appointed to take vp their bodies being dead, and to wrapt them in the black cloth whereon they had kneeled, to deliuer them to their kinsfolk. On Sunday the 20 of Iune (the day before the execution) many of their wiues and children cast themselues at the Prince of Lichteine's feete, to sue for their husbands: but he made them answere, It was not in his power, but onely in the Emperors, to giue.

The manner of the execution of the prisoners.

At fiue of the clock in the morning, at the shooting off a Cannon from the Castle, all the gates of Prague were presently shut vp, and the execution began.

First of all the Earle of Schlic, attired in a gowne of black silk, houlding a booke in his hand, went vp to execution. The man, appointed to that office, presented him the Crosse: his seruant vnclothed him; and, after his prayers ended, the Executioner cut off his head: which done, his owne seruant laid his right hand vpon a block; the which, in like manner, was cut off, and layed apart with the head: the body was wrapped vp in the cloth whereon he had kneeled, and carried from the scaffold by those six men appointed to that purpose; so as the body was neuer touched by the Executioner. The like forme was obserued with all the rest which were beheaded. NICHOLAS DVBIS, whose tongue was nailed for an hours space to the gallowes, died with the torment within three daies after.

The Countesse of Scklic, did so much lament the losse and death of her husband, as she did not suruiue him many daies. As for the bodies of such as were executed by the sword, they were deliuered to their kinsfolkes & friends, to be enterred some in their Segniories, and others in Prague.

At the same instant, there was the like inquisition in both Austrias, against the chiefe which had held the Bohemian party. The Commissioners did summon many to appeare personally before them at Lintz, to iustifie themselues. Some came: other (who thought there was more safety in absence) forbare. Some, which came in, were committed: against such as stood out, they proceeded, by seisure of their goods; the which, as LVNDORPHIVS writes, were restored for mony, and vpon other conditions. FREDERICK, Baron of Tieffembach, one of the chief actors in Morauia, had beene taken at the Bathes in the County of Tiroll: being brought to Oenypont, the Emperour sent Commissaries, who made his processe, and cut off his head.

The Marqueſſe Iagerndorf (who had not beene comprehended in the treaty of Silesia, but proscribed by the Emperour, and the execution thereof committed to the Elector of Saxony) thought, by these terrible executions at Prague, to put the Silesians in feare, and to make them returne to Armes against the Emperour. At his departure out of Lusatia, he marched with his troupes being 3000 men into the County of Glatz; resoluing, that the States of Silesia (in whose name,

1621 name, and for whom, he had leuied these forces) should pay them what was their due. Hee required the States therefore to giue him satisfaction: but, they so delayed him, as he well perceiued they desired to be ridde of him.

The County of Glats is a frontiere of Bohemia, Lusatia, Silesia, and Morauia. The riuer of Iegerne, vpon which lieth Iegerndorf (that is to say, the Bourrough of Iegerne) is betwixt Nisse, Tropau and Glats. This Marquesse seeing all the Emperors forces employed either in Hungary or beyond the riuer of Molda, and that round about the Countie of Glats, there were none but enemies, where his souldiers might get good booty; he resolued to surprise some such places, as they should be forced to demande a peace of him: all which succeeded happily. For, the Elector Palatine King of Bohemia hearing of his designe, sent him his Letters, by the which he made him Commissarie Generall in his Realme of Bohemia and the incorporated prouinces, with ful power to gouerne those Countries according to his discretion; to make leuies of souldiers, and to doe whatsoeuer he thought necessary; commanding all his subiects to yeeld obedience and assistance vnto the said Marquesse his Commissarie. Hauing this Commission, he gaue liberty to his troupes to commit all acts of hostility: whereby his number so encreased as he made himselfe Maiester of Tropau and Nisse, and forced the inhabitants of the whole Bishoprick of Nisse to pay him 100000 dollers, and the foure receiuers of the Countrey (who were his prisoners) to furnish him with 10000 Hungarian duckets within two daies. After which, going with his horse and some part of foote (being in all 1500 men) he entered into Bohemia: where he committed great spoiles; and, making vse of the Pesants which were in Armes, he seised vpon diuers places. After which, he went to besiege Glats: which being yeelded, he furnished it with 3000 good souldiers and 13 Cannons.

The Marquesse takes Tropau and Nisse.

The States of Silesia desirous to stop the course of these suddaine incursions, and surprising of Towns, sent their Deputies to the Elector of Saxony, Commissary for his Imperiall Maiesty in Silesia. It was resolued betwixt them to leuie an Army of 1500 horse and 11000 foot to stay the said Marquess. The Elector sent them 3000 foot & 1000 horse; the States of Silesia were to furnish the rest. They had resolued to recouer Glats: but the Marquess had taken such order, and his new enterprises vpon the territorie of Preslau (from whence he drew 60000 dollers to retire his troupes) made them in the beginning to stand vpon the defensiue, and to assure their other Townes without attempting any thing against the Marquesse: who hauing retired his garrisons from Nisse and many other places, which he held not able to resist their forces; hee made the body of an Army; which he led into the principality of Tischin vpon the frontiers of Morauia: where after great spoiles committed by his troupes, the inhabitants were forced to giue him certaine thousands of Hungarian duckets to leaue them & to passe on to BETHLIN GABOR.

The Marquesse his Letters to the States of Silesia.

Before he left the Countrey, hee wrote two Letters to the States of Silesia touching the execution of the prisoners at Prague. The first did intimate that it was notorious to the whole world, that the cruell and barbarous execution made at Prague of the chiefe Noblemen of Bohemia (the true pillers of the State) and of many honest and worthy persons and good countrey men, was onely in regarde of their religion and constancie to keepe their faith vnto their King, whom they had chosen: a cruell execution, which God would reuenge vpon the Authors. That he was truly aduertised that the like would shortly be done to the chiefe of Silesia, at Preslaw and in other places (if God diuerted not the designe) notwithstanding the transaction and treaty of grace and pardon made with the Electour of Saxony. That this cruell inquisition of Spaine hauing no other end, but the oppression and extirpation of the Protestant religion, hee thought good to aduertise them all, and especially the inhabitants of Preslau and Schueitnitz, to be wise by other mens examples; and not so much to regarde that which concerns their priuate profit, as that of the publike; to the end they might maintain the faith giuen to their King, and to the league which they had sworne; and to ioyne with him to free themselues from so many tyrannies: but, if (contrarie to his hope) they would willingly remaine in danger, let them accuse none but themselues to be the Authors of their and the Countries ruine, and the breach of faith which they had sworne to their elected King. And, withall, he aduertised them, that if in his absence any violence were offered to any of his Counsellors, officers, ministers and subiects which were in Silesia, or to any Protestant in the Bishoprick of Nisse, or if they did put any garrisons into the Townes which did particularly belong to him, or that they receiued any wrong; that they should assure themselues, that the administrators and receiuers of the Bishoprick of Nisse (who were in his custodie) should haue the like vsage. The second Letter was to the same effect.

The

The Elector of Saxony made answere to these Letters, shewing the iustice of the Emperors proceeding in the execution at Prague: And as touching the breach of the transaction which he had made with the Silesians, he gaue them his word and Electoral faith, that it should be faithfully kept and obserued; and that there was neuer any intent, neither should their be any search or execution vpon any colour whatsoeuer, so long as they conteined themselues within the bounds of the said transaction.

The Elector of Saxony answeres the Marquis his Letters 1621

The Emperour also made answere to those Letters: by which, he assured the Silesians that he would neuer forget the grace and pardon which he had imparted vnto them; promising, to maintaine the transaction made with the Elector of Saxony: which he did confirme by those presents, so as they continued in their fidelity and obedience. Hee also exhorted the Princes, States and all his subiects of Silesia, not to suffer themselues to be seduced by the inuention and fraude of that proscript or any other person; but, to remaine within the termes of the transaction, and to employ all their forces to oppresse that rebel and his partisans, by whom they had beene often seduced; to the end that Silesia might be restored to her former estate and enioy a full and absolute peace.

The first of Aprill the Emperour appointed a Diet of the Electors and Princes to be held at Ratisbone on Saint IOHN BAPTIST'S day following, to consult of the meanes how to settle a generall peace in the Empire. The Elector Palatine King of Bohemia, aduertised hereof, sent his Letters vnto all the Electors and Princes which had beene called thither; by which hee complained that he had beene aduertised, how that some imputed vnto him (that contrarie to his Imperiall Maiesties intention, who had called a Diet of the Electors and Princes of the Empire at Ratisbone on the 24 of Iune, to resolue how peace might be settled in the Empire) he was more pleased in the actions of warre, then in treaties of peace; but contrariewise his conscience did witnesse vnto him, that he rather desired an honest peace then warre. That, touching the troubles then in the Empire, hee had not ingaged himselfe through ambition, or to wrong any priuate person; but by the perswasion and promise of a lawfull calling and a iust defence. That he confessed truly, and ingenuously, to owe vnto his Imperial Maiesty, obedience and honour, as to the soueraigne head of the Empire. That he was depriued (contrary to his hope and expectation) of his Electoral and hereditarie countreys, which was the cause of great inconueniences and preiudice to many States of the Empire, entangled in these warres; for the which he was much afflicted, especially for the great miseries which had befallen, the Turke preparing to enter into Germany. That he hoped, God would so direct the hearts of the Emperour, Electors and Princes which should assist at this assembly, that all their counsells and consultations would tend onely to the restoring of peace in the Empire, to banish iealousies & distrust, and to settle a new confidence. That he doubted not, but in this Diet they would treate cheefly of the meanes of his reconciliation with the Emperour, as many kings and Princes haue formerly done by their Ambassadors: to whose good counsells and aduice he would alwaies submit himselfe, so farre forth as his dignity and conscience might not bee wounded. That hee would alwaies witnesse, and desired the world to know, that he neuer had a thought to offend his Imperiall Maiesty, but desired to yeeld all honour due vnto him according to the constitutions of the Empire. That he hoped his Imperiall Maiesty would procure a remedy for so many mischeefes by a generall Amnestia or forgetfulnes; and so moderate all things, as the Princes and States of the Empire, his friends, counsellors, officers, and subiects might be freed from the insolencie of forraine souldiers, and all things restored to their former state and liberty. This was the tenor of his Letter. Let vs now see what passed at Viena.

The King of Bohemias Letters, to the Electors and Princes of the Empire.

You haue formerly heard how that the Princes of the Vnion had sent their Ambassadours to the Emperour, touching their reconciliation, which in the meane time was concluded at Mentz, with the Elector and the Lantzgraue LEWIS: so as after their arriuall at Viena, they had no other charge but to entreate his Imperiall Maiesty to confirme the treaty of reconciliation, and to commande the Execution for the restitution of places taken and deteined from the Earles and Noblemen of Veteravia: whereunto, according to their instructions, they added the restoring of the Elector Palatine to his countries, or to stay the execution of the Imperiall proscription. Whereunto they receiued answere the sixt of May, That his Imperiall Maiesty was very well pleased that the Protestant Princes had abstained from defence of the Elector Palatine, whom he had proscribed; and for promising not to continue the Vnion or to reuiue it any more; which will be a principall point for the establishing of peace in the Empire. That his said Imperiall Maiesty desired not to spare any paines for the restoring of peace, but could

The Emperours answere to the Ambassadours of the united Princes.

1621 not yet see how he might satisfie their demande of reestablishing the Palatine, or at the least to retract the execution of the Imperiall Ban denounced against him. That although it bee not lawfull, by the constitutions of the Empire, to make intercession for a proscribed person; yet for so good a thing as the settling of peace in the Empire, his Imperiall Maiesty would be well pleased the said Princes should endeuour that the Elector Palatine should acknowledge his fault, craue pardon of him, and (as the said constitutions require in matters of lesse importance) make offer to satisfie the charges and losse he hath procured. That hitherto it hath not beene obserued, that the Palatine is willing to take this good course; but, on the contrarie, he saw both within the Empire and without, in Holland and other places, that through his practices and on his behalfe, many leuies of souldiers were made: which constrained his Imperiall Maiesty also to make preparation to keepe the faithfull States of the Empire from the oppression of the said Elector Palatines adherents. And touching the delay of the execution which they demanded, he did not think that all the Protestant Princes consented thereunto. And as for the restitution of the Townes and Castles which had beene taken from diuers Noblemen of Veteravia, his Maiesty had declared his pleasure by his Letters Patents, that he had no desire the innocent should suffer with the nocent; but contrariwise would repell the violence which had beene done them, by force. That if they did not giue them satisfaction accordingly, he would cause them to haue all content.

mbassadors nt from the ing of Den. narke to the mperor.

In the same month of May, Ambassadours came to Viena from the King of Denmark, with instructions from the assembly at Sconeberg, demanding a disannulling of the Palatines proscription and of all the rest, and that they might bee restored to their lands and estates: without the which, there was no hope of any peace in the Empire. The Emperour, hauing sent this proposition to the Electors, and receiuing their aduice, made answere to the Ambassadours, that the proscription could not be made voide, but rather to be executed with all speede according to the constitutions of the Empire. The Ambassadors replyed, that their kings intention was not to meddle with questions of times; but onely to procure a peace in the Empire, and a firme confidence betweene the head and the members: to which end the Emperour said, he had appointed an Assembly at Ratisbone, to resolue vpon all things concerning that question.

oppositions at e treaty of ainbourg.

In the meane time, the conference at Hainbourg grew to such length, and both parties so full of distrust, as the French Ambassadors were not able to reconcile them. The Emperour had resolued in counsell, vpon the seauenth of April, that he would accept of a peace vpon these conditions: That BETHLEN GABOR should be againe confirmed Prince of Hungary, and haue for his entertainment 100000 florens yearely, and 100 markes of siluer from the mountaine Townes. They write, that Prince BETHLIN was content to accept of these conditions; but he demanded Cassouia and many other townes of safety, with these clauses: That his Maiesty should pardon all the confederates of what prouince soeuer; who should be restored to their estates; and that no question should bee made for what was past: whereuppon the Emperour would not yeeld; so as the conference brake off: before the which, BETHLIN GABOR was retired from Presbourg to Tirnaw, and had drawne his Chancellor from the conference, vpon some pretexts. His partisans said, that the Imperialists made shew by their daily practices, to draw the Noblemen of Hungary to their partie, and by the preparations they made at Viena, and by their prosecutions against their confederates in Bohemia, Austria, and Moravia, that this conference to treate of a peace, was but a snare to entrap them, and suddenly to shut Prince BETHLIN into Presbourg. The Imperialls on the other side gaue out, that Prince BETHLIN, hauing carried away the Crowne of Hungary, desired to haue the title of King: and if he had had anie good intent to make a peace, he would not haue made leauies of Transiluanians and Tartarians, which were marching into Hungary; writing his Letter vnto GALGA Prince of Tartary: which for breuity sake I must omit.

etschy recon- les himselfe to e Emperor.

GEORGE SETSCHY, one of the chiefe Noble-men of high Hungary, who had been a powerfull Partisan to BETHLIN (hauing made his peace with the Emperor) gathered together two thousand men; and, vpon the ending of the Truce, surprised Altensol and Vesprin, where he put all the Transiluanians which were in Garrison to the sword. It is an vsuall thing when treaties end, some change their partie. The victorie of Prague, and the Earle of Bucquoy (who had wintered vpon the riuer of Mare a daies iourney from Presbourg, making account to haue twenty thousand men) was the cause that many Noblemen of BETHLIN's partie expected but an oportunity to reconcile themselues to the Emperour. The breach of the conference and of the truce, made Count BVCQVOY aduance with his Army to inuest Presbourg. Prince

Prince BETHLIN who was at Tirnaw, seeing SETSCHY fallen to the Emperour and ioyned with PALFY, and to be betwixt him and Cassouia at his back (who bragged he would take him aliue and present him to the Emperour, or at the least stop his returne into Transiluania) and Count BVCQVOY to come in Front, relying vpon the Garrison which he had put into the Castle of Presbourg, he resolued in this reuiuing of the warre to stand vpon his defence; to furnish the places he held, and to put himselfe into Cassouia, there to assemble the body of his Army, whilest the Emperors men should coole themselues at some siege. Hauing left some men in Tirnaw, and STEPHEN TVRSO with a strong garrison of Hungarians and Transiluanians in Neuheusol, he carried the Crowne of Hungary to Cassouia. 1621

In the meane time, FORGATSY Palatine of Hungary, with other Noble-men which were in Presbourg, seeing themselues inuested by Count BVCQVOY, desired to send Deputies to the Emperour; which was graunted: Who hauing obtained from his Maiesty a treaty of their reduction, by the which they were all maintained in their Dignities, Estates and Offices, with abolition; the Towne of Presbourg, was yeelded to the Emperour the second of May; into the which they put a great Garrison. The Castle only remained; in the which there were many Germanes and Hungarians, who demanded their pay and a generall pardon. There were some houres of Truce to heare their demaunds: The which being ended, and nothing graunted to the besieged, they shotte continually from the Castle; so as many of them were slaine and hurt. Presbourg yeelded to the Emp.

They defended themselues brauely for the space of ten dayes: but, on the tenth of May, seeing a new batterie planted of seuen double Cannon, they demanded a Parley; which was granted. After many contestations, they promised to yeeld the Castle, and they were suffered to depart with Armes and baggage, their matches dead, and their Enseignes folded vp, the Hungarians to be conducted to Neuhusol, and the Germanes to the Frontiers of Moravia. Count BVCQVOY hauing assured the Towne and Castle of Presbourg with new Garrisons, hee ledde the Imperiall Army (being two and twenty thousand men) towards Tirnaw: vpon the way, diuers Townes and Castles submitted themselues. The Garrison of Tirnaw, finding themselues too weake to make resistance, accepted of a composition to depart with their Armes and baggage. Tirnaw yeelded to Bucquoy.

Count BVCQVOY being aduertized, that there was dissension between the Soldiers and the inhabitants in Neuhusol; it was resolued in Councell to leade the Army thither: yet they which were of a contrary opinion, gaue them to vnderstand that the souldiers should finde no victual for themselues, nor forrage for their horses, for that the whole Countrey was ruinated, and the Townes and Villages burnt: And in truth this siege had like to haue ruined the Emperours partie in Hungary. Bucquoy before Neuhusel.

In the beginning, the Imperialists had some aduantage at their approaches: and the batteries being well planed, did somewhat annoy the besieged; They mustered their Souldiers, and to put courage into them, they gaue them three moneths pay. FORGATSI, Palatine of Hungary, was come vnto the Army before Neuheusol, who wrote vnto the besieged to yeeld; he entreated and threatned them; but all was in vaine: for they made him answere, that they were true Hungarians, which would fight euen vnto the last droppe of their blood, to preserue the honour of their Nation, and to free themselues from the yoake of the Turkes and Germanes.

Thus were they in Armes in two places of the vpper Hungary: that is, at the siege of Neuheusol, and towards Filec, whereas SETSCHY and PALFY made head against the Partizans of Prince BETHLIN GABOR, and defeated eight hundred men, which the Prince sent to Neuheusol, conducting a conuoy of Victuals, Money, and Munition; but soone after they had their reuenge. In the lower Hungary betweene the Dannow and Stirria, BVDIANI a Protestant and a Noble-man of great power, hauing made himselfe an irreconcilable Enemie vnto the house of Austria, held many places vpon the lake of Newdsiller; and the Riuers of Rabnitz and of Rechinitz, which did much annoy Vienna, by the incursions of the Budianits: to preuent the which, the Emperour sent the Earle of Colalto with eight thousand men, and some Cannon to take those places of retreate from BVDIANI, who retired towards Canisia: from whence wee shall see him returne with Turkish succours, and fire diuers parts of Austria.

During the siege of Neuheusol, the Imperialists were but ill intreated in many sallies by those that were besieged, the which had no want of any thing; for the Gate towards the Riuer of 1621 Ouiar was free; and on the other side of the riuer lay encamped tenne thousand men com to their succours: that is to say, foure thousand sent by Prince BETHLIN from Cassouia, and and six thousand which the Earle of Thurn and others (fled out of Bohemia and Austria) had brought. During the exploits of Neuhusoll, where the Palatine FORGATSY died, Prince BETHLIN held an Assembly of the States at Perein, neere to Cassouia, letting them see that he had the Crowne of Hungary in his possession: the which encouraged them to follow his party; and it was resolued, first to free Eileck, besieged by PAIFY SETSKY and others, and to hazard a battaile to raise that of Neuhusoll.

The Barons of Palfi, Setsky and Posmasi, being lodged with their troupes at Mitarlin a mountaine Towne, Prince BETHLIN entertained them with good words, touching a peace which hee desired to make with the Emperour, and in the meane time surprised them suddenly; where, after a bloudy fight, PALFY, was found slaine vpon the field, with two thousand Imperialls: SETSKY and the rest escaped; but wholly defeated. After this expedition, all the mountaine Townes returned to BETHLIN's party. This was the first vnfortunate crosse of the Imperialls; let vs now obserue the second. The siege of Neuhusoll continued: The Port of Carniola towards the riuer of Ouiar was still free for the besieged, they being alwaies relieued (when they had neede) with 10000 men which lay encamped at their gate; who, when they past the riuer, did so stoppe the passages and approached so neere vnto the Imperiall Army, as nothing could be conueighed to them without very great forces. Count BVCQVOY was therefore often constrained, for want of forage for his horse, to send out many companies both of horse and foote. The tenth of Iuly all his foote which he had sent a forraging (except two hundred musketiers) being returned with the Carts, and the horse being in number fifteene hundred, consisting of all the nations of the Army (except Walloones which they had left in Morauia for safegard of the Countrey) being yet a Cannon shotte from their quarter, fifteene hundred Caualliers Hungarians, diuided into Troupes, left their Camp and past the riuer of Ouiar, vnder the fauour of the Towne Cannon, and began to charge the Imperiall horse. Vpon this Alarme, Count BVCQVOY went to horse: and being accompained by some officers, he came to the head of his Troupes, to encourage them by his presence, to maintaine the brunt of this important skirmish, and to auoide the disgrace of any losse. Hauing obserued the order of the assailants, hee presently drew his men into diuers squadrons, and commanded the Earle of Torquaty, Lieutenant Collonell to the Earle of Valstein's Regiment (which consisted of low Dutch and the Emperours troupes) hauing the point of the vantguard, to goe by charge: which he did resolutely, and forced into the enemies squadrons being pell mell amongst them; But, the squadron, which followed, wheeled about; and discharging their Pistols, betook themselues to flight; whereupon the low Germanes were enclosed and defeated, and Count TORQVATI and all the Captaines taken prisoners: All the rest of the squadrons, appointed to second him on both sides, fled also by their example; so as the Earle of Bucquoy was left alone.

The Earle, seeing this disorder, did what hee might to stay them, riding from squadron to squadron with his sword and Pistoll in his hands, thinking to make these runnawaies to turne head againe: but, nothing could preuaile. At the same instant the Earle of Bucquoy was inuested by fifteene Hungarians which were best mounted; who charged him on all sides. He defended himselfe a long space very valiantly, vntill he had receiued a pistoll shotte through the body, and a blow with a Lance, which ouerthrew him from his horse. Hereupon, the Marquesse of Gonzagua, followed by some of his people, came in to succour him: and pressing in to the midst of these Hungarians, he slew two of them, and gaue the Earle leasure to rise, and to retire on foote some fiftie pases towards the Army. But, the Marquesse being presently forced to retire, these Hungarians ouerthrew the Earle againe with their Lances: and then discharging their Pistolls vpon him, they left this braue conductor of Armies dead, with 13 mortall wounds.

Count Bucquoy found dead with 13 wounds vpon him.

In the meane time, the said Marquesse, thinking yet to succour him once more and preserue him aliue, ioyned himselfe with Mounsieur CAMARGVES and som of the low Germane troupes formerly broken, and draue them back, pearcing through them euen to the place where the Earle was, but found him dead. Then did the Marquesse take time to alight, and layed the body on his owne horse, and brought it to the Camp, where was great mourning and lamentation. The cowardise of these horsemen which had thus abandoned their Generall (vnto whome their very enemies gaue the title of incomparable valour) was euen as much blamed, blamed as the courage of two hundred musketters which were with them, was highly extolled: for although they were in an open field, they defended themselues with such resolution, that the Hungarians were in the end forced to leaue them, they receiuing little losse. 1621

The Emperour, and all Kings, Princes and Catholike Lords, much bewailed this death of Count BVCQVOY: his body was carried to Viena; where on the twentith of Iuly, it was sumptuously interred with all militarie pomp; which was a sad and heauie day there, both for these obsequies, as for two other heauy tidings: the one of raising the siege of Neuhusall the seauenteenth of Iuly, the other the death of the Arch-duke ALBERT Duke of Brabant and Prince of Flanders, who died at Brussels, the 13 of the said moneth of Iuly. It is obserued, that in foure yeares, fiue great Princes of the house of Austria haue deceased; namely, PHILIP third king of Spaine, The Emperors eldest son, and three brothers, The Emperor MATHIAS the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN; and this yeare, The Arch-duke ALBERT. Death of the Arch-duke Albert.

After the death of the Earle of Bucquoy, The Hungarians, and Bohemians, Prince BETHLINS Partisans, were much encouraged, and the Imperialists asmuch deiected. The continuall raine also at this time, contrarie to the season, seemed to augment this sorrow, and minister occasion of the losse of the Cannon which they left behinde them at the raising of the siege of Neuhusall.

RODOLPHVS TIEPPENBAC, a Lord of Morauia, whose father had beene Generall in the warres of Hungary 1594, succeeded Count BVCQVOY, in his charge, and had beene himselfe Sergeant maior at the battaile of Prague. Through the diuisions which grew among so many nations which were in the Army; it was resolued in Councell, that the siege should bee raised, and that they should march towards Gutta vpon the Dannow three miles aboue Comora. Moreouer, vpon aduertisement that the Hungarians and Bohemians which were fled out of their countrey, being fortified with new Troupes, were resolued to pursue them in their retrait; it was resolued they should abandon 15 Cannons which they had for that siege, to the end they might march away with the more speede; being impossible for them to draw them away by reason of the abundance of raine which had fallen, and spoiled the waies.

On the 27 of Iuly the siege was raised in a tempestuous rainie night, so as the Hungarians could discouer nothing before the morning. This retrait hath beene diuersly related: and thus they write on either side. At the rising of the Camp, the Hungarians (being fortified with new Troupes) were resolued to charge the Imperialls, who had abandoned their Cannon, and to defeate the better part: but foure hundred musketieres, Walloones, defended a passage so valiantly, as the whole Army recouered Gutta without losse: from thence they went to Presbourg and to other necessarie places for the preseruation of the Emperours prouinces. GOTHARDVS saith, That the Hungarians seeing the siege raised, pursued the Imperialls with great furie, who had set Captaine MARBREIN at a passage to fauour their retreate; who after some resistance was forced and slaine with three hundred of his men and some of the Rereward. The Army came to Gutta and was very well entrenched: yet many French and Walloones fled towards Presbourg: part of the Army was sent to Comora and the rest towards Iauerin. As for the fifteene Cannons which they had abandoned at Neuhusoll, they were carried into the Towne in great triumph.

All these happie exploites in fauour of Prince BETHLIN made him to march speedily to Neuhusoll to pursue so many victories and to recouer Presbourg: but he found a stoppe at Tirnaw, where there were foure companies of Imperialls and fiue hundred horse in garrison: hauing planted his batteries, and made a breach, at three assaults he lost seauen hundred of his best men. Afterwards the batteries being continued, the besieged obseruing that they might easily bee forced, and knowing well they had small store of victualls remaining in the Towne, they demanded composition: which was graunted, and they departed with Armes and baggage. Tirnaw taken by Prince Bethlin.

From Tirnaw, Prince BETHLIN went to plant his siege before Presbourg, whither all his Partisans with their troupes came to ioyne with him: The Marquesse of Iagerndorf brought his from Morauia: the 19 of August he caused incursions to be made into Austria; whereas on either side of the riuer of Dannow, there was nothing to be seene but effusion of blood, slight of the inhabitants, spoile and fier; and of one day they might see from Vienna, on the other side of Dannow, 20 villages on fire: and on this side 14, by BVDIANY.

This BVDIANY hauing drawne together 6000 Hungarians and Turkes; seeing that COLALTE had beene countermaunded by the Emperor to put himself into Presbourg, & to de-1621 fend it, he followed him, and took from him one of the lodgings of his Rere-ward; committing so great cruelties and inhumanities, that they write he ruined aboue a thousand villages in Hungary and Austria. As for the siege of Presbourg, it was continued by BETHLIN, whom the Imperials called ATTILA King of Huns, for that there was some conformity, being both Hungarians born, commanding one Nation, like in humours and conditions, both scourges to Christendome, hauing both put all to fire and sword as they past. He presſed Presburg to yeeld; in which there was a great garrison of horse and foot: the besieged were forced to make sallies to fetch forrage for their horses; where there were diuerse encounters, with variety of succes according to the hazard of the war: but on the fifteenth of September, there entring into the Towna supply of ten Cornets of horse and two companies of foot, sent from Moravia, Prince BETHLEIN with his Partisans was forced to raise the siege, and retire vnto Tirnaw, sending to refresh their Troops in many places of high Hungary, for that they had ruined the champaine Country.

Let vs now return to Vienna, and see what good succesſe the intercession hath had which many great Princes made for the restoring of the Palatine to his hereditary rights. Ambassadors had been with his Imperiall Maiesty from the King of Denmark and the Princes of the Vnion, and receiued their seuerall answers as you haue heard, with small succesſe. Our Kings Maiesty of great Britanne, who intermitted no care nor charge to repair this breach of disunion between his Imperiall Maiesty and his sonne-in-law the Elector Palatine, and to sane his hereditary Countrey for his posterity, which now lay in danger to be ruined, being inuaded by potent enemies, vnder the Emperors Commission; he dispatched the Baron of Digbie, now Earle of Brisſowe, Vice-chamberlain to his Maiesty, in ambassage to the Emperor; who, arriuing at Vienna in the beginning of Iuly with an honourable train, was receiued with great state, and had his audience on the fifteenth of Iuly. Some Writers relate, that the two chief points of his ambassie were, first, that the Elector Palatine, son-in-law to our King's Maiesty, might be receiued into grace and fauour with his Imperiall Maiesty, and restored to all his hereditary estates and titles which he had enioyed before the troubles of Bohemia; and, secondly, that the Imperiall Proscription giuen out against him might bee reuoked, or the execution suspended. Which being performed, the King's Maiesty of great Britanne would cause the Elector Palatin to yield all due obedience to his Imperiall Maiesty, and submit himself to all honest conditions of satisfaction.

The Lord Digbie sent to the Emperor.

To this demand he receiued an answer in writing, that his Imperiall Maiesty had a great desire to gratifie the King of great Britanne, and other Kings and Princes who had made the like intercession for the Elector Palatine; but the whole businesse consisted vpon two points: first, that he should cause the Elector Palatine to yeeld due obedience vnto his Imperiall Maiesty; and, secondly, that he should make satisfaction. His Imperiall Maiesty hauing also, during these troubles, vsed the aduice and counsell of many Electors and Princes, to the end they should not think that in this important businesse he would do any thing which might preiudice them, he had appointed an Assembly at Ratisbone; that he would let the King vnderstand the resolution that should be taken touching this businesse by the common consent of the said Electors and Princes; that in this warre which had been continued with iustice by his Imperiall Maiestie, there was no proportion between the parties for the continuance of hostility; that there was a difference between his Imperiall Maiesty who was feudatorie and soueraigne Iudge, and the Elector Palatine who was condemned; that, according to the Kings request, his Imperiall Maiesty had granted a truce: but as soon as there was a suspension of Armes in the lower Palatinate, at the same Instant hee caused warre to bee reuiued in the vpper Palatinate; and persisting in his enterprises, he had sent his Commissions vnto MANSFELD and the Marquesse of Iagerndorf, to cause new combustions in Bohemia, Silesia and Moravia; that he left it to the Ambassadour to iudge whether he could doo otherwise than oppose his iust Armes against those who were raised against him: yet if FREDERICK the Elector Palatine did yeeld and consent vnto the admonitions of the King his father-in-law, all matters might well bee compounded; freeing his Imperial Maiesty and the obedient Princes of the Empire from the iealousies which they had iustly conceiued. And thus much writes the French MERCVRIE touching this Treaty.

There is another author (who hath written a discourse called, Vius Demonſtratio) relates, that vpon my Lord DIGBIES second audience, his Maiesty made answere; That touching the suspension of Armes, which was the ground of the treaty, there seemed many difficulties: first,

First, that he was not well acquainted with the state of the lower and vpper Palatinate; whether a Truce might be made without preiudice: for that he vnderstood, in the lower Palatinate, Sir HORATIO VERE had inuaded the Bishop of Spires Countries, and broken the Truce; yet, for that he would not omit any thing which might tend to a Peace; and satisfie the Kings desire, he would presently write vnto the Duke of Bauaria for his counsel and consent touching this Truce; and Letters should be deliuered vnto the Ambassadour for the Arch-ducheſſe at Bruſſells; who should haue full power to conclude a Truce, vnleſſe there were apparant cause of danger: Whereunto his Maiesty did the more willingly encline; for that he promiſed, in the kings name, that as soon as a Truce were concluded, he would cause MANSFELD to obſerue it: Or if he should commit any hostile Act against his Imperiall Maiesty, or the Princes of the sacred Empire, during the said Truce; both the King and his sonne in Law, would declare him an enemy, and assist his Imperiall Maiesty, against him: Moreouer, he would procure, that if Iagerndorf had any power and authority giuen him to offend or inuade; that it should be presently reuoked: But especially he assured, that the King his Master would so deale with his sonne in Law, as that Tabor and Pintzgaw, with all other places which were held by that party, should with all speede be restored to his Maiesty: Furthermore, that if his Imperiall Maiesty would passe his promiſe, that the execution of the foreſaid Proſcription, in the vpper Palatinate, should be suspended during this Treaty; he would faithfully endeuour, that all MANSFELDS Souldiers should be discharged, and Armes laid down; with this condition, that if the said treaty of Peace should not haue a desired end, his Imperiall Maiesty (before hee should goe to Armes for the execution of the said Proscription) should be bound to giue notice thereof, three moneths before to his Maiesty.

To this effect the Emperour wrote his Letters to the Infanta, and to the Duke of Bauaria, which Duke by his Letters, of the 27 of September, vnto the Lord Ambassadour, seemed to haue no enclination to a suspension of Armes, as appeares by these words contained in the said Letter.

His Imperiall Maiesty, in the first entrance of our Army and beginning our worke, hath giuen notice vnto vs of a motion for the suspension of Armes, and required our aduice: but to returne presently and suspend the businesse, it was neither safe, nor possible; especially for that the suspension was chiefly referred to the Infanta of Spaine; neither haue we conferred with those it doth concerne, hauing also MANSFELD with an Army at our doores, who might inuade our Prouince, and so obiect other difficulties to frustrate the said suspension. The Lord Ambassadour did much presse the Emperour and the Duke of Bauaria by his Letters for his suſpenſion of Armes; but he preuailed little: for the Emperour changed his minde, as it appeared by his Letters vnto the Duke of Bauaria, dated the thirtith of September; by the which he commanded him to inuade the Palatinate by vertue of his Commission, and to reduce it vnto his obedience, and to take an Oath of Allegeance in his name. This Author writes much concerning this businesse, and of the transferring of the Electorate to the Duke of Bauaria, long before proiected at Rome; to the end they might fortifie the Catholique party, and haue alwais an Emperor at their deuotion.

And, although they be Arcana Imperij; yet I hope I shall incurre no blame, if I lay open what I finde written by my Author. The Pope (much affecting this translation of the Electorshippe to the Duke of Bauaria) gaue Commission to a Capuchin Frier called HYACINTHVS, to goe and treate with the Emperour at Vienna: He had Letters of recommendation from Cardinall LODOVICIO the Popes fauorite; his charge was to perswade the Emperour to continue the warres, being against Heretiques, dangerous enemies to the holy mother Church of Rome, and disobedient to his Holineſſe; and that the Emperour should conferre the Electorall voice vpon the Duke of Bauaria, for that he was a Catholique Prince, and had well deſerued it for the aide and assistance he had giuen him in his warres against the Palatine; whome he entreated to dispoſſeſſe of the Electorall voice, and to punish him as his rebellion and offence had deſerued.

The Pope sends to the Emperor touching the Electorship.

The businesse being resolued at Vienna, the Frier was sent into Spaine, and Letters of credit sent after him, from the Emperour, writing to the King, and referring him to the Friers Commiſſion; but especially to Don BALTHAZAR of Zuniga (a great Counsellor of State, who died lately, being Vncle by the mothers side to the Earle of Olinares the kings fauorite) by the which he giues him to vnderstand, that he holds it most neceſſary, for the preſeruation and greatneſſe of the holy Faith, and consequently of the house of Austria, to transferre the Electorship

The Frier sent into Spaine.

1621 ship vpon the Duke of Bauaria; aduertising him withall that he was so much bound vnto the said Duke for his good deserts, and for the many promises he had made him aswell by word as writing, touching the translation of the Electorship, that he could not by any meanes retract it, without offence to God and a blemish to his honour, the which he hoped he would endeauour to preserue. This Letter bare date from Vienna the fifteenth of October 1621.

In a second Letter vnto Don BALTHAZAR of the same date, the Emperor set downe many reasons why he should not make a peace with the Elector, nor restore vnto him the Electoral dignity: in the end he concludes, that before that famous battaile at Prague, he had fully resolued, that the Palatine, being once proscribed, could not be restored to the Electorall dignity, without preiudice and danger vnto all Catholikes and to his house. That he had willigly offered it vnto the Duke of Bauaria, a stout Champion of the Catholike religion, whose aid & assistance he had employed in the recouerie of his Realmes and prouinces: wherefore the very time did seeme to presse him more then the Duke himself, that he should performe his promise without any further delay; and the Electorship being conferred vpon him, the Palatine should be depriued of all hope, and they in like manner which had so earnestly desired his restitution, and his Maiesty freed from further trouble. Which business requiring the King of Spaines aide (although he knew him to be well enclyned to any thing which concerned the honor of God and the safety of their house) yet would he not lose this occasion to perswade him, not to neglect so faire an opportunity for the settling of their house and religion. And in a Postscript to the same Letter he addes another motiue of no small consideration: which is, that by his translation they should haue a Catholike voice more then formerly they had; whereby they should be assured, that the Empire should be alwaies in the hands of the Catholikes, and by all reason in their house; wherein the Duke of Bauaria would willingly concurre, in requitall of the benefit he had receiued, to bee aduanced to so great adignity, by an Emperor of their house.

The Emperours Letter to the Pope.

The Capuchin Fryer HYACINTHVS, hauing receiued his Commission sent him into Spaine, had a Letter of aduice written with the Emperors owne hand, whereby he wished him not to speake any thing in that Court, that the Duke of Bauaria had gotten the inuestiture of the Palatinate; but should perswade them to concurre with him in his opinion, and giue those aydes whereby they might effectually attaine vnto it, being so profitable and necessarie for the preseruation of the holy faith, and consequently of their house; doubting that if he should say that his Maiesty had giuen away the inuestiture, it would much preiudice the cause; knowing well, that if he should bee abandoned by the crowne of Spaine, he should not be able with his owne forces to effect that which he had promised to the Duke of Bauaria: And he was in a manner assured (according to the daily speech of the Spanish Ambassador there resident) that this would vndoubtedly follow; that he should be abandoned by the crowne of Spaine, if the King should know he had giuen the inuestiture, before he had imparted it vnto that Crowne. The continuance of this warre, and the translation of the Electorship, was much pressed by the Popes Ministers and the Emperours.

Cardinall Lodouicius Letters to the Popes Nuntio at Brussels.

Cardinall LODOVICIO wrote his Letters vnto the Popes Nuncio resident at Brussels, wishing him to employ all his meanes and credit with the Infanta, that no suspension of Armes might be granted; adding withall, that touching the Palatines person, being iustly deprised of the Palatinate, hee might hold it for a great fauour if hee might be admitted to humble himselfe at the Emperours feete: the which if he did, yet should not his children enioy any parte of his patrimony, vnlesse they were bredde vp in the Catholike religion; being a capitall error to restore those territories to heretiques, especially in regard of the Belgique prouinces to which they ly so neere.

The Popes Nuntios Letters at Vienna to the Nuntio at Brussels.

The Popes Nuncio at Vienna, wrote his Letters to the Nuncio at Brussels; intimating that ther was no doubt of the Emperours inclination to conferre the Electorship vpon the Duke of Bauaria; but the busines depended wholly vpon the Spaniard: otherwise, it had beene before this time decided. The Spaniards oppose the Elector of Saxony against the Bauarian, making that their pretence: but the truth is, said he, they are not pleased with his greatnesse, and desire to reteine the lower Palatinate without any further warre. And for that they doubte that the Elector of Saxony, who desires to haue the constitutions of the Empire (which admit no strangers) to be religiously obserued, should oppose himselfe to their desires, they seeke by all meanes to please him, and giue him some colourable satisfaction: but, in case he should be withdrawne, and become an enemy, by their cunnning they seeke to perswade all the world, that this was not the true cause, that they haue reteined the lower Palatinate; but, for that the Electorall voice was conferred vpon the Duke of Bauaria. To free them from this excuse, the Archduke CHARLES is gone to the Duke of Saxony vpon another pretext, and we shortly expect his answere. If it be indifferent or neutrall, and not directly contrary, then it is thought (and 1621

I will doe my best endeuor) that the Emperour shall declare himselfe for the Bauarian, without any further delay; especially for that the Bulle of Ogniate hath declared that the king of Spaine would consent that the Electorship should be conferred vpon the Bauarian, if the Saxon did not oppose. But for that we feare the obstinacy of the Count of Oghate (although the Saxon should not oppose) we haue sent Father HYACINTHVS secretly into Spaine to oppose himselfe against the actions of OGNATE and the Baron of Digby the English Ambassadour, who is to go to that Court. It would much please the Spaniards, both to curbe the power of the Bauarian, and to haue the lower Palatinate at their command, in regard of the Belgick warres: As for our intentions, it is all one whether he or any other Catholique Prince hath them. And although it may be doubted, that this may breede some tumults in the Empire; yet, matters standing as they doe, there is not cause of feare: for as for the Catholiques, BAVARIA (to doe his owne businesse) will easily pacifie most of them, being Clergy men. The Caluinists are disbanded; neither can they hope for any succors from France or Holland, being in both places in daunger of their owne Estates. The Lutherans of Neuteralls haue neither force nor courage: so as I think the Spaniards haue a great opportunity to attaine to their wished end: without the which, I cannot perswade my selfe, that they will euer suffer the Bauarian to obtaine any thing; notwithstanding that Marquesse SPINOLA the last yeere at Mentz in the presence of the Cardinall of Colern did affirme that the Catholique King did not affect the inuestiture of the lower Palatinat, which the Earle of Ognate did seeke to procure him. But to conclude, it is thought the Spaniards (vpon whom all depends) will giue their consents vpon these foure conditions: First, that the Bauarian should restore the vpper Austria. Secondly, that in regard of his expences, he should haue the Electorshippe, with the vpper Palatinate; whose reuenues did exceede his charges. Thirdly, that the Spaniard should haue the lower Palatinate, and that the Bauarian should renounce all pretensions which he might haue to that State in regard of the Electorship. Fourthly, that there should be an offensiue and defensiue league made betwixt the Catholique league, his Imperiall Maiesty and the King of Spaine, against any that should oppose themselues. Thus I haue set downe the contents of seuerall Letters touching the transferring of the Electorship to the Duke of Bauaria: for confirmation whereof the Reader may obserue the euents which haue succeeded.

After the taking of Plissen, Falkenaw and Elnbogen; MANSFELD, hauing no more places of retreate in Bohemia, lodged, with his Troups, in the vpper Palatinate; where, hauing joyned with the forces of the two Dukes of Saxony and Weymar, he made an Army of eighteen thousand men, which he led into the Bishoprick of Aichstat, and the Countrey of the Lantz-graue of Luchtenbourg. The Emperour, being aduertized hereof, gaue charge to the Baron of Tilly, to stop MANSFELD's courses: Also IAMES BAVVER, of Bissenet, Generall of the Bishop of Virsbourg's Troups, being joyned with Tilly, they went to encounter MANSFELD; who was camped and entrenched at Verdhausf: From whence he made incursions vpon the Frontiers of Bohemia. TILLY and BAVVER, hauing imbattailed their Army right ouer against his, seized vpon a neighbouring Hill, and Wood; where they had many skirmishes together. Vpon the conjunction of TILLY's and BAVVER's Troups, MANSFELD, as Commissarie to the Elector Palatine in Bohemia, published a declaration against the Bishop of Virsbourg, and the Deane and Chapter of Bamberg, to this effect:

Seeing it is well knowne vnto all men, that the Troupes of the Bishoppe of Versbourg were ioyned with the Duke of Bauaria's, in the warres of Bohemia; and that they doe giue vs occasion enough (as Commissarie to the King of Bohemia) to pursue the said Bishoppe and Chapter by Armes, according to the Talion Law; I thought it better to vse grace and clemency, then force, and to send them a Trumpet to aduertize them to call back their Troups from Bohemia, and to admonish and enioyne them not to meddle with secular affaires, but containe themselues within the bounds of their Ecclesiasticall function: Which if they doe, they shall haue mee their friend; otherwise they must expect that I will bring Fire and Sword into their Countreys.

Mansfelds Letters to the Bishop of Virsbourg.

MANSFELD, hauing intelligence that the Imperialists meant to force him in his Campe, resolued to preuent them, and to charge them in their lodgings, the 14 of Iulie: He began first with Hoseldorf; where the horsemen sallied forth with a hundred and fifty Musketiers Germans, to defend the approaches: but the Mansfeldians charged them with such furie, that they slue many, and put the reſt to flight. Some of their chiefe commanders were taken priſoners in the Towne; which they ſpoiled and burnt: From thence they went to their ſecond lodging, which was at Saint CATHERINES; the entry whereof was more difficult by reaſon of ſens and ditches which they were to paſſe, the bridges being alſo broken: In this place were fiue hundred Souldiers: who, ſeeing themſelues ſo reſolutely ſet vpon, abandoned the ſame, to retire themſelues into a Wood; where twelue thouſand of MANSFELD'S Souldiers purſued them ſo ſpeedily; as, hauing no leiſure to recollect themſelues, they caſt away their Armes and fled: in which flight, there were 300 ſlaine, and many taken priſoners, with much cattell which they carried to their Camp.

TILLY and BANVER, ſeeking to repaire this diſgrace, put all their troups in battail, on the ſixteenth of Iuly, with an intent to charge him; which, MANSFELD finding, hee did the like as well as he could in thoſe mountainous places, hauing twenty Cornets of Horſe, and fifty companies of foote: This day was ſpent in skirmiſhes from eight of the clock in the morning, vntill nine at night: but MANSFELD, hauing foure field-peeces, ſhotte directly vpon the Imperialiſts; who receiued a farre greater loſſe then the Mansfeldians, and yet they came not to a generall battaile: Some write that MANSFELD loſt but 100 men, and the Imperialiſts 1000, ſix Captains, and their Generall BANVER who was ſhot in the head, being afterwards embalmed at Egra. As they conducted his body to Virsburg with a ſmall train, they were charged by the garriſon of VALDSAXEN; who tooke all his baggage and thirty three horſe. Afterwards, his body (at the requeſt of the Biſhop of Bamber) was deliuered, and ſolemnly interred at Virsbourg with a military pomp. Vpon the nineteenth of Iuly, ſome of MANSFELD'S Army tooke a conuoy which went to the Imperials; in which ther was a good quantity of pouder and other munition, with many carts loaden with wine, and ſixty horſe. On the firſt of Auguſt the two Armies ſtood in battell one againſt another, from noon till eight of the clock at night. Generall TILLY did what he might to draw the Mansfeldians to a generall combate: but there was nothing but light skirmiſhes with many cannon ſhot; in which the Imperials had the better. Some write, that a bullet of fiue and twenty pound waight fell ſo neer vnto Count MANSFELD (who was with two Princes of Weimar and the Earl of Solms) that it couered his horſe with duſt.

The Emperour, being aduertized of the warre which MANSFELD made in the vpper Palatinate, cauſed a ſecond Edict of Proſcription to be publiſhed againſt him; containing, That it was well knowne to all the World, how that his Predeceſſor the Emperour MATHIAS had Proſcribed ERNEST, baſtard of MANSFELD for his felonies and crimes; and that the ſaid MANSFELD, continuing his diſobedience, threatned to put the Countries and Princes of the Empire (which had continued faithfull in their obedience vnto his Imperial Maieſty) to Fire and Sword. That ſome Princes and States, againſt the conſtitutions of the Empire, fauoured him and gaue him paſſage through their territories; induced thereunto by the Palatine, an apparant enemy to his Imperiall Maieſty, and by him alſo Proſcribed: Which Palatine, the ſaid MANSFELD, by his laſt Mandats, did ſtill tearme King of Bohemia. That his Imperiall Maieſty had well hoped that hereafter the ſaid MANSFELD ſhould not finde any one to fauour and protect him, fearing the puniſhment inflicted by the conſtitutions of the Empire; which had not ſucceeded. That to ſhew his naturall clemency, he thought good againe to aduertiſe all the Princes, States, and members of the Empire; that vpon the Penalties contained in the ſaid conſtitutions, they ſhould not giue any paſſage through their Territories to the ſaid MANSFELD nor his ſouldiers. As for the Captaines, Officers and Souldiers, which followed the ſaid MANSFELD; that they ſhould abandon him vpon paine (for ſuch as were ſubiects to the Empire) of the loſſe of all their dignities, priuiledges and immunities: and for thoſe which were ſtrangers, vpon loſſe of life.

The Town of Nuremberg hauing ſubmitted it ſelf to the Emperors obedience (as hath been formerly ſaid) would not ſuffer any ſouldiers to be leuied, nor go out of the Town, before they had taken a new oath to the Duke of Bauaria in the name of his Imperiall Maieſty. Moreouer, the Imperiall Ban againſt MANSFELD had been proclaimed there; whereat he was wonderfully incenſed: and, to take reuenge, he went into the Territortes of the City neer vnto it with 500 horſe and 1000 muſketiers on horſeback; who, diſperſing themſelues round about it, and vpon all the approaches, committed infinite ſpoils.

The Duke of Bauaria was increated by the Biſhops of Virsbourg, Bamberg, and other States of the Empire, to free them from the oppreſſion of MANSFELD'S incurſions and ſpoyles: where-whereupon, leauing his inſtruments of muſick (which is his greateſt delight) hee gaue the Rendez-vous for all his troops, his cannon and munition, at Straubin, to march into the vpper Palatinate. 1621

MANSFELD (as we haue formerly related) being encamped with his Army in the vpper Palatinate, they were not onely much afflicted with peſtilent diſeaſes, by reaſon of the dead carcaſes both of men and cattell, but the Bauarians did alſo much annoy them with their ordinance and daily aſſaults. To repaire which loſſe he gaue money to certaine Captaines to leuie new ſouldiers, and he took 4000 men, who hiding their matches vnder their hatts, marched all night to ſurpriſe the Bauarians in their Camp: but it hapned that being neere, a French-man by chance diſcharged a peece, which made the whole Camp cry To Armes; ſo as this attempt being made voide, he reſolued to fire a wood which the Bauarians held, ſpreading great ſtore of powder on the one ſide with pitch barrels burning: but ther ſuddenly fel ſo great a ſhower of raine as it took no effect.

The Duke of Bauaria, hauing prepared all things readie to march into the vper Palatinate, he parted from Munch or Munich on the 13 of Iuly: and hauing paſt the riuer of Danuow and ioyned with TILLY his Lieutenant, he muſtered his Army; in which were ſix and twenty thouſand men. What his exploits were, and how MANSFELD left the vpper Palatinate you ſhall ſoone heare.

In the moneth of May, the ſouldiers which remained in the Palatinate for the Elector, fell vpon certaine Townes and villages belonging to the Biſhop of Spire: as Forſt, Hochdorf, Niderkich, Hamlot and others: and the twenty two of Auguſt following, Don GONZALES de Cordua, Generall for the Spaniard, put in execution an enterpriſe which hee had, vpon the Caſtle and Tower of Stein, a ſtrong place, ſituated in a mariſh ground betwixt Wormes and Germensheims; whereas fifteene Peſants which kept it were all ſlaine. This Caſtle being one of the keyes of the Palatinate on that ſide, the Army which was left for the guard of the Palatinate with fifteene hundred Boors, ranne preſently thither to recouer it if they might: but they found that the Spaniard had fortified it well with a good garriſon and munition. At their firſt approach they recouered a Rauelin: but moſt of them being forced to ſtand vp to the waſte in water, and ſo to fight with the enemie, being alſo beaten by three cannon which the Spaniard had planted on the other ſide of the Rhine, they were after three daies forced to raiſe their ſiege, hauing loſt 300 men, and 70 hurt. What number of Spaniards were ſlain is vncertain: there were many hurt in the Caſtle, which they carried away with them: and ſince, they haue ſo fortified this place, that they haue made it a receit of contribution; to the which they haue made the townes of Northeim, Wartemhem and Byblise with their territories, ſubiect. Stein ſurpriſed by the Spaniard.

The Duke of Bauaria being entred with his Army into the vpper Palatinate, hearing that MANSFELD receiued moſt of his victual and refreſhing from Amberg; meaning to depriue them of thoſe helpes and to cut off that paſſage, he ſurpriſed certaine rich monaſteries vpon the way, and went to beſiege Chamb, which he ſummoned to yeeld by his trumpet. The Gouernor made anſwere he had no commandement from them of Amberg to yeeld; whereupon he battered it with foure Cannon: whereupon the Gouernour miſtruſting his forces began to perſwade his ſouldiers, that it were better to departe with their liues then to endure the diſcommoditics of a ſiege and preuaile nothing; ſo as in the end they made their compoſition, and departed with Armes and baggage, and ioyned themſelues to MANSFELD with three companies of foote and two of horſe. Hauing taken this Towne, the Duke went on and made himſelfe maiſter of diuers others. In the meane time MANSFELD hauing intercepted a meſſenger with Letters, whereby the Duke aduertiſed the Lantzgraue of Luchtemberg that his intent was to ſend certaine troupes of Bauarians to cut off MANSFELD'S paſſage; hereupon ſending ſome forces to Sfremdi, he forced the Towne and tooke the Lantzgraue in it; whome he brought to Amberg. The Duke of Bauaria takes Chamb. The Lantzgraue of Luchtemberg taken by Mansfield.

The Noblemen and States of the vpper Palatinate, ſeeing that they receiued more loſſe and preiudice from the Mansfeldian ſouldiers, who ſhould haue defended them, then from the Bauarians; hauing receiued monitorial Letters from the Duke, that they ſhould abandon MANSFELD, who would ruine their countrey, they reſolued to leaue him and to ſubmitt themſelues vnto the Duke; with this Proniſo, that he ſhould not alter any thing in point of religion nor policie. MANSFELD knowing the reſolution with the States of the vper Palatinate had taken, and ſeeing that his paſſage would be cut off by the Bauarians, and that he ſhould finde little meanes to releeue his Army: to auoide this danger, being preſſed by a Potent aduerſary and in want want both of money to pay his ſouldiers and of other meanes to releeue them, hee made offer to ſubmit himſelfe to the Emperours obedience, promiſing to ſerue him with his Army, ſo as he might receiue a certaine ſumme of money to giue them content; whereupon, hauing receiued part, he deliuered vp his fortification at Verdhauſe (which hee could no longer keepe) to the Bauarians.

This treaty of MANDSFELD hath beene diuerſly cenſured. Some haue thought that he did it in policie, onely to entertaine time and to finde meanes to ſlip downe into the lower Palatinate. Others affirme, that he treated ſeriouſly being in great wants; That his ſouldiers preſſed him for money and were ready to mutine, which might haue beene dangerous to his perſon; and that the Lord DIOBY his Maieſties Ambaſſadour, hauing ſent to the Duke of Bauaria, and finding no hope of any ſuſpenſion of Arms, came by MANSFELD; with whom he had conference, putting him in minde of his oath to the Elector Palatine, choſen King of Bohemia, of the honour which he had formerly gotten by Arms, the which would now be quite blemiſhed by this act of infidelity; perſwading him to be conſtant, and withall ſupplying him with a good ſumme of money to giue his ſouldiers ſome content: whereupon, hee forbare to conclude the Treaty, vntill he had gotten a paſſage with his forces into the lower Palatinate. Being freed from this danger, he brake off the Treaty, and declared himſelf an enemy to the Bauarian Ambaſſadors who had ſtill followed his Camp. This newes did fruſtrate their ioy at Prague which they had conceiued for MANSFELD's reduction to the Emperor.

The Spaniards in the lower Palatinate vnder the command of GONZALES de Cordua, going out of Steim, and ſeeing that Sir HORATIO VERE had fortified Heidelberg, Manheim and Frankendale, with ſtrong garriſons, went and took moſt of the Towns towards the mountains, and then returned to Luthra a Town not well prepared to endure a ſiege, nor the citizens inured to labour and danger: wherefore, the Gouerner and his garriſon being let out at the vpper port, they receiued-in troops of Spaniards.

The truce between the Spaniard and the States of the vnited Prouinces being now ended, Marqueſſe SPINOLA came down with a powerfull Army, and lay neer vnto Weſell, ſending Count HENRY of Vandenberg to inueſt IVLIERS a Fee of the Empire, diſputed by the Marqueſſe of Brandenburg and the Duke of Nuburg, as heirs to the Duke of Cleues; but now held by the vnited States, as Cleues is by the Spaniard. There was a ſtrong garriſon in the Town; who, ſeeing themſelues beſieged, made a great ſalie on the foure and twentith of September, and tooke their neereſt Trenches in deſpite of the Spaniard. In the meane time there grew a great Fier in the Campe, many Tents were burnt, and the beſieged annoyed them much with their Cannon; and, making a new ſalie, they ſpoiled Count HENRIES quarter, carrying what they got into the Towne. The Earle following them with moſt of his houſe, the Towneſ-men loſt a Captaine with thirty ſix horſe-men; which, being ſlaine, they had leaue the next day to burie them.

In the meane time, the Spaniards in the lower Palatinate took the ſtrong Caſtle of Landſtule; which hauing fortified with a great garriſon and munition, they turned their forces to Frankendale, vnder GONZALES de Cordua's command; they being, as ſome write, twelue or thirteene thouſand men: They pitched their Campe on the twenty ſeuenth of September, towards Spire and Manheim, and fortified themſelues both againſt the beſieged, or any forraine Enemy; which done, they began to plant their Ordinance. This Towne hath been built of late yeers by Wallons, which were fled out of the low Countries for Religion, during the time of the Duke of Alua, when as the Elector Palatine protected them with their families, and gaue them leaue to build and fortifie it, being before of no import.

Vpon the approach of the Spaniſh Army, the Towne being vnder the command of the Engliſh, Captaine BVRROVVES being Gouernour; Captaine FAIRFAX, a gallant Gentleman, who was there ſlaine, and buried in the bed of honour, hauing command of the out-works of the Towne, encouraged his Souldiers, telling them that the Towne was a part of the King of England's daughters iointure; and the warres they vndertook were for two reaſons: firſt, for that being Proteſtants the Papiſts came to aſſault them, and to take the place; and, ſecondly, they were ſent to defend her right, which was the place whereon they ſtood; and that for his part he would not loſe one foot whil'ſt he breathed, neither did he doubt but they would doo the like: whereat they all proteſted they would dy in her defenſe. The enemy, hauing made his trenches and fortifications, came late in the euening being very dark, and ſurpriſed a ſentinell: who, being amazed, caſt away his Armes and fledde; and, miſtaking the out-work from which which he was ſent, ranne to the half Moon which lay vnder the Town-wals. They within the out-works, hauing no aduertiſement of the enemies approach, were for the moſt part ſlain, being ſixty Engliſh and Dutch. Captain FAIRFAX, then Sergeant maior, hearing the alarme, came to the half Moon, takes a pike, asked what Gentlemen would go with him; and beeing in haſte, went without his corſlet with his pike and ſword onely, and entred the trenches, which he found ſtrongly guarded by the enemy; where he charged and hurt diuerſe: but, the night being exceeding dark, he was thruſt through his buffe coat into the left ſide, and was caried off by one of his Followers; of which wound he was ſoon cured. 1621

The enemy plaid vpon the Town with his cannon: and on the thirtith of September the beſieged made a ſalie, ouerthrew their trenches, and had taken foure peeces of ordinance if they had been aſſiſted by any horſe: but they were forced to retire. They continued their batterie; but did not annoy the Town, ſhooting ſtill ouer it: whereof beeing aduertiſed by two boies which went out to gather grapes, they planted their cannon lower, and did much annoy their houſes; ſo as they hoped it would ſo terrifie the Townſmen, that they would ſoon yeeld. The enemy, hauing taken the out-work, approached neer to the half Moon where the Engliſh lay; whither Captain FAIRFAX came, being ſomewhat recouered: where incouraging the ſouldiers, and offering to make a muſket ſhot into the enemies work, he had his thigh broken with a demi-cannon; wherewith falling down, he cried, Gentlemen, I haue loſt my leg: yet bee not diſmaid, but fight like braue Engliſhmen; for, my heart ſhall be alwaies with you. Whereupon, he was caried away; and died that night, and was buried with an honourable funeral pomp, to the great grief of the ſouldiers and the Burgers of the Town: who, to ſhew their loue, erected a monument in remembrance of ſo worthy a ſouldier.

The enemy (ſeeing he could preuail nothing by force nor by his cannon) vpon the ninth of Nouember began to ſhoot fiery bullets into the Town: but the Beſieged with their wiues and children vſed ſuch diligence to quench the fire, that it proued fruitleſſe. The ſame night they made an aſſault vpon the Port of Spire: but it took no effect, beeing repulſed by the Beſieged. The next day there fell a great rain, which was very preiudiciall to the Spaniard: for, their trenches being made in a moiſt ground, and growne dry for want of water, their fortifications fell, and their trenches were full of water. In the mean time, Count MANSFELD came out of the vpper Palatinate with his forces and ten peeces of ordinance, towards Nuremberg; where hearing that the Spaniards had beſieged Frankendale, hee marched on ſpeedily with his forces to relieue it. C. Mansfeld reſolues to relieue Frankendale.

On the thirteenth of October the Spaniard ſent a Trumpet to the Town to require them to yeeld in the Emperors name, with promiſe that the Burgeſſes ſhould enioy their liberties with free exerciſe of religion; and that the ſouldiers ſhould depart with their colours flieing, their Arms and all their baggage: but they had an anſwer ſent them from Captain BORROVVES the Gouerner, that the Towne was not his, but had charge from Generall VERE to keep it, and that they muſt bring his conſent from Manheim; that he could not truſt their promiſes, hauing ſeen the contrary by the example of others. The Trumpet hauing receiued this anſwer, with many threats he returned to the enemy, who renewed his battery againſt the Town. The ſame night the Beſieged heard a great noiſe of horſes in the wood, nothing ſuſpecting the Spaniards riſing, who had ſo lately ſummoned them to yield: but they being aduertiſed that Count MANSFELD and Generall VERE made haſte to raiſe the ſiege, departed ſuddenly, leauing many ſick and wounded, with much Arms and munition behind them. At the break of day the Engliſh which guarded the out-works went into their Camp, where they found ſome Italians; whom they ſpared for that they were not Spaniards. The Spaniards being gon towards Worms, the Beſieged threw down their fortifications and trenches. The Citizens were very reſolute to defend the Town, ſparing neither coſt nor labour. Of the Spaniards there were ſlain 3000, by the report of ſome priſoners. The Beſieged loſt 109 ſouldiers: among which were Captain FAIRFAX and his brother, and the brother of the Gouerner BVRROVVES. Frankendale reſcued.

During this ſiege of Frankendale, Don GONZALES drew out ſome of his forces to break off the Bridge at Manheim. Sir HORATIO VERE the Generall (who was neuer daunted at the fight of any enemy) commanded his men to come into the out-work before the bridge, and there to be quiet till the enemies approach: who coming on with a great reſolution, they gaue them ſuch a volley of ſhot, that they were forced to retire with the loſſe of many; yet beeing not daunted heerwith, they came to a ſecond aſſault, where they were entertained in the like manner, and with as great loſſe: ſo as, deſpairing of any ſucceſſe, they retired, caſting moſt of their 1621 their slain men into the riuer of Rhine. Count MANDSFELD, being ignorant of the raising of the siege at Frankendale, marched ouer the bridge at Manheim with 108 companies of foot, 56 of horse, and foure peeces, to relieue the Besieged; with whom ioined Generall VERE, MERVIVS Gouerner of Heidelberg, OBERNTRAVD, and others with their forces. The Citizens of Frankendale gaue to MANDSFELD 12000 florens for raising of their siege, to the end he might giue some content to his souldiers. He followed the Spaniards towards Steim: but finding them well fortified, and not able to attempt any thing without danger, he dismissed Generall VERE and the other Commanders; marching himself with his army into the Bishoprick of Spire, to get what he could.

Tilly sent into the lower Palatinate.

The Duke of Bauaria, seeing himself circumuented by Count MANSFELD (hauing taken an oath from them of Amberg, Newmark, and others) sent 47 Troops of horse and 85 companies of foot, vnder the command of Generall TILLY, to follow him into the lower Palatinate: whereof some Dutchmen ran away; others fell to robbing and spoiling without respect of friend or foe. At his first coming into the Palatinate, hee took many places towards the Mountain: and, drawing neer to Heidelberg, he sent Letters vnto them; signifying, that he had commission from his Imperiall Maiesty and the Duke of Bauaria, to reduce the lower Palatinate to the Emperors obedience; to the which end he had brought an Army: but before he would proceed to force, he would admonish and require them not to oppose themselues in so iust a cause, whereby they should draw ruine vpon themselues and the whole Prouince; that hee expected a kinde answer from them, hoping that they would willingly submit themselues to the Emperors command; whereby hee promised them all safety and good vsage, and that they should receiue no wrong from the souldiers, but should be defended like to the subiects of the vpper Palatinate: but if they should do otherwise, and not obey the Emperors commandment, he would ioin his forces with Don CORDVA, Lieutenant Generall of the Spaniards, and subdue them by force.

The Citizens of Heidelberg made answer to these Letters, that they were much grieued to receiue them by night by a Trumpet; that it was not in their power, neither could they by their oath resigne a gouernment to another which was committed vnto them by the Magistrate: wherefore they did hope, that he would excuse them if they did not satisfie his desire; that they would speedily aduertise their Magistrate thereof, and expect his answer: in the meane time they did hope, that he would not attempt any thing by force. This answer, being giuen by the Counsellers of Heidelberg, was not pleasing to the Gouerners; who, staying it, sent another to TILLY after this maner: that they had receiued his Letters which were sent by night contrary to the discipline of war, and seen with admiration what he desired from the Counsellers of Heidelberg; that the gouernment was committed to them, but referred to them by Generall VERE their Commander; that they could not gratifie him, nor dispose of any thing in so difficult a businesse without his consent, especially for that the whole Electorship was committed to Generall VERE, and the City of Heidelberg to their guard: the which they resolued to defend to their last gasp; that if he or any other desired to try their valor, they could not hinder it: but he might come and see whether there were lesse worth in the souldiers, than in the garrison of Frankendale.

The Elector of Saxony comes to Presław to receiue an oath of the Silesians.

The Elector of Saxony, coming to Presław to receiue the oath of alleageance in the Emperors name from the Princes and States in Silesia, was receiued with great pomp, and brought into the City the 22 of October by the Princes of Lignitz and Munsterberg. The next day, the Princes and States being assembled in the Castle, he caused the Emperors proposition to bee read vnto them; whereby he let them vnderstand, that his Maiesty was glad the Princes and States of Silesia had so willingly come to that prouincial assembly; neither could any thing haue bin more pleasing to him than to haue been present there himself: but being diuerted by many affairs of importance, he had committed that businesse to the Elector of Saxony to represent his person; the which, for his obedience towards his Maiesty, and his loue to the Princes and States of Silesia, he would not refuse. He wished them as much happinesse as they had inioyed in the time of his Predecessors: and seeing the Prouinces were now settled in peace by the grace of God and his great care, he hoped they would continue constant, and giue him aid to repell his barbarous enemies: to which end he desired a speedy contribution of 500000 dollers, for that many other poorer Prouinces, and which had been much exhausted, had dealt bountifully; that they knew how much it concerned them to haue the bounds of Hungary preserued. To the which end both their Ancestors and the States of Bohemia had spent much: and now the danger was was very great: for defense whereof, the Emperor required 100000 dollers yeerly for 6 yeers. As for the tribute or excise of beer for the maintenance of the Court, hee desired they would 1621 continue it as they formerly had done, his treasure being exhausted by reason of ciuill warres. And for the remouing of all occasions of war in that Prouince, he aduised them not to entertain any more souldiers than were fit to defend their Frontiers, and to send the rest against the Turk with a yeerly contribution. The next day the Elector coming to the Castle, the Princes, States and Citizens, took a new oath to the Emperor.

The Marquesse dissuading from the oath.

During this Assembly, the Marquesse of Iagerndorf sent two Trumpets vnto them, with Letters to perswade them not to take an oath to the Emperor, but to continue cõstant in the league and faith which they had once sworn to FREDERICK their King, and not to hasten the ruine of their Country by an vnnecessary defection: they could not be ignorant how grieuous it would be to them who knew his good disposition, hauing defended Silesia from hostile inuasions. And being bound to satisfie God and the league they had sworne, hee perswaded them to send their Deputies to BETHLIN GABOR, and to himself as Commissary to the King of Bohemia, within 14 daies with a declaration of their intents. But if any thing hapned to the contrary, he should be very much grieued for the ruine of the Country, but the cause should be imputed to them who had been the motiues of these combustions by their ambition and couetize.

Resolution of the States of Silesia.

Notwithstanding these threatning Letters, the Princes and States of Silesia made answer to the Emperors proposition, that they were ready to pay 400000 Imperials or dollers at certain daies; that they would contribute 70000 dollers yeerly during the space of six yeeres for the defense of the Frontiers of Hungary: for the excise of beer they were content to supply his Maiesty for ten yeers, and for their auxiliarie forces according to the present estate of the Countrey. This answer being pleasing to the Elector Palatine, a generall peace was proclaimed in Silesia.

Brunswick goes into the Palatinate.

CHRISTIAN, Duke of Brunswick, and Bishop of Halberstad, cosin-germane to the Queen of Bohemia, hauing a desire to relieue the Palatinate, gathered what forces he could together in the Lowe-countries, and on the 18 of October departed from Emericq with his Army. Hauing sent 2600 foot and 300 horse before into the territories of Minden, Hildesheim and Brunswick, they committed great spoils: and being commanded from the Bishop of Halberstat's brother, the Duke of Luneburg, and the Administrator of Magdeburg, to remoue their Camp, they would not obey; so as they were suddenly set vpon by the souldiers of the Country, and most of them slain, losing their Arms and Ensignes. The Duke was not daunted for this misfortune, but continued his resolution to go into the Palatinat with thirteen companies of foot and fiue hundred horse.

MAVRICE, Lantzgraue of Hesse, at this time inuaded the iurisdiction of the Earles of Waldec, for that they had demanded their fees from the Emperor, and not from him; as also for the antient contentions for the City of Corbac. Hee took the Castle of Esingbourg, draue away the Gouerner, and manned it with a good garrison, leauing all to the spoile of the souldiers; who eare in peeces all their Registres, Letters, Seals and Documents which did concern Mentz, Cullen, Patterborn and Hesse, which had been kept there for many yeers in an originall form. From thence he went to other Castles, Cities and Towns, making them subiect to him. Hee called together the Knights and other States of Corbac; letting them vnderstand, that the Earls of Waldec had lost their fee by their owne fault: wherefore they should not assist them against the iurisdictions of Corbac and Hesse, but ioin with his Officers. The Earles in the meane time fledde to some places of safety; one of them posting to the Emperor to acquaint him with the whole businesse.

In the Palatinate, TILLY with his Bauarian Army made hauock in the mountaine-Countries, spoiling all places; so as the Inhabitants were forced to flee away for extreame want and penury. MANDSFELD committed no lesse spoile on this side of the riuer of Rhine in the Bishoppe of Spire's Countrey, causing the Towne of Brugsel to redeeme it selfe for a great summe of money. TILLY and CORDOVA with their ioynt forces might easily haue releeued it: but there was some distast between them; so as he had good meanes to escape them: and on the thirteenth of Nouember, passing the bridge at Manheim, he besieged Didesheim, and took it, finding in it a great booty; committing the guard thereof vnto the Duke of Lauenbourg of Saxony: after which he tooke the Towne and Castle of Kerchweil; where the Captaine and garrison followed his colours. Afterwards he seised vpon Lawterbourg, which was very rich, because those which inhabited the Countrey had brought their wealth into it; all which hee 1621 gaue to the ſouldiers for ſpoil. Planting his Camp there, he cauſed 6000 foot and 16 companies of horſe to be leuied.

The Spaniards and the Bauarians on the 21 of Nouember, being 18000 men, marched towards Lauenbourg to recouer that Town: to relieue which, MANSFELD poſted thither with foure peeces of ordinance; but ſeeing the Spaniards lodged vpon aduantage, he retired: after which the Town yeelded. After Count MANSFELD's departure out of the vpper Palatinat, though the garriſon of Tabor could hope for no relief, yet they refuſed to yeeld vnto Don BALTHAZAR; proteſting, that they would defend it to the laſt gaſp. Hauing planted his cannon, he fought by all means to make a breach. The thirteenth of October, the Beſieged endured an aſſault the ſpace of three houres: they repulſt the Imperials with great loſſe, there being three Captains and many ſouldiers ſlain, and 200 ſore wounded. They had reſolued to defend it till S. MARTIN's day, and to expect ſuccours if happely any might come; as appeared by their Letters intercepted to Count MANSFELD. The day aforeſaid being comn, and no ſuccours appearing, the garriſon being in great want both of wood and ſalt, and the Gouerner a little before dead, they did capitulate, and left the Town on the 18 of Nouember, going out with their colours flieing. Arms and baggage: which the Imperials mand with a ſtrong garriſon, the Citizens redeeming themſelues from ſpoil for a ſumme of money: but yet they were not ſuffred to go out of the Town. The Noble-men of Bohemia which had fled thither, and continued there during the ſiege, were apprehended and put in priſon.

hriſtian the nger, Prince Anhalt, ye- ncelled to the mperor.

CHRISTIAN the yonger, Prince of Anhalt, who had been hitherto kept priſoner at Newſtad, after many interceſſions was brought to Vienna the 26 of Nouember with a conuoy of fifty horſe. He was lodged in an Inne, and had free liberty to walk vp and down the City. The 12 of December he was admitted to the Emperors preſence, and humbly craued pardon for his offenſe; the which he obtained after ſome repetition made by the Vice-chancellor.

Some months before, CHRISTIAN the elder, Prince of Anhalt, ſued to the Emperor for pardon, writing Letters to this ſenſe:

hriſtian the der, Prince of nhalt, craues rdon of the mperor.

The mercy which his Maieſty had ſhewed to offenders againſt him in this Bohemian warre, had made him (plunged in great miſeries) to flee to his Imperiall Maieſty, hoping that the gate of grace ſhould not be ſhut againſt him; eſpecially for that he had this more peculiar than the reſt, hauing been neither the author nor beginner of theſe combuſtions, but was lately drawn into them: neither was he abſolutely ſubiect to his Maieſty as a great number of others, but mediatly as a Prince of the Empire; neither was he at that time tied to him by oath; that he could truly affirm, he came not to thoſe warres with any bad intent to his Maieſty, being his ſupreme Magiſtrate: but the care and loue to religion which the Bohemians ſo much complaind would be oppreſſed, and the faith which he had vowed for many yeers to the Elector Palatine, had ingaged him in theſe miſeries; neither had he euer any wil to oppoſe himſelf againſt CÆSAR, but onely to preuent the falling of thoſe countries into any ſtrangers hands, and to ſee the combuſtions paciſied by ſome honeſt Treaty: to which end he had vſed many graue admonitions. But, all hope of compoſition being taken away, he could do no leſſe than became the Generall of an Army; preuenting as much as in him lay all vnneceſſary deuaſtations and ſpoils, and preferring the recouery of peace and publike ſafety before the diſcommodities of war. In the end finding that God had not onely giuen CÆSAR victory, but made it knowne to the world that he would not haue religion alwaies defended by the ſword, he had ſpeedily laid down Armes, and perſwaded the Palatine to make his compoſition, although in ſhew he had great means to rettie the war. Hee would not deny, but the loue of the reformed religion and of the Elector Palatine had drawne him into this error: yet it was true, no man liued without fault and neuer erred; God onely was free from ſinne, it was not giuen to men. It was common for all men to erre: if he in like manner had failed, he humbly beſought his Imperial Maieſty to couer his error with the cloke of his mercy and clemency, and to pardon all his offenſes, to receiue him and his again into fauour, and reſtore his captiue ſonne to liberty and his former dignity; which ſhould be an honour to his Maieſty, and binde him for ſo great a fauour to doo him perpetuall ſeruice.

The 21 of Nouemb. the Spaniards (who lay claim to any thing lying fit for them) attempted the ſtrong Caſtle of Reinfeld in the Earldom of Catzenelnbogen; which was out of the Palatinate, nor depended thereon, meaning to ſurpriſe it by night, ſending certain companies of men with a guide who knew all the paſſages, & brought them by night to their fortifications on the other ſide of the Caſtle: which hauing ſurpriſed, and diſcharged ſome peeces, they required them in the the Emperors and the King of Spain's name to yeeld: the Garriſon, being moued at this ſudden ſurpriſe and importunate demand, fell to Armes, and ſo plyed the Spaniard with ſhot and wilde fire, as they forced them to abandon the place which they had taken, and to retyre. The Spaniard ſought to excuſe the fact, vpon a pretence of the Duke of Brunſwicks comming, deſiring only to hold this Caſtle for a time, to the end they might ſtop his paſſage through Haſſia. 1621

Brunſwick ſpoiles the Biſh. Mentz country

CHRISTIAN, Duke of Brunſwick, Biſhop of Halberſtad, paſſed on the eighteenth of Nouember through Haſſia, into the Elector of Mentz Countrie; where he tooke Anenbourg by a ſtratagem. Whilſt that the Captaine treated with ſome Officers for the lodging of his Troups, certaine ſouldiers going before with a guide, who knew the place, crept vp a Hill, and got into the Caſtle by an old Priuie which was ruined: Being in poſſeſſion thereof and giuing a ſigne to ſome horſe-men which were neer, they left their horſes and went vp with their peeces. The Towne-men, hereupon, went to the walles to defend themſelues; but BRVNSVVICK's forces, ſalying out of the Caſtle, took the Towne; whereupon they fled, leauing a great booty vnto the Enemy. After which they took Newſtad, with all that tract, with ſome Townes belonging to the Lantz-graue of Darmſtat, and other Noble-mens Caſtles in the valley of Buſec, ſpoyling the Countrie thereabout.

Darmſtat ſent to Brunſwick

In the meane time LEVVES of Haſſia, Lantz-graue of Darmeſtat, ſent his Deputies to the Duke of Brunſwick; ſignifying, that whereas he and the Elector of Mentz, had receiued great ſpoiles by the paſſage of Souldiers; his Imperiall Maieſty had expreſly forbidden, that no ſouldier ſhould be ſuffered to paſſe, vpon the penalties preſcribed by the Imperiall conſtitutions; perſwading him to forbeare to appoint them any lodgings, and that he ſhould returne the ſame way he came.

His anſwere.

The Duke of Brunſwick made anſwere, that he would willingly (as much as in him lay) forbeare his Countrie; yet he was aduertiſed that he took Armes to oppreſſe his Souldiers: which he could not beleeue, hauing not deſerued it; but if hereafter any wrong ſhould be done vnto them, he would reuenge it by what meanes ſoeuer.

Ledowick of Haſſia denies paſſage to Brunſwick.

Hereunto the Lantz-graue made anſwere, that he was glad he would neither doe wrong to him nor his; yet he vnderſtood, by faithfull relation, that his ſouldiers had entred into diuers places of his iuriſdiction, ſlaine his ſubiects, and ſpoiled them of their goods: which fact hee alſo vnderſtood he had deteſted, and therefore hee entreated him to ſeeke out the Authors, and puniſh them for examples ſake. Touching his reſolution and end, he would ſpeake nothing. As for his paſſage, ſo it was, that the Generall of the Burgundian Army, in the Palatinate, hearing that the Baron Dona was marching vp with ſome troups againſt the Emperour, had entreated him and other Princes to be carefull that no Army, oppoſite to the Emperour, ſhould paſſe by the Riuers of Main and Rhine; whereby it may be eaſily gathered, that he makes himſelfe a partaker of the warres which ſhould giue paſſage to ſtrange Souldiers, and therefore he did aduiſe DONA, that he ſhould not moleſt him in his paſſage; the which he eaſily obtained. The like cauſe he had now for this admonition, neither did he hope that he would willingly offer any violence to his Countrey: And whereas he had with the neighbour Electors and Princes, leuied ſome Souldiers to preuent the imminent dangers which might enſue; he hoped hee ſhould be blamed no more then the Saxon Princes, who had denied paſſage to many. That the Spaniards and Bauarians, prepared themſelues to meete him and ſtop his paſſage with all their forces, whereby his Countries might receiue much ſpoile; the which he might eaſily preuent, if he would retire and leaue thoſe vpper parts of the Rhyne: Wherefore he entreated him that he would take the ſafeſt and moſt excuſable way, and deſiſt from his enterpriſe; That before he vnderſtood of his expedition, he had entred into treaty with the neighbor Electors and Princes, not to giue paſſage to any Souldiers; wherefore he ſhould not take this his declaration in ill part; wiſhing well to him and his whole family.

That he meddled not with the affaires of the Palatinate, but ſought only to ſtop the paſſage of Souldiers, which would be a preiudice to his Countrey. That he might turne his forces againſt the Enemy of Chriſtendome, where he ſhould reape more honour; for in theſe places he ſhould but afflict his friends and innocent ſubiects. He entreated him therefore to change his minde and to returne into the Lowe-countreys, and to free his territories from danger, not doubting but he would giue more eare to his fatherly admonition (which honour hee had once vouchſafed him) then to the perſwaſions of others which were not ſo well affected vnto him.

The young Duke of Brunſwick expected another anſwere: but being moued therewith he wrote vnto him like a ſouldier; that whereas he vnderſtood (beyond his expectation) that hee with his ſubiects and other ſouldiers intended to ſtop his paſſage, he feared them not, nor the Spaniſh forces; but reſolued to proceed in his reſolution by the grace of God, notwithſtanding any oppoſition: wherefore he ſhould reſt reſolued, that if he or his ſouldiers ſhould receiue any wrong, both he and his poſterity ſhould repent it.

The Lantzgraue of Darmſtats Letter to the Lantzgraue Heſſe.

Before the receipt of theſe Letters, the Lantzgraue had written vnto MAVRICE, Lantzgraue of Heſſe, informing him how that he had aduiſed the Duke of Brunſwick to abandon thoſe vpper parts of the Rhine, and not to moleſt his ſubiects; which he ſeemed not to regard: it beeing therefore to be feared, that if he ſhould continue in his reſolution, and try the doubtfull euent of warre, the ſeat of the warre would be drawne into Heſsia, and their Countries afflicted with all diſcommodities, he could not but intreat him to deal with the Duke of Brunſwick, and to perſwade him to depart; the which if he would effect, hee would doo his beſt endeauour to ſtay the Emperors Troops, being ready to march into thoſe parts againſt him: it being alſo neceſſary in theſe dangerous times that ſome agreement ſhould be made between neighbor Princes, how paſſage ſhould be allowed or denied, it agreeing both with the law of nature and of nations; and therefore he did hope, and likewiſe intreated him, if he ſhould be any way preſſed by the Biſhop of Halberſtat, or in danger, that he for their old contracts would come to ſuccour him, as he would do for him in the like caſe.

His anſwer.

The Lantzgraue MAVRICE made anſwer to theſe Letters, that whereas he intreated him to cauſe the Biſhop of Halberſtat to retire with his Army, thinking it to be in his power, hee did not doubt, but he vnderſtood well by his former Letters, that thoſe Troops were not onely leuied in the King of Bohemia's name, but by the States of the vnited Prouinces, and ſent to thoſe parts: wherefore to ſet vpon thoſe ſouldiers, and thereby to offend ſuch potent Princes, was not ſafe; that he was aduertiſed, the Biſhop was paſſing to another Territory; that he was vnacquainted with his counſels, neither had he aduertiſed him of his courſe; that it was not in his power to preſcribe or command any thing to the Biſhop of Halberſtat in this action; that both they and all Heſsia were bound by the duty of their fee vnto the Palatine, of which fee the ſaid Lantzgraue LODOVVICK was in poſſeſſion: wherefore, as he deſired not to meddle in the affairs of Bohemia againſt the Emperor, ſo he could not forget the oath he had taken to the Palatine. And whereas he required his aid againſt any force which ſhould be offred him, according to the antient contracts of neighbourhood and conſanguinity, the like he expected from him to whom his innocency was well knowne; aſſuring himſelf, that if by the league of the Catholick Princes againſt the Proteſtants he ſhould be inuaded, he would not fail to aſſiſt him according to the ſaid Treaties: yet he could not forget, that of late hee had been wronged by the Spaniards, who had attempted to ſurpriſe the Caſtle of Reinfelt, and ſummoned them to yeeld in the Emperor and King of Spain's name; from the which they were forced to retire; for which attempt they had no colour, hauing neuer been wronged by him. He therefore intreated him to imploy his credit with the Spaniſh ſouldiers touching this buſineſſe, for that delaies were dangerous; and that they would appoint a meeting for their Deputies.

Many Letters paſt betwixt them touching this action of the Duke of Brunſwick; the which I muſt for breuities ſake omit. In the mean time, the Duke of Brunſwick, hearing that the Baron of Anhalt approached with forces to ſtop his paſſage into the Palatinate, and to driue him out of thoſe parts; being fortified with ſome troops from the Biſhops of Mentz, Virsburg, and the Lantzgraue of Darmſtat, and hearing that ANHALT approacht neer the vallie of Buſec, hee attended him there in open field (the weather being exceeding cold, about the end of December) meaning to fight with him: but, finding his forces too weak, he retired, ſpoiled Anebourg, and burnt Newſtad, and then marcht with his Troops towards Weſtphalia, as you ſhall hear.

The Miniſters and Preachers of Bohemia baniſhed.

The Preachers and Miniſters of Gods word in Prague being taxed, that during the Bohemian combuſtions they had exceeded the bounds of modeſty, and incenſed the people by their admonitions & preachings, and ſo made themſelues partakers in theſe broils, were now baniſht the Kingdome of Bohemia, by an Edict made by the Prince of Lichtenſtein, as followeth.

For that the Miniſters and Preachers of Bohemia had been the firſt ſowers of ſedition in the Kingdom, and publiſht ſcandalous books both againſt the Emp. MATHIAS then liuing, and ſince againſt FERD. now Emperor, as alſo againſt his Lieutenants, Officers and Counſellers, and drawn the people into actuall rebellion, and approued the election of a new King, laboring by al perſwaſions to haue him crowned: for theſe & other cauſes ſpecifi'd at large, it was ordaind, thoſe ſeditious men (as they ſaid) chiefly thoſe who made the edict an. 1618, or approued the Co-

Coronation ſhould be baniſhed for euer out of Bohemia, the incorporated Prouinces, and all the iuriſdictions of the houſe of Auſtria, hauing deſerued a far greater puniſhment; whereby they were commanded to depart out of Prague the day after the proclamation made, and within 8 daies out of the Kingdome of Bohemia, the incorporated Prouinces, and all the iuriſdictions of the houſe of Auſtria, and neuer to return during their liues: yet they did them this fauour, To ſuffer them to carry away their moueables; and, if they had any lands, they were ſuffred to ſell them by their Deputies within three moneths. This clauſe was annexed, that If after the time prefixed any one was found in Prague or any place aboue-mentioned, and conuicted of theſe crimes, he ſhould without all exception loſe his head. The like puniſhment was inflicted vpon all thoſe who ſhould entertain them, lodge them, or conceal them after the time prefixed. This Edict being proclaimed, there were fifty Miniſters of the Huſſits (whereof ſome were exceeding old) forced to abandon their Country. 1621

Mansfeld take. Haguenaw.

Count MANSFELD, hearing that Don GONZALES de Cordua (after the recouerie of Didſheim) had put his Troops into garriſon, marcht with his Army towards Haguenaw; where he forced from the Catholique Inhabitants and Iews a contribution of aboue 100000 dollers: the which they were willing to pay, hoping to auoid any further oppreſſion. But returning in 14 daies with greater forces, he got entrance into the Town, the Citizens being vnable to endure a ſiege; the which he fortified with a good garriſon. Hauing got this Town without any loſſe of men, and thinking that others in Alſatia would follow their example, he ſent a Trumpet to Elſaszabern, ſummoning them to yeeld: which they denying, hee drew great ſtore of munition from Haguenaw, and marcht thither with his Army; which he battered with ſuch fury, that hee thought they would haue yeelded the firſt day: but, finding the Gouerner reſolute to defend it, he continued his battery 12 daies; hauing made a breach, but not fit for an aſſault. The Beſieged defended themſelues reſolutely, and ſlue 300 of his men who had entred the ſuburbs, and in a ſalie took ſome priſoners, carrying ſom into the town, hanging others ouer the wals.

Mansfeld beſieged Elſas Zabern.

The weather growing ſo exceeding cold that they were not able to endure it, hauing loſt many braue men, there was a truce made for ten daies at the interceſſion of the Duke of Lorraine; but with this condition, that they ſhould chuſe whether they would pay him 100000 PHILIP's dollers, or endure the extreamity of a ſiege. The beſieged accepted of this condition: but hauing in the mean time receiued a ſupply of 2000 ſhot, they ſent an anſwer vnto Count MANDSFELD (who was gon to Haguenaw) that they had bought powder and bullets with their mony, and that he might return if he deſired to ſmell of them. After which, they burned their ſuburbs, ſent their wiues and children into Lorrain, mured vp all their Ports but one, and prepared themſelues for a ſiege.

Count MANSFELD, ſeeing the Town thus fortified, and that the continuance of a ſiege in ſo vnſeaſonable and ſharp a time of winter would be the ruine of his Army, lodged ſome of his Troops in thoſe parts, and paſt with the reſt into the further Alſatia and the hereditary Countries of the houſe of Auſtria: where he put all to fire and ſword, and where he ſtruck ſuch terror into the Inhabitants, that they thought of nothing but flight, leauing much cattell in their ſtals and ſtables: whereof ſome died for hunger, and others were carried away by the ſouldiers; which bred a great dearth of victuall through all the Country. Colonell OBERNTRVDA on the other ſide being in Briſgo, made an incurſion to Briſac and Enſisheim; where he ſpoiled the Country, and put all the garriſons to the ſword.

A Proſcription againſt Count Mansfeld.

Mean while, the Emperor ſent out another proſcription againſt Count MANDSFELD to this ſenſe: that whereas ERNEST of Mandsfelt had ſome yeers before been proſcribed by the Emperor MATHIAS his Predeceſſor, for that he had preſumed to take Arms, and been a chief actor in the Bohemian rebellion, hoping he would haue acknowledged his fault, and yielded him due obedience as the ſupreme head of the Empire, to which dignity he had been aduanced by the ioint conſent of all the Electors: yet it was knowne to all men how that MANSFELD had perſiſted ſtill in his reſolution, vſed all means to entertain the rebellion, giuing all aid and aſſiſtance to the head thereof who was alſo a baniſhed man, and after that memorable victory of Prague had not forborn to leuie new ſouldiers, and to annoy thoſe who were faithful to him and the States of the Empire, eſpecially vpon the Rhine, with murders, ſpoils, burnings and grieuous exactions; whereby it was eaſie to be coniectured, that he would neuer ceaſe (although he had nothing of his owne) to trouble the Empire during his life. Wherefore to preſerue his authority, to maintain peace in the Empire, and to free his faithfull States from this his tyranny, hee did admoniſh all Electors, Princes, and Common-wealths, to obſerue him carefully, and whereſoeuer they ſhould take him to keepe him ſafely, and not deliuer him at any mans interceſſion without his commande. He alſo commauded them not to lodge him, feede him or releeue him, and to call preſently back their vaſſailes and ſubiects which ſerued vnder him, by publike proclamation, vpon paine of the loſſe of all their goods, priuiledges and dignities and the baniſhment of their wiues and children.

treaty of ace betweene e Emperor & thlin Gabor

BETHLIN GABOR, in the meane time, hauing miſerably ſpoiled Morauia, there being nothing left to relieue his ſouldiers, hee retired into Hungary, where there was a treaty of peace propounded betweene the Emperors Deputies, BETHLIN'S, and the Hungarians at Nicholasbourg, vpon theſe Articles following. That the Emperour ſhould graunt a generall pardon to all the Hungarians. That BETHLIN ſhould forbeare to vſe the title of King. That he ſhould reſtore the Crowne of Hungary to the Emperour, reſtore the frontier forts, yeeld vp the kingdome, and attempt nothing againſt the Emperor nor the houſe of Auſtria. On the other ſide, he ſhould haue from the Emperour the title of a Prince of the Empire with ſeauen iuriſdictions and the towne of Caſſouia during his life: he ſhould alſo hould the Principalities of Oppell and Radiborne in Sileſia; with the forts of Moncats, Toccay, Sagmary and Eſchet for a certaine ſumme of money, and 50 thouſand florens yearely for the entertainement of his ſouldiers; but vpon condition they ſhould aſwell be bound by oath to the Emperour as to BETHLIN. That the Crowne of Hungary ſhould be left in the Caſtle of Trinchin vntill the aſſembly of States. To the which, the compoſition for grieuances and the admitting of Germanes vnto publike offices ſhould be referr'd. That matters concerning Religion ſhould remaine in the ſame eſtate, they were in, when the Emperour came vnto the Crowne. That the Ieſuites ſhould be againe receiued, but ſhould enioy no lands &c.

he Marqueſſe Iagerndorfs rmy diſper- d by the Im- rialiſts.

The Marqueſſe of Iagerndorf, being abſent from his Camp during this winter ſeaſon, the States of Sileſia began to treate with his ſouldiers, perſwading them to diſſolue their Camp and be gon for a certaine ſumme of money; but they requiring too great a ſumme perſiſted in their reſolution. In the meane time there was ſo great a want of victuals among the Imperialiſts in Sileſia, as they ſhould be enforced to abandon their lodging or endure all extremities: whereupon the commanders reſolued rather to dy valiantly then to retire ſhamefully; ſo as on the ſixteenth of Ianuary they marched away in an extreame colde night, with 30 companies of horſe and foote, and fower Cannon (beſides ſix companies vnder Collonell BODEARVS) and came early in the morning to Wageſtadt where hauing ſeized vpon all the approaches, they ſummoned the Towne to yeeld: but the Gouernour making anſwer, the Towne was giuen him to defend & not to yeeld, they beganne to batter it, the beſieged anſwering them in the like maner. During which, they had newes that two miles off, there lay certaine of the Marqueſſe his ſouldiers: whom they ſuddenly ſurpriſed, diſarmed, and bound them by oath, that for ſix moneths they ſhould not carrie Armes againſt the Emperour, the Elector of Saxony, the Prince of Bauaria, nor the States of Sileſia, and ſo diſmiſſed them. The next day the garriſon of Wageſtad yeelded and took the like oath. After this they marched towards Odera, whereas there lay ſeauen of the Marqueſſe his troupes: but before their comming to the place, they had newes by a trumpet, that if they might obtaine the ſame conditions they would depart. The report hereof being brought to the Earle of Ortenbourg who lay at Tetſchin with ſix companies of horſe and foot, abandoning the place he departed. Other Captaines and ſouldiers followed this example, ſo as in fiue daies 40 companies of horſe and foote were diſarmed, and all thoſe places except the Caſtle of Glats reduced vnder the Emperours obedience.

e Emperor s vaſſed to Duke of nauares ſiſter.

There had beene a marriage treated of betweene the Emperour and ELIANOR the Duke of Mantuas Siſter, by IOHN VLRICK Baron of Egenberg. When as they had agreed vpon the conditions and dowry, the Duke of Mantua conducted her with 300 Noblemen and Gentlemen & a great band of ſouldiers from the monaſterie of Saint VRSVLA to the Cathedral Church: where ſhee receiuing the keys of the City from the Biſhop, as the Emperours future wife, and the ceremonies being ended, on the 26 of Ianuary ſhee beganne her iourney with a great traine, and paſſing through the Venetian territories came to Oenipont; whither alſo the Emperor came with a great Troupe of Princes, Earles, Barons, and Noblemen: where finding his ſpouſe the fourth of February, the marriage was afterwards ſolemnly celebrated with great Pompe.

he King of emia's Let- s to the Pro- ant Princes.

The King of Bohemia, remaining in the Low Countries, had reſolued to returne into the Palatinate, and to attempt if he might by force recouer his inheritance & free his poore afflicted ſubiects from the cruelty of his inſulting enemies. But before he vndertook his iourney, he wrote wrote Letters vnto the Electours, to the Princes, and to the Proteſtant States, after this manner. 1622

Hee did not doubt (ſaid hee) but they all remembred what practices had beene for many yeeres againſt the Proteſtant Electours, Princes and States, and how faithfully his houſe had alwaies oppoſed it ſelfe, and euer endeuoured to maintaine the liberty of Religion in all aſſemblies of the Empire; his Father, Grandfather and great Grand-father, hauing nothing but the glory of God, and the publique good, before their eyes; as did well appeare by the Acts of the Empire. That he had followed their commendable example; and, as ſoone as he came to the Electorſhippe, had directed all his counſels and actions to the ſame end; without reſpect of perſons or priuate profit: Whereby he grew into great hatred of the aduerſe party, and ſo continued; vntill at laſt, the troubles falling out in Bohemia, and the alteration of that Crowne, the States deſiring and preſſing it, he had accepted of that Kingdome; being conferred vpon him with all their conſents, comming into a voide poſſeſſion, not with any deſire to raigne; but moued with a friendly care to releeue ſo many Chriſtians, and to free the Empire from greater dangers; and the rather, for that he was giuen to vnderſtand from many Proteſtant States, that theſe perſecutions in Bohemia were for the common cauſe of Religion. And although there had been many things publiſhed in Print, whereby he had beene taxed that he had not onely engaged the Turke in theſe troubles of Bohemia; but alſo ſought to expoſe the Romane Empire, in prey, vnto him; yet he hoped no man ſhould euer proue, nor would giue credit vnto thoſe ſcandales. And ſo refuting thoſe ſurmiſes, he ſaid he would not then make any Apologie of his innocency, but deferre it vnto another time; only he would make knowne vnto the World, that as he neuer was aſhamed of his actions; ſo after the taking of the Crowne of Bohemia, he had alwaies offered to ſubmit himſelfe to juſtice and right, and to yeeld due obedience vnto the Emperour: yea, the Electors and Princes of the Empire, with other forraigne Kings, for the ſettling of a good Peace in the Empire, had vndertaken that he ſhould accept of, and doe any thing which he might with his dignity and Conſcience; ſo as thoſe places (which had been taken and ſpoiled in his Electorall Countrey) might be faithfully reſtored vnto him. That it was neuer heard of, yea it was contrary to Law, and all the conſtitutions of the Empire, that without any citation or knowledge of the fact, any man ſhould be proſcribed, and the iudgement begin by the Execution, inuading his Countries, and oppreſſing his miſerable ſubiects with hoſtile fury; hauing neuer imparted it to the Electors, and other States of the Empire, who haue receiued much prejudice thereby. Seeing then the proceeding hath not been lawfull; neither can the execution be juſt, nor reſtitution of the charges be demanded. Touching this execution; the capitulations were made with ſome few, who were partakers and aduancers of theſe combuſtions for their owne priuate profit; when farre lighter buſineſſes were referred to Diets and Aſſemblies of the Electors: Neither ſhould they make ſuch haſte to the execution, whereby the neighbor and innocent States might receiue great loſſe, and many poore innocent creatures be ruined and ſlaine.

They to whom this execution was committed, might well haue excuſed themſelues; neyther did he doubt but they would haue done ſo, if they had not regarded their owne profit and aduancement, contrary to the treaty which they themſelues had made; in the which the Palatinate was comprehended. To diuert all theſe miſeries, and to preſerue the Empire from ruine; many Kings and Princes had interpoſed their Authoritie, but haue not preuailed any thing; ſo as vpon the treaty propounded by the Lord DIGBY although that the Emperor had yeelded to a ſuſpenſion of Armes in the vpper and lower Palatinate, and MANDSFELD withdrawne his Army out of the confines of Bohemia; yet did the Duke of Bauaria inuade and take the vpper Palatinate, as may well appeare by the Lord DIGBIES Letters of complaint to the Emperor. At the ſame time CORDOVA, Lieutenant generall of the Spaniſh Army (neglecting the Truce) tooke many places in the lower Palatinate, beſieged Frankendall (his wiues Dowrie in caſe ſhe ſuruiued him) and ſought to force it.

To excuſe theſe attempts, nothing could be obiected againſt him; but that in theſe grieuous perſecutions, he thought himſelfe bound in Conſcience to haue a care of his afflicted Subiects, and had ſought ſome helpe for them from other Princes, his Allies; the which being allowable by all diuine and humane lawes, could not be denied vnto him; if there had been any exceſſe committed by his men (whereof he was ignorant) they ſhould haue admoniſhed him, and known if it had been done with his will and command. They ſought a pretext, for that before theſe times, he had giuen Commiſſion to the Marqueſſe of Iagerndorfe, and the Count 1622 MANSSFELD, to doe all things during his abſence, in Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, which they ſhould thinke fit for his ſeruice; but no man that is impartiall will miſconſtrue thereof.

It is conformable to reaſon and equity, that a man ſhould hold that which he thinkes is his owne, if he ſee that taken from him in another place, which is his without any controuerſie; vntill that hauing recouered it, all ſuits might be ended by ſome honeſt agreement. The vanity of thoſe things which were objected againſt him might very well appeare, for that they which labored to perſecute him, vnder a colour of ſettling Peace in the Empire, did ſo waſte and ſpoile it in many places by warre, as it would hardly be able to recouer ſtrength to make head againſt forraine Enemies; The affaires of Bohemia ſtanding vpon thoſe tearmes, as there was no neceſſity to trouble the Peace of all Germany, it being only for a priuate pretention of the houſe of Auſtria, and might well haue been determined in Bohemia: Touching thoſe things which concerne the Empire, they might haue beene compounded in a publique Aſſembly of all the Electors and States with full knowledge of the cauſe. This hath not been done, but priuate treaties and leagues made and confirmed with hoſtile violence, and the fire of Bohemia diſperſed ouer the nobleſt Prouinces of the Empire; which were expoſed to the ruines and deuaſtations of Spaniſh Souldiers.

The Warre being continued (to the end there might be ſome colour of juſtice) there followed a declaration of Proſcription againſt him. He did not finde, that ſince the making of the golden Bull, and the wholeſome conſtitutions, as fundamentall lawes of the Empire, euer the like violent courſe was taken againſt the meaneſt State of the Empire; much leſſe againſt an Elector, who had alwaies ſubmitted himſelfe, and doth ſtill, vnto reaſon and equity. And it was worthy obſeruation, that neglecting all the Emperours promiſes, not to queſtion any State of the Empire, which had not beene an actor in the combuſtions of Bohemia; yet many Princes, Earls, and Noble-men, had been much oppreſſed and wronged, not ſparing Widowes and Electorall Pupils; among others, they diſpoſſeſſed his brother of his inheritance, and lately forced his Towne of Luthra, who had neuer meddled with the affaires of Bohemia, but had beene declared innocent by the Emperour himſelfe, notwithſtanding the treaties of Vimes and Mentz, and the conſent of SPINOLA himſelfe, at the laying downe of Armes: whereby it appeares plainely that they ſeeke to draw the firſt Electorall voice from the Proteſtants, and to transferre it vpon a Romane Catholique.

That the D. of Bauaria had planted the Maſſe in diuers places of the vpper Palatinat; nor was ther doubt but hereafter they would plant Popery by force, according to the reſolution of the Councell of Trent. That there was no liberty for the Proteſtant Religion, there being no reſpect of the Imperiall conſtitutions; eſpecially for that there was no regard had of the Emperours promiſes by forraine ſouldiers, who hated the liberty of the Germanes, and alwaies pretended ſome colour of warre. And matters were brought to that paſſe, that it was no more in the Emperours power to make a Peace or Truce without the conſent of his confederats, as might appeare by his treaty with the Lord DIGBY; all which he left to their conſideration: For his part he thought it moſt neceſſary, that to preuent the ruine of the Empire, the Proteſtant States ſhould ioyne their forces, and oppoſe them againſt this eminent daunger. He entreated them that they would not only conſult carefully of this buſineſſe, but impart it to others, and eſpecially to the Electors of Saxony; to the end they may oppoſe themſelues to the pernicious practices of the aduerſe party; and ſo deale, that he being reſtored, that cruell warre might be ended, and a deſired Peace ſettled: But if all meanes of compoſition and reconciliation were denied him, and the gates of juſtice and grace ſhut againſt him; he intreated them to aſſiſt him with their counſell and ayde; and likewiſe, that they would endeuour to diuert the daunger from themſelues, and to preſerue the liberty of Religion; which had beene gotten with ſo much labor and coſt.

King of Bohemia's ſecond ouer to the Proteſtants.

He wrote another Letter vnto them, whereby he did intimate that the Duke of Bauaria had ſent a great part of his forces into the lower Palatinate; that his Generall TILLY had ſummoned Heidelberg, the chiefe ſeate of the Electorſhippe, to yeeld; that he had ioyned his forces with the Spaniſh Army, and had drawne ſo neere vnto the City, as they expected newes daily of the ſiege; That by the copies of Letters, ſent by the Emperor to the Lord DIGBY, and the Infanta of Spain, it plainly appeared what the intentios of the aduerſe party were; and vnder what pretext they ſought to peruert all. That he had receiued many Letters ſigned by the Emperours owne hand; the which he ſent vnto them, that they might ſee with admiration, what ſtrange Counſels

Councells were treated of in the Empire, for the reall tranſlation of his Electorſhip vpon the Duke of Bauaria. Yet he did hope, that God, who had ſo miraculouſly diſcouered it, would not ſuffer them to bring it to effect. In the meane time hee entreated them to conſider of the common cauſe, giue away to his former admonitions, and aſſiſt him in his neceſſarie defence. 1622

Brunſwick inuades the dioceſe of Paderborn.

The young Duke of Brunſwick, being fallen out of Heſſia, and theſe vpper partes of Germany, into Weſtphalia, he took in a manner all the Townes of the Dioceſe of Paterborne with the Citie it ſelfe; He ſuffered the ſouldiers to ſpoile the Iewes which dwelt there, and exacted a great ſumme of money from the Clergie, and found great treaſure in the Cathedrall Church, beſides the patron of the Church called Saint Liborius which was made of pure gould. To ſtay his courſes, the Elector of Cullen ſent for part of the Bauarian forces out of the Palatinate and Veteravia, vnder the commande of the Baron of Anhalt: who paſſing through the County of Naſſau and Dillenbourg marched towards the Elector of Cullen; whoſe forces hearing of Anhalts approach, paſſed the Rhine, on the 21 of February, and ioyned with him, with 3000 foote and 600 horſe.

Iuliers yeelded to the Spaniard.

Hauing formerly made mention the laſt yeare of the ſiege of Iuliers (it being a fee belonging to the Empire though held by the vnited States) I hould it fitt to ſpeake ſomething of the yeelding of it. It hauing beene long blockt vp by Count HENRY VANDENBERG and the Spaniſh Army, and diſtreſſed for want of victuals, he ſummoned them to yeeld, threatning them that if they forced him to vſe extremity he would not ſpare any. PYTHANIVS the Gouernour anſwered, that he was but a ſeruant and could not yeeld without the reſolution of the vnited States, but they conſenting he would vſe no delay. After this anſwere they fell to their Cannon on both ſides: and being againe preſſed to yeeld, he ſaid, they ſhould expect it at Eaſter; yet he began to treate with the Spaniards on the 17 of Ianuary, ſending three Captaines out of the Towne to that end. Hauing conferred with them, the Earle acquainted SPINOLA therewith, and in the end theſe conditions were concluded. 1. That there ſhould be no alteration in religion. 2. That the Captaines and ſouldiers ſhould depart with their Armes, colours flying, drums beating, and their wiues, children and goods. 3. That the Ordinance and munition ſhould remaine in the City. 4. That the Gunners, Armorers, Smiths, Carpenters, and others might depart with their ſouldiers. 5. That the Gouernour and Captaine ſhould haue horſe and waggons to carry their goods to Nemigen. 6. That the ſicke and wounded might ſtay in the Towne vntill they were recouered, and then haue waggons to carry them to Nymegen. 7. That the Captaines and ſouldiers ſhould haue a whole yeares liberty to ſell their lands if they had any. 8. That the ſouldiers which were in any other Townes or Caſtles ſhould haue leaue to come thither and bring their wiues and children. 9. That all Armes and commodities belonging to the Towne and Caſtle ſhould bee left behinde. 10. That recordes and antient writings in the Towne and Caſtle ſhould remaine there ſtill. 11. That the ſouldiers ſhould not be arreſted for debt. 12. That the bedds which the ſouldiers had brought into the Towne ſhould be reſtored to their owners, and they bound to receiue them. 13. That the Elector of Brandenburghs officers and miniſterrs ſhould execute their offices for the ſpace of one whole yeare. 14. That the Citizens might depart the City and diſpoſe of their goods within one yeare. 15. That there ſhould be two hoſtages giuen on either ſide vntill the Articles were performed: all which being ſigned and ſealed by the Gouernour, he ſhould ſend one to the Prince of Orenge, and bee bound to yeeld the place if they were not releeued within 12 daies, with at the leaſt 300 waggons: which timebeing expired and no releefe comming from the Prince, the Earle of Vandenberg ſent 600 waggons to carrie away their baggage, wiſhing the Gouernour to haſten his departure: who, ſending the keys of the Caſtle vnto the Earle, departed with all his ſouldiers and goods, leauing two within the City vntill the waggons were returned. PYTHANIVS the Gouernor comming to the Hague, he was committed and called in queſtion for deliuering vp the Towne.

The Emperour enters Vienna with his Empreſſe.

The Emperour hauing conſummated his marriage with the Duke of Mantuas ſiſter at Oenipont (as we formerly related) he returned to Vienna with his new Empreſſe. Comming to the Towne, all the ordinance was ſhot off, and a guard ſet on either ſide from the Port vnto the Caſtle. Firſt, there entred ſix troupes of horſe, with many Towns-men: then followed the Emperours ſeruants and young Noble-men with the Emperours horſes, his officers, Senators and Counſellors in great numbers. Before the Emperour went fiue Heralds. LOBESTEIN Lord Marſhall carried the ſword, and with him went LEOPOLD ERNES-

TVS

1622 TVS, his Maiesties eldest son. The Sindiques and Senators carried the Canopy. The Empresse was in a rich Chariot, accompanied by CHARLES WILLIAM the Emperours youngest son, and two of his daughters; being enuironed by seuenty foure Noblemens children and many souldiers: after which, followed DETRISTEIN with some troupes of horse.

The Funerall of the Arch-duke Albert.

As this action was ioyfull at Viena, so was the funerall of the Arch-duke ALBERT of Austria, mournfull at Brussels: the which was performed with so great pompe, as those of the Emperour CHARLES the Fift were not comparable, as some write; whereof I must make some little mention. Omitting the ordinary ceremonies, I will onely make relation of those things which were extraordinary. Before the Herse there were 32 horses couered with black, hauing euery one a Gentleman going before them, carrying the Armes of so many prouinces. Euery horse had two Gentlemen to leade them, with diuerse Heralds. After which the Archiducall Diademe, his scepter, the goulden fleece, with two swords (whereof the one with a cup of great price was giuen him by Pope CLEMENT the Eighth) were carried by Noblemen. Betwixt these, and the body went a triumphant Chariot of Liberality, in remembrance of his great bounty, for that after the death of the Emperour MATHIAS he had freely giuen to the Emperour FERDINAND eleuen Kingdomes: namely, Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Sclauonia, Bosnia, Seruia, Halista, Lodomicio, Cumania, and Bulgaria, with the Arch-duchy of Austria, the Duchie of Silesia, the Marquesates of Morauia, Lusatia, and Burgau, the Earledomes of Habsburg, Tiroll and Ferret, the Principalitie of Sweuia, the Marquisate of Alsatia, with other territories which descended vnto him by hereditarie right. In this Chariot sate Liberty (a beawtifull Nyph) and before her an altar whereon were diuers Scepters and Crownes with this inscription, His spretis obijt. About this Chariot were the Armes of 27 Kingdomes and prouinces, which in his life time he had so bountifully bestowed vpon the Emperor FERDINAND. This tiumphant Chariot was drawne by six horses, representing six vertues; namely, Nobility, Mildnesse, Wisdome, Loue, Reason and Prouidence; whereon sate six boyes, representing Nymphs. After the body followed the Popes Nuntio, the Spanish Ambassadour, Marqueses, Earles, and Knights of the Goulden fleece, with the rest of the traine, as is vsuall in such funerall pomps.

ploits in sphalia.

The Duke of Brunswick, hauing taken many Townes in Westphalia (as was said) ERVYS (a Commander of the Elector of Cullens forces) came by night with a thousand horse and some companies of foote, on the 8 of March, to Gifee: which he took, with some other Townes, by the secret practices of the Inhabitants; where they slew 900 of Brunswicks souldiers, and took some few prisoners. The Duke (to reuenge this losse and disgrace) hearing that 8 troupes of horse and foure companies of foot, lay not far from Susat, he presently posted from Lippa thither, with his Horse. The commanders of the Cullen forces, seeing his furious approach, abandoned their foot and baggage, and fled. The foot retired into a Church-yard: whereof 200 were slaine, and 748 with their officers taken prisoners. There were also 36 horsemen taken and foure ensignes; which were sent vnto the Elector Palatine. After which, the Duke recouered some places which they had taken, and punished some which had beene authors of the Treason.

ttengaw in hemia yeelded the Emperor.

The Towne of Wittengau in Bohemia held yet against the Emperor: the garrison being without all hope of succours, pressed with hunger, and seeing all the passages stopped, they entred into treaty, and compounded to yeeld vp the Towne and Castle, and to depart with bagge & baggage whither they pleased. But the Garrison of Clingenberg, although they saw all passages stopt, would by no means consent to yeeld.

Emperors bassadour ck to his ieſty.

About the end of March, the Earle of Swartsenbourg, Ambassador for his Imperial Maiesty, arriued in England: where he was honourably receiued, lodged in Denmark house, and defrayed with his whole traine at his Maiesties charge, during his abode in London. He had his Audience in the vpper house of Parliment: where, after the ordinary complements, he made an expression of the Emperors loue and zeale in particular to his Maiesty; That hee desired to enter into conditions of an euerlasting peace, and to hould an indissoluble contract of perfect friendship with him; That it had pleased his Maiesty to giue him assurance of his sincere loue & affection by many stately Embassies endeauoring still to settle the peace of Christendome; And, whereas some ill affected had sought to trouble the quiet state of Europe with combustions, none but his Maiesty had endeauord to reconcile them, and like a rising sun to dispel those cloudy vapours of dissension, to the great honor of his royal name for so worthy a work: intreating his Maiesty, in the Emperours name, to continue still in the same course; that the Princes of Europe

Europe might not onely enioy peace by his meanes, but that he himself might haue the fruition of his desire, and immortall fame. 1622

And, to let him vnderstand how highly his Imperiall Maiesty did esteeme of his loue and affection, and his endeuour to gratifie him, as farre as honourable correspondence might extend; he had sent him, as his Ambassadour, to acquaint his Maiesty with his gracious intent, and to assure him that he did affect the common good of Christendom, and especially the welfare of his Maiesties house. Although there had been some cause of discontent; yet it was part of his care, that the decayed peace (which had beene interrupted by some turbulent spirits) might be restored; acknowledging, that those violent courses had beene distastfull vnto his Maiesty; who out of his regall piety had alwaies endeauored to preuent those mischiefes, as well for the generall good of Christendome, as for the settling of a peace in Germany, which had beene dismembred by dissension. And whereas his Imperiall Maiesty had taken Armes for his owne defence and the maintaining of his honor and dignity; so he said he would be as easily entreated to lay them down againe, and desist from all hostility, if others without any iust cause did not shew themselues refractarie: to the which, he was the more tractable, for that his Maiesty could so nobly act his part in defending the dignity of kings, and the prerogatiue of monarchs. His conclusion was, that his Imperiall Maiesty had a worthy intent to treate sincerely, really and without fraude, with him about those affaires, that all might bee firmly ratified and performed, whereunto the king of Spaine was also willing; and that they were both ready to harken to his Imperial Maiesties propositions, when his Maiesty should think fit to treate about the same: neither did they doubt, but that the work being generally good, charitable and perfitable for all the Prouinces of Europe, it would haue a happie succesſe; there being nothing intended but truth, sincerity, and the hope of an indissoluble friendship.

Sir Richard Weston sent to Brussels.

His Maiesty was well pleased with this proposition, and willingly embraced the offer of a Treaty appointed at Brussels: whereupon, after an honourable dismission of the said Ambassadour, his Maiesty made choice of Sir RICHARD WESTON, Chancellor of his Exchequer and Counsellor of State, to be employed in this Action: whome he sent presently after him, to treate of a peace for the Elector, and restitution to his hereditarie lands and dignities; and during the treaty to procure a cessation of Armes. And to the end all obstacles might be taken away, his Maiesty soone after sent the Lord CHICHESTER, Baron of Belface, into the Palatinate, to acquainte his sonne in law the Elector with this treaty, that he might conforme himself accordingly; whereby no exception might be taken: but there followed no such fruite of this treaty, as all good men did wish. For, there was neither any suspension of Armes, nor any peace concluded; but after six moneths treaty, his Maiesties Ambassadour returned home without any satisfaction, as the world did coniecture.

The Duke of Virtemberg refuses to send his Souldiers to the Bauarian.

In this moneth the Duke of Bauaria sent an Ambassador to the Duke of Virtemberg, requiring him, to send him those souldiers which he had leuied (hauing no neede of them) to be employed against Count MANSFELD. To whom the Duke answered, that he had no quarrell against the Palatinate, in the defence whereof MANDSFIELD was to be employed; and, besides, it was contrary to the treaty of Vlme, by the which it was decreed that nothing should be attempted against the Palatinate. Moreouer, the souldiers being leuied by the States for the defence of the countrey, they could not be drawne away to any other place, without their consents. Count MANDSFELD, hauing spoiled Wansenau, and fortified Haguenaw with two Bullwarks, 20 Companies of foote and 4 troupes of horse, he returned with his Army into the Bishoprick of Spire; where he demanded a great quantity of corne, wine, and money from the Clergy: but, preuailing nothing, hee caused the Castle of Meidebourg (into the which the inhabitants of the Countrey had carried great store of goods) to bee besieged by the Earle of Locuenstein: the which was yeelded the fourth of Aprill.

Count Mandsfeld takes the Castle of Meidebourg.

After this, TILLY cut downe all the trees about Ladebourg, and ouerthrew the walles and ditches, and ruined Saint MARTINS Church without the Towne: and that he might haue the better meanes to besiege Heidelberg, he took one Towne after another: and on the fift day of Aprill (as GOTHARDVS writes) falling vpon 20 troupes of Count MANDSFELD's horse and three thousand foote at Wingare, he ouerthrew them, took a hundred and fiftie waggons with fiue hundred horses, and a great prey; the rest sauing themselues by flight.

Tilly makes his way to Heidelberg.

To prepare his way (as I saie) to Heidelberg, on the fourth day of Aprill he laide siege to the Towne of Necargemond being a mile from the same: and for that the garrison resolued to 1622

to yeeld vpon the first summons; the next day he forced them, and put them all to the Sword, with most of the inhabitants, their Wiues, and Children; as he had done some daies before at Oberndilsbae. The same day he sent to Dilsberg to summon the Castle in the Emperours name: the Gouernour refusing to yeeld, TILLY marched thither on the 6 of Aprill, with all his forces, and battered it the next day for the space of fiue houres; but the Gouernor of the Castle (whose name was BARTHOLOMEVV SMID, borne at Sedan) defended it so valiantly, as hauing endured foure fierce assaults, they were forced to retire with great losse, leauing great store of Armes and Ladders behinde them. After this a Truce was made for the burying of their dead, and retyring of their wounded; TILLY sending a messenger to Heidelberg, with a promise that he had no intent to annoy their Towne, but only to force that Castle: whereupon they returned to Armes, on the tenth of Aprill; where, continuing his battery from ten of the clock in the morning till six at night, he had made some breaches in the walles, the which the Garrison did resolutely defend; and the enemy ceasing to giue any further assault, they were summoned againe to yeeld: which the Garrison refused, requiring three daies respite to consult; which being granted, they sent a Messenger to Manheim & Heidelberg for ayde; who returned on the 14 of Aprill with these comfortable newes: That they should not onely haue ayde, but that the Electour Palatine himselfe was comming into those parts. Being againe pressed by Generall TILLY to yeelde; the Gouernor answered that he was yet ready to defend it 3 dayes longer, and then he would come to a treaty. In the meane time, they being aduertised in the Camp that succors were comming, and that the Elector Palatine was arriued in his country; the Bauarian retired speedily, burned his Camp, and left much Munition, Corne, Wine and Meale behinde him.

Dilsberg besieged in vain by the Bauarians.

The Elector Palatine king of Bohemia, having resolued to see his Countrey, and Subjects, which were ruined by the enemy; having no safe passage if hee should be discouered, being to goe through the enemies countrey: hee tooke a generous resolution, rather to hazard his life then to abandon his afflicted subjects; wherefore in March hee departed from the Hague, imbarked himselfe and arrived at Callis with a small company, hee being disguised and attendant to one of them. He passed through part of France, went by Sedan and Lorrane: at Bitsi he (comming into an Inne) fell amongst some of the Archduke LEOPOLD'S souldiers; where, being at the table, he heard them raile freely at the Palatine, the which hee swallowed up quietly. He past from thence in the night, and never discouered himselfe untill hee came to Landaw, to GEORGE LEVVES Earle of Loneſtein, who presently gaue notice thereof to the Earle of MANDSFELD, who lay then at Germersheim, and was in treaty with an Ambassador sent from Brussels from the Infanta; who propounded many faire conditions vnto him, as GOTHARDVS writes; namely that he should hold the Towne and Province of Haguenaw in fee for him and his heires; That hee should be a Prince of the Empire: that hee should enjoy the lands of the Prince of Orange, during the confiscation; and, if a peace were made, then he should haue the like yeerely pension; or, if it might bee redeemed from the Prince, hee should enjoy it for ever in fee: that hee should receiue a great sum of money for the entertainement of his souldiers: that hee should bee Marshall to the Infanta, with a pension of 1200 crownes a month, and should bee subject to no mans command but Marquesse SPINOLA'S. But receiuing newes of the King of Bohemia's arrivall, hee brake off the treatie with the Ambassador, who prepared to depart: but Count MANSFELD would not suffer him. The King of Bohemia arriving soone after, inuited him to dinner; and could him, that, He laboured in vaine in seeking to withdraw a faithfull seruant from him: that hee had need of his help: that hee was come to assist & defend his poore subjects, miserably afflicted; and, if hee had any further charge hee might freely deliver it.

The King of Bohemia goes vp to the Palatinat offers made to Mansfeld by the Infanta of Spaine.

The Infanta's Ambassadour being dismissed, the King of Bohemia and Count MANSFELD, with the whole Army, spoyling the Bishop of Spires Countrey, past the Rhyne, with an intent to charge the Bavarians, who were lodged neer to Wisbloch in a little wood, having fortified themselues upon an eminent place of good advantage, where they had planted six peeces of Ordinance, but did not much annoy the Kings Army, which went and lodged neere unto Mingleſheim which was not above halfe a mile from the enemies Camp. On the seuententh of Aprill Count MANSFELD marshalled his Army, and marched against the Enemy; but they, having advantage by reason of the countrey's situation, after a hot skirmish, valiantly maintained on both sides, the Mansfeldians were forced to retyre, with the losse of some few men. TILLY grew proud with this successe, perswading himselfe upon this retreat, that he had already gotten the victovictory: whereupon hee removed his Campe to pursue them, crying out, in great bravery; March on, they are all ours. The weather was exceeding foule; yet TILLY used such diligence, as hee planted two peeces of Ordinance, which shot into the Kings Army, but did not much annoy it, for that hee could not well discouer it. The Generall MANSFELD drew his Army out of Mingleſheim, and put it in order of Battaile behind the Village. TILLY, finding that the Kings forces had left the Village, imagined that they were fled for feare; the which he beleeued the more confidently, for that Count MANSFELD had caused the Village to bee set on fire, onely to blinde the enemies sight, and to cover his army with the smoake vntill it were put in battail. TILLY presently seised on the Village, and drew all his forces over at a narrow Bridge to pursue the King of Bohemia's Army: which he imagined to be fled, for that hee could not well discouer it. 1622

The King's Army being in battaile, he, and his Generall MANSFELD encouraged the Souldiers to shew some testimonies of their valour, whereof the King himselfe would be a witnesse, resolving to fight in person: whereupon the Vantguard marched on and charged valiantly; yet seeming a little to retyre, the enemy pursued them, and were so entertayned by Count MANSFELD'S forces, as they were forced to retyre in confusion, hoping to saue themselues by flight; but the passage of the bridge was so narrow, as within lesse then halfe an hower they were quite overthrowne, and above 2000 men slaine vpon the place; where the Enemy lost many Cornets and Enfignes, with foure peeces of Ordinance, and many prisoners taken. After this ouerthrowe, the Bauarians which were left in Garrison in Wisbloch, Snitzen, Hilſpach, and some other places, abandoned them and fledde; of which there were 150 slayne by the Marquesse of Baden's Souldiers, and three hundred taken prisoners.

On the 26 of Aprill, Generall MANSFELD went to beseige Ladebourg; which, hauing battered with 7 peeces of Ordinance, he summoned to yeeld by his Trumpet: The Gouernour, whose name was EINET, gaue him thanks that he thought him worthy to be visited by such an Army; yet he did not hold it fit to giue vp the Towne so easily: That he was tyed by oath to the King of Spain, that he should defend it to the vttermost of his power. MANSFELD, hauing receiued his answere, renewed his battery, sending for 4 peeces more from Manheim, wherwith after 3 daies battery he made a reasonable breach. He then sent again to the Gouernor, giuing him to vnderstand that vnles he yielded, he wold not spare the children in the mothers wombs: whereunto he answered, that he had no womb, yet he would not refuse an honest treaty, so as the Cannon might cease, that he might take counsell with the soldiers; promising to yeeld it if he were not relieued within 4 daies, vpon the same conditions that were granted to the Earle of Isenbourg at Dideſheim, or else that he should send Commissioners to treate, and he would do the like: the which was performed accordingly. In the meane time the Gouernor encouraged the soldies to haue a care of their guard, and that the townsmen with their wiues and children shold carry wood, stone & other prouisions to mend the breaches. During the treaty MANSFELD'S soldiers preſt the garrison to come vnto them, if they would saue their liues; wherfore seeing 7 Regiments ready to giue an assault, the soldiers neglecting their captains cõmand, for the most part went to them. BREDENBACH, who was sent from the Gouernour, returning from MANSFELD, told him they would treat with him in person; who, going out of the Port, and receiuing the cõditions, told them he wold acquaint the captains therwith, but in the meane time seeing MANSFELD'S soldiers make a violent assault at the breach, he protested against it, desiring they would stay a little till he were retired into the town. WALDMANSHVS, who was Cõmissioner for MANSFELD, did his best to stay this furious assault, but in vain: for being entred in troups, they slue all that bare Armes against them: the spoile was great; hauing taken 8 Enfigns, store of Arms, and 10000 Ricks dollers from the Spanish Cõmissary, and then ruined the town. CHRISTIAN D. of Brunſwick & Bishop of Halberſtad, greatly annoyed the Bishopricks of Patterborne & Munſter, his forces encreasing daily: from the citizens of Munſter (where he burnt S. MAVRICES Church, and other places without the town) he exacted 100000 Ricks-dollers: At Susat he had 100000 dollers, besides a great quantity of Hungarian gold, left there by a certaine Bishop whose name was THEODORIC of Furſtemberg. At Franc he intercepted 80000 dollers, belonging to the Abbesse of Herfeens: but hearing that the Earle of Vandeberg was comming with great forces to relieue them of Giſee, he was forced to raise the siege, hauing lost many men. Of the money which he had gotten at Patterborne and in other places, he caused new dollers to be coyned: on the one side there was an Army comming out of a cloude with a sword in the hand, and his name; on the other side an inscription, whereby hee professed professed himselfe a friend to God, and an Enemy to all Papists.

1622. The Duke of Brunswick writeth to the Bishop of Virsbourg.

Before his departure from Westphalia, he wrote vnto the Bishop of Virsbourg and Bamberg after this manner: That he had long obserued (not without admiration) how that during these troubles in the Empire against his faith giuen for Neutralitie, by the instinct of Sathan and the Iesuites his adherents, since that cloud in the Bohemian State, hee durst not only send his Army, remaining in his Diocese, into Bohemia, and to ioyn with the Prince of Bauaria, but had endeuored by all means to ruine the Protestants; which was done to no other end, but to establish the Spanish Monarchy; decreed many yeers before, to oppresse the liberty of the countrey and the Protestant States, and to bring in the Councell of Trent, with the tyranny of the Inquisition. These counsells to the oppression of the Germane liberty, were not to be suffered; wherefore he could not but aduise him to desist from those practices, and to call back his Army out of the lower Palatinat; where they had committed many outrages vpon wiues & virgins: and withall that he should remember, being a Scholer, that such tyrannies were hatefull to the Heathen; and that it was his duty, as a Pastor, to reclaime his strayed sheepe, rather by milde meanes and faire speeches, then by fire and Sword: That this his passage into the lower Palatinat was not only contrary to equity, but to the treaty of Ylme, confirmed by all the Princes of the Empire; That his onely end was to expell the lawfull Elector all heir, and conferre the dignity on some which were remoued by many degrees; whereby they might haue more voices in the Electorall Colledge for the Bauarian party, and the Protestant States with the liberty of Germany bee the more oppreſt: That he had alwaies disliked the Elector Palatines meddling with the affairs of Bohemia, seeking to take the Crown from the Emperor; neither should hee now allow, that the Electorship should be taken from the Palatine, much lesse to cast oil into the fire with such violence; aduising him to call back his army, with this protestation, that he would do him all good offices if he gaue credit to his words; if otherwise he should suffer any one to bee depriued of his possessions, he would vse all means of defense for the glory of God and the liberty of Germany; calling God and posterity to witnes, that whatsoeuer he had done or should do, was for the peace of their common Country.

The Bauarians, after the aboue-mentioned defeat at Mingelsheim, had their reuenge of the Marquesse of Durlach, who lay apart with his Army between Wimpfen and Heilbrun. TILLY, hauing sent to discouer his Camp, ioining with CORDOVA's forces, on the 25 of April he seised on a wood and hil which was of great aduantage. Next day morning their cannon began to play on either side: but, DURLACH's forces, lying in open field, were much annoied. Their Troops encountred, and maintained the fight valiantly with equall losse, the Bauarians still refreshing their men in the wood; which the Marquesse his souldiers could not do. After noon, sending some troops of horse to charge them, they were repulst with such fury, that they were routed and put to flight: whereupon, TILLY and CORDOVA march against the Marquesse his forces with 6 regiments of foot and 800 horse; who attended them so resolutely, that they were forced to retire again to the wood: but returning again with greater fury, they putte his horsemen to flight, the footmen still fighting valiantly: during which conflict, certain carts loaden with pouder were by chance set on fire; which greatly spoiled the Marquesse his men, and was the losse of that daies battell. There was a Commander called HELMSTET, who maintained the fight to the very end, and (as they write) had got the victory if he had been well seconded by the horse. This battell continued from Sun-rising till eight of the clock at night; there being slain on both sides, as the report went, 5000 men, and 800 of the Marquesse his men taken prisoners. The Spaniards opinion was of this and of some former actions, that if they had been entertained in the beginning with such encounters, they should neuer haue been able to enter so far into Germany.

During these exploits in the Palatinate, the Town and Fort of Glatz seised on all the passages, repaired their Bulwarks, and fortified themselues with men and Arms against any enemies inuasion. The Elector of Saxony aduised them louingly to submit themselues to the Emperors mercy; promising them by his Letters, to obtain them a free pardon for all that was past: but the young Earle of Thurne returned him this answer, that they could not giue any credit vnto his promises; and therefore they were resolued to defend themselues to the last gasp. After which, the Towne-men tooke downe the roofes of their houses, and couered them with earth, to preuent the danger of fire. And being supplied with new Troops which came vnto them after the yeelding of Wittigaw, they made a sallie, and spoiled the Countrey foure or fiue miles round about, carrying away all the cattell and victualles into their Fort: and by night they surprised prised Beurath, where there was a good garrison; whom they slue and set fire on the Town.

1622. Haguenaw besieged by Mansfeld the Arch-duke Leopold.

At such time as Count MANSFELD was busie at the siege of Ladebourg vpon the Riuer of Neccar, the Arch-duke LEOPOLD taking aduantage of the time, thinking the other busied, marcht with an Army of 7 or 8000 foot, 2000 horse; and six or seuen peeces of ordinance; and set himself down before Haguenaw, a Town belonging to the Bishop of Spires, lying very fit for his passage into the Palatinate. Hauing made his vsuall summons to yeeld, and the garrison refusing to parley, he fell to his battery, seeking to get it before they should be relieued: and, for the speedier effecting thereof, he wrote his Letters to them of Strasbourg, requiring them to send him aid to force the Town. The Citizens (being very wary) forbare to answer him presently: yet they sent him some victuals and munition. Count MANSFELD had left within Haguenaw 4000 foot & 500 horse, who defended it valiantly til they might aduertise their Generall of the danger; who vpon the first aduertisement posted out of the Palatinat with the king of Bohemia and almost 20000 men to relieue the siege. His coming was very seasonable: for the enemy had gotten into the Town-ditches; so as it was feared they could not haue held it aboue two daies longer. LEOPOLD, hauing intercepted a Letter of aduice which Generall MANSFELD had sent to the Besieged, and finding by his scouts that his Army was on foot the 16 of May, and seeing no possibility to take the Town suddenly, fearing to bee hemd in betwixt the Kings Army, the riuer Rhine, and the town-garrison; he sent 1000 Croatian horse with som foot-companies to encounter him about Wisemberg, that by this stay he might saue the rest of his Army; with which he rose so tumultuously, that the garrison salying forth, slue 5 or 600 of his men in the trenches and rereward. They likewise who were sent against Count MANSFELD were ouerthrowne, and most of them slain or taken prisoners. The Arch-duke LEOPOLD fled ouer the Rhine: many of his souldiers were slain in the flight: six companies of horse retired into a wood; where, after 3 daies hunger, they yielded themselues to Colonel OBERNTRAVD, and serued the King. Some companies fled into Lichtenaw which they fortified, bringing with them six peeces of ordinance from before Haguenaw: but they were in great feare of the Marquesse of Durlach; who although he had receiued an ouerthrowe, and lost his baggage and cannon, yet he drew together again his dispersed regiments, and swore the companies hee had cashierd before, to the king of Bohemia; so as he had again an Army in field of 6000 foot & 1500 horse.

Mansfeld sieth on Darmstat.

After the relief of Hagnenaw, and the ouerthrowe of the Arch-duke LEOPOLD's Army, Count MANSFELD retired with his Army to Germensheim, Frankendale and Manheim; where putting the souldiers in hope that he would bring them to good pastures, and leaue all to their spoil, so as they would abstain from firing and murder; vpon the two and twentith of May hee with the King of Bohemia went with 16000 horse and foot to Darmstat, a Town belonging vnto LODOVVICK, Lantzgraue of Hesse; and hauing enuironed the Town by night, early in the morning they summoned it to yeeld. The Inhabitants, being amazed at this sudden accesse, opened their gates. The King's and MANSFELD's guards being within the wals, the one went to the Court, and the Kings to the Castle: the rest of the souldiers, gaping for prey, spoiled the Town, Villages and the whole Country, driuing away their cattell, some to Hannow, and some to Frankfort; where the Burgers were suffred to buy them on this condition, that they should restore them to their owners, paying the same price. The misery and lamentation of the Inhabitants was great, the souldiers sparing no man. Hauing continued 7 daies in DARMSTAT's Country; MANSFELD, hearing that TILLY, who had bin supplied with 6000 men from the Duke of Bauaria, came to encounter him with an Army of 20000 strong, he thought it not fit to make any longer stay there, but retired the same way they came, carrying the Lantzgraue LODOVVICK with them, who had sought to escape: but being knowne, hee was brought back again, and conducted to Manheim. This Prince had been alwaies a professed enemy to the King of Bohemia, and was the chief instrument to make the accord between the Princes of the Vnion and Marquesse SPINOLA. He had alwaies giuen passage and assistance to the Spanish forces, and dissuaded the Marquesse of Durlach and other Princes from taking Armes vnder a colour of desire of peace, and had perswaded the Inhabitants of Heidelberg from their obedience and duty to their lawfull Prince: for the which reasons, the King took him prisoner, and carried him to Manheim, suffering his countrey (which was very rich and plentifull) to be spoiled by the poore and hungry Souldiers; who were well relieued and the needy garrisons supplyed with store of Beeus, and sheep, and other necessaries.

CHRISTIAN Duke of Brunswick, making preparation to march towards the Palatinate, the bruite thereof was dispersed ouer the whole countrey; which strooke such a terror into the poore inhabitants, as they carried whatsoeuer they had, good and pretious, into Franckfort: To stop whose course; the Baron of Anhalt, marching speedily through the Countey of Waldec and Hesse, came to Aschaffenbourg, where he ioyned with the Bauarian and Spanish forces: who spoiled both friend and foe. BRVNSVVICK, leauing Westphalia on the 6 of May, marched to the Riuer of Visurgis, ouer which Colonel KNIPHVS had built a bridge; where he passed with 82 Cornets of Horse, and 15000 foot, leading captiues with him some Iesuites, and a certain President. He was followed by the Bishop of Cullens, the Duke of Newbourgs, and the Spanish forces; but hauing no meanes to ouertake him, for that all the bridges were broken down; they returned, and in their way recouered Susat, Alten, and other places in Westphalia. Approaching neere vnto the Elector of Saxonies countrey, the Duke came with good troops of souldiers to Langesalt vpon the Frontiers, to preuent all danger, and to preserue his subiects from oppression. The Duke of Brunswick, hauing receiued victuals, past quietly by the iurisdiction of Coburg towards the Abby of Fuldam; where he exacted from the Chapter 40000 dollers. The Elector of Saxony, hauing freed his Frontiers from feare, entred into Lipsick in great Pompe, with his royal Standard before him, bringing with him Captaine FISCHER prisoner, for that hee had exceeded his Commission contrary to the Edict, and had spoiled certain villages about Eysfeld, belonging to the Elector of Mentz. This Captain had many good friends which did intercede for him, especially FREDERICK a Duke of Saxony, who loued him much; yet he could not so palliate the offence, but 3 of his chiefe officers were hanged.

The L. Chichley arriues at Manheim.

His Maiesty of great Brittain, hauing (as I said before) resolued to send the Lord CHICHESTER, Baron of Belface, into the Palatinate, to the Elector Palatine his son in Law, to dispose him to imbrace this treaty of Peace now in hand at Brussels, and to remoue all lets & obstacles that might hinder it, or a suspension of Arms, which his Maiesty so much desired: about the end of May he arriued safely at Manheim; whereat the king of Bohemia was much satisfied, & the poor soldiers greatly reioyced, hoping that the presence of such a person should supply all their wants; where, after great welcome and entertainment, the king and his General MANSFELD, returned to the Army; which, about the end of May, marched to Achenburg, a town of the Bishop of Mentz lying aboue Franckfort, to meet with BRVNSVVICK who as they heard was marching into Franconia: But ere he could get to the riuer of Main, which of force they must pass, TILLY hauing a very strong Army (beeing newly fortified with 6000 men from the Duke of Bauaria, and supplied with the Infanta's horse-troops from GONZALES) had got before him; so as he must of necessity fight or retire: for, BRVNSVVICK was not yet come to the riuer, neither had any notice of the Kings being so neer. Finally, it was not held conuenient to fight vpon such disaduantages: for, the Country was very poor, and not able to feed them; and the enemy was strong and very well prouided, which might endanger their Army: wherefore it was thought fit to retire; which was done in so good order, that the King himself was much commended. Notwithstanding all their diligence, yet the enemy followed them so fast, that he ouertook them, and their horse made such way through and about the woods, that they were forced to skirmish, the King going from place to place to make head against the enemy. This continued about two daies, the 30 and 31 of May. During these encounters of the horse, the foot retired to Manheim, hauing lost not aboue 100 on either side: the horse skirmisht still, wherin the King demeaned himself so brauely, as he drew on others by his example to noble performances; where many Gentlemen were much praised for their valor: among which Colonell OBERTRAVNT (Commander of the Palatines horse) and Sir IOHN MANVVOOD of Kent (a Captain of a Troop of MANSFELD's horse) were specially noted. The report was, there were not aboue 200 slain, besides the wounded and prisoners; so as TILLY had little cause to boast of this attempt, where they lost so few men, and no baggage, in a retreat of 30 or 40 miles, albeit the enemy made great maters of it; giuing out, that MANSFELD lost aboue 2000, as both GOTARDVS and LONDORPIVS write; and that this encounter was at their retreit from Darmstat: but it seems, ignorance or passion abused them.

The Emperors generall pardon.

In the beginning of May, the Emperor had caused his Letters to be set vp in the 3 Townes of Prague, commanding all men to acknowledge honor and respect to the Prince of Lichtenstein, as his Lieutenant and Vice-gerent in the kingdome of Bohemia, and that they should faithfully obey him, as if his Maiesty were there in person; and on the other side, the Prince should Minister Iustice to all men indifferently, and take them into his protection. On the next day a generall pardon was proclaimed throughout all Prague; but with this condition expresst, that no mention should be hereafter made of any former offences or transgressions; neither should death be inflicted vpon any man; yet such as during that time of Rebellion had assisted the directors of Bohemia and the Count Palatine, or at the least had been partakers in the Bohemian combustions, should within 3 weeks bring in their names to certain Counsellors appointed for that businesse, and attend their resolution: and then (matters being duely considered) should pay a fine: yet such were expresly excluded out of the pardon, who had bin particularly condemned before, and whose names had been affixed vpon the place of Iustice.

The Emperor prepares to goe into Hungary.

The Emperor resolued to leaue a garrison of 18 companies in Viena. The citizens which dwelt in the high market place, refusing to receiue this garrison into their houses, and therby shewing their smal deuotion to the Emperor, the soldiers entred the lodgings which were appointed for them, by force; with the consent and approbation of the Magistrate. Hereupon the Prouinciall States of Austria came speedily to Vienna; and, amongst other things, most humbly besought his Maiesty that they might hereafter liue in Peace vnder the shelter of the Eagles wings: whereupon there was a new treaty propounded for the leuying of money; but by reason of his iourney into Hungary, it was deferred. On the 18 of May, he began his Iourney with 2 regiments of foot, and 12 cornets of horse, hauing sent some Noble-men and Counsellors of Hungary before, to conferre with the States, with this expresse resolution; that if the Hungarians would not be forgetfull of the Oath they had taken, he would then shew them all grace and fauor: if otherwise, then for the loue of Iustice, he would shew them the Sword wherwith God had girt him.

About the 11 of May, certain Commissioners which had been sent to Prince BETHLIN returned to Vienna; who aduertized his Maiesty that BETHLIN shewed himself not only a good and deuout Imperialist, but also faithfully perswaded his Maiesty not to disarm himself of those warlike preparations, lest the Turkish Emperor should take an aduantage of this treaty of Peace, and inuade the one or other party: whereunto the Emperors Commissioners replied; That although his Maiesty had greater and more difficult war, yet he was resolued to conclude a firme and constant Peace with all his enemies; the which he had often fought of many, but in vaine: Which declaration did so please BETHLIN, as he concluded, that now was the wished time that all his Maiesties subiects and rebels, for loue of their countrey, should ioyn with the sacred Roman Empire, and therby breake and ruin all the Turkish forces. The Emperor parting from Vienna, the 18 of May after the new stile, on the 26 he came to Edenbourg with his Empresse and children, hauing a guard of 5000 horse & foot; where he was receiued & brought into the town by the Hungarians: two daies after, he made his propositions in Latin vnto the States. 1. His Imperial Maiesty did perswade them to forget all hostility, and to resolue on a generall Peace, for the loue of their country; to which end he came to them in person. 2. That the Crown might be presently brought back againto Presbourg, & there safely kept; to which end his Maiesty would appoint certain Commissioners. 3. That a Peace should be maintaind with the Turk and other neighbor Princes; which his Maiesty would endeuor to see effected, and that such as should break the league might be duely punished. 4. That a law might be made against such as should treat with the Turk or any other Enemy to the preiudice of the kingdome. 5. If any hostile inuasion should be made, then the States should take care for defence. 6. That EMERICVS LIPTAGVS, STEPHANVS DOTRIVS, and IAMIS RIMAIVS, should giue an account of their Embassie to the Turkish Emperour, to the intent the Peace might be the better kept. 7. All goods taken away during the time of the Rebellion, should bee presently restored to their owners. 8. That the Germanes (necessity so requiring) should bee lodged againe vpon the Frontiers, according to the prouinciall constitutions; the which hereafter should be obserued with more strict discipline. 9. That they should consider by what meanes, the Dominions, which had beene deliuered to BETHLIN Prince of Transiluania, should be reduced to the Crowne of Hungary. 10. That their late Letters of confederacie with their Prouinciall orders, should bee deliuered vnto his Imperiall Maiestie. 11. That the houses should bee numbred, and that euery one should be bound to pay six Hungarian florens, vntill the next Assembly of the States. 12. That Trees and Timber should bee fetcht out of the neereſt Woods, for the re-edifying and repayring of the decayed Forts. 13. That Corne should bee sent vnto the Frontier Forts, during these turbulent times. 14. That the Articles formerly made should be renued and duely obserued against those which did ill intreate Souldiers. 15. That whereas there was a generall forgetfulnesse of all that was past; the States, to shew their loue vnto their lawfull King of Hungary, should make a Law againſt ſuch as ſhould attempt any thing to the prejudice of the Country. 16. That 1622 a Law ſhould be made for the reſtitution of ſuch places as were fit for the keeping of powder for his Maieſties neceſſity. 17. And whereas, during the Peace, Vaccia had been deliuered; therefore the States ſhould haue a care of the ſafety of the Common-wealth, leſt by this auulſion; the conſtitutions of the Prouinces might be endangered. 18. That the fortification neer to Canifis might be prouided for; to which end, his Maieſty promiſed to treate with the other Prouinces. 19. That the paſſage of the Riuer of Iauerin might be cleanſed, and the new Mills demoliſhed, which otherwiſe would be a hinderance vnto the defence of the Fort. 20. That ſuch Officers might be appointed for the adminiſtring of Iuſtice as ſhould remayne in a certaine place.

During this aſſembly, BETHLIN Prince of Tranſiluania ſent his Deputies, who preſented vnto the Emperour a goodly horſe, with other rich preſents; he himſelfe then remaining at Caſſouia, for that his wife CAROLA was newly dead: Some wtite, that during the conſultation touching the Emperours propoſitions, among other things it was debated, that the Ieſuites ſhould be no more admitted into Hungary, at leaſt enioy no Lands: And ſecondly that they would not only haue a generall pardon, but a particular for the Ambaſſie they had ſent to Conſtantinople; and in the meane time the Emperor appointed a Commiſſioner to fetch the Crowne from Trentſchin.

Brunſwick approacheth the Palatinate.

Let vs now returne againe to the Palatinate, and obſerue what ſucceſſe BRVNSVVICK hath in his march thitherwards. It ſeeming by all circumſtances that his Army approached neere vnto the limitts of the City of Franckfort, there was great ſtore of treaſure brought from the neighbour villages and townes, the which might ſerue the owners to good purpoſe, many of them being fled to the City. On the fourth of Iune his Army drew neere to Vrſell, a Towne belonging to the Arch-biſhoppe of Mentz; the Gouernour whereof (who was buſie about the fortification of the Town) holding his greateſt ſafety to be in flight, abandoned it, to the ſpoile of the Souldiers: After which, Colonell KNIPHVS marched with one thouſand fiue hundred ſhotte, foure troups of horſe, two peeces of Ordinance, and ſome Petards to Hoeſt, a town ſeated vpon the Maine, a mile from Franckfort; where he meant to make a bridge to ioyne with MANDSFELDS forces. Hauing inueſted the Towne by night, in the morning the Garriſon fell to Armes, ſhooting continually at them, ſo as the Colonell was hurt in the left arme; wherewith, being nothing amazed, he ſummoned them to yeeld: but ſeeing them reſolute, hauing loſt aboue a hundred men, he ſent preſently to the Duke of Brunſwick for more forces; the which the Townes-men ſeeing approach, they grew amazed and fled preſently to the watergate, where they all (with their wiues and children, and the beſt of their ſubſtance) paſt the Maine; ſome going to Mentz, ſome to Franckfort: whereupon they entred the Towne and Caſtle. The next day the Army came thither: In the meane time TILLY and CORDOVA, lying at Aſchaffenbourg with an Army of thirty thouſand men at the leaſt, they ſent two hundred foote, and two troups of horſe, by night, to reliene Hoeſt, but they were met withall and defeated by BRVNSVVICK's Troups.

On the ſeuenth of Iune they paſſed the Maine towards Franckfort: The Duke of Brunſwick, hearing of the Enemies march, ſent to Count MANDSFELD, to let him vnderſtand in what poſture he ſtood; reſoluing that he would continue ſo ſtill, vntill he might march vnto him: for whoſe paſſage or his owne retreate (if he were forced) he prepared a bridge ouer the Maine. Count MANDSFELD receiued theſe newes as he was marching with a deſigne to breake the bridge at Oppenheim; or (that failing) to make ſome other diuerſion, thereby to draw GONZALES homewards; commaunding threeſcore Cornets of horſe to march preſently towards the Duke, meaning himſelfe to follow after the reſt of his Army: but he was ſtayed by contrary newes of his ouerthrow as you ſhall heare.

Brunſwick defeated by the Bauarians at Hoeſt

On Whitſonday, the ſouldiers hauing burned many villages thereabouts, the Bauarians marched with 15 Regiments of foote, 140 Cornets of horſe and 18 peeces of Ordinance: In the meane time, the Duke of Brunſwick encamped himſelfe, and ſent ſome of his carriages ouer the bridge. The enemy approaching his Camp, the fight beganne preſently, and continued ſix houres: the Bauarians had 18 peeces of Ordinance fitly placed, which did much annoy his horſe: BRVNSVVICK had but three, whereof one was broken in the beginning, and another was made vnſeruiceable by the enemies Cannon; ſo as they could not make the fight good, notwithſtanding that his foote-men fought valiantly. The Duke, by the aduice of his commanders, retired himſelfe: whereupon, the whole Army fell into confuſion, and fled preſently towards the bridge: where, by reaſon of the narrowneſſe thereof, many were turned into the riuer, and drowned. The Bauarians durſt not purſue them which fled, fearing ſome ſtratagem. 1622
The Duke of Brunſwick waded through the riuer with fiue troupes of horſe: they loſt moſt of their baggage, and many of the ſouldiers in their flight threw away their Armes: which was a very great loſſe. The number of the dead was vncertaine, for that many both of horſe and foote were drowned in the paſſage of the riuer: But the loſſe had beene farre greater, if the Bauarians had had any horſe to purſue them on the other ſide of the riuer. They had no great cauſe to brag of this victory, there being three ſtrong Armies ioyned againſt one, and hauing ſix times as much Ordinance. The Duke came to Mainheme; and, gathering together his ſcattered troupes after this loſſe, muſtered 5000 horſe and 8000 foot. TILLY, retiring after this defeate towards Frankfort, cauſed a bridge to be built by Steinheym, to paſſhis army ouer the riuer of Maine: which being finiſhed, they diuided their Armies. TILLY went to Schrife, a fort which he had taken vpon the riuer of Neccar: and Don CORDOVA encamped at Ladenburg; where making a bridge, Heidelberg was in a manner blockt vp; without any hoſtile attempt.

An Ambaſſadour from the King of Denmark to the Emperor.

Whil'ſt the Emperour continued at Edenbourg (during the aſſembly of the States of Hungary) there arriued an Ambaſſadour from the King of Denmark, to intercede againe for the reſtitution of the Elector Palatine to his hereditarie Countries and dignities; intreating his Maieſty, that (for his fatherly affection to the Common-wealth and his innocent ſubiects) hee would change his minde (preferring clemencie before rigour) and ſuffer the Elector Palatine to be reconciled vnto him. That he had often ſhewed himſelfe ready, both to him and the States of the Empire, to renounce the crowne of Bohemia both for himſelfe and his heires; and to yeeld all due obedience vnto his Imperiall Maieſty; ſo as he might enioy his hereditarie poſſeſſions with the Elector all dignity, and recouer that which had beene taken from him. But if his Maieſty thought that his offences were ſuch as they could not ſo eaſily be pardoned, and that he had cauſe ſufficient to proſecute the execution of the proſcription; yet he could not but let him vnderſtand, that in theſe extremities whereas the publike ſafety was in danger, it was not needfull to proceede according to the rigour of the law; but, remember that worthy ſaying of an Antient, It is not neceſſarie I ſhould doe all things according to mine owne will. Wherefore he could not but intreate his Maieſty againe (ſeeing that the Elector Palatine was ready vpon the former conditions to make his renunciation, ſubmiſſion, and ſatisfaction) that he would in the end vanquiſh himſelfe, and forget his conceiued diſpleaſure againſt him, for the good of the Common-wealth; whereby he ſhould free many thouſands from death and deſpaire; hee ſhould make an end of warre and the deuaſtation of countries; ſettle peace and the publike quiet, and reſtore the Common-weale to life; being now in the very agonie of death; and as it were breathing out his ſoule: And, to conclude, he ſhould ſo bind all his Noblemen and ſubiects, yea and his very enemies vnto him, as they would not only be ready to employ their liues and fortunes in all cauſes of neceſſity, but would alſo poure forth their vowes and prayers for his health and ſafety.

The Emperour anſwere vnto the Danish Ambaſſadour

The Emperour, in his anſwere to this Daniſh Ambaſſador, made an ample relation of all the proceedings of the Bohemians, and of the combuſtions which had hapned there ſince the yeere 1618, as he had formerly donne to others: That, notwithſtanding the great victory which hee had got at Prague, he had not changed his minde, which was alwaies enclyned to peace: That he had appointed diuers aſſemblies of the Electors and Princes, meaning to aſſiſt there in perſon for the ſettling of a general peace: the which had been diſappointed by Count MANDSFELD; who, leauying new forces in the vpper Palatinate, had entred into the confines of Bohemia, meaning to infeſt it againe, if he had not oppoſed the Duke of Bauaria againſt him: That both hee and CHRISTIAN Duke of Brunſwick had committed many outrages in Aſſatia and Weſtphalia: That the Elector Palatine could not excuſe himſelfe of theſe proceedings; which were no ſignes of repentance, but of obſtinate malice: yet he had ſent the Earle of Swartſenberg to the King of great Brittaine, to acquaint him with the conditions whereby a ſuſpenſion of Armes might bee obtained; the which he had referred to the Iuſanta of Spaine remaining at Bruſſels. Yea, he had beene content, that the Electors and Princes ſhould meete touching this buſineſſe: Yet, in the meane time, before he could receiue their concluſions, FREDERICK Elector Palatine, neglecting the Treaty (which his father in law had ſo often deſired) came againe into the Empire, and ioyned with MANDSFELD and others, to the end they might inuade the Territories of the Electors and Princes which had beeene faithfull vnto him. Whereby the King of Denmark might well perceiue, with what patience he had endured theſe affronts: finally, ly, when he should receiue aduice from his Ambassador at Brussels what was fit to be done touching this desired treaty, he would so resolue, that the King should finde that his interposition was not in vain.

The Ambassadors reply to the Emperor.

The Ambassador, seeming not well satisfied with the Emperors answer, vpon a second audience gaue him to vnderstand, that his Master would not make any question to the troubles of Bohemia, nor the punishing of such as were the motiues: but seeing that his Imperiall Maiesty had now recouered this his Kingdome with the incorporated Prouinces, part by force, part by treaty, his King did aim at nothing more than to see an end of this warre and misery, that peace and tranquillity might be restored with due obedience to his Maiesty, all offenses forgotten, and perfect loue and trust confirmed among the States; that there was nothing wanting in the Elector Palatine, who was ready to make his renunciation and an honest satisfaction, desiring nothing but his owne hereditary Countries and Electorall dignity, as he enioyned them before the troubles; that it was apparant to all the world, that the Duke of Bauaria alone laboured to expel him by force from his hereditary right, contrary to the treaty of Vlm. If the Palatin according to the law of nature had vsed any defense, or sought means to preserue his subiects liues, and those poor possessions which yet remained, from cruell subuersion, such as that of Neccargemond (where they vsed barbarous cruelty against innocent women and children) he was not to be blamed; neither was it to be reputed a new crime of obstinacy and rebellion against his Maiesty, if in his defense there had been some wrong done (as souldiers can hardly containe themselues within their bounds) to them of Strasbourg, it was that wherof the King of Denmark complained, that the sparks of this fire did flee into the neighbour Prouinces; and if it were not speedily quenched, all Germany would be on flame, and in a manner reduced to ashes. Hee did not doubt but those Prouinces, which had suffred some losse, had giuen counsell and assistance against the Palatine; that SPINOLA, Generall for the King of Spain, had been a great cause thereof, who had done great wrongs to MAVRICE Lantzgraue of Hesse, to the Countesse of Hannow, to an innocent pupill, the Count Palatine LODOVVICK the Electors brother, and to diuerse Imperiall Towns; that he would not be troublesome to his Maiesty with a commemoration of those calamities, but would only intreat him not to blame the Palatin if he had sought to protect his subiects, nor to think he had done any thing contrary to the promise of the King of great Britanne; being ready to accommodate himself to any friendly Treaty, so as he might not be forced to submit himself to the Duke of Bauaria and the Catholick League, to the ruine of his Country, and blemish of his dignity. Wherefore the King of Denmark did hope, that the Emperor would giue way to so many intercessions; that hee would forget what had past in the troubles of Bohemia; that he would not tax the Palatine with any new crime, nor spoil him of his Country and Electorall dignity: whereby the Protestants mindes might be much distempered, if, seeing all other men pardoned which had been partakers in those troubles, and that BETHLEN (who had marched in the same steps with the Palatine, if not worse) had been admitted to a friendly composition without any intercession, and diuerse Principalities and Earldoms granted to him during his life; but to the Palatine all fauour was denied, and a cruell reuenge exercised against him: this might easily breed iealousie in the Protestants, as if ther were some other matter intended to their preiudice by his oppression; and the rather, for that it was commonly spoken, that the Electorall dignity was conferred vpon the Duke of Bauaria, which might be the cause of new combustions; that his Maiesty should not giue credit to such turbulent men who regarded onely their owne priuate profit, nor think that by the defeat at Wimpfen the Palatines forces were so weakned, as he should not be able to finde meanes to defend himself; that MANSFELD could not bee drawne to leaue his Master by the rigor of Proscriptions, but had made head against the forces of the Bauarians with a good Army, and had beaten them at Vislock; that no enemy whatsoeuer was to be contemned; that if all hope of reconciliation were taken away, and (the title of rebels continued) they were brought to despair, his Maiesty might well conceiue what calamities were to be feared, seeing that the warre (increasing since the Treaty of Vlmes) seemed to threaten all estates. Wherefore he besought the Emperor, that seeing the Palatine shewed himself willing to renounce the Kingdome of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, he would shew him grace at the request of the King his Master and the Elector of Saxony, who did likewise intercede for him: whereby there might be hope of his restoring to his former dignity and inheritance; that the King would willingly send an Ambassador to this Treaty, with instructions whereby it should plainly appear, that whatsoeuer he had done was out of a sincere loue to settle peace, and to maintain the dignity of his Imperiall maiesty.

sty. Touching CHRISTIAN Duke of Brunswick, the king his Master had vnderstood by vulgar relations, that he had made an irruption into Westphalia, and had taken diuers places; but he had not hard of his Tyrannie. That what he had done was out of his meere loue and pity to the Palatine, his wife and children, being so neere allied vnto him in bloud, and dispossessed of all their States: wherefore, he intreated the Emperour not to take any seuere counsells against this Duke; but rather to vse lenity and mildnesse in respect of his youth and other circumstances, whereby he might draw him to better counsells, and make triall of his fidelity and valour, either against the sworne enemy of Christendome, or in some other good occasion. 1622

The Emperors answere to the Ambassadour.

The Emperour hereunto made this answere; That what-so-euer had beene attempted by force in the Palatinate, was done by his commandement, and by the vertue of his Commission. That the Army which was then in the Palatinate was to be accounted the Emperours: so as whatsoeuer was attempted against it by the Palatine or his commanders, was to be held done against his person. That he persisted constant in his first resolution, touching a treaty of peace: wherein he hoped all long disputations should bee auoided, according vnto the desire of the King of Denmark, promising withall that hee would haue a respect vnto his intercession.

The Elector of Saxony intercedes for the Palatine.

During this Embassie, The Elector of Saxony wrote Letters vnto the Emperour, whereby he gaue him to vnderstand, that he had beene requested by the King of Denmark, to be a suter vnto his Maiesty, for the reconciliation of FREDERICK Elector Palatine, who seemed ready to renounce the Kingdom of Bohemia for him and his heires; to make his submission and giue satisfaction. Hauing therefore found by diuers Letters and Embassies sent vnto him, that his Maiesty was wholy enclined to settle a wished peace, and had referred the whole business to the Infanta of Spaine, lying at Brussels, whereby all Acts of hostility might cease, or at least a cessation of Armes be concluded, that they might proceede in their treaty, and the faithfull States be freed from further danger; and seeing the King of Denmarks loue and affection to his Imperial Maiesty, and the publike peace; he thought it his duty to employ his best indeuor for the pacifying of all troubles and combustions in the Empire, neither could he forbeare to assist this his commendable designe by his Letters. That he held it very necessarie and high time that a peace were settled in the Empire; which could by no meanes be effected, vnlesse the Spring of all troubles were stopt and the fier quenched. Wherefore he entreated his Maiesty not to suffer this intercession of the King of Denmark to be without fruit, but that he would vanquish himselfe; and as the Palatine seemed ready to make a renuntiation and submission, so in like manner he would suffer him to be reconciled vnto him: whereby he should preserue the loue and affection of the King of Danmark, make an end of all those miseries, settle a peace in the Empire, and purchase immortall thanks and glory with all the States of the Empire and posterity.

About this time, those of Glats surprised the Towne of Wunselburg: in the which, were fiue companies of foot belonging to the Prince of Lichtenstein, whereof they slew the greatest part; some few flying to Brun. In like manner, they of Clingenberg, being besieged by the Imperialists, made a salie and slew many of their souldiers. About the same time 5000 Cossacks came and offered their seruice to the Emperor; they sate downe within two miles of Glats, bringing great spoiles with them: of which, they of Glats took a great part from them; CHARLES Bishop of Nisse, the Emperors brother, sending them word he had no neede of their seruice: yet they continued their course, and marched towards the Duke of Bauaria, spoiling the Towne of Glatz in Bohemia as they passed.

Demandes made by the vnited States to the countries of Iuliers and Mounts.

The vnited States hearing that the Countries of Iuliers and Mounts (which are a part of the circle of Westphalia, and subiect to the Empire) had giuen great assistance to the Spaniards, they sent an Ambassadour to Dusseldorf with these demandes following: That they should pay them one hundred thousand dollers within three weekes, or expect the like that had beene done in Brabant; That they should make yeerely paiement vnto the States of halfe their profits. That they should receiue no Spanish garrisons into their townes as they had done the last winter. That they vnderstood, they had maintained the king of Spaines forces without any charge to him; the which if they should do againe this winter, they would burne all their Townes and villages: And lastly that they should giue them as greate a quantity of oates as they had done to SPINOLA.

Heidelberg besieged by Tilly

TILLY hauing taken the Castle of Ladebourg without any great toyle, vpon the 21. of Iune he marched toward Heidelberg: and finding that the Towne and Castle might be annoyed from a neer place which they call the holy Hill; he presently seised vpon it, and soon after tooke a fortification, 1622 fortification, which for some considerations had been abandoned, and in a manner cast downe by them of Heidelberg; from whence they began to shoot against the Towne: and comming downe the Hill, they began to fortifie against the bridge which went ouer the Neccar, and to take it if they could, and withall to disturb the besieged if they should attempt to recouer the Fort vpon the Hill, but they were forced to desist from their attempt, by their continuall shooting from the Castle. There were diuers salies and Military exploits for some daies together, with losse to either side; they within hauing a Captaine with thirtie seuen footmen and two horsemen slaine, besides such as were wounded. The Bauarian lost some hundreds of his souldiers with one Captaine, there being aboue 100 of them carried prisoners into the Towne. In the meane time two of MANSFELDS Captaines, being shut into the Towne, and hauing no meanes to returne vnto their Armie, had drawne together a troupe of 300 foote, and eightie horse of the Mansfeldians and others, who lying sicke there had recouered their healths; these men salied forth daily, and neuer returned without some prey. TILLY, finding hee should doe little good beyond the Riuer of Neccar, on the 28 of Iune raised his campe, and returned to Lawdebourg with his Armie: where passing the Riuer, he marched to the other side of the Towne, and put his Armie in battaile, shewing himselfe readie to fight, but to no effect: only he made the Towne Gardes sometime retire, as they did his, his souldiers spending the time in gathering vp the corne, and spoiling and burning the neighbour Villages.

Lodowick of Hassia sent home to his Country.

In the meane time, LODOVVICK of Darmstat Lantsgraue of Hesse was released from his imprisonment before the comming of two Ambassadors from the Elector of Saxony, and from MAVRICE, Lantsgraue of Hesse: the conditions of his dismission were, That he should labour to procure the peace of Germany; That he should doe his best endeuor for the restitution of the Palatinate, and other iurisdictions belonging vnto the Elector FREDERICK: That he should attempt nothing in hostile manner against the Electour or his subiects during these troubles; and that he should not seeke any reuenge for that which had been formerly done. Hauing accepted and allowed of these conditions (so as they might not preiudice the hereditarie contracts which he had with other Electors and Princes) he presently returned to Darmstat the first of Iuly. At the same time the Marquesse of Durlach gaue ouer Armes and resigned his troupes to the Baron of Helmstat.

Count Mansfeld and Brunswick go into Alsatia.

Count MANSFELD and the Duke of Brunswick, hauing ioyned their forces together, left the Palatinate (being wholly wasted and not able to feede their Armies) and marching into Alsatia, they passed by Strausbourg, and in the way took diuerse Townes belonging to the Bishops iurisdiction, whereof they spoiled and burnt some and ransomed others, from whom they exacted great summes of money besides other supplies of corne, wine and other victuals for the releefe of their Army.

The Lord CHICHESTER Baron of Belface, being sent by his Maiesty of great Britanie (as you formerly heard) to his sonne in law the Elector Palatine, to dispose him to retire out of the Palatinate, and to lay downe Armes in regarde of the present treaty of peace, being also pressed by Letters from the King of Denmark, who had much laboured his reconciliation with the Emperour, and had consulted with some States of the Empire; he thought good to aduise him to desist from Armes and dismisse his forces, setting downe certaine conditions, whereby they hoped this difficult businesse might be compounded.

The Elector freeth the Army from their oath.

The Elector (by the aduice and counsell of the King his father in law, and the perswasions of the King of Denmark) not onely raised the siege from ELSAS ZABARN, but also freed the Army from their oath; as may appeare by this attestation which was made in the Camp, the 13 of Iuly: He could not but confesse (said he) That his worthy Generall and Lieutenant generall, the Earle of Mansfeld, with his Kinsman CHRISTIAN Duke of Brunswick, with al their Colonels, Captaines and Officers, together with the whole Army of horse and foote, had hitherto faithfully discharged their duties: but, being now destitute of all meanes to entertaine them any longer, so as they should not be able hereafter to continue in their fidelities and duty, He would not therefore blame them for that they had required an honest dismission; but did willingly graunt it, and declared them freed from their oath, and that they might now freely take what course they in their discretion should think fittest for their good and safety.

Count Mansfeld offers his seruice to the Emperor.

GOTHARDVS writes, that Count MANSFELD (hauing receiued this attestation from the Elector) wrote vnto TILLY, sending him a copie thereof, letting him vnderstand that both he, the Duke of Brunswick, and the whole Army were discharged from the Elector: so as being now their owne men & at liberty, mooued out of loue and affection vnto the Emperour they were ready to serue him, if they might be sure of the remainder of their pay: or if his his Maiesty had no need of his seruice, the proscription being taken away and a pardon granted for his former offences, he would speedily depart out of the lymits of the Empire: yet I dare not warrant the truth hereof. The Assembly of the Prouinciall States in Hungary continued still: in the which, they shewed themselues very willing to giue the Emperour content; and among others, they concluded these Articles following. That all persons aswell Ecclesiasticall as Secular, should be restored to their goods, which had beene taken away during the time of the rebellion. That ayde should bee giuen vnto his Imperiall Maiesty against his enemies. That the Germanes should be receiued into garison, for the defence of the frontier townes; and that the Empresse should be crowned Queene of Hungary; to which end the Emperours Commissioners should be presently sent to fetch the Crowne to Edinbourg, whereby the Assembly might be concluded. In the meane time, Clingenberg, with the Towne and Castle, was yeelded to the Emperors deuotion, vpon certaine conditions: which done, the Garrison departed with their baggage, and other troupes entred for the Emperor: and at the same time the Earle of Holoch was reconciled to the Emperour; and the Electorall Diet, appointed at Ratisbone or Rainsbourg, was deferred vntill the first of October. 1622

The Empresse crowned Queen of Hungary.

The States of Hungary, to shew their deuotion to the Emperor, resolued to haue his Empresse crowned Queene of Hungary vpon the 26 of Iuly; for the which, there was great preparation made. The Hungarian Crown had beene carried by BETHLIN GABOR from Presbourg to Trentschin (as you haue formerly heard) the which was now brought back with a troupe of 1000 Germanes and Hungarians horse and foote: it was carried with great solemnity in a Caroach, hauing many Noblemen both of the Emperors Court and Hungarians going before and after it, with trumpets in front. Being come to the house where the Crown was to be kept, presently the Archbishop of Iauerin, the Lord Palatine TVRSO, with many other Noblemen Hungarians, receiued it with great honour, from certaine Haydukes, and carried it into the house. Before they came vnto the said place, the citizens stood on the one side in Armes, and the Haydukes (being Armed after their manner) on the other. The next day the Crowne was brought forth into the Court and publikly shewed, being found whole and vntouched.

On the day appointed for this ceremonie, the Emperour went with great pomp vnto the Franciscan Church: before him marched the Gentlemen and Noblemen of the Court, with some Knights of the Goulden fleece: then followed fower Bishops in their Episcopall habits, and six other in their ordinarie attire: then came there fiue Heralds: and then followed the Emperour with his Kingly Diadem, on his head; the Earle of Solmes carrying the regall Ball, BRVNO Earle of Mansfeld the scepter, and the Baron of Locenstin the sword; Next to the Emperour followed STANESLAVS TVRSO, the Palatine of Hungary, who carried the Hungarian Diademe, SETSCHIVS the regall Ball, and ESTERHASIVS the scepter: and, last of all, came the Empresse with her traine and the Emperours guard. Comming into the Church, the Archbishop of Iauerin was appointed to performe the ceremonie: who, after the ending of Masse, anoynted her vpon the right Arme, betweene the elbow and the hand, and likewise vpon the face: which done, she was conducted by the Earle of Dietrichstein and the Countesse of Porcia, into the Vestrie; where she was attired with rich robes: and then comming forth, the foresaid Noblemen went before hir with the Crown, Scepter and Ball. Comming to the Altar, and falling vpon hir knees, the Archbishop anointed her againe. Then came there another Bishop and set her owne Crowne vpon her head, and so departed: after which, the Archbishop returned, and taking the scepter, he put it into her right hand, the regall Ball into her left, and the Crowne of Hungary he set vpon hir right shoulder: which as it seemes, is their manner when they crowne a Queene: the which, after some small pause, was taken off and set vpon the Altar.

The ceremonie being ended, the Queene taking hir owne crown, and carrying the scepter & Ball in her hands, went to hir appointed seate: after which they returned with great ioy & pompe in the same maner they came, the Palatine often shewing the Hungarian Crown to the people.

Count MANSFELD, and the D. of Brunswick, hauing retired their forces out of the Palatinate, and being discharged from the Elector Palatine king of Bohemia's seruice, as you haue heard; TILLY and CARDOVA remaining still there with great forces, hauing no enemy able to make head against them, they had a faire opportunity to attempt any thing they pleased. Generall VERE hauing worke enough, to man, fortifie, and munition the Townes of Heidelberg, Manheim and Frankendale with some few others which remained yet vntaken, and were commanded by him vnder our Kings Maiesties protection. He therefore neglected not any thing that might either either hinder the enemy in his designes, or auail himself in his defense; and therefore commanded the Gouerner of Gemersheim to seise on all the boats he could vpon the riuer Rhine, and burn them, lest the enemy should make vse of them for bridges or some other designe: and those Troops which the Marquesse of Durlach had cashiered when he retired himself, the Generall entertained.

Mansfelds proceeding after his discharge.

The Elector Palatine, King of Bohemia, hauing discharged his Army (as wee haue formerly related) retired himself to Sedan to the Duke of Bouillon, his vncle. Count MANSFELD and the Duke of Brunswick in the mean time left Alsatia and the Territories of Strasbourg, sending to the Duke of Lorrain to demand passage through his Country: the which was granted either for loue or fear; yet it strucka great terror into the poor inhabitants, who fled with their goods into the walled Towns, fearing the insolency of disordered souldiers, which can neuer be kept in discipline where there wants pay: and therefore their Commanders are often forced to giue way to their spoils and violences. This Army passing through Lorrain and the Bishoprick of Metts, they entred vpon the edge of Champagne in France, sitting down by Mouson a small Town belonging to the French King vpon the riuer of Meuse, hauing put all the Countries round about in alarum, and caused them to stand vpon their guard; whom wee will at this time leaue for a while.

Durlach his country spoiled.

The Marquesse of Durlach, soon after his giuing ouer Arms, had a great disaster falleh vpon him: for, certain Troops of Croatians and Cossacks, comming from the Bauarian, entred his Country, spoiled where they came, and put all to fire and sword. They not onely wasted and consumed the corn in their Barns, but also that which stood vpon the ground, the husbandmen being fled, and not daring appear to reap it: they also did beat out the heads of their wine-vessels, pouring it on the ground; after which insolencies they made an incursion toward the duke of Virtembeag's Country: where, as many as they took of the country-people, they barbarously mangled and slue, not sparing the very infants.

The Hungarians hauing had many treaties in the prouinciall Assembly, there were these heads following offred to the Emperor by the Noble-men to be confirmed: that there should be free exercise of religion vnder both kindes, by what name soeuer it should be called, and that the Palatine of Hungary should haue authority to punish the Bishops if they should attempt any thing to the contrary; secondly, that the Emperor should haue power to put Germans in garison into the frontier Towns and Forts, giuing order for their sufficient pay, and where they should receiue it, lest they should be inforced to fall to spoil, and thereby waste the Countrey; if otherwise, they would then place Hungarians vpon the Frontiers, yet vnder the Emperours command: thirdly, that the coin should be reduced to the antient value; whereby the Hungarians might traffick more commodiously with the Turks, and the subiects should not be so oppressed by the Magistrates: fourthly, that all grieuances (whereof they had often complained) might be taken away and redressed.

To these foure heads the Emperor made answer, first, that they should haue free exercise of religion, were it Caluenian, Lutheran, or any other: but hee had no power ouer the clergie in spiritual matters; that they should try if they could obtain that power from the Pope, to whom would he write touching that busines: secondly, that he could not excuse the drawing away of the Germans from the Frontiers by the Princes and States of the Empire, who supplied the charges for the defense of the Frontiers against the incursions of the Turk: yet it would be dangerous, that they being drawn away would be forsaken if the Turk should make any sudden irruption; but they should haue two Noble-men, Hungarians, resident in his Court and of his Councell, who should haue a care that the contributions of the Empire should not be imploid to any other vse than the defense of the Frontiers of Hungary: thirdly, that touching the reduction of monies to their old values, his reuenues had been so miserably wasted in the charges of the Court, that they were not able to entertain the souldiers; but there should bee a care taken for the restitution and reforming thereof, as soon as the troubles of the Empire were pacified: fourthly, touching the grieuances of the Empire (whereof they complained) they had not been taken away, compounded nor redrest by any former King; yet if his Imperiall Maiesty should finde, that they were such as concerned that Kingdome onely, and no other Prouinces, hee would be pleased that twelue of the Nobility of Hungary should bee chosen; who, conferring with the Palatine, all grieuances (according to the constitutions of the Kingdome) should bee examined by them, abrogated and compounded; promising, that he would not contradict their answers, but allow of their resolutions.

Hagenau and Spire taken by Leopold.

After MANSFELD's departure out of the limits of the Empire; the Bauarians being now Masters in a maner of the whole Palatinate, and hauing no enemy to crosse their designes, took Frisseisheim, Winsnig, Neustad and some other places, without any great opposition. The Bishop of Spire in like manner recouered some Townes belonging to his iurisdiction: and the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, being aduertised of his departure, came with his Army out of the vpper Alsatia, and recouered Hagenaw; from whence he went to Spire: where the Bishop entring on the 9 of August on horseback with two companies of foot & one of horse, within few hours after he arriued with great troupes; to whom the Magistrates of the City presented wine as they had done to TILLY.

After which, the Senate, submitting themselues to the deuotion of the Emperour, did put in anew garrison and discharged the olde, causing the citizens to bring all their Armes into the Court. Presently after, they went to besiege Germesheim: which they battered with their cannon, and the Besieged in the beginning defended themselues valiantly; yet, finding no hope of any releefe, they offred to treate: but in the meane time, the Croatians, on the 14 of August, getting ouer the walls, made a cruell slaughter of men, women and children; meaning to leaue none liuing if the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had not restrained their fury by a seuere Edict. And, not long after, Wormes, which had supplied the souldiers of the Bauarian and Spanish Armies with great store of victualls, was also surprised by the Arch-duke LEOPOLD; to the great losse of the Citizens; where the old garrison was discharged and a new brought in.

The cruelty of the Croatians.

All things tending to ruine and desolation in the Palatinate, about the same time an Edict was made in Bohemia, and proclaimed by CHARLES, Duke of Silesia, concerning the goods of such as had been proscribed and banished; That wheras, in the yeer 1620, commandement had bin made in the Emperours name, to all the subiects of Bohemia, of what estate or dignitie soeuer, that were any way indebted to those Rebels and turbulent persons, by whose fault the kingdom had receiued an incomparable losse, and was brought in a maner to vtter ruine, or that had in their possession any gold, plate, or other moueables, by way of trust, borrowing, or other title, or did know were in the hands of any other, should presently without anie delay deliuer in their names and discouer them: and whereas many offending against this expresse Edict of his Imperiall Maiestie (not carrying themselues like faithfull subiects, but rather fraudulently consenting with those pernicious Rebels and enemies) had not beene conformable nor satisfied the contents thereof, but neglected the paiment of those debts, according to the Tenor of that and other Edicts; hee had therefore good and sufficient cause to proceede to the execution of all their goods moueable or immoueable: yet, to the end no man should haue cause to complaine of wrong, he would out of meere fauour and grace forbeare the execution thereof; giuing a strict command in the Empetours name, to all the Subiects of Bohemia, that if they had discouered any debts or goods belonging to those Rebels, and had not brought them into the Treasurie, or had dissembled them, and not discouered them to himselfe or some others who had that businesse in charge; that now, within one moneth after the publication of the sayd Edict, they should bring, or cause to be brought, the sayd debts or goods committed to their charge, into the Emperors Exchequer: If any one, neglecting this fauour, should continue obstinate, or presume in any sort to alienate the goods of these Rebels thus condemned, or hereafter to be condemned, hee should presently bee censured to pay a Fine, thrice as much as the value.

An edict touching the goods of them which were proscribed in Bohemia.

On the fifteenth of August, the Emperour with his Empresse returned from the States of Hungary, to Vienna, with great content: where, soone after, a cause depending betwixt the eldest sonne of EDWARD Marquesse of Baden, against the Marquesse of Durlach and Baden, was heard before his Maiesty; whereas the said sonne of EDWARD, demanded to haue the vpper Marquisate graunted vnto him in Fee. This cause had been long in question, and the parties were now commanded to appeare in Court: where the Emperour sitting in his Imperiall Throne, the Vice Chancellor of Vlmes made a speech, shewing that his Maiesty was ready to discharge his duty, and to administer Iustice to all men; especially to widowes and Pupills. And whereas the cause had beene long debated before three Emperours, and the Tutors of the dispossessed Pupills of the Marquesse of Baden had beene humble suters to haue the cause decided (diuers Kings, Electors, and Princes, hauing beene also intercessors vnto his Maiesty in that behalfe) hee would no longer deferre it; and the rather, for that the Defendant sought many delayes; and would haue more time spent to informe his

The Emperors iudgement touching the Marquisate of Baden.

1622 Maiesties better. He had therefore caused all the Acts to bee viewed by his Councell: which done, the sentence, which was to be pronounced by the Secretarie, was concluded by all their consents. His speech being ended, the Imperiall Secretarie read the sentence publiquely; which contained, That the Marquesse of Durlach the defendant should not onely yeeld and restore the vpper Marquisat, with all the fruits receiued & to receiue, to the heir of EDVVARD, but also pay him all the charges of the sute; A heauy sentence for this poore Prince after the ruine of his Countrie and so great losses: but, I doubt not but his willingnesse to assist the Elector Palatine in his iust defence of the Palatinate, did make the Emperour so willing to proceede vnto iudgement, whereby hee hath now in a manner ruined another Protestant Prince.

Mansfelds course going into the low countrys

Let vs now return to Count MANSFELD, who had incamped some weeks neer vnto Mouson. The world expecting what course he would take, euery man spake of him according to his fansie. Some said he was a souldier of fortune; that he had more ambition in him then Religion: That he would serue him that should offer him the faireſt conditions, and that he had offered himselfe to the State of Venice, to the Duke of Sauoy, to the Duke of Bouillon, and them of the Religion in France, to the French King and to the vnited States. It was generally giuen out, that he should serue the French King vpon very noble conditions; with which supposition, he sought to satisfie his discontented Souldiers who were ready to mutine, telling them that he expected a messenger from the King; whereof there was some likely-hood, hauing treated with some of his Ministers. This did somewhat pacifie his Souldiers; yet there were many which would not enter into the kings pay. And to make the Inhabitants of Mouson the more confident, he put his Ordinance into their Towne, desiring them to assist him with some victuals for his Army, for that he was to follow the King. Whereupon the Townesmen, giuing credit to his words, sent him out presently Corne to refresh his Troups; but in the meane time he contracted secretly with the States of Holland, and entred into their pay.

The Earle being come to Mouson, the Infanta of Spaine (doubting that he would come down to assist the vnited States) called home Don GONZALES de Cordoua, with all his Army (being fourteene thousand horse and foot well Armed) who marched with great speede through Luxeubourg and the countrey of Liege vpon the Riuer of Mense, to stoppe MANSFELD in his passage: and as LONDORPIVS writes, the Baron of Anhalt was sent after him with another Army into Lorraine to preuent his return into Germany.

The Earle, hauing receiued resolution from the States, soone after demanded his Ordinance from the Townesmen of Mouson, pretending that he would march directly to the King. And to the end they should the more credit him, he deliuered money to certain Captaines, for the leuying of Souldiers within their Towne: after which he beganne to march, discouering his intent to all his Army, shewing them his Letters-patents which he had receiued from the States, and withall telling them that they must resolue to fight more then once. Seeing himselfe out of daunger, his and the Dukes Army past Auesnes; and on the twenty seuenth of August attempted Mauberg: but, being fortified with a good garrison, they only burnt the suburbs, and so past the Riuer of Sambre with their whole Army. There he and the Duke of Brunswick burnt most of their Carts, mounting their foote-men on the horses, getting also many other in the Countrey; whereby he might aduance with the more speede in the march. They were held to haue 14000 men in their Army, horse and foote: but it is confidently reported, his horse-men were very ill Armed, hauing for the most part no Armes at all but their Swords and Pistols. They were now in an Enemies countrey, where there was nothing to relieue them but what the Trees would afford; all the Boores being in Arms watching some oportunity to set vpon them, if Don CORDOVA should put them to route. The Earle comming to Iamblours which lyeth betweene Haynault and Namures, his Souldiers being weary and tyred with long marches and want of victuals, he caused them to rest and refresh themselues. Don CORDOVA was encamped, neere vnto Fleury, in a straite whereas Count MANSFELD and the Duke of Brunswick must of necessity passe, hauing a very good Army of Souldiers with an infinite number of Boores. Some write that MANSFELD, comming neere vnto CORDOVAS Campe, he sent a Trumpet vnto him, to know whether he would giue him passage or fight: who answering that he had charge to stop his passage and to fight, The Earle presently prepared to charge (knowing there was daunger in delaies) the which his men performed so resolutely, as they put CORDOVAS men to route and surprised his Ordinance from the Boores, the which they kept for the space of two houres, but afterwards they recouered it againe;

Where-

Whereupon the fight grew very cruell: the Duke of Brunswick (behauing himselfe most valiantly) was shot in the left Arme neere vnto the wrist; yet, notwithstanding, he would not leaue the field, but continued still fighting; so as with the losse of blood, and heate, his wound so enflamed, as afterwards hee was enforced to haue this arme cut off aboue the Elbow. To conclude, after a long fight, Count MANDSFELD hauing slaine many, especially of the Boores; Don CORDOVA was forced to sound a retreit: whereupon Count MANSFELD and the Duke of Brunswick, being Masters of the field, marched directly towards Breda, hauing taken much of the Enemies baggage and some of his Ordinance. What men were lost in this battaile is not certaine: but at their comming to Breda they mustered, as it is written, 10000 men; besides many sick and weary, which came daily vnto them. 1622

I cannot relate the particular circumstances of this battaile, being so diuersly reported by such as haue written thereof, nor what their particular losses were; neither doth it concerne this Historie, being out of the limits of the Empire: But thus much I dare boldly affirme, that it was one of the most resolute (if not desperate) exploits that hath been performed in our Age, to see a weake Army (the horse-men hauing no Armes but their Swords and Pistolls) tired with long marches in an enemies countrey, where they had nothing to friend but the Heauens which couered them; to encounter a powerfull Army, fortified with the best men, from the neighbour garrisons, and seconded with at least 20000 Boores Armed; to charge them in their own strength, to force through them, to make them retire after great losse, and then (being masters of the field) to march almost 30 or 40 miles through the enemies country, there being 10 or 12 strong Towns with great garrisons in their way; who no doub. would haue cut them in peeces if they had been routed. The Prince of Orrange (being aduertised of their march) sent them bread and other prouision to refiesh their hungry Souldiers before their comming to Breda. At Brussels they proclaimed a Triumph before the victory, and made bonfires with a confident assurance they were quite ouerthrown, for that certaine Ensignes of the Duke of Brunswick's and Count MANSFELD's were brought thither; but afterwards their mirth was turned to heauinesse, when they had intelligence of the truth, how that Don CORDOVA had been forced to retire with great losse; that they were Masters of the field, and had burnt the corn and countrey as they past, and were safely arriued at Breda, where they were receiued with great ioy by the Prince of Orrange, the vnited States and the whole Army.

Towards the end of July, Count MANSFELD and the Duke of Brunswick being retired out of the Palatinate with their forces, and no man left there able to make head against the Enemy; The Baron of TILLY, Generall for the Emperour, returned againe to Heidelberg with an Army of 15000 men, and laid a straight siege to the Towne and Castle. Presently after his sitting downe, he seized vpon a Fort, which had been built by IOHN Earle of Nassaw; but first abandoned by the besieged, lying too farre off to be well kept. From this Fort which lay behinde the Castle, he sought to annoy the Towne: and with the rest of his Army, he blocke vp Manheim and Frankendale to keepe all reliefe from them. Hauing fortified his Trenches, and planted certaine Ordinance, he played vpon the Towne, but did it no great harme; perswading himselfe that they would soone yeeld, being giuen to vnderstand that they wanted Salt and all kinde of victuall but Breade and Wine. With this perswasion hee spent aboue two Moneths before the Towne, and neuer tooke any of their out-workes or place of any importance, but summoned them often, and perswaded them to yeeld obedience to the Emperour: but finding that his perswasions preuailed nothing, and that his long stay there had not yet driuen them to any extremity of hunger; he resolued to attempt some thing by force. The Towne was commaunded by a Dutch-man, whose name was MERVIN, vnder whom were good Troupes of Souldiers of diuers Nations besides the Inhabitants. Heidelberg besieged, & taken by Tilly.

The Castle was vnder the charge of Sir GARRET HARBERT with 2 Companies of English, his owne and Sir IOHN WENTVVORTHS, being not aboue two hundred strong, whereof there were not aboue one hundred and forty English, the rest were of other Nations. On the fift and sixt daies of September, Generall TILLY plaid with his Ordinance vpon their out-workes, resoluing to giue a generall assault.

Those out-workes without Spire Port were defended by the Dutch, and might well haue beene kept against any daring Enemie whatsoeuer, if they had had any courage or valour in them: But presently after their approach, and before they came to the foote of their Rampart; a Dutch Captaine whose name was GRAY, and had the commaund of the first out-worke, most cowardly abandoned it, and in this amazement all the rest of the troup 1622 caſt away their Armes and fled towards the towne, or yeelded themſelues to the enemy; where wee will leaue them a while and turne towards the Caſtle, where the enemy had ſent to aſſault an outwork called the Pheſant garden by 2000 men; which Sir GARRET HARBERT defended valiantly with one hundred of his men: They came often to the ſcalado, and were valiantly repulſed by the defendants, where as the Gouernor brake three pikes, hauing his page attending him with 6 more: but to the loſſe of this braue Captaine, and as we may coniecture to the loſſe of the place, he was ſhot in the head, hauing no head-peece, and was the firſt man which was ſlaine vpon the work: His Lieutenant was alſo ſhot in the ſhoulder and retired, yet the ſouldiers defended it valiantly, the ſpace of two houres after, vntill that the enemy had left ſhooting. The Dutch being fled from the defenſe of the outworks and comn into the Suburbs, the Gouernour ſhut the Towne gates againſt them, ſo that many of them were either ſlaine or taken priſoners.

The enemy comming to Spire Port commanded Petards to be brought to force it: but in the meane time certaine Crabats (which are aduenturing Boote-halers of Croatia like vnto the Coſſaques and liue vpon ſpoile) got by the riuer to the water Port, and entred; where they beganne to fier the houſes and to ſpoile. During the which, TILLY forced the Port and in this confuſion the Gouernour, Captaines, with many ſouldiers, Burgers, and women fled to the Caſtle; and in the meane time, the inſolent ſouldiers fell to ſlaughter and ſpoile in the Towne. Notwithſtanding all this diſaſter, the Engliſh ſtill maintained their worke vntill that the gouernour had perſwaded them to retire: they alſo fearing that the enemy might come vpon their backs from the Towne; yet they ſhewed no amazement in their retreat; for they drew away their ordinance and munition, and brought off the bodies of ſuch as had beene ſlaine being but 13 in all. TILLY being Maſter of the Towne, and hauing abandoned it to the ſpoile of the ſouldier, he ſummoned the Caſtle to yeeld: where the Gouernour MERVIN, hauing propounded large conditions for himſelfe and his troupes, in the end it was concluded, 1. That he ſhould yeeld vp to Generall TILLY, the Caſtle, with the Cannon, munition and all other inſtruments of warre, to the behoofe of his Imperiall Maieſty, with all other goods, Iewels, writings or any other thing belonging to the Count Palatine and the Princeſſe his wife; onely that excepted which the General out of his grace ſhould ſuffer to paſſe. 2. That the Gouernor, Colonels, Captains, and ſouldiers with all other belonging to them, might depart with their drums beating and full Armes, and with all their baggage, ſo that it were their owne and not belonging to the Caſtle or Towne. 3. That they ſhould haue a ſafe conduct giuen them to Franckfort or any other place whither they would go, except Manheim and Frankendall. 4. That they ſhould haue carriages allowed them by the Generall. 5. That all low Dutch, French, Engliſh and other ſtrangers which were priſoners, ſhould be ſet at liberty without any ranſome: As alſo on the other ſide, all priſoners ſhould be reſtored vnto the Generall vpon the ſame tearmes. 6. All ſick and wounded ſouldiers ſhold be put into ſome conuenient place, and there maintained with neceſſarie releefe, where hauing recouerd their health, they ſhould haue ſuch paſſeports giuen them as they ſhould deſire: That none ſhould be moleſted in body or goods for debt or any other occaſion. This was the Capitulation concluded vpon the 9 of September: and the next day he gaue them a ſafe conduct; entreating all the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire, of what dignity or quality ſoeuer, to giue free paſſage vnto Mounſieur MERVIN ſometimes Gouernor of Heidelberg, with his companies and baggage, through all their Principalities and Segniories, gluing them all aſſiſtance for the aduancement of their Iouney. The next day MERVIN went out of Heydelberg with ſeauen hundred men of all nations; but the capitulation was ill obſerued: for as they marched through the ſtreete and ouer the bridge, the enemies ſouldiers ſtanding in guarde on either ſide, ſtript all they could lay hand on to their verie ſhirts: which bred a great tumult in the Towne. Whereof Generall TILLY being aduertiſed, hee came forth of his lodging to ſtay the ſouldiers furie, and conducted them three or foure miles out of towne with a troupe of 200 horſe, fearing the ſouldiers ſhould haue followed them to haue cut their throates. I cannot forget one inhumane act of Generall TILLY's, who would not ſuffer the body of that braue and valiant Knight Sir GARRET HARBERT to be buried like a Chriſtian in the Towne Church, but they were forced to lay him in the greene Court in the Caſtle; there being nothing in the Towne to embalme his bodie, which they meant to haue brought into England, his worth deſeruing a moment of better note.

The yeelding vp of the Caſtle of Heidelberg

The Gouernour with the ſouldiers, being (as ſome affirme that were preſent) 700 men, came ſafely to Franckfort, whereas my Lord CHICHESTER then remained attending directions

1622 tions from his Maieſty, either to go to the Diet appointed at Reinsberg, or to returne home into England: by whoſe meanes the Engliſh receiued money to conduct them into the Low Countries or home, by the hands of Maſter BOVRLEMACK, who was appointed Paymaſter in thoſe parts to the Engliſh and other ſouldiers that were entertained in his Maieſties name for the defence of the Palatinate.

Thus the cheefe place of reſidence for the Elector Palatine was by the baſe cowardize of the Dutch loſt, and with it one of the goodlieſt Libraries in the world; a Iewell which cannot well be valued, for the many rare Manuſcripts which had beene there gathered together by his predeceſſors. The Duke of Bauaria did highly eſteeme this prize, and committed the guard thereof to his Ieſuits. The ſouldiers being gone, the Inhabitants were miſerablie ſpoiled by the enemy; who ſtript both men & women, ſo as they neither had clothes to couer them, nor meat to releeue them, but what they got from Heilbrim or Franckfort: and yet their cruelty was ſuch as they forced the poore inhabitants to ranſome themſelues, and to pay the ſouldiers which were left there in garriſon.

The loſſe of this Towne did adde much to the king of Bohemias other afflictions: Hee was then at Sedan vnder the protection of the Duke of Bouillon, his Vncle; deſiring much to be at the Hague with that Noble and generous Princeſſe his wife: but the difficulty was to paſſe. To goe thtough the Low Countries was not poſſible; all was ſubiect to the enemy: and to paſſe diſguiſed through France as he had formerly done, there was little hope, he was too well knowne; but he was ſoone freed of theſe apprehenſions: for the French king, either by the interceſſion of ſom others, or out of his owne princely and generous diſpoſition commiſerating the diſtreſſed ſtate of this Prince (whoſe houſe had alwaies beene firmely allied to the Crowne of France, and had aſſiſted it in the greateſt extremity of their affaires) ſent him a ſafe conduct to paſſe freely through his kingdom to what Port he pleaſed, commanding all his ſubiects to giue him that aſſiſtance and reſpect which was fit for the greatneſſe of his perſon. Whereupon he took leaue of the Duke of Bouillon, who gaue him a conuoy of 100 horſe to conduct him to Callis: where the Gouernour receiued him with much honour, and the people obſerued him with much reuerence and reſpect. There he embarqued in ſome of the States Ships, and ſo came ſafely to the Hague, where he was ioyfully receiued by the Queene his wife and the whole Court.

The King of Bohemia goes from Sedan to the Hague.

Let vs turne head a little towards Bohemia and the incorporated prouinces, whereas the Emperour was now abſolutely obeyed, Glatz only excepted; which had beene long beſieged: yet the ſubiects were in no great ſecurity. For they were both queſtioned for their liues and ſtates, and were in danger to loſe the free exercize of religion, the which had beene promiſed them at the reduction of thoſe prouinces. The Emperour ſent his Commiſſioners both into Bohemia & Moravia, to call diuers Lords and men of account in queſtion, touching the late combuſtions. 1. All thoſe were to be queſtioned which where preſent when ſome of the Councell were caſt out of the windowes in Prague. 2. Thoſe which had conſented to the League againſt the Emperor and the houſe of Auſtria. 3. Thoſe which had beene at the Emperours reiection, and ſuch as had beene preſent at the Count Palatines election to the Crowne of Bohemia. And laſtly all ſuch as had marched in Armes againſt Viena.

Executions in Bohemia and Moravia.

In Moravia many Noblemen and others of note, abſenting themſelues, were proclaimed Traitors, their names fixed on the common gallows, degraded of their honours, and their Lands & goods forfeited, which were preſently ſeiſed on to the Emperours vſe; nor did they ſpare the dead: for the Emperours Commiſſioners began to examine the cauſes of the deceaſed rebels (as they tearmed them) meaning to brand them with infamie after their deaths; and reduce their heirs to miſerie, by the confiſcation of their eſtates, for that is alwaies the concluſion; being a great meanes to raiſe money to pay the Coſſaques and other ſoldiers. It was alſo giuen out, that the Commiſſioners in Bohemia would proceede criminally againſt all thoſe that had borne Armes vnder the Prince of Anhalt, Count HOLOCH, Count MANDSFELD, or any other, his Maieſties enemies: which Article had ſo large an extent, and would comprehend ſo many of all degrees, that if they ſhould proceed with rigour againſt them, the Emperour ſhould bee faine to bring in new Colonies to repeople thoſe Prouinces: but it ſeems they took a milder courſe: for, diuerſe Lords and Knights with other Citizens, being condemned at Brin in Moravia to loſe their heads, their corporall puniſhments were turned into impriſonment; ſome for their liues, ſom for yeers: but there was no grace for their goods; they were ſtill forfeited. And thus haue they proceeded touching the examination of ſome Lords and others, whom they tearmed rebels, in Bohemia and Moravia.

1622 The protestant churches shut in Prague.

Touching matters of religion, it seemd the Emperor had an intent to root out the Protestants in Bohemia and the incoaporated Prouinces: for, the Prince or Lantzgraue of Lichtenstein, Lieutenant of Bohemia for the Emperor, had commission from him to shut vp the two Dutch Protestant Churches in Prague, and to presse the City and Country to reformation in religion; the which was put in execution: so as they were likely to lose the comfort of the Gospell by the preaching of their Ministers, and the grounds of religion which the youth learned by the instruction of their Teachers: for, both the Ministers and Preachers were commanded to be presently gon; which did much afflict the Protestants: and the Colledges where their youth was instructed, were shut vp. There was also commandement giuen by publique proclamation to all book-sellers and Stationers, to bring-in a catalogue of all their Lutheran & Caluinian books to the Secretary of State, within foureteen daies, vpon great penalties.

The Duke of Saxony, hauing notice giuen him of this alteration in Bohemia touching the shutting vp of the Protestant Churches, was much discontented, both in regard of his owne particular, being of that religion, and might in time be subiect to the like calamity with the rest of the protestant Princes of Germany; as also houlding his honour to be blemished, for that, at the reduction of those Countries to the Emperors obedience, hee had promised them by warrant from the Emperor, that the Churches should not be molested, nor they depriued of the free exercise of their religion, hauing also taken them into his protection; and therefore the Duke obiected these proceedings to the Emperors Ambassador as a wrong done to him: and beeing still importuned by the petitions of the Preachers which had been driuen out of their Countries, he wrote to the Prince of Lichtenstein to this effect; that forasmuch as hee could not but take notice by sundry aduertisements from Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, as also by the complaints of diuerse Preachers lately banished out of those Countries, of the restraint of the publike profession of the reformed religion, and of the shutting vp their Churches, and the putting down of their schools: yet for that men in miserie do commonly seek to moue pity by the report of their estates, and for that he had been alwaies better conceited of his Maiesties word, who had promised him, that if those Countries could bee reduced to obedience by his forces, he should by his Maiesties direction passe his word to the subiects of those Prouinces, that those of the reformed religion should still enioy their freedome of conscience: Wherefore, relying vpon the Emperors word, he would not rashly giue credit to those informations till he might hear the certainty both of the authority of his commission, and in what manner it had been executed: wherefore he could do no lesse in fauour of the cause, and for the honour of his owne word (whereon the inhabitants of those Prouinces had much relied) than to entreat him earnestly to aduertise him of the truth of the businesse; the which if he found conformable to the Petitioners complaints, he could not but hold his own honor ingaged to take care for a timely remedy, and withall imploy his credit and power with his Imperiall Maiesty for the staying of all future proceedings. Some think, these alterations in Bohemia staied the Duke of Saxony's iourney to the Diet at Regensbourg; who, continuing his discontents, gaue the Emperor to vnderstand by his Letters, that he was much grieued for the shutting vp of the 2 protestant Churches at Prague, the which did not belong to the Bohemians, but to the Electors and Princes of Germany, professing the gospell; who had built and maintained them at their owne charges, and procured them great priuiledges and immunities: wherefore his Maiesty had not to do with the Protestants of Bohemia, but with the Electors and Princes of the Empire, which should not suffer them of their owne religion (contrary to his Imperiall promise and the priuiledges of the Empire) to be persecuted and oppressed. This may breed some new combustion and trouble, vnlesse it shall please the Emperour to restore those Churches to their former estate and condition.

The Duke of Saxony writes to the Prince of Lichtenstein.

The siege of Glatz continued still: which being resolutely attempted by the Imperialists, it was as obstinately defended by the besieged. The young Earle of Thurne, making many salies vpon the Enemie, cloyed some of their Cannons and returned with good spoiles and much honour: but in September there was an accident which did much impaire the state of the town; for they setting fire of their suburbs, to the end the Imperialists should not lodge in them, some sparks of it fell by chance into their powder; whereby part of the Town, and much of their prouision was burnt; and likewise a part of the wall, with two peeces of Ordinance falling downe, through the violence of the fire, the Imperialists aduanced to a scallado, but they were valiantly repulsed by the Garrison.

The continuance of the siege of Glatz.

About the middest of October, the Imperialists assaulted the Towne with great fury: and they they within, suffering them to approach to their very walles, they hauing discharged their Ordinance, they presently set open their Ports and salied forth with one thousand horse and foot; where they slue six hundred of the Enemy, and then retired with no great losse. During these 1622 factions of warre before Glatz, there was a parley between the young Earle of Thurne, Gouernour of the Towne; the Earle of Torquato, Generall of the Emperours Army; and the Prince of Lichtenstein, Gouernour of Bohemia; where there were many propositions made vnto the young Earle with promises of pardon and great rewards, both for himselfe and his Souldiers, in the Emperors name, if he would yeeld vp the Towne. The young Earle of Thurn made them this answere:

That if they could procure the King of Bohemia to free him from his double Oath (one as he was his subiect, and the other as his Soldier) that then he would not only yeeld vp the towne and castle, but would also forsake the quarrell and lay down Armes: But, seeing they could not dispense him of his Oath, that both he and his companie were resolued to make it good against the Imperialists; and although they might haply, with great losse and charge, take the Towne, yet they had a Castle to retreat into, the which they would defend to the last man; and so the treaty brake off, euery man returning to his quarter: Presently after which, they made a great salie, which was very bloody and many were slaine on either side; among the which, there were thirteen Captains of the Imperialists.

They so annoyed the Campe with their Ordinance, as the Emperour commanded all his forces in Bohemia to march towards Glatz to re-enforce the siege, and they sent for powder, bullets and munition from all parts. The siege had continued almost two yeers, and had put the Emperor to wonderfull great charges, the which could hardly be supplied; and therefore they vsed a policy to make the besieged pay for their own ruine: for, by a publique proclamation in Silesia, they enioyned all men vpon paine of death, which ought any money, or had any goods in their hands belonging to them of Glatz, to bring it presently into the Towne-house at Presslawe: Whereupon, much money and goods was brought thither; which extremity hath beene often, and is still, vsed against the Nobility and Gentry of those Countries which had beene executed; yea, euen against such as were dead before they had beene called in question.

This Proclamation did nothing amaze them of Glatz, who held their Armes to be their greatest wealth, the which could not be violently taken from them, without the losse of their liues; and then their cares were past, and their scores paid: But, to auoide tediousnesse, I will omit the daily skirmishes which were before that Towne, and come to the yeelding of it. After a long and obstinate siege resolutely defended by the yong Earle of Thurne, they were driuen to some extremities, by reason of some casualties by fier, in the which their salt, powder, and meale was consumed, and their water cut off by the Imperialists: which daunted the Souldiers much, and made them mutine; so as the Gouernour (although he were one thousand fiue hundred strong) was glad to come to a parley, and to yeeld vp the Towne vpon honourable tearmes on the twenty sixt day of October. The Articles were, First, that they should haue free exercise of the reformed Religion, and their Church remaine as it was, vntill the Emperour shall otherwise dispose: And if any Protestant were desirous to leaue the Towne, they should haue free liberty to sell their goods within six moneths, and goe where they pleased. Secondly, that the Gouernour, Captains, Commaunders and Souldiers, both of Horse and Foote, should freely and safely depart with bagge and baggage, Drums beating, Colours flying, and their full Armes; conditionally, that all the companies should be cast and dismist about Swainitz, and there leaue their Commanders, and their Cornets and Ensignes to be torne from their staues, and all sworne not to beare Armes against the Emperour for six moneths following. Thirdly, that the Gouernour, Commanders, Officers and Souldiers, should haue a generall pardon for all offences and rebellions committed against the Emperour, and suffered to depart where they pleased. Fourthly, that all Commanders, Officers and Souldiers, which had serued his Maiesty, and now born Armes against him in this quarell, should haue Pasports giuen them to passe freely through the Dominions of the Empire, into their own Countries, or whither they pleased. Fiftly, the sick and hurt should remaine still in the Towne of Glatz, and there haue all due attendance and prouision from the Cittizens, for their cure and recouery; after which they shall haue free leaue to depart, and pasports giuen them to goe where they pleased. Sixtly, that the Earle of Thurne should leaue two Captaines with the Imperialists as Hostages vntill he had dismist his Troups about Swainitz, according to the capitulation.

The yeelding of Glatz.

These Articles, being very honourable for the Earle of Thurne and the besieged, were very 1622 duely obserued by the Imperialists, who gaue them a good conuoy to Swainitz, which is fiue German miles from Glatz. It was thought that they were very rich when they left the Town, hauing a hundred waggons heauy loden with baggage, beside lighter carriages: of which there were fifty belonging to the young Earle of Thurne, which were conducted to his wife in the Marquesse of Brandenburg's Country by 500 light horse of his owne, and a conuoy of 2000 Imperialists. Thus at last the Emperor hath reduced all Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces to his obedience; and his brother, the Arch-duke CHARLES Bishop of Nuis or Nisse, liking well the ayre of the Countrey and the strength of the place, hath gotten the gouernment of the countrey of Glatz, from the Emperor.

Heidelberg being lost, Generall TILLY marched presently with his Army to Manheim, where Generall VERE attended him; it being the place of most importance and best fortified in all the Palatinate, standing neer the point of a land where the Neccar which passeth by Heidelberg falleth into the Rhyne, so as it commands both the Riuers, and receiues the Toll of all boats which passe. The Enemy being set downe on the one side of the Towne; Generall VERE, considering that the guard thereof and of the out-workes was very great, and that he was not sufficiently prouided with men, hauing but seuen companies of English, and nine of Dutch (all which were very weake in numbers, and many sick) he sent to Franckendale, to haue Captain BYRROVVS to send him three companies more of English and as many Dutch: which he performed accordingly.

The Enemy, as soone as the oportunity of the swelling Riuers would giue him leaue, intrenched his Camp, and planted seuerall batteries. During his approaches, Generall VERE made diuers braue Sallies, especially one which was generall; in all which he slue many of the Enemy with little losse of his own: yet considering that in continuance he should waste his men, he hauing not in all full two thousand of all Nations, sick and whole, which would hardly be able to man his out-works, which were very great; and that after the losse of Manheim, Frankendale could not subsist; He sent a Commissary againe to Captaine BYRROVVS, wishing him to abandon the Towne and repaire vnto him with all his Troups: which the inhabitants vnderstanding, began to mutine, fell to Arms, and slue to the Ports; giuing the Gouernour to vnderstand, that as he had defended them valiantly the last yeere, so they would now liue and die with him, and not leaue him vnlesse he would passe by force ouer their bellies, desiring rather to be slaine by him then by the Enemy: Whereupon the Gouernour aduertised the Generall in what state he stood; who returned him an answere presently, that he should doe as he thought good, referring it to his discretion: whereupon he stayed in Frankendale.

Generall VERE, hauing no hope of any more supplies of men, was forced to abandon his out-workes, suffering the Enemy to approach neere to the Walles. After some dayes, the Town being not defensible, he set it on fire, and retired with those fewe troupes he had into the Castle, from whence he so annoyed the Enemy, as he could hardly lodge within the Town. TILLY often summoned him to yield vpon honourable conditions; but he found an Enemy who preferred his honour before his life, and would giue care to no parley, as long as he had any meanes to keepe it: Wherefore TILLY being loth to assault a Fort defended by such resolute men, resolued to get it by Mine or Sappe. His Pioners being come to the very brimme of the Moate, hauing with other Trenches drained away the Water, which at first was some hindrance vnto them; he then resolued to giue an assault; for the which he had prepared great store of bauins to fill vp the Dike: yet considering that to force this Castle would cost him much blood, and although they could not keepe the place long, yet he should hardly get it without great losse: He held it the safest course to summon them againe, and to get it by composition.

Generall VERE, on the other side, finding that he had neither men sufficient to man it long, and that he had not powder for three daies seruice; considering withall, that although they should lose themselues they could not keepe the Fort long, and knowing withall that dead men could doe their Prince and Countrey no seruice; he resolued to make a vertue of necessity, and not to lose so many braue men with obstinacy, whom he might bring off with honour: Whereupon, after summons made by the Enemies Drumme, Generall VERE accepted of a parley; in which, after much debating, there were six Articles concluded betwixt Mounsieur TILLY, Generall for the Emperour and the Duke of Bauaria on the one side; and Sir HORATIO VERE, Generall of his Maiesties forces of great Britaune in the Palatinate, on the other:

ther: The Articles were, that the Gouerner, Captaines, Officers and Souldiers, should haue leaue to depart freely with bag and baggage, drums beating, colours fleeing, matches light, and 1622 bullets in their mouthes: secondly, that they might take with them two falconets or small field-pieces, with munition and instruments belonging to the same: to the which, Monsieur TILLY (after some contestation) yeelded, to do honour to Sir HORATIO VERE, because he was a Generall; thirdly, that they might carry away with them thirty pipes of wine, with two hundred sacks of meal, and prouant for three daies onely; the which was to go with them by land, and the rest to be transported by water: fourthly, that they should haue a conuoy of one thousand horse to Frankfort, and there to stay foureteen daies till the English Ambassadour or his Commissarie might come to conueigh them downwards: fiftly, that all goods and moueables, which had been brought into the Castle for safety, should be free, and the owners haue liberty to transport themselues and their goods whither they pleased: sixtly, all Ministers and Church-men should haue free liberty either to stay in Manheim, and exercise their function, or depart safely whither they pleased.

Vpon these honourable conditions the Castle of Manheim was deliuered vp to the enemy on the fiue and twentith of October, stilo veteri. And so Generall VERE retired out of Manheim with ten companies of English, and twelue of Dutch vnder the command of Colonel WALDMANHVSE. He marched to Frankfort with a good conuoy of one thousand horse. The Generall with his Captains was lodged in the City; and his Troops, in the villages thereabouts. After their departure from Franfort, the Dutch left them, and would go no further, notwithstanding they had promised to march with them into the Lowe-countries: and after some stay, the Generall with the English, being fiue or six hundred men, were conducted by a Commissary of the enemies, through the Lantzgraue of Hesse his Country; where they past down a riuer to Breme, there to be embarked for England.

After the surrendring of Manheim, Generall TILLY marched with his Army to Franken- Frankendale dale (it being the onely place now remaining in the Palatinate for the Elector) with an intent, by besieged.
the taking of this place, to make himself absolute Master of the whole Palatinate: but he found the same Gouerner Captain BVRROVVES, who had so valiantly defended it the yeer before against Don GONZALES de Cordoua; and the same resolution, hauing vowed to lose his life rather than any iot of that honour which he had gotten at the former siege: neither was he idle during the siege of Heidelberg and Manheim, but furnished and fortified it by all the meanes hee could, hauing drowned the land about it on the weaker part of the Towne; so as the enemie could neither make trenches on that side to lodge his men in, nor approach his cannon to plant his batteries: yet it seemd still he was resolued to force it, drawing souldiers from all places thither with the hope of spoil, hauing promised them the sack of that Town: but he was deceiued of his present expectation; because the approaches were so difficult by reason of the drowned land, and the wayes so slippery and deep with the continuall rain, that he forbare to attempt any thing by force, and imploied his best eloquence to perswade the Inhabitants to yeeld. Hee assured them, that they should not be molested in their religion, nor oppressed with any great garrison; that the commerce should be open and free, and that the Emperor would keep no garisons in the Palatinate, but in some important places. To these good words Generall TILLY added some threats, that if they continued obstinate, they must expect nothing but the rigor of warre, and the ruines which are incident to Towns besieged; whereas by their voluntary yeelding they should purchase the Emperors fauour, preserue themselues, their wiues and children, and haue fair Quarter kept with them, and be protected by his Imperiall Maiesty with the rest of the Palatinate. All this could not moue the resolute Inhabitants; who had vowed to take the fortune of the warre, and to defend the Town with the Gouerner and souldiers: and therefore they gaue no answer to his propositions.

The Generall, after all his practices to draw them to a composition, finding little meanes to aduance any thing by force in regard of the vnseasonablenes of the weather, and the continuall rain which made the waies exceeding deep, he resolued to retire his camp for a time, marching towards Hannow and the Lantzgraue of Hesse his Country, with an intent to winter his Troops thereabouts, leauing some companies of horse about Frankendale, to keep them from excursions and from all relief. Thus this poor Town, the onely remainder of all the Palatinate, hath som time of rest and breathing, till that the season of the yeer will giue the enemy leaue to return; who is well assured, that they haue no means to be relieued, being enuironed by their enemies garrisons which ly in the Towns round about them; and that time will waste their prouisions, and factions of warre before Glatz, there was a parley between the young Earle of Thurne, Gouernour of the Towne; the Earle of Torquato, Generall of the Emperours Army; and the Prince of Lichtenstein, Gouernour of Bohemia; where there were many propositions made vnto the young Earle with promises of pardon and great rewards, both for himselfe and his Souldiers, in the Emperors name, if he would yeeld vp the Towne. The young Earle of Thurn made them this answere:

That if they could procure the King of Bohemia to free him from his double Oath (one as he was his subject, and the other as his Soldier) that then he would not only yeeld vp the towne and castle, but would also forsake the quarrell and lay down Armes: But, seeing they could not dispense him of his Oath, that both he and his companie were resolued to make it good against the Imperialists; and although they might haply, with great losse and charge, take the Towne, yet they had a Castle to retreat into, the which they would defend to the last man; and so the treaty brake off, euery man returning to his quarter: Presently after which, they made a great salie, which was very bloody and many were slaine on either side; among the which, there were thirteen Captains of the Imperialists.

They so annoyed the Campe with their Ordinance, as the Emperour commanded all his forces in Bohemia to march towards Glatz to re-enforce the siege, and they sent for powder, bullets and munition from all parts. The siege had continued almost two yeers, and had put the Emperor to wonderfull great charges, the which could hardly be supplied; and therefore they vsed a policy to make the besieged pay for their own ruine: for, by a publique proclamation in Silesia, they enioyned all men vpon paine of death, which ought any money, or had any goods in their hands belonging to them of Glatz, to bring it presently into the Towne-house at Presslawe: Whereupon, much money and goods was brought thither; which extremity hath beene often, and is still, vsed against the Nobility and Gentry of those Countries which had beene executed; yea, euen against such as were dead before they had beene called in question.

This Proclamation did nothing amaze them of Glatz, who held their Armes to be their greatest wealth, the which could not be violently taken from them, without the losse of their liues; and then their cares were past, and their scores paid: But, to auoide tediousnesse, I will omit the daily skirmishes which were before that Towne, and come to the yeelding of it. After a long and obstinate siege resolutely defended by the yong Earle of Thurne, they were driuen to some extremities, by reason of some casualties by fier, in the which their salt, powder, and meale was consumed, and their water cut off by the Imperialists: which daunted the Souldiers much, and made them mutine; so as the Gouernour (although he were one thousand fiue hundred strong) was glad to come to a parley, and to yeeld vp the Towne vpon honourable tearmes on the twenty sixt day of October. The Articles were, First, that they should haue free The yeelding vp of Glatz.
exercise of the reformed Religion, and their Church remaine as it was, vntill the Emperour shall otherwise dispose: And if any Protestant were desirous to leaue the Towne, they should haue free liberty to sell their goods within six moneths, and goe where they pleased. Secondly, that the Gouernour, Captains, Commaunders and Souldiers, both of Horse and Foote, should freely and safely depart with bagge and baggage, Drums beating, Colours flying, and their full Armes; conditionally, that all the companies should be cast and dismist about Swainitz, and there leaue their Commanders, and their Cornets and Ensignes to be torne from their staues, and all sworne not to beare Armes against the Emperour for six moneths following. Thirdly, that the Gouernour, Commanders, Officers and Souldiers, should haue a generall pardon for all offences and rebellions committed against the Emperour, and suffered to depart where they pleased. Fourthly, that all Commanders, Officers and Souldiers, which had serued his Maiesty, and now born Armes against him in this quarell, should haue Pasports giuen them to passe freely through the Dominions of the Empire, into their own Countries, or whither they pleased. Fiftly, the sick and hurt should remaine still in the Towne of Glatz, and there haue all due attendance and prouision from the Cittizens, for their cure and recouery; after which they shall haue free leaue to depart, and pasports giuen them to goe where they pleased. Sixtly, that the Earle of Thurne should leaue two Captaines with the Imperialists as Hostages vntill he had dismist his Troups about Swainitz, according to the capitulation.

These Articles, being very honourable for the Earle of Thurne and the besieged, were very duely obserued by the Imperialists, who gaue them a good conuoy to Swainitz, which is fiue German miles from Glatz. It was thought that they were very rich when they left the Town, hauing a hundred waggons heauy loden with baggage, beside lighter carriages: of which there were fifty belonging to the young Earle of Thurne, which were conducted to his wife in the Marqueſſe of Brandenburg's Country by 500 light horſe of his owne, and a conuoy of 2000 Imperialists. Thus at last the Emperor hath reduced all Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces to his obedience; and his brother, the Arch-duke CHARLES Bishop of Nuis or Nysse, liking well the ayre of the Countrey and the ſtrength of the place, hath gotten the gouernment of the countrey of Glatz, from the Emperor.

Heidelberg being loſt, Generall TILLY marched preſently with his Army to Manheim, where Generall VERE attended him; it being the place of moſt importance and beſt fortified in all the Palatinate, ſtanding neer the point of a land where the Neccar which paſſeth by Heidelberg falleth into the Rhyne, ſo as it commands both the Riuers, and receiues the Toll of all boats which paſſe. The Enemy being ſet downe on the one ſide of the Towne; Generall VERE, conſidering that the guard therof and of the out-workes was very great, and that he was not ſufficiently prouided with men, hauing but ſeuen companies of Engliſh, and nine of Dutch (all which were very weake in numbers, and many ſick) he ſent to Franckendale, to haue Captain BVRROVVS to ſend him three companies more of Engliſh and as many Dutch: which he performed accordingly.

The Enemy, as ſoone as the oportunity of the ſwelling Riuers would giue him leaue, intrenched his Camp, and planted ſeuerall batteries. During his approaches, Generall VERE made diuers braue Sallies, eſpecially one which was generall; in all which he ſlue many of the Enemy with little loſſe of his own: yet conſidering that in continuance he ſhould waſte his men, he hauing not in all full two thouſand of all Nations, ſick and whole, which would hardly be able to man his out-works, which were very great; and that after the loſſe of Manheim, Franckendale could not ſubſiſt; He ſent a Commiſſary againe to Captaine BVRROVVES, wiſhing him to abandon the Towne and repaire vnto him with all his Troups: which the inhabitants vnderſtanding, began to mutine, fell to Arms, and ſlue to the Ports; giuing the Gouernour to vnderſtand, that as he had defended them valiantly the laſt yeere, ſo they would now liue and die with him, and not leaue him vnleſſe he would paſſe by force ouer their bellies, deſiring rather to be ſlaine by him then by the Enemy: Whereupon the Gouernour aduertiſed the Generall in what ſtate he ſtood; who returned him an anſwere preſently, that he ſhould doe as he thought good, referring it to his diſcretion: whereupon he ſtayed in Frankendale.

Generall VERE, hauing no hope of any more ſupplies of men, was forced to abandon his out-workes, ſuffering the Enemy to approach neere to the Walles. After ſome dayes, the Town being not defenſible, he ſet it on fire, and retired with thoſe fewe troupes he had into the Caſtle, from whence he ſo annoyed the Enemy, as he could hardly lodge within the Town. TILLY often ſummoned him to yield vpon honourable conditions; but he found an Enemy who preferred his honour before his life, and would giue eare to no parley, as long as he had any meanes to keepe it: Wherefore TILLY being loth to aſſault a Fort defended by ſuch reſolute men, reſolued to get it by Mine or Sappe. His Pioners being come to the very brimme of the Moate, hauing with other Trenches drained away the Water, which at firſt was ſome hindrance vnto them; he then reſolued to giue an aſſault; for the which he had prepared great ſtore of bauins to fill vp the Dike: yet conſidering that to force this Caſtle would coſt him much blood, and although they could not keepe the place long, yet he ſhould hardly get it without great loſſe: He held it the ſafeſt courſe to ſummon them againe, and to get it by compoſition.

Generall VERE, on the other ſide, finding that he had neither men ſufficient to man it long, and that he had not powder for three daies ſeruice; conſidering withall, that although they ſhould loſe themſelues they could not keepe the Fort long, and knowing withall that dead men could doe their Prince and Countrey no ſeruice; he reſolued to make a vertue of neceſſity, and not to loſe ſo many braue men with obſtinacy, whom he might bring off with honour: Whereupon, after ſummons made by the Enemies Drumme, Generall VERE accepted of a parley; in which, after much debating, there were ſix Articles concluded betwixt Mounſieur TILLY, Generall for the Emperour and the Duke of Bauaria on the one ſide; and Sir HORATIO VERE, Generall of his Maieſties forces of great Britaune in the Palatinate, on the other:

ther: The Articles were, that the Gouerner, Captaines, Officers and Souldiers, ſhould haue leaue to depart freely with bag and baggage, drums beating, colours ſteeing, matches light, and bullets in their mouthes: ſecondly, that they might take with them two falconets or ſmall field-pieces, with munition and inſtruments belonging to the ſame: to the which, Monſieur TILLY (after ſome conteſtation) yeelded, to do honour to Sir HORATIO VERE, becauſe he was a Generall; thirdly, that they might carry away with them thirty pipes of wine, with two hundred ſacks of meal, and prouant for three daies onely; the which was to go with them by land, and the reſt to be tranſported by water: fourthly, that they ſhould haue a conuoy of one thouſand horſe to Frankfort, and there to ſtay foureteen daies till the Engliſh Ambaſſadour or his Commiſſarie might come to conueigh them downwards: fiftly, that all goods and moueables, which had been brought into the Caſtle for ſafety, ſhould be free, and the owners haue liberty to tranſport themſelues and their goods whither they pleaſed: ſixtly, all Miniſters and Church-men ſhould haue free liberty either to ſtay in Manheim, and exerciſe their function, or depart ſafely whither they pleaſed. 1622

Vpon theſe honourable conditions the Caſtle of Manheim was deliuered vp to the enemy on the fiue and twentith of October, ſtilo veteri. And ſo Generall VERE retired out of Manheim with ten companies of Engliſh, and twelue of Dutch vnder the command of Colonel WALDMANHVSE. He marched to Frankfort with a good conuoy of one thouſand horſe. The Generall with his Captains was lodged in the City; and his Troops, in the villages thereabouts. After their departure from Franfort, the Dutch left them, and would go no further, notwithſtanding they had promiſed to march with them into the Lowe-countries: and after ſome ſtay, the Generall with the Engliſh, being fiue or ſix hundred men, were conducted by a Commiſſary of the enemies, through the Lantzgraue of Heſſe his Country; where they paſt down a riuer to Breme, there to be embarked for England.

After the ſurrendring of Manheim, Generall TILLY marched with his Army to Frankendale (it being the onely place now remaining in the Palatinate for the Elector) with an intent, by the taking of this place, to make himſelf abſolute Maſter of the whole Palatinate: but he found the ſame Gouerner Captain BVRROVVES, who had ſo valiantly defended it the yeer before againſt Don GONZALES de Cordoua; and the ſame reſolution, hauing vowed to loſe his life rather than any iot of that honour which he had gotten at the former ſiege: neither was he idle during the ſiege of Heidelberg and Manheim, but furniſhed and fortified it by all the meanes hee could, hauing drowned the land about it on the weaker part of the Towne; ſo as the enemie could neither make trenches on that ſide to lodge his men in, nor approach his cannon to plant his batteries: yet it ſeemd ſtill he was reſolued to force it, drawing ſouldiers from all places thither with the hope of ſpoil, hauing promiſed them the ſack of that Town: but he was deceiued of his preſent expectation; becauſe the approaches were ſo difficult by reaſon of the drowned land, and the wayes ſo ſlippery and deep with the continuall rain, that he forbare to attempt any thing by force, and imploied his beſt eloquence to perſwade the Inhabitants to yeeld. Hee aſſured them, that they ſhould not be moleſted in their religion, nor oppreſſed with any great garriſon; that the commerce ſhould be open and free, and that the Emperor would keep no garriſons in the Palatinate, but in ſome important places. To theſe good words Generall TILLY added ſome threats, that if they continued obſtinate, they muſt expect nothing but the rigor of warre, and the ruines which are incident to Towns beſieged; whereas by their voluntary yeelding they ſhould purchaſe the Emperors fauour, preſerue themſelues, their wiues and children, and haue fair Quarter kept with them, and be protected by his Imperiall Maieſty with the reſt of the Palatinate. All this could not moue the reſolute Inhabitants; who had vowed to take the fortune of the warre, and to defend the Town with the Gouerner and ſouldiers: and therefore they gaue no anſwer to his propoſitions. Frankendale beſieged.

The Generall, after all his practices to draw them to a compoſition, finding little meanes to aduance any thing by force in regard of the vnſeaſonablenes of the weather, and the continuall rain which made the waies exceeding deep, he reſolued to retire his camp for a time, marching towards Hannow and the Lantzgraue of Heſſe his Country, with an intent to winter his Troops thereabouts, leauing ſome companies of horſe about Frankendale, to keep them from excurſions and from all relief. Thus this poor Town, the onely remainder of all the Palatinate, hath ſom time of reſt and breathing, till that the ſeaſon of the yeer will giue the enemy leaue to return; who is well aſſured, that they haue no means to be relieued, being enuironed by their enemies garriſons which ly in the Towns round about them; and that time will waſte their prouiſions, and 1622 and neceſſity force the ſtowreſt courages to yeeld. TILLY retiring his Army, the gouernor of the Towne ſalied forth, and ſlew diuerſe of the enemies Rereward, and brought in good ſpoile. After which, he made incurſions with two companies of horſe, as farre as Wormes & Spire, bringing-in what the poore waſted Countrey could afford. But, all this will not ſerue to maintain the Towne, for any long time.

The Prince of Orrenge, with the vnited States had (as you haue heard) in the yeere 1620 built a fort in the riuer of Rhine betwixt Cullen and Bona, which was agreat eyeſore vnto them, and did keepe the paſſage of the riuer, and the neighbour Prouinces in awe: whereupon this Summer, the Duke of Newburg one of the pretendents to the inheritance of the Duchies of Cleue, Iuliers and Berck, ſent ſome forces vnder a commander of his to beſiege it, being aſſiſted by the Archduchеſſe Infanta, who ſent the Prince of Cheine with men, cannon and munition. Theſe forces built fortes vpon either ſide of the riuer and planted their batteries, hauing receiued ſome cannon from Iuliers or Gulich: they alſo maintained two ſhips of war in the Rhine, whereby all boates which came vp or downe with any merchandiſe were forced to diſcharge and carrie it ouer land by cart, leſt the beſieged ſhould receiue any reliefe. They haue ſpent a long time at this ſiege without any great militarie exploits: onely they haue not ſpared their powder and ſhot, but yet made no great breach which might encourage them to offer an aſſault; for the which they haue made great preparation of Rhine boates, Punts, and ſuch like, as if they intended to force it; but the garriſon ſeemed reſolute: Yet ſince, in the end of December, the garriſon being growne very weake, they haue beene forced to yeeld.

Count MANDSFELD, after his retreit out of the Palatinate, entred into the States pay for three moneths: thoſe being ended, and the ſiege of Bergh raiſed, he marched vp with his and the Duke of Brunſwicks forces towards Weſtphalia, and the Archbiſhop of Cullens countrie, which is within the limits of the Empire; and there took ſome Townes and Caſtles, ſpoiling and ranſoming the Countrey to reuenge the wrong which the Archbiſhop of Cullen had done vnto the Elector Palatine in ſending the Baron of Anhalt his Generall with forces thither: from thence he went into East Freezland and the County of Emden, the Earle whereof had maintained a Regiment of foote with the Spaniard againſt the vnited States. Being in thoſe parts he blocked vp Lingen a farre off (which Towne had beene taken by SPINOLA before the truce, and did belong by inheritance to the Prince of Orrenge) and he forced the ſaid Earle to abandon his Countrey and to leaue his poore ſubiects to the furie of inſolent ſouldiers; ſo as the Biſhoprick of Munſter and the Territorie of Emden were in a manner ruined and left waſte. SPINOLA ſent Count HENRY VANDENBERO, the Baron of Anhalt, with ſome other commanders, with forces to follow him into thoſe parts: but MANSFELD, hauing ſeized vpon Neppel, Reenen, and ſome other Townes about Lingen, kept all victuall from them, whereby the ſouldiers are in ſome diſtreſſe: He fortifies himſelfe daily with new troupes which are leuied in thoſe Countries for the Duke of Brunſwick, and builds ſconſes vpon the paſſages by the which the enemy might come vnto him: ſo as there is no apparance of any great exploits to be done by thoſe Armies, this winter (the way in thoſe parts being ſo deepe as an Army can hardly make any faire march) but that they wil paſſe this winter & feede their troupes vpon the poore mans purſe vntill the Spring drawe them againe into action.

The Emperour had long ſince appointed a Diet at Regensburg, for the ſettling of a firme peace in the Empire, to reforme abuſes, and to redreſſe all greeuances whereof there had been many complaints vnto his Maieſty, and they ſtill referred for their anſwere, to the Diet; the which had beene often adiourned and put off vpon ſome important conſiderations: but now it was fully reſolued, the Emperour hauing ſummoned all the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire, to appeare there in Nouember, and to that end both his Maieſty and all the Princes ſent their officers thither to prouide their lodgings. But before the Emperors parting from Viena towards Regensberg, there arriued two Ambaſſadours, one from the King of Perſia; the other from the Ottoman Emperour. The Perſian deſired confirmation of the League which his father had formerly had with the Emperor, and to intreate him to employ his forces againſt the Turk, who ſeemed to threaten his countrey this yeere with a powerfull inuaſion. The Turk ſent a Baſha with a ſtately Embaſſie and great Preſents (an vnuſuall thing in them who are accuſtomed to receiue from all Princes which ſend vnto them, and not to giue to any) but it ſeemed his new State was not ſo well ſettled as hee would truſt the Chriſtians, during his expedition againſt Perſia; entreating the Emperour to continue the truce, or to confirme peace, fearing leaſt ſomething might be attempted againſt him vpon the frontiers of Hungary during during his abſence: to whom the Emperor gaue no preſent anſwer, but told him that he might return if he pleaſed, and leaue a Chaux behinde him to receiue his anſwer after the ending of the Diet. 1622

In the beginning of Nouember, the Emperor and the Empreſſe parted from Vienna towards Regensbourg, with a great train of Ladies and Noble-men. Hee made his entry on the fiue and twentith of Nouember in great ſtate; the particularities whereof I omit. There was yet a final appearance of Princes: for, there were onely comn three eccleſiaſticall Electors, with the Biſhops of Saltzbourg and Virtzbourg. The Dukes of Bauaria and Newbourg were expected dayly; but the Proteſtant Princes made ſome ſtay, and it was doubtfull of their coming: namely, the Duke of Saxony, the Marqueſſe of Brandenbourg, the Dukes of Brunſwick, Virtemberg and Pomerania, the Lantzgrane of Heſſe, the Marqueſſe of Durlach of the houſe of Baden, with many others of their religion. The Emperor deſired much to haue the Duke of Saxony preſent at the Diet, and had preſt him much by his Letters: but his coming was doubtfull; beeing, as they write, diſcontented for the breach which had been made touching religion, with the Bohemians and the incorporated Prouinces; wherein he ſaid his honour was ingaged. Some which preſume to knowe the Secrets of Princes Cabinets, haue giuen out, that one of the chief reaſons for the calling of this Diet, is, To ſettle the Electorſhip of the Palatinate vpon the Duke of Bauaria, with the conſent of the whole State of Germany; the which the Emperor hath much deſired, the Duke ambitiouſly affected, and the Pope with all his Clergie inſtantly preſt: but, as I haue heard of no propoſitions, ſo I will not diuine of their concluſions; onely I will pray to God ſo to direct their counſels, that they may preferre the publike peace and tranquillity of Germanie before their priuate intereſts, and not caſt oil into the fire of their diuiſions, which may draw a great part of the Chriſtian world into troubles and combuſtions.

THus, with the end of the yeer and the loſſe of the Palatinate (one poor Town excepted) I end this work: wherin we haue ſeen a great Prince, the firſt ſecular Elector of Germany, ſpoiled and diſpoſſeſſed of his hereditary eſtate, and forced to abandon his Country and ſubiects to the fury and oppreſſion of an inſulting enemy. But God I hope (who is the God of battailes) will in his due time diſſolue theſe pinching froſts of affliction by his almighty power, and reſtore him, with the vertuous Princeſſe his wife, to their former eſtate; and make thoſe Princely Imps (ſprung from ſo Royall a Stem) flouriſh like oliue-branches, to the great ioy and comfort of all which honour and reſpect them: for the which I will daily pour forth my vowes and praiers to almighty God; and let all good men ſay Amen.

A brief

A brief Diſcourſe of the ciuill warres in the Valtolin.

HAd not meant to write of the ciuill broils in the Valtolin and the Griſons Country; houlding it impertinent to this Hiſtory which treats onely of the Emperors liues, and of thoſe things which haue paſt in their dominions: but, finding that the houſe of Auſtria doth make a chalenge to ſome of thoſe Communalties, and haue by their Arms brought the Griſons Country in a manner into ſubiection & ſeruitude, and poſſeſſed themſelues of the paſſage of the Valtolin; I haue thought it fit for the Readers better ſatisfaction to make a ſummary relation of theſe combuſtions, and to ſhew the motiues and the euents: for the true vnderſtanding whereof, I muſt rip it vp from the firſt beginning, which was in the yeer 1603.

The Valtolin is a Valley which depends vpon the Cantons of the Griſons; the which extends it ſelf in length ſome thirty French leagues from the Lake of Como in Italy to the County of Tirol which is in Germany. It is watered by the riuer of Ada, and is ſhut vp on either ſide by inacceſſible mountains. In the Griſons Countrey their gouernment is Democraticall. The Generall aſſembly of the Communaltie hath all ſoueraign power. Many Boroughs and Villages make a Communalty; and many Communalties, a Canton or League: and of three Cantons the Common-weal of the Griſons conſiſteth. This Aſſembly hath abſolute power by plurality of voices to make and aboliſh lawes, to treat of alliances with Princes and forren States, to diſpoſe of war and peace, and of all things belonging to Soueraignty. But, to come to the firſt beginning of theſe factions, you muſt vnderſtand, that in the yeer 1602, HENRY the Fourth, the French King, had renewed the antient alliance of France with the Swiſſers and Griſons, vpon the ſame articles and conditions as had been concluded with other Kings his Predeceſſors; againſt the aduice of ſome, who had propounded to make a new league with the Venecians, which might concern the paſſage of the Alps: but the Griſons which embraced the alliance of France would not yeeld to it.

A new league betwixt the Venecians and Griſons.

In the yeer 1603 there was a new league concluded at Coire or Chur betwixt the Griſons and the Venetians, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the French Ambaſſador. Of 26 Communalties of the Griſons, two parts of them are Proteſtants Calueniſts, contrary to the Romaniſts. The Proteſtants, which fauoured this league, gaue the common people to vnderſtand, firſt, that the moſt Chriſtian King was well pleaſed with it, being a matter of State, and the onely means to fruſtrate the Spaniard of all alliance with the Griſons: ſecondly, touching religion, that they ſhould not doubt but by means of this league which allowed them liberty of conſcience in Venice without exerciſe, the Goſpell would take root in Venice, and from thence diſperſe it ſelfe throughout all Italy; and, thirdly, the yeerly penſion and the Arms they ſhould receiue from the Venecians, with the particular penſions for their captains: for, the Griſons do naturally loue money.

The Fort of Fuentes built, and the Griſons forbidden commerce with Milan.

The Earl of Fuentes, who was at that time Gouerner of Milan, grew iealous of this league betweene the Venecians and the Griſons, and could by no means endure it, by reaſon of the importance of the paſſage of ſouldiers which they allowed the Venecians through the Alps: whereupon, he forbad all commerce with the Griſons, and preſently built the Fort of Fuentes at the entry of the paſſage of the Valtolin. The Griſons, who could not liue without the commerce of Milan and Lombardy by reaſon of the barrenneſſe of their Country, fell into faction. Some prime men and Captains, with the proteſtant Commons, would haue gon to Armes: and the Biſhop of Coire and many of his partiſans (fauouring the Spaniards) practiſed in ſuch ſort, that Deputies were ſent to Milan, to treat vpon the old alliances betweene the Milanois and the Griſons, to the end that the Fort of Fuentes might be raſed: where, they concluded vpon certain Articles, which were reiected in the Aſſembly of the Griſons; who in the mean time wauered betweene the doubtfull euents of war and the diſcommodities of peace.

The Deputies or Ambaſſadors, who were ſent to Milan, were much taxed by all the Griſons, to to haue receiued Preſents and chaines of gold from the Earle of Fuentes: with the which hee ſought to fetter their liberty; they hauing accorded, firſt, that the Spaniard might leuie ſouldiers in the Griſons Country when he pleaſed; ſecondly, that the paſſage ſhould be open for him at all times to tranſport his Armies through their Country, and that they ſhould not ſuffer any other ſouldiers to paſſe through their Territories without the aduice of the Gouerner of Milan, to the end that he ſhould conſider whether that paſſage might any way preiudice the Duchie of Milan; Articles which they held hurtfull to their antient alliance with France, and to make their new league with Venice vnprofitable. The Griſons hauing reiected theſe Articles in an Aſſembly at Illant, the Earl of Fuentes preſently cauſed his Fort to bee immured, and the Griſons deſcent into Italie to be ſtopt: whereupon, the Griſons reſolued to chuſe the hazard of Armes, to maintain their liberty.

1622 The Biſhop of Coir treats an alliance with Milan.

Hauing demanded ſuccours of men and mony from the Ambaſſadors of France and Venice, they both took time to aduertiſe their Maſters. The like they did to the Swiſſers beeing then aſſembled at Bade; letting them vnderſtand, that the Earl of Fuentes had taken from them the commerce which was betwixt them and the Duchy of Milan; requiring their counſell and aid, for that the iniurie was common to them: but they returned ill ſatisfied, for that the Ambaſſador of Spain had preuailed much in that Aſſembly.

In the yeer 1605, the French Ambaſſador, receiuing the King his Maſters pleaſure, gaue the Griſons to vnderſtand, that his Maieſty did aduiſe them to end their differences by an accord, eſpecially that they ſhould not come to Armes: and although the buſineſſe did nothing concern himſelf, yet he would willingly imploy himſelf in regard of their alliance, to the end that the oppreſſion they receiued from the Fort of Fuentes might be taken away. On the other ſide, the Ambaſſador of Venice tould them, that the propoſition to make a Fort vpon the Frontier of the Valtolin, to the end they might keep a paſſage open, and free from the Griſons Territories vnto thoſe of the Venecians, was good; and that the Segniory of Venice would defray the coſt and charges of the building of a new Fort, and would entertain a garriſon of one hundred and fifty men.

After this, the Griſons grew diuided into three factions. The Biſhop of Chur or Coire, with many Romaniſts, ſupported the Spaniard; who caſt much of his Indian duſt among them, and blinded the eies of their vnderſtandings. The Proteſtants and others fauoured the Venecians: and the antient friends to France blamed both theſe factions, and the league made with the Venecians; as the onely cauſe of the confuſion which took root in all the members of their Common-wealth. Theſe men knew well, that the counſell the King gaue them, Not to come to Armes, was for the good of their Common-wealth; and that, if they oppoſed a Fort to that of Fuentes, it would prouoke the Spaniard to war. 1606

The motions and alterations between the Pope and the Venecians (which ended in the yeer one thouſand, ſix hundred and ſeuen) much augmented theſe diuiſions; the Venecians ſeeking to draw ſuccours from the Griſons, and the partiſans of Spain labouring to hinder it. Then the corruption which the Spaniſh gold had bred in the Catholique Communalties, was ouerſwaied by the Captains, who had receiued twice as much money from the Venecians to make Leuies of ſouldiers in the Griſons Countrey: and ſuch as drew penſions from France, deſiring to ſettle an order in the Griſons liberty, in the which the baſeſt amongſt the multitude would take knowledge of the State, and diſcourſe thereof in tauernes and ſtoues (which is not the right courſe to manage the affairs of a Common-weal, for that there Secrets were as ſoon vented as propounded) cauſed a ſecret Councel to be erected of fifteen Deputies choſen out of all the Communalties, with a certain limited power: but this was preſently croſt by the two other factions, who required to haue this Councell diſſolued.

There was a combuſtion at Coire this yeere in May; whither the Communalties which ſupported the Venecians came with their Enſignes diſplaied, and required to haue that which had been promiſed by the Venecian League, effected: but preſently there comming a greater number of other Communalties, by the Spaniards practice; they demanded the contrary; as may appear by theſe following Articles. 1. That heerafter no ſtranger ſhould bee ſuffred to paſſe ſouldiers through the Alps. 2. That they ſhould enquire who was the Author of the putting a garriſon into the Valteline, and who ſhould pay it. 3. That the Communalties had not granted vnto the Venecians any paſſage for ſtrange ſouldiers. 4. That the ſaid Communalties had not made any alliance with the Dolphin of France, nor promiſed to giue paſſage to the French King's friends. 5. That the ſecret Councell newly erected ſhould be wholly abrogated.

1622 6. That they should renew the antient Alliances with Millan. 7. That the French Captains which were in the Valtolin, should be discharged. 8. That hereafter no man should receiue any pension from a forraine Prince: and that those which were receiued by priuate persons should be distributed amongst the communalties. 9. That Church-men and Ministers should not meddle with the ciuill gouernment, nor should be admitted to the assemblies of the communalties. 10. That the soldiers leuied by the Venetians might not goe out of the Countrie. 11. That the Criminall chamber should proceede against such as should be found traitors to their countrie. 12. That the Deputies of assemblies should hereafter bring the aduice of the communalties in writing and signed by them. Finally, the combustion was so great, that the Spanish faction seised on the Castle of Coire.

The subtility of the Spanish Agents was well obserued in these Articles; who seeking to depriue the Ambassador of France of all liberty to giue his accustomed pensions openly to priuat Grisons, would thereby diuert them from the amitie of France, whil'st he practised all he could by gifts to bandie against them which supported the Venetians, who had also (as was written) dispersed among their partisans aboue 80 thousand crowns, to maintain that they had a free passage through the Alpes. In the end of the yeere, the Iudges of the Criminal chamber (who were taxed to be pensioners to the Spaniard) were changed, vpon complaint of their great couetousnesse and iniustice: but they which succeeded them in their places exceeded them in arrogancie, corruption, and cruelty, which they practised against all those which they found partisans to Spaine, as Traitors to their liberty.

Complaint of the French Ambassadour against the Partisans of Spaine.

The French Ambassador, who had discouered the intention of the Spanish faction, demanded Audience in a general Assembly of the communalties; where he let them see by the reading of the alliance which they had with France, the Imposture of those which had published, That the king his Maiesty had no free passage either for himselfe or for his friends through the Alpes: and that the Dolphin of France was not comprehendended in the said Alliance. After the reading whereof and an exhortation made to continue constant in the League, with a promise of bounty, the whole assembly with one voice lifting their hands to heauen, cried out God saue the king, God preserue France and the Dolphin. Which done, the French Ambassador demanded of them a declaration of their confirmation of the Alliance, desiring to send it vnto the king: the which they all iointly promised, and afterwards euery communalty signed. The Venetian Ambassador, to haue the like declaration vpon their new treaty of Alliance, made offer by his partisans to giue 3000 crownes to the three Grison Cantons: but his proceeding and offer was reiected; and the Garrison of 150 Grisons which was in the Valtolin paied by the king, was discharged: which seemed to be the subiect of some bad intelligence, which hapned afterwards betwene the Ambassadors of France and Venice, resident in those parts, the particularities whereof I must for breuities sake omit.

Bad intelligence betweene the Ambassadors of France and Venice.

In the yere 1608 and 1609, the Grisons State was vnder the power of their Criminall chamber, whereas the Bisiop of Coir was condemned to a pecuniary Fine; and if he would not signe certain Articles which should be imparted to him, he should be banished. Thus the Protestants held the chief places in the gouernment: and the Valtolin Catholiques were much discontented to bee vnder the yoak and gouernment of Podestate Grisons of a contrary religion; so as it seemed by some actions, that the Earl of Fuentes would willingly haue giuen them aid to haue taken Arms.

In the yeer 1610, the French King hauing been traiterously murdered, the Magistrate of Coir repaired to his Ambassador; where, after many signs of great sorrow for so lamentable a death, hee protested in the name of all the Grisons, to continue constant in the Alliance which they had with the Crown of France: and the same yeer, the Earl of Fuentes, Gouerner of Milan, died also. About this time the Venetians pursued a continuation of their Alliance for ten yers with the Grisons: but they were let vnderstand, that they had sufficiently made trial of the good & harme which this Alliance had brought them; so as they desired no more: for there were many Articles obserued in that treaty which were directly contrary to the Alliace of France, the which I omit being very long.

In the yeere one thousand and eleuen, VELASCO Constable of Castile, being newly made Gouernour of Milan, hee sought to continue the designes of the deceased Earle of Fuentes, not by Armes but by Treatie. Hee promised at first to raise the fort of Fuentes: But the Ambassadour of France gaue the Magistrate of Coire to vnderstand, that it was but a cunning practice, thinking thereby to reuiue the Treaty of Milan. Hereupon the Agents for for Spaine, lay de aspersions vpon the said Ambassadour (to make him odious to the Catholiques) in a counterfeit Letter written in the Germane tongue, and directed to the Bishop of Coire; by the which they gaue him to vnderstand, That the reason why the Protestant Ministers of the Grisons were so affected to the French King and his Ambassadour, was for that they had seene in the Register of their accounts, that he gaue vnto them yeerly many thousands of crownes by way of pension. And on the other side, the said Ambassadour hauing laboured by the Kings commandement, that the alliance with the Venetians should not bee contynued, their partisans called him Iesuit, and they gaue it out that hee had giuen money to PLANTA and others of the Spanish faction to breake the Alliance with Venice. 1622

Practises of the Spanish and Venetian factions.

In the yeere 1613, the Grisons hauing againe concluded that the Alliance with Venice should not bee continued, the next yeere they commanded their Ambassadour to depart the Countrey. After this in the yeere 1616 and 1617 the Spanish faction got the masterie, and beganne to dispose absolutely of the gouernment of the State; so as by their practices, there was a Treaty appointed at Coire, this yeere on the 9 of March to reuiue the antient Alliance with Milan, for the King of Spaine. There came ALFONSO CASAT his Ambassadour, in the name of Don PEDRO de Toledo Gouernour of the Duchie of Milan, where there were certaine Articles concluded. Firstly, They promised that betwixt his Maiesty as Duke of Milan with the subiects of the said Duchie, and the three Cantons, with their subiects of the Countrey of the Valtolin, Wormes, and the County of Chyauens shall be true, sincere and perpetuall frendship: so as they shall not attempt aught to the preiudice one of another, nor suffer any practice to be made openly or secretly in their prouinces, nor consent to any passage, nor giue counsell or ayd directly or indirectly, but should oppose themselues with all their force & power. And if the one partie should know or discouer any secret practices, attempts or counsells to the preiudice of the other, the said partie shold be bound to reueale it presently, and seeke to diuert it with all fidelity. Secondly, And for that his excellencie vnderstood that the three Cantons desired much that the fort of Fuentes which had beene built in the yeere 1603 vpon the frontiers of the Valtolin might be demolished, to the end they might thereby bee assured to be restored to his Maiesties good grace and fauour, his excellencie promised to treat with his Maiesty with all sincere affection in fauour of the said three Cantons; and that after the Articles of this present capitulation shall be accepted, sealed, and sworne by his Maiesty and the said three Cantons, that with out all delay, the demolition of the said forts shall take effect; And that his Maiesty shall not suffer them to be built vp againe, so long as the three Cantons shall for their parts faithfully obserue the contents of the said Capitulation, and that hereafter no such cause of iealousie be giuen vnto his Maiesty as was in the yeere 1603. And for asmuch as the three Cantons knew wel that the distrust which ministred occasion for the building of the aforesaid forte of Fuentes, did proceede from the Alliance and passage which they had graunted vnto the Seigniorie of Venice: they promised by this present capitulation for them and their successors not to renew it hereafter, nor to suffer the said Alliance and passage in any sort, so long as this present capitulation shall be in force. Thirdly, That both parties shall haue free commerce and trafique from one countrey to another, aswell for themselues as their subiects, without any exception of persons: with this reseruation, that touching matters of religion they should giue no scandall, nor carry with them any forbidden bookes. And touching the role of cattell and other commerce which they should bring into the Duchie of Milan, or transporte from thence, the three Cantons should enioy all the priuiledges the which are granted vnto the Swissers, allies vnto his Maiesty. Fourthly, If it hapned his Maiesty shold haue neede of any troupes of souldiers of this nation for the defence of the Duchy of Milan, it shall be lawfull for him to make a leauie in the Territories of the three Cantons, not exceeding the number of 3000 souldiers Voluntaries: and the election of the Colonell and Captaines shall be made by his Majesties Ambassador, who shal agree with them for their Armes & pay: And in case his Maiesty would for the preseruation of his countries & Seigniories cause som troupes of strange soldiers to passe through the Grisons countrie into the Duchie of Milan, it shal be allowed to his Maiesty & his commanders: so as euery troupe exceed not the number of 200 persons and a daies iourney one from another: Euery troupe also shal haue his captaine or conductor to keep them in good discipline, and with them a Commissarie of the Cantons at the kings charge to preuent all inconueniencies: & to the end also that the soldiers may pay for their victualls & passages and carrie themselues honestly, they shall not carrie any other Armes but their

If it ſhall happen that the three Cantons ſhall be hoſtilely inuaded by any Prince, Potentate, or free State; his Maieſty ſhall bee bound when ſoeuer they require him, to aſſiſt the Cantons at his owne charge with 2000 foote and 200 horſe, ſo long as the warre ſhall continue: and if the three cantons ſhall haue neede of greater aſſiſtance, his Maieſty ſhall ſend it without delay. But, if the three Cantons ſhall think it more commodious to haue money then men; his Maieſty in that caſe as long as the warre ſhall continue, ſhall effectually pay vnto them 10000 crownes a moneth; and withall ſhall lend them 6 feeld peeces with their due munition, vpon condition that they ſhall be reſtored when the warre is ended. 6. His Maieſty as Duke of Milan, out of his royall bounty and in teſtimonie of his loue and affection vnto the three Cantons, doth promiſe to pay to euery Canton yeerely, at the Feaſt of Saint IOHN BAPTIST, the ſumme of 3000 florens, euery one being 15 Batzes of the money of Coire; the firſt payment to beginne on the ſaid firſt Feaſt day, after the accord ſhall be ſworne. Seuenthly, That this preſent capitulation ſhall no way preiudice the antient League and alliance which the three Cantons haue with the Crowne of France, the which ſhall remaine in full force and vigor. And laſtly, that this capitulation ſhall be perpetuall and hereditarie.

The Griſons proceedings in the yeere 1618.

This accord bred a great combuſtion among the Griſons (whereof two third parts are Proteſtant Caluiniſts) and was the cheefe and onely cauſe which made them to proceede criminally againſt many Catholique perſons and of quality: that is to ſay, againſt the Biſhop of Coyre, the Arch-Priеſt of Sondrio, RODVLPH, and POMPEIVS PLANTA brethren, IOHN BAPTISTA Preuoſt, with an infinite number of others. And, for the iuſtification of their proceedings, they publiſhed a Proteſtation to the world, giuing all men to vnderſtand, that certaine priuate perſons had ſought to vſurpe the gouernment of their State, and to appropriate vnto themſelues thoſe Soueraignties & powers which did properly belong to all the Communalties in generall: the which they attempted by their great wealth and power, by corruption and preſents, and by the alliances of their kindred: And this was not done at one inſtant; but, ſometimes in one Communalty, and ſometimes in another, as occaſion was offered, to reduce them vnder their particular power. Which ſubtill practices had ſucceeded ſo well, as not onely the free Allies with their ſubiects, but alſo if Princes and forraine States deſired to obtaine any thing from their State, they were forced to receiue it from theſe priuate perſons, who practiſed all kindes of treaſon, infidelities, falſhood, deceits, tyrannies and violences; whereby they brought their Eſtate into great contempt with all Princes and forraigne Potentates; who, by their Treacherie and raſhneſſe, haue beene promiſed thoſe things which they could not effect. Theſe lamentable courſes being obſerued by ſome men of iudgement, yea and by the common people (deſiring to preuent the danger by ſome lawfull meanes) they complained in the laſt Aſſembly held at Davos in the yeere 1617, before the three Cantons, being their ſuperiors, of theſe intolerable proceedings: and there, after an ample declaration of the miſeries raigning in the State, had ſeriouſly inſiſted for a neceſſarie reformation, by the moſt conuenient meanes. Which buſineſs, in regard of the great importance and for other vrgent cauſes, was ſent by the Magiſtrate before the reuerend iudges and all the Communalties, being the ſupreme power of their eſtate: whoſe intention they followed. And whereas after, in a Synode held in Aprill in the yeere 1618, it had beene reſolued that a writing of the ſaid tenor ſhould be publiſhed to all Counſellors and Communalties of euery pariſh, with inſtant prayers and exhortations to prouide by all lawfull meanes without any commotion, for the reſtoring of the liberty of their countrey, freeing themſelues from the fraudulent Treaties of ſome of their ſubiects with Princes and forraine eſtates, to the end they might not bee brought into iuſt contempt; but rather to carrie themſelues in ſuch ſort towards them, as their Anceſtors had done; and ſo, their fidelity and integrity ſhould be eſteemed:

All which notwithſtanding, thoſe Authors of ſedition had ſought to abuſe the common people, and to maintaine their violent commande by their ordinary practices. Whereupon the reformed Preachers in all the pariſhes had earneſtly inſiſted for a neceſſarie reformation of the whole State; and required, that ſome good men might be choſen out of the Commons (which were no way tyed or engaged to any Princes or forraine States) to whome they might reueale certaine treacheries of ſome tyrannous commanders, who were no longer to to be ſuffered, and whoſe reiection might be the reſtoring of the eſtate. But the people being out of hope, that in ſo ſmall a number of Deputies they ſhould euer obtaine any good ſucceſſe; and finding in like manner that theſe tyrants could not be vanquiſhed but by multitudes: not for any feare of their forces, but onely for plurality of voices, and to preuent all kinde of corruptions and falſe perſwaſions; In the end of Iune the yeer 1618, the fiue Communalties of Engaden and Valthaſna the lower, together with thoſe of Muſſerthall, aſſembled themſelues, hauing ſent Letters and Embaſſies to the other Communalties of the three Cantons, requiring them to do the like and by vertue of the Vnion to aſſiſt them as being moſt oppreſt, for that their power and authority was taken from them, and vſurped by ſome priuate perſons; their lawes falſified, their ſtatutes changed, and their goods and means wreſted from them, vnder pretext of publike authority; to the end theſe new lawes might be aboliſhed, and the antient liberty of their anceſtors reſtored, that alſo the treaſures of Princes and forrain States might no more bee waſted by priuate perſons without the priuity and conſent of the whole State, and that they might not be ſo treacherouſly deceiued by the vain promiſes of ſuch men. 1622

The Griſons aſſemble, requiring a reformation of the ſtate.

At their earneſt entreaties, there came to their ſuccours in the beginning good numbers of men from ſome other Communalties; who willingly agreed for the reſtoring of the common eſtate, and the election of indifferent Iudges to puniſh criminall offenders.

Rodulphus Planta prepares to reſiſt the Griſons.

In the mean time, the chief Author of theſe alterations, and Attempter vpon the ſoueraigne authority, called RODOLPHVS PLANTA, hauing as it ſeemed a guilty conſcience, retired himſelf to his Caſtle of Vildenbourg in Zernetz; the which he fortified and furniſhed with victuals and all things neceſſary, hauing drawne vnto him ſix hundred men to defend it, and ſeiſed vpon the paſſages, broken the bridges, and committed all acts of hoſtility againſt the neighbours and Allies. But, ſeeing the Troops of the Communalties approach, hee fled into Tirol with ſome of his moſt confident friends. During theſe proceedings, the other Communalties of the three Cantons ſent an Embaſſie to Engaden, offering to aſſiſt them to repaire the common eſtate, to reſtore the lawes, and to ſettle iuſtice, ſo as they would cauſe their Troops and Enſignes to retire; to the end that, all violences ceaſing, Iuſtice might be adminiſtred indifferently to all men. But, anſwer being made vnto them, that the power of the ſeditious delinquents and of their adherents was ſo great, that without the aid and aſſiſtance of many men, their enterpriſe would be in vaine; therefore they preſt the other Communalties to aſſiſt them with ſuch Troops as they themſelues ſhould think good vpon ſo iuſt a buſineſſe: which thing was granted.

Aſſemblies at Coir & Thuſis.

Vpon this reſolution, euery Communalty of the whole State aſſembled, ſome with their enſignes, ſome without, at Coire, and from thence to Thuſis in the vpper Rhetia; where, with a generall conſent, for the reſtoring of their eſtate and policy, they renewed certain antient lawes, and made ſome new, touching the late tranſgreſſions: whereunto alſo their Allies which were abſent, conſented, with ſome little moderation. The tenor whereof conſiſted in theſe Articles: firſt, that the free exerciſe of both religions, reformed and Catholick, ſhould bee allowed in all their lands and iuriſdictions, and euery man maintained and defended by the generality in his profeſſion; ſecondly, that in all their Territories, euery league, Communalty, iuſtice, and particular perſons, noble or ignoble, ſhould be maintained and protected in their priuiledges, cuſtomes, dignities, goods and antient poſſeſſions; and that in all differences they ſhould bee bound to ſubmit themſelues to the deciſion of a neutrall iudgement: thirdly, that their ſubiects ſhould be gouerned in equity, and bee no more expoſed to tyrants, as happely ſome had been: fourthly, that the treaſure of the common eſtate ſhould bee better gouerned, and that they ſhould not ſuffer the common reuenues to be any more waſted and conſumed by priuate perſons: fifthly, that no particular man ſhould preſume to treat with any Prince and forrain Eſtate without expreſſe commandement, vpon pain of death; but, thoſe alliances which ſhould be orderly made, and by a common conſent, they meant to maintaine with all loyalty towards all eſtates their neighbours, ſhewing them faithfull and good neighbourhood, with other circumſtances, &c.

New articles made at Thuſis.

In this Aſſembly there was appointed a criminall chamber to proceed againſt certain perfidious perſons; whereof ſome were priſoners, and others fled. To the which Court of Iuſtice euery Canton deputed two and twenty Iudges, nine Examiners, two Treaſurers, one Secretary, and two Vſhers: and finding, that by the authority of the reformed Preachers and Miniſters, the people had hitherto been maintained in better order, it was alſo thought good, that nine of them ſhould be admitted in this buſineſſe, but not at definitiue ſentences: all theſe were bound to sweare to discouer all such as had done any thing against law and equity: That they should not respect rewards, friendship, hatred, factions or any other thing which might draw them from the rule of Iustice; but rather attend the honor of God, the free and prosperous estate of their countrey, and sacred Iustice.

The criminall proceſſe of Preuoſt.

Among the prisoners (whose processes they were to make) the chief was IOHN BAPTISTA Preuost called ZAMBER, lying at Vospran, in the vpper Pregell: who (by the confession of certain persons executed some yeers before, the deposition of witnesses, and by Letters written with his own hand) was conuicted that he and his consorts had giuen aide and counsell to build the fort of Fuentes vpon the frontiers of the Grisons countrey: To haue receiued presents in money from Millan, and to haue been gratified with the free transportation of Corne and Wine, paying little for the custome; and to haue taken rewardes to mediate the treaties made in former time with the State of Milan; and, on the other side, to haue receiued money and a great pension from the Ambassador of a forraine Prince, to dissuade the Grison Communalties from that alliance: the which being testified by the witnesse of men of reputation, in the end he confessed it with all the circumstances; and moreouer said that RODVLPHVS PLANTA, with some others which were dead, had resolued the designe of the said Fort of Fuentes at Danos, in the yeer 1603, during the Assembly of the league there, to the end that they might thereby force the people to their deuotion, and treate a league with Millan at their pleasure, the which PLANTA had much affected. For which crimes he was condemned (as a Traytor to his countrey to be quartered; his goods to be confiscate to the benefit of the Cantons, yet without preiudice to his wiues portion and his creditors: His house to be rased, and two pillars set vp in the place for a perpetuall infamy; but at the intercession of his friends and kinsfolk, he being 74 yeers old, and hauing 9 children, they shewed him some fauor by losing only his head; and the demolishing of his house, was referred to the disposition of the Cantons.

The proceſſe of Nicholas Ruſca.

NICHOLAS RVSCA, Arch-Preest of Sonders, being a prisoner, was accused of the like crimes, both by the deposition of witnesses, and the confession of some which had been executed, and also by Letters which were found about him: All which he constantly denying, or seeking to auoide by subtle deuices, he was condemned to the rack; the which he endured the first day, being without any waight: but, being tied vnto it again after the same manner, he grew so weake as they were forced to vnbind him, so as he presently after died, not without suspicion of poison by some manifest signes appearing in his body. They proceeded in like manner, by way of contumacy, against such as had absented themselues. IOHN Bishop of Coir was accused for that 11 yeers before he had bin banisht by the iudgement of certain indifferent Iudges, consisting of both Religions, chosen out of the 3 Cantons, for many perfidious actions, and obstinate disobedience against his country; That he had taken and giuen money to crosse the Swissers their trusty Allies, That he had put his Bishoprick into the protection of their enemies: And, finding himself guilty, he laboured to haue the title of Legat in Germany; That afterwards he had fauored their perfidious inhabitants, who had vsurped the Sate-gouernment, and had returned into his Bishoprick at Coire, whither he was conducted by RODVLPH PLANTA the chief Author of the treason; and continuing in his old train, he had assisted at all consultations which had been made against the liberty of the country. For these and diuers other crimes obiected against him, and verefied by his own Letters, and the deposition of witnesses; they confirmed his banishment for euer, and confiscated his goods, without preiudice to the Bishopric; They degraded him of his Episcopal dignity, commanding the Chapter to choose another, forbidding all men to lodge him in their Territories; and if he were taken, to be executed by the Sword.

The proceſſe of Bishop of Coire.

The proceſſe of Rodulphus Planta, by contumacy.

This criminall Court proceeded in like manner against diuers others which absented themselues; But especially against the 2 brethren RODVLPH & POMPEY PLANTA, who had bin the ring-leaders of all these alterations. RODVLPH, who had been Captain generall of all the Valtolin, Iudge criminall of Zernetz & of the neighbor Comunalties, and Captain of a company of Grisons for the French kings seruice; was accused of many hainous crimes, wheron I must of force insist somwhat the longer; for that he was the chief actor and procurer of all these combustions. The Arch-duke of Austria of Inspruck, hath certain rights and priuiledges to be criminall Iudge in the lower Engaden on S. GEORGES day, with the approbation and consent of the Commons: some yeers before, the said PLANTA had bin chosen to that charge for the Arch-duke, wherin he had continued & neuer demanded any renuing or confirmation, contrary to al custom, hauing audaciously vsurped this authority, as if he had obtained it by purchase or inheritance, bringing in criminal Iudges at his pleasure to be at his deuotion. By which meanes he he drew to himself the Soueraignty of all that iurisdiction, without any opposition; that he had reinstalled the Bishop of Coire (who for his treason towards his Country had been banished by a generall Sentence) into his Bishoprick & Castle before he had obtained pardon; that by this means he might haue him at his deuotion, for that the Bishop hath power to create certain Magistrates, and especially those which haue the gouernment of the reuenues of the Church. Hauing good intelligence with the Ambassadors of France, not onely they to whom they gaue pensions were most commonly forced to attain to them by the intercession of PLANTA; but also by his practices he had obtained from the said Ambassadors great summes of money, new pensions and increase of the old for his adherents; that he vsually entertained spies in their Countries and Iurisdictions, who reuealed to him what soeuer was said or done against his person, persecuting such as any way opposed him. Moreouer, to encrease his authority, hee had changed the statutes and lawes in his Iurisdiction, raised the amercements and fines, and for 35 yeers together had disposed of all things at his owne pleasure. By these and such like practices hee had growne so powerful, that for many yeers he had the direction of the most important affairs, and through great corruptions and presents had at his pleasure swaied their Communalties and free Countries, disposed (with his adherents) of many offices, presumed to make and break leagues, and to stir vp seditions against good men. His iurisdiction was miserably tyrannized by him, the priuiledges of the Communalties broken; depriuing them of the free election of their Magistrates, and entertaining them with vain hopes, that so all might depend on his fauour.

When the estate of the reformed Clergy opposed it self, in the yeer 1617, against the dangerous league practised between the state of Milan and the three Cantons; murmuring openly against it, he persecuted them, and threatned to depriue them of their ministeries, imprisoning them, and to vse them worse. His practices against his Country were such, that he thought to deprive them of their liberties by fraudulent and preiudiciall articles of confederacy with the duchy of Milan. After hee had obtained and procured by corruption the renunciation of the league between Venice and the Grisons, he deuised new Articles: which was called the league of Zutze; by which some Communalties, lying vpon the passage, bound themselues not to suffer any one to passe through their Territories, to hinder all succours from the Venecians. But when, in the yeer 1617, the league and passage was solicited for the Duchy of Milan, he was one of the first to yeeld to a perpetuall passage for the Spaniard against the former accord; that hee had forced the Venetian Ambassador to depart their Countries, had leuied Troops, and had made certain barbarous Articles, the which they would force the Inhabitants to obserue; especially, that no Minister of the reformed religion should presume to reueal his intention to the Commons, nor giue his voice in any matter concerning the Countrey: which was allowed to the pooreſt man of their free state; and that they had erected a chamber of iustice, whose principall director had treated with all affairs by the direction of the said RODVLPH PLANTA and his brother, as had been discouered by the Iudges themselues; that they had bound themselues by a particular oath to the Bishop of Coir against the sworn customs of the country; that they had tyrannized ouer the Ministers of the reformed religion, commanding them strictly not to meddle with the affairs of Spain, imprisoning some, and threatning them with death.

But in this yeer 1618, when as some Communalties did rise to preuent this mischief, he presently forced the Magistrates of his iurisdiction to bind themselues to him by oath, and demanded succours from others, to the end he might raise a ciuill and intestine war, and the common people kill one another; whereby he might make himself Soueraign of the Countrey. When he saw his enterprises were frustrate, and that he might be called in question for his actions, he absented himself, and did not appear. Wherefore, seeing he had drawne vnto him the greatest treasures of the liberty of thir Countrey; that is, To make and disannull lawes, to treat and break leagues, to create and depose Magistrates, to dispose of warre and peace, and in this authority to vse all kinde of treacherie, force, tyranny and treason; he was condemned to perpetuall banishment: and whosoeuer should bring him aliue, to haue one thousand crowns; and he that should bring his head, fiue hundred. Being taken aliue, his body was to bee broken vpon the wheele, and quartered; his goods confiscate to the Communalties without prejudice to the iust pretensions of his wife and creditors; his house to be rased, and Pillars of infamy to be there erected. The Communalty which did relieue or lodge him, should pay 10000 crowns for a Fine: and if any priuate person did entertain him, he should lose his honour, and bee condemned in the like Fine; and if hee had not meanes to satisfie it, his body should suffer for it. Whosoeuer should presume to treat of his liberty, write Letters, conuerse with him, or receiue Letters from from him, should forfeit body and goods: The like sentence was giuen against his brother and diuers others; whom they charged to haue been pensioners to Spaine, to make him absolute Master of their passages, and to haue taken money from the State of Venice; with promise to second their demand touching the opening of passage for Souldiers, and that in case no other did contradict it, they would be silent. By these meanes they had gathered together the Treasure of the said Potentates, sometimes deceiuing the one, sometimes the other; and thereby had brought the Country into contempt. 1620.

The Apology of the Valtolins. The Catholiques of the Valtolin complained much of the proceedings of the Grisons, pretending that they were not their Subiects, but their Allies, and that it was a meere vsurpation; producing certaine Articles concluded betweene the Bishoppe of Coire, and the three Cantons on the one side, and the inhabitants of the Valtolin on the other, in the yeere one thousand fiue hundred thirteen. First, that the inhabitants of the Valtolin and the Communalty of Till, should for euer yeeld due obedience to the Bishoppe of Coire and the three Cantons in honest and lawfull things. Secondly, that the Inhabitants of the Valtolin and Communalty of Till, should bee faithfull Confederats and Allies to the Bishop of Coire and the three Cantons. That in all Assemblies, when it should be fit to call them, they should haue place with them, and a deliberatiue voice touching all matters concerning the publique good of the said Communalties: and when as they should bee called to any Diet, euery Communaltie of Till, should be bound to send a Deputy. Thirdly, that the Inhabitants of the Valtolin and the Communalty of Till, should enioy their antient customes and priuiledges, so as they were conformable to iustice. Fourthly, that the said Bishoppe of Coire and the three Cantons, should be bound to giue aide and counsell to the Valtolins and Communalty of Till, in fauour of his Imperiall Maiesty and the Duchie of Milan, as necessity should require: And the said Valtolins should bee freed from all taxes and impositions, as well as the subiects of the three Cantons. Fiftly, that the Valtolin and Communalty of Till, should yeerly pay vnto the Bishop of Coire and the three Cantons, a thousand Florens in ready money, to be leuied indifferently vpon the lands and goods of such as dwelt in the said valley.

This they made the ground of their alteration; and in the yeere one thousand six hundred twenty, fell to acts of hostility, as you shall heare. They said that God had in the end giuen them meanes to free themselues by their owne Armes, from those miseries: That the Ministers of the reformed Religion had, in their pernicious Sermons and Writings, gotten great credit with the simple people, disguised the truth, blamed innocency, supported crimes, and entertained diuisions and discord: That they had sought to suppresse the profession of the Romish Religion in the Valtoline: and touching the Gouernement of the State, That the greatest offices had been set to sale, without respect of merit or vertue: That touching matters of ciuill Iustice, the poore lost their right, they were condemned with all iniustice, they took away their goods violently, at the pleasure of the Iudges; who sould iustice, for money, to pay their purchases: These, and infinite other things, put the Romanists of the Valtoline out of hope euer to receiue any better vsage from their pretended Lords the Grisons. Besides, that which they had learned of the Assembly of Thusis, made them apprehend many bad designes against them and their families, and drew some of the Catholique Communalties to meditate of the meanes, how to free themselues from so cruell a seruitude; and therefore they gaue the Magistrates of the Grisons notice of the barbarous proceedings of the criminall Iustice of Thusis, and the cruel sentences giuen against some of them: But finding no reformation, by meanes of the Hereticall Ministers (as they tearmed them) the Romanists, hoping for no better vsage, resolued either to perish suddenly, or to free themselues from the subiection of so barbarous a Gouernement. Whereupon the Romanists of the Valtolin and the vallies depending of the Grisons, conspired together: their pretext was, that seeing themselues banisht and depriued of their goods, and their houses rased and demolished; hauing often assembled and conferred in secret, touching so many miseries and calamities, and finding no hope of better vsage; aswell in regard of those which gouerned, as of the great hatred of the familie of the Salici Grisons, their deadly Enemies; who, sought to vsurpe the Gouernement of the State, the which they could not easily do vnlesse they should banish the honestest men of the Countrey which crossed their designes: The chiefe of this faction in the Valtoline (whose names were ROBVSTELLA Knight, Captaine IOHN GVICHARDI, ALZO and CHARLES BESTA brethren, IOHN MARIA PARAVICIN, FRANCIS VENOST; and in the bottome of the vallies, RODOLPHVS PLANTA, the Podesta Giouer, IOHN MOLINA, with diuers other banished men) A faction of the Romanists in the Valtoline.

men) plotted secretly to free themselues from so many tyrannous subiections (as they pretended) and to purge their Countrie from heresie, by the cutting of the Protestants throats. ROBVSTEL acquainted his friends and kinsfolke with this designe, and inuited PARAVICIN (a banished man, who was retired to Como) to approach vnto the Frontiers with what men he could, to the end they might put it in execution on Sunday the 26 of Iuly: but fearing to be discouered if he should delay his designe any longer (for that his Messenger, whom he had sent to Como, had been taken) he went only with a hundred souldiers to Bormio, where he slew the Podesta, with all his family, and hung him vp: The like they did to as many Caluinists as they found there, except the women and children: The like his confederats did in other places, burning and spoiling all their houses and goods; so as some Authors write, they slue aboue 400 persons. After this furious murdering of the poore Protestants, some of them marched with their Troups towards the valley of Malingo, and assured themselues of that passage, hauing broken the bridges, and made Barracadoes to stoppe the Grisons entry that way to Sondres, the chief Town of the Valtolin. Another Troup went towards Barben and other places, and slue all they found of the contrary Religion. PARAVICIN came from Como with such forces as he could draw together, and seized vpon the mouth of the Riuer of Ada, to stop all succours which might come to the Protestants by water. Finally, they made themselues Masters of the whole Valtolin, being fortified daily with new Troupes which came to succour them, whom they put in Garrison in the most important places ioyning to the Grisons and Venecians, where they brake all the bridges, and built some small forts. These things, thus executed, ROBVSTEL was, in an assembly of the communalties in the Valtoline, chosen Governor of the whole Vallie; vnder whose protection they submitted themselues, promising to expose their liues for the Catholike faith, and the libertie of their Countrie: this acknowledgement being made, he presently disposed of all the Magistrates and Officers for the administration of Iustice. 1620. They kill the Protestants in the Valtolin.

The pittifull cryes of the poore Protestants passing the Mountains, the Cantons sent three thousand men to suppresse the fury of these Rebels: amongst the which there were many Hollanders which had formerly serued the Venecians in the Gulfe; but, they were soone forced to retire without any great exploit, doubting the arriuall of some other forces. At the same time the Gouernour ROBVSTEL sent Ambassadours to Millan, to intreat the Duke of Feria, the Gouernour, to receiue the Valtolins vnder the protection of the King of Spaine, and to assist and defend them; who willingly embraced this occasion, and supplied them with forces, whereby he hoped in time to get an entry for his Master in that valley: so as the Catholiques power increased daily, hauing drawne together, about the middest of August, an Army of six or seuen thousand foote, and seuen hundred horse: And to countenance them the more, the Duke of Ferda, Gouernour of Millain, had sent twenty two Ensignes of Spaniards and one thousand horse vnto the Frontiers of the Valtolin; vnder the command of the Generall of the horse of Millan, enioyning him to haue a care that no souldier should goe out of the limitts of Millane, vnlesse that some succours should come vnto the Grisons from Forraine Princes: inferring thereby, that if it were lawfull for the Venecians to succour the Caluinists against the Romanists, it should be as lawfull for the King of Spain and his Ministers to protect and defend the Catholique Valtolines: And if that should happen, hee commaunded him to enter both with his horse and foote. The Valtol craue vote & ayde fr the king of

The Grisons did what they could to make head against their enemies, and had drawn at least 5000 men into the valley, being masters of Sonders and many other places: but they, hearing that ROBVSTELL approached with his Army of eight thousand men, retired speedily by the valley of Malengo, and past the Mountaines: By whose flight, the Valtolin wholly remained in the power of the Catholiques, who assured themselues of all the passages. During these exploits in the Valtolin, PLANTA, GIOVAR, and MOLINA vsed the like cruelties against the Caluinists in the valley of Munstel; PLANTA desiring to make himselfe Gouernour of that valley, and GIOVAR of that of Misolcine. This is all which hath passed in the enterprise of the Catholique Valtolins, from the 26 of Iuly in the yeere 1620, till the midst of August; who being assisted by the Spaniard, forced the Grisons succours (consisting of fiue thousand men) to repasse the Mountaines. The losse of the Valtolin, thus surprised by banished men by the help of the King of Spain, concerned the Swissers aswell as the Grisons, and might also threaten their liberties; and the Romanists knowing they were not able to subsist of themselues against the reformed Protestants, the King of Spain gaue charge to his Gouernour of Millan to defend them against all hostile violence: Whereupon the said Gouernour raised some forces The Spaniar possesse the Va which he sent to them. After diuers military exploits, the Spaniards not only subdued the whole Valtolin, but also fortified themselues in such sort in the Mountaines and their vallies, as no man could safely passe. Wherefore, to preuent this mischiefe (for that it concerned all Swisserland, if the Spaniard should get a free passage by the Valtolin into Germany) they appointed a generall assembly at Bade: But, for that the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had formerly taken some places there which had belonged to the Iurisdiction of Austria, and forced the Inhabitants to do him homage before the antient rights had beene settled in the former State, and to that end had leuied great forces in Alsatia, therfore the assembly at Bade proceeded very slowly.

The Grisons being duly informed of the Spaniards attempts, who (vnder a color to restore such as had been banished, and to plant the Catholike Religion) sought to make themselues Masters of their Country, they appointed an assembly at Luzerne, calling the Protestants thither; with whose consents they made this decree: That whereas it was apparant to all the world, what tumults had beene in their Country, and what seditions had beene raised by turbulent persons to oppresse their liberties; for the preuenting of these miseries and dangers, they had decreed by oath, carefully to defend their liberties with the hazard of their liues and fortunes; to leaue religion free to euery man; to maintaine peace and to liue louingly and quietly together; so as no other Religion should be admitted but the Catholike Romish and the reformed, the exercise whereof should be free vnto them. That all vowes and oathes taken or made against the liberty of religion in these two points (That is to say, the hearing of the word of God, and the Sacraments of Baptisme and the Lords Supper) should be abrogated & held voyde, neither should any man be bound to stand vnto them. If any one in contempt of either religion should forbeare to come to church, to heare Sermons, or to receiue the Communion, the Church where hee dwels shall haue power to punish him. And to the end that both these religions may bee truly and really exercised, it shall be lawfull for euery man and Church to cherish and aduance his religion, to bestow costs and to giue stipends by himselfe or by others for th emaintenance thereof: To erect Schooles and Seminaries, and to institute ministers and Doctors in Churches and Schooles, without any distinction or difference betwixt Monks and Iesuits and Doctors of the reformed Religion, so as neither partie offend the others That honest men and of integrity be chosen, and that they forbeare to tax or slander one another: That Ecclesiasticall persons of what Religion soeuer shall treat onely of spirituall things, and not meddle, with politicall affaires, vpon paine of being remooued from their charges, and the losse of life & goods, being lawfull for euery Magistrate to punish them in whose iurisdiction they shall be found; and if he shall not doe his duty, the whole Communalty may question them: or if they shall neglect it, euery priuate man may punish them and enioy their goods, vnlesse they shall first fly to the Bishopick of Coire or to the house of Tisiaen, where they shall haue Sanctuarie: All iudgements giuen at Thusis, Ciseret, and Danos, and all decrees made there in the yeeres 1618. 1619. and 1620, with all conclusions made to the preiudice of the French King, shall bee abrogated; and euery one shall haue liberty to prosecute those which haue any way vniustly wronged them in these iudgements: That the Authors of sedition by reason of the Venetians practices should be punished: That the hereditarie confederations and Leagues made with the house of Austria, the French King, and other States and prouinces, should remaine firme; That the French Ambassadour (so as the King would stand to his promise) should be restored to his place: That hereafter there should be no seditions raised, vpon paine of the losse of life & goods for such as should be the Authors, and any States, which should attempt the like, should be excluded out of the League, subdued at their common charge, and reduced into seruitude. That no City nor priuate man should pretend any thing against the Iudges of the confederates, nor commence any Action against them, without the knowledge and consent of the Senators of most of the confederates, vpon the like penalties: That all secret practices should be remooued, and iustice equally administred to all men; and offices distributed without respect of persons: That all care should be taken for recouery of the Valtolin, Wormes and other places, and reducing them to the League craning ayde from the French, the Millanois & others, and that no man should attempt aught against this transaction & decree, vpon paine of infamy & the losse of life & goods.

This yeere 1622. the French King began to labour for the restitution of the Valtolin, sending Mounsieur BASSOMPIERE his Ambassadour to the Swissers, to preuent the danger wherevnto the Realme of France was subiect, if the Spaniard should enioy that Country and stoppe vp the passage. The Gouernour of Milan, to disturb this Treaty, propounded certaine Articles to the confederate Grisons: That there should be a perpetuall peace betweene them them and the Milanois; that the Valtolin should be left to the Grisons, with all priuiledges and immunities; but vpon the conditions, that there should no religion bee vsed there but the Romish; that the ecclesiasticall iurisdiction should belong to the Bishop COMO; that they should vse the decrees of the Councell of Trent and the new Calendar; that the Protestants, who had been driuen away for religion, should enioy their goods, and return twice in the yeer if they pleased, but might not stay aboue two months at a time, neither might they seek any occasion to dwell there with their wiues and children; that they should giue no offense vnto the Catholicks; that such as should breake the ecclesiasticall constitutions, should be punished by the Spaniards, and that they should suffer the Valtolins and Grisons to enioy their lawes and customs; that the Spaniards should hould the Fort at Riua for fiue yeers: which being ended, it with the Fort of Pusin should bee raised; that they should haue garrisons in the Valtolin for eight yeers; that the ordinance should be taken out of the Castle of Sonders, and that the keies of Tirano and Morbegno should be kept by the confederates; that the Spaniards should haue only a defensiue passage through the Grisons Country, going vnarmed, and through the Valtolin armed; that the garisons should forbear to meddle with any ciuill or criminall actions; that Rebels should be pardoned for their rebellion; the King of Spain on the other side should pay yeerly vnto the Grisons 1500 duckets; that, desiring to haue any Leuies from the Grisons, they should not bee bound to send aboue foure and twenty companies, and not lesse than twelue; that the Spaniards should defend the confederate Grisons against all forrain inuasion; that the restitution of the Valtolin should bee made onely to the chief of the Grisons, and to such as should imbrace these Articles: the rest that shold not within one month allow of that treaty, nor haue another, should be held for open enemies.

The Romanists departed in the Valtolin.

This Treaty did not satisfie the Grisons: for, they of Engaden, going vp to the white hil with some troops, desired to know of the Inhabitants whether they would take their parts, renounce the Spanish capitulation, and defend religion, giuing them foure and twenty houres to resolue: who yeelding to their desires, they presently ioyned their forces together, and charged the Roman confederates at the passage of a bridge; where they slue many, and put the rest to flight: who, retiring towards Hantz, were pursued by the Engadins; but, finding themselues too weak, they slue their owne horses and fled, cloying two peeces of ordinance, leauing their arms and all their victuals and baggage behinde them, notwithstanding that 2000 Spanish foot and 300 horse came to relieue them; who, seeing the flight of their companions, and being much troubled with snowe, returned to Milan. There were many other military exploits performed with good successe by the Grisons; whereof I cannot insist, lest I should bee too tedious. The Spaniards had attempted Cleue in vain, being repulsed by the valour of the Besieged. The Romanists craued more aid from the Gouerner of Milan against their enemies; who sent them a supply of 1000 foot and 300 horse, with good store of money and warlike preparations, vntill they shold be further assisted with 6000 Germans & 4000 Neapolitans, with 400000 crowns which was promised from Spain.

A Treaty at Coire.

The warre continuing still in the Valtolin, and no party willing to yield to the other and to lay down Armes, in the end there was an Assembly appointed at Coire to end the controuersie; whither the French King sent his Ambassador, who propounded these following Articles to the Cantons: first, that all souldiers should be dismist out of the Valtolin; secondly, that there should be pardon for all offenses; thirdly, ther should be free exercise of religion in all the Valtolin, and the Territories of Cleues and Vormes; fourthly, that the league with the Swissers and the Lords of Saint Gal. should be inuiolably obserued; fiftly, that Ambassadors should meet at Lucerne for France, Spain, and the Duchy of Cleues, to confirm this hereditary league vnder their hands and seals. Moreouer, the confederate Cantons were required, that hauing forgotten all which was past, they should suffer those which were fled, to return into their possessions: but they, fearing some new treason, made answer, they would take some further deliberation; and when they of Zurich were admonished to call back their souldiers, they promised to do it willingly when the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had withdrawn his forces from the Frontiers, and the King of Spain restored the Valtolin. But all these Treaties could not settle a good peace, the Spaniard and the Austrian being loth to leaue what they had gotten. They fortified some Frontiers, made new Forts, and repaired Sonein and Bormeo; so as the restitution was deferred. On the other side, the Swissers fortified themselues strongly against the attempts & hostile inuasions of the Spaniards, in building new Forts, raising Souldiers, and preparing cannon: and although the Spaniard had

New combustions in Swisserland.

1621 had attempted to surprise a Fort neer vnto Clave by treachery, yet the Swissers repulsed them with losse.

This yeer in October, the Gouernour of Millan, hauing seized vpon the county of Cleue, he left the Earl of Serbellone there for Gouernour, sending his Wallons and Neapolitanes towards Chiauenne; who not only took the place, but seized vpon the whole valley. Soon after the Neopolitans passing into the valley of Borchyane, they slue all they met without mercy: and although that a Captain of the Grisons attended the enemy with some troups, with an intent to fight; yet finding himself too weake, he yeelded with all his Souldiers to the victor: and for that the women in the lower Engaden had prepared to defend themselues with stones, spits, and other like womanish weapons, and had cruelly slaine aboue 80 Austrians; therefore the other Soldiers fell vpon them, and put very many of them to the Sword. To end all these miseries, the Grisons sent a Commissioner to the Gouernor of Milan, to moue him to a treaty of Peace, and a suspension of Armes.

The Arch-D. Leopolds successe in the Grisons Country.

A little before, the Arch-duke LEOPOLD of Austria, without any effusion of blood had subdued Prettigau, Meinfelt, both the Engadens, Munsterthall, Coire, and all the inhabitants of the 3 Cantons; all which (although in former times they had been held inuincible) craued the victors pardon, yeelded themselues; their Captains, commanders, with their Protestant Ministers and some of their Troups, flying into Swisser-land, and Germany: After which he placed Garrisons in all parts of the Country. Soon after in the beginning of the yeer 1622, the Grison State growing desperate, and their countrey in a manner wholly possessed by the Spaniard and the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, they were glad to sue for Peace; the which, after some difficulty, was confirmed with these Articles: 1. That the Romish Religion should remain firm and immutable. 2. That Cleue should be restored, and only the Romish Religion allowed. 3. That the places in Engaden and Prettigaw, should remain to the prouinciall Prince; the which heretofore did belong to the house of Austria. 4. That the king of Spain and the house of Austria should haue a perpetuall passage. 5. That there should be 30000 Florens of yeerly pension paid vnto the Grisons. 6. That it should be lawfull for the Spaniard to leauie 3000 Grisons when he pleased. 7. That hereafter the Valtolin should be a Common-weale, and the king of Spain haue the title of Protector, allowing no other Religion but the Catholick Roman. 8. That all Leagues should be made voide.

A pacification with the Grisons

The Grisons rise against the Spaniards and Austrians.

All these treaties gaue no contentment to the poore Grisons, which grew Iealous of their liberty and Religion: for they were giuen to vnderstand that the Articles of Millan had made them subiect to the yoake of Spaine, and diuided them from the other confederats; that their Countrey had lost her liberties, was reduced into seruitude, and spoiled of her wealth; and which was most of all to be lamented, they were depriued of the foode of their soules: whereupon the poore people grew desperate, resoluing rather to die then to suffer that bondage. Wherefore, on the fourteenth day of Aprill they (being formerly disarmed) went into the Wood, vnder colour of gathering greene boughes, where they armed themselues with Bats and Staues, and set vpon the Spaniards and the Archduke LEOPOLD's Souldiers with great furie, nothing regarding their shotte; so as they slue 500 of them in seuerall places. BALDERON had a Garrison of a hundred in the Towne of Schirsens, of which they slue fifty with their Clubs; the rest, flying into a steeple, were smothered and burnt: The rest of the Souldiers in many places retired themselues from the fury of these Clubs, vnto Castell, Mynfelt, Coire, and other places.

They that came to Castell, being besieged by the Prettigauers, tooke an Oath to goe out of the Prouince, and neuer to beare Armes against the three Cantons; but, comming to Guttenberg, they forgot their Oath, and were againe entertained by RITNAVER. After this these Commons went to Mynfelt, where they fortified themselues after their tumultuous manner. In the meane time Ambassadours came from the Swissers vnto RITNAVER, entreating him to abstaine from Armes, and giue eare to some honest composition, wherein they would doe all good offices. But hee, neglecting their requests, made haste to Steiga to fight with the Confederats, setting a village on fire, thinking they would runne to quench it; but the Prettigauers, regarding not the fire, marched against RITNAVER; whose Souldiers seeing them, cryed out, Come ye Cow-suckers (for so they called them in contempt) Wee will this day giue you a new God: To whom they answered, Wee are well pleased with that onely GOD which created vs, redeemed vs by CHRIST, and hath preserued serued vs till this time in the vnity of Faith, by the power of his holy Spirit. For his glory wee fight; and then, like madde men, they set vpon them and slue foure hundred, forcing aboue two hundred of them into the Riuer of Rhyne, RITNAVER himself hardly escaping. After which, they cut off a Mill neere vnto Maynfelt, forcing the towne Garrison to retire with losse. 1622

In the meane time there came about one thousand Neapolitane Souldiers to Coire; who making an irruption into the valley of Schanfice, carried away their Cattell, burnt the Towne of Mallader, and raged most cruelly ouer those poore wretches which were vnarmed and vnacquainted with Warre: Which the Confederats hearing, they fortified themselues at Sizera, against the Spaniards; and aboue Seiet about nine hundred Grisons charging them, they forced them to abandon their Campe and retire to Coire, hauing slayne many of them and taken two peeces of Ordinance with great store of Armes and much Cattell: After which exploite they returned safely vnto their Campe. Soone after they seized vpon diues important passages, and prest Maynfelt with such violence and eagernesse, that the Towne and Castle were forced to yeeld, vpon composition that they might depart with their Arms and baggage, on the twenty third of May.

Maynfelt taken by the confederate Grisons.

After this they tooke a strong passage, which was held by six hundred Spaniards: the Garrison whereof was so terrified with their Clubs, as they compounded to depart with their Armes and baggage. This done they went to Coire, where they seized vpon a Fort before the Towne, which was very commodious for them; from whence they so annoyed the Townesmen, that no body durst walke in the streetes, hauing easie meanes to burne the Towne, for that they had cut away their Conduits: The Spanish Garrison, being driuen to great Streights, compounded to depart on the sixt day of Iune, vpon these conditions; That they should the next day goe away with their Ensignes, Armes and baggage; That foure Captaines, who were prisoners with the Collonel RYNEL, should be dismissed and let goe, putting in caution to the Bishoppe and Chapter, that none of the Confederats should be wronged in their going away; leauing three Captaines for Hostages. The Confederats, on the other side, should defend the liberties of the Bishoppe and Chapter, and protect them from all Iniuries; That the Souldiers should haue meate and drinke for their money in their going away, and release two Captaines whom they had taken prisoners. These conditions being accepted, Collonel BALDERON went along with the Italians towards Cleue, and the Germanes (which were in number nine hundred and fifty) marched another way, hauing all of them taken a solemne Oath, neuer to carry Armes eyther against these Confederates, or against the Protestant Cities.

Coire taken by the Grisons.

After this happy successe, the Confederats, hauing giuen thanks to God, wrote Letters vnto all the States, Common-weales, and free Cities of Germany, to whom the recouery of their liberty, and safety of the Church was pleasing. The tenor of their Letters was this, that whereas they been vniustly oppressed by the Austrian and Spanish souldiers, contrary to their liberties and priuiledges enioyed for many Ages, lost all their passages, and with them the exercise of religion, and forced with threats to imbrace another; they could do no lesse than, despairing of all relieue, seeke to recouer by the sword their lost liberty both of body and conscience; that God had fauoured their endeauours with good successe, who no doubt would still assist them if they did craue it with humble hearts. And whereas those mountaine places had beene disarmed and depriued of all munition for the warre by those barbarous souldiers, so as they were not able of themselues to beare the charges of the warre, they were inforced humbly to entreat all Common-wealths and Cities which loued liberty and religion, to assist them with some money in this commendable designe; hoping, that they would take this their petition in good part, and consider carefully how much their preseruation concerned all reformed Common-wealths, and to haue these passages free and without danger; the which, the house of Austria had much affected, and now (hating the liberty of Germany) had brought in a manner vnder their power; that with the assistance of God they had recouered some of the chiefe, and doubted not (if so they might haue any helpe) to recouer the rest: for the which they would be thankfull to their Benefactors, and pray to God to increase the spirit of wisdom, courage, and Christian charity in all Common-wealths and free States, and protect them from all their enemies.

The confederat Letters to all free States.

After the taking and fortifying of Coire, the Grisons, reuiuing their former vnion, put some prime 1622. prime men to death, without any forme of Iuſtice; for that they had ſet their hands to the treaty of Millan: and they wrote Letters to the Swiſſers of Lucerne, and the other foure Catholique Cantons, entreating them to retire their forces which they had vpon the Frontiers: The Abbat of Diſentine promiſed to ioyn with them, to lay open the paſſage, and likewiſe to aſſiſt them with 20000 Florens towards the warre.

The Arch duke preuailes again in the Valtolin.

The poore Griſons ſeemed now to be in good hope to recouer their loſt liberty, and the paſſages which had been vſurped by their Enemies: but they were ill aſſiſted by the French, Lorraine, and German, whom theſe paſſages did much import; ſo as they, being deſtitute of helpe, the Enemy encreaſed his forces: for the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had good meanes by the retreat of Count MANSFELD, to proſecute the warres in the Valtoline; whither he ſent new ſupplies, and Collonel BALDERON had drawne the forces of Millan alſo into the Valtolin, towards Chiauenna; with whom the Earle of Sultz ioyning, they ſpoiled the Countrey of Prettigaw, and put all to the Sword. There was an Aſſembly appointed at Lindaw; where the Arch-duke LEOPOLD would yeeld to no peace without the reſtitution of Coire and other places. After which, that Citty with the vpper and lower Engaden, the Commonalties of Danos, Prettigaw, and the Lordſhip of Maynfelt, were taken by force; and many Griſons with their aſſiſtants, ſent from the Swiſſers, ſlaine at Saint MARTINS bridge neere the lower Engaden, where BALDERON forced his paſſage.

The Arch-duke was now Maſter of the field; whereupon the Griſons ſent vnto him to treat for their liues though they had loſt their liberties: and therfore they were forced to accept of ſuch miſerable conditions as it pleaſed him to propound vnto them; which were, That one of the Cantons ſhould be diuided from the other two, and after that day belong vnto the houſe of Auſtria, as hereditary ſubiects. Secondly, that the houſe of Auſtria ſhould not ſuffer the Inhabitants to vſe any other then Catholique Religion. Thirdly, that all Leagues and Alliances ſhould be made voide except thoſe which they made with France; which Article included only the ſubiects of the houſe of Auſtria: but the two other Cantons ſhould haue leaue to keepe their old leagues. Fourthly, the Garriſons of Spain ſhall be continued for ſix yeers in Coire, Mainfelt, and vpon the Frontiers, as neceſſity ſhall require; but no new fortification to be made in thoſe parts, except in Prettigaw, and thoſe places which did belong to LEOPOLD. Fiftly, all Rebells to haue a generall pardon. Sixtly, that free paſſage ſhould be granted to ſoldiers through their countrey according to the Capitulation made at Millan, Anno 1617; and that all paſſages ſhould be preſently opened, in regard of commerce. The Griſons murmurred much againſt theſe Articles; pretending that the firſt made them ſubiect to a familie, being free States: and that in the Capitulation of Millan in the yeer 1617, they treated as free States; wherein there was no mention made of any ſubiection to the houſe of Auſtria, and that Spain was to giue three thouſand florens yeerly during the League. The ſecond, they ſaid, reſtrained their Conſciences. Againſt the third, they obiected that it diuided them amongſt themſelues, and would breed a ciuill warre and make them ſubiect to any potent Prince that ſhould come to aſſiſt either party. The fourth they held very dangerous, pretending that by allowing of Garriſons, they ſhould be ſtill kept in fetters, hauing found by the ſort of Fuentes what ruines the building of Forts had brought them vnto: Moreouer it had been concluded at the treaty of Millan in the yeer 1617, that the Fort of Fuentes ſhould be raſed, and no more built againe. They alſo feared that ſix yeers being expired, the Spaniard would be as loath to leaue the Country as at that preſent; and although their pardon was promiſed; yet no man of reſolution would ſue for it: for that whoſoeuer fought for his countrey, would be aſhamed to confeſſe himſelfe a Rebell to the vanquiſher; whoſe ſubiect he doth not yet acknowledge himſelf. And vnto the ſixt they affirmed, that to giue a ſtrange ſoldier free paſſage through their countrey, were to let in an Enemy; and ſo to be ſubiect to the inſolency of ſouldiers, how kind and louing ſoeuer the Prince which ſends them be vnto them. Thus the poore Griſons were ouer-maſtered at this Diet at Lindaw, and forced to ſubmit to the houſe of Auſtria, and to acknowledge part of their countrey to be the inheritance of that family; ſo as Arch-duke LEOPOLD reſolued to put a Gouernor into the countrey vnder him. Vpon the ratification of theſe Articles, there was a ſurceaſe of Armes, and the Spaniſh and Imperiall forces were to depart the Country, all but ſuch as ſhould be left in Garriſon. But it ſeemed neither party was contented with this Capitulation: for neither did the ſouldiers retire as they ſhold haue done; but continued ſtill in the Countrey, and committed great inſolencies, contrary to the agreement at Lindaw: Neither were the the Griſons in ſhew well pleaſed, finding little eaſe by this accord, being alſo preſt by the Confederate Swiſſers, and by the French kings Ambaſſadours, to demaund better conditions: touching the which they had a conference at Coire, where the French Ambaſſadours told them, that if they accepted thoſe Articles, and ſubiected themſelues to the houſe of Auſtria, the King their Maſter would hold them for Enemies; ſeeing that whereas he had entred into League with them as free States, they now acknowledged themſelues ſubiects to that houſe. Wherefore to free themſelues from the feare of this bondage, they muſt be forced to flie for ayde vnto ſuch Princes as the paſſage of the Valtolin doth moſt concern; namely the French King, the Duke of Sauoy, the State of Venice, Lorraine, Germany, the Swiſſers and others, who it is thought will aſſiſt them for their own intereſt: for if they enioy the Valtolin quietly, the Emperor and Spain ſhall haue eaſy paſſage for their Armies to ioyne together and aſſiſt one another; there being no obſtacle, they hauing got theſe Vallies, whereby they will be fearefull to all the neighbour Princes of Chriſtendom:

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, LIONEL LORD CRANFIELD, EARLE OF MIDDLESEX, Lord High Treasurer of England, and Master of his Maiesties Court of Wardes and Liueries.

THE treasures of Emperors themselues in their stil-preserued Actions, Counsailes and Liues (transcending farre their transitory treasures) In all Humility I present to your Lordshippes preseruation and protection; as proper, and peculiarly due to the Honors of your Office and Title, for the most apt correspondency of your Iudiciall habilities, to husband and dispose as well the Treasures of Counsailes and Actions, as of Offices and Reuenues. Of all these Imperiall Liues (my truely honoured Lord) most of the first Edition I haue only weeded, ordered, and amplified: The last six are the fruits of mine owne Labours. Three of the first I haue cast into new Mouldes: And the later I haue faithfully collected according to the most Authenticall and Impartiall-reputed Authours now extant, together with the confident relations of such as haue been eye-witnesses of some of the late Accidents, here offered as a Sacrifice to Immortall Memory. Notwithstanding which sufficient acquitall (and discharge from blame) of my well-intended Industries, I can no more assure nor promise their Approbations, then all other ingenuous and laborious Treasurers of example and vertue; though therein they cannot but be commended for cordiall restoratiues, to redouble Liues, if not to eternize them. But, in these moderne times, Endeuours that profit not, receiue acceptances that please not. Yet such was the Bounty and Nobility of all our antient Presidents of Times, that whosoeuer committed, to the Monuments of writings, eyther the prayses of Cities or singular Men, were euer adorned with Crowns, or Honours.

But in these degenerate yeers of ours; As many other excellent and ornamentall Merits: so these, especially, are left vtterly prayseleſſe and exolete. For ſince men ceaſe to doe praiſe-worthy deeds; To be prayſed, likewiſe they thinke thriftleſſe and idle. Notwithſtanding, what Preſents more precious can poſsibly bee giuen to Men, then Prayſe, Glorie, and Eternitie? All which I intentionally and effectually preſent and aſcribe, with all Worthineſſe to your Lordſhippe, in entitling them to you, in theſe ſupreameſt Perſonages. For, Whoſoeuer protects and maintaines Vertue and Nobilitie, muſt neceſſarily be himſelfe both Vertuous and Noble. To the Protection therefore of all the Vertue and Nobility herein made ſacred to Eternitie, I only ſelect and inuoke your Honour, in theſe my humble Dedications; Abiding euer

THE LIFE OF IVLIVS CAESAR.

FOVNDER OF THE EMPIRE AND MONARCHIE OF ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

IVlius Cæsar was of a Noble Family; and, returning to Rome from the Pretorship in Spain with great renown, entred into friendship with Marcus Crassus & Gneius Pompey, who were the mightiest Citizens in Rome: and, pacifying the controuersie between them, he obtained the Consulship: which he executed with such grauity and reputation, that his fellow-Consul would not endure to be with him, but liued retired. Afterwards, gining his daughter Iulia in mariage to Pompey, hee went into France; which he subdued, and ouercame the Germains. Hee went afterwards also into Britannie, and by force subdued it to the Roman Empire. Iulia afterwards dying, and Marcus Crassus being slain by the Parthians, mortall discord grew between Cæsar and Pompey: the occasion whereof was, for that the second fiue yeers of Cæsars gouernment of France beeing expired, it was propounded by Pompeyes faction, that a successor should be sent him: and Cæsar desired, that his command in the French Wars might be prolonged, and that in his absence he might demand the Consulship: which beeing denied him, hee made another proposition, that he would giue ouer his army in France, vpon condition that Pompey should do the like by his in Spain. Which being also denied, and being enioyned to leaue his army, he passed the River Rubicon (limits assigned him which he was not to passe) and, taking the city of Ariminum, he went with such fury directly to Rome, as Pompey abandoned Italie; and he, following him, in the end ouerthrew him in Pharsalia. Whereupon Pompey, for refuge repairing to Ptolomey King of Egypt, was in a small Barke, by that Kings direction, slain by the hands of Septimius and Achila: whose head being (by Ptolomy's command) presented to Cæsar, he wept. Afterwards, bending his force against Ptolomy, and ouercoming him, he passed into Egypt, and tamed the pride of the Egyptians. Thence he went into Africa, pursuing the remainder of Pompeyes faction; all which he ouercame: and Cato being in Vtica, vnwilling to fall into Cæsars hands, slue himself. Cæsar, returning to Rome, triumphed: and afterwards going into Spain (after a most cruell battell, wherein he was in danger to haue been lost) hee ouerthrew Sextus Pompeius, eldest son of the great Pompey: and, returning to Rome, hee took vpon him the Dictatorship. Where, finally, Decius, Marcus Brutus, Gaius Cassius, Gaius Casca, Attilius Cimber, Quintus Ligarius, Marcus Spurius, Cornelius Cinna, with many other principall Romans, conspiring against him, he was slain in the Senat, being of the age of 56 yeers, vpon the fifteenth day of March, with 23 wounds; many prodigious signes of his death appearing both before and afterwards: which hindred his passage against the Parthians, and many other high designs, which he resolued to haue vndertaken.

BEing to write the liues of the Roman Emperours, which held the Monarchie of the world; or, to speak more properly, to reduce them into a brief Compendium (a work in truth of waight and troublesome, requiring an actiue spirit, and a more eloquent pen than mine) I hould it no small difficulty to begin with IVLIVS CÆSAR, of whom I am first to treat. Who although he were but Dictator, and not stiled Emperour, in that sense of Lord and Soueraign, as his Successors afterwards held it; yet he was the fore-runner, and made the way to this Monarchie: and all succeeding Emperours haue held it a glory to be called CÆSARS after his name. His exploits were such and so many, and Histories are so fraught with them, that I hould it as great a difficulty to relate them briefly, as to write them confusedly. Wherefore, out of so large and copious a field, I will onely collect that which I shall hould

fitteſt for the Subject of this Work; yet handling it with conuenient breuity: notwithſtanding (he being the baſis and foundation of this ſtately Building) it wil be needfull I ſhould extend my ſelf much more in this, than in the reſt which ſhall follow. As for his other braue atchieuements, I will refer the Reader to thoſe many books which make honourable mention of CÆSAR, and to the content which is generally conceiued of his vertues and worthy endeauours.

Among all the glorious actions of IVLIVS CÆSAR, the greateſt in my opinion, and which breeds moſt admiration, is, how he durſt project, then put it in practice, and laſtly bring it to effect, to make himſelf Lord of the Roman State (the which was Lady and Miſtreſſe of the greateſt and moſt habitable part of the world) and of all that ſhee had ſubdued during the ſpace of 700 yeers: for, ſo long it was from the firſt foundation of Rome, vntill that IVLIVS CÆSAR ſeized vpon the gouernment of the Common-weal: whereof there were 240 yeers vnder the abſolute command of Kings, and the reſt vnder the gouernment of Conſuls, who were choſen by the people; except ſome fewe yeers, in which the Tribunes and Decemuiri bare the ſway. Doubtleſſe, a ſhort time to raiſe and get ſo great an Empire as the Romans had obtained; whenas CÆSAR, of a free State, made it ſubject to the command of One; whoſe Empire without doubt exceeded all others both for continuance, extent and power: the which is confirmed by many approued Writers. Wherefore, omitting all other Kingdoms and Common-weals, wch are not to bee paralleld with this, I will make mention onely of the greateſt and moſt famous which at the firſt were called Monarchies; namely, the Aſſyrians, Perſians and Macedonians: all which the Roman Empire did far exceed. As for the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, which is the moſt antient of all Monarchies, during the ſpace of 1240 yeers (for, ſo long it continued, according to the computation of Saint AVGVSTINE) it neuer extended it ſelf out of the bounds of Aſia, nor had any footing in Affrick or Europe. Neither were the Medes more powerfull: of which Kingdome ARBATVS was the firſt Founder; by the ruine and death of SARDANAPALVS King of the Aſſyrians, ouerthrowing the firſt Monarchie. Then the Perſians extinguiſhed the Medes by the powerfull hand of CYRVS; and this ſhall bee accounted the ſecond Monarchie: who although they made ſome irruption into Europe (as that of XERXES and others) and in Aſia grew more powerfull than thoſe which had gone before, yet it continued not aboue 200 and odde yeers; and they were ruined, with DARIVS their King, by ALEXANDER, the Great, King of Macedon. We cannot deny, but that his Empire was of a greater extent than any of the aboue-named: for, he had vnder his obedience a great part of Europe, and hee ſubdued in a manner all Aſia: and this is held for the third Monarchie; but it was like a flaſh of lightning, burning all it encounters, and is ſoon extinct: for, with the death of ALEXANDER, his power decaied. Then grew factions, and diuerſe Kingdoms were erected; ſo as it is apparant, that the Roman Empire exceeded them all both in time, greatnes and power. In time, being not much leſſe than 2300 yeers ſince Rome was built, and yet the name of the Roman Empire continueth vnto this day. For the ſpace of 1300 yeers it ſtill increaſed, and hath euer ſince been held the moſt predominant power of all others. In extent of dominions & power; for, it is moſt certain, that, vniting whatſoeuer the others held, it will ſcarce equall the one half of the Roman Empire. For, laying aſide whatſoeuer the Emperours did adde vnto it, before that IVLIVS CÆSAR did ſeize vpon the State, they had ſubdued the beſt part of the world. In Europe they were Maſters of all Italie, and Gallia Ciſalpina or Lombardie, Auſtria and Illiricum, now called Sclauonia; and they extended themſelues as farre as the riuer of Danubius: they had ſubdued all Greece (ſome yeelding voluntarily; others, by force) the States of Athens, Lacedemon, Thebes, Corinth, and all Peloponeſus, now called Morea, with their Territories; the Kingdoms of Macedon, & Epirus now Albania, and in like maner Thracia. They held the Ilands of Sicilie, Sardynia, Creete or Candie, Cypres, Rhodes, Euboea, now Negropont, with many other Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea. They alſo ſubdued Spain (but with more difficulty and oppoſition than any of the reſt) and in like manner all France, with that part of Germanie which lies on this ſide the Rhine, called the Lower, or Gallia Belgica, which was the work of CÆSAR himſelf; and in like maner that of Britannie, vnder which are comprehended England and Scotland. They were Maſters of all Affrick (which is the third part of the world) that is to ſay, of the fruitfulleſt and moſt habitable parts, hauing ruined proud Carthage. In Aſia they had ſubdued the greateſt and beſt Prouinces, and made them their Subjects and Tributaries: among the which were Syria called Soria, Phenicia, Paleſtina, Iudea, Phrygia, Caria, Cilicia, and Bithinia by the laſt will and teſtament of King NICOMEDES. The Kings of Egypt and Cappadocia were their friends and confederates; and they had a commanding power in Armenia, Colchos, and other Prouinces. Albania, Iberia, Iberia, and ſome other Countries, did them homage, and paied them tribute: which Countries had been vanquiſhed by them, and many Kings and valiant Captains ſlain. Finally, they were Lords of ſo many Cities and Prouinces, as it were an endleſſe labour to ſet them down in particular; and their power was ſo great, as no forces but their owne were able to annoy them. But afterwards, diſcord and ambition creeping into this State which was ſo free and powerfull, what forren force could not effect, they wrought with their owne Arms, and triumphed ouer themſelues. The Romans vanquiſhed themſelues.

The cauſe of all this grew through the diſcord between POMPEY and IVLIVS CÆSAR, which two were at that time the moſt eminent and powerfull men in Rome; and yet at the ſame Inſtant there were other Citizens of great eſteem. But, the root of this hatred grew from a further cauſe, that is, from the factions and ciuill war between SCILLA and MARIVS: in which, MARIVS being ſlain, SCILLA made himſelf Dictator, and ſeized vpon Rome; yet before his death hee gaue it ouer, and left the City at liberty. POMPEY had followed SCILLAS faction, and done braue exploits for him: but CÆSAR had ſided with MARIVS, being his kinſman, and at that time very young. This was the ſeed from whence ſprung the ciuill war between them. But, it ſhall be needfull to relate ſome former matters, for the better vnderſtanding of the occaſions which went before, and the ſucceſs which followed; the which wee will deſcribe briefly after this maner: The warre and power of SCILLA beeing ended, GNEIVS POMPEIVS and MARCVS CRASSVS (who had alſo followed that partie) remaining in great reputation, the one ſought to ſupplant the other, ſo as there grew ſome jarrs between them, which began during the life of SCILLA. CRASSVS grew very powerfull: for, beſides his Wiſdome, Nobility and Eloquence, he was very rich beyond all the other Citizens of his time. POMPEY alſo became famous and much eſteemed, beſides the ſucceſſion he had by SCILLA, for his great victories and valiant exploits in Arms performed in SCILLAS time and ſince, both by ſea and land, in Affrick, Spain and Aſia; the which are ſo many and ſo great, as I dare not relate them. The deeds of theſe two eminent Perſons being growne to this height, and their quarrels increaſing daily as the heads of factions (and yet at the ſame time there were others of great note within the City, as CATO, CICERO, LENTVLVS, and others) during theſe alterations, IVLIVS CÆSAR returned to Rome from his Pretorſhip in Spain with great reputation, yet his ambitious thoughts aimed at greater matters, both in regard of the greatnes of his houſe (for, by the fathers ſide, hee was of a Noble and very antient Family; and by the mother hee deſcended from the Kings of Rome, who were extracted from ÆNEAS of Troy) and for his many allies and friends; being alſo very witty and eloquent. He had alſo purchaſed great credit and authority in the managing of thoſe charges which had been committed vnto him. He had bin Queſtor in Spain, Tribune of the ſouldiers, Ædile, high-prieſt and Pretor; hauing gotten victories in Spain againſt the Inhabitants of Galitia and Portugal; adding to all this, his merits and vertues, being bountifull, wiſe and learned in all good Arts, moſt actiue in the managing of Arms both on foot and horſe-back; very valiant and ſtrong, whereof he made great proofs before he had any command in the wars of Aſia, vnder the Pretor MARCVS TERMO, and SERVILIVS the Proconſul; where hee obtained a Ciuicall Crowne. He was, moreouer, of a good conſtitution of body, tall of ſtature, fair, ſtrong of his members, and very patient of labour. For all which conſiderations and many others, hee was in great eſteem; but neither by his authority nor place able to equall MARCVS CRASSVS or POMPEY, for that the roots of their greatnes had been of long continuance. Competency betwixt Pompey and Craſſus. The reaſons of their greatnes. Cæſars familie and vertues.

CÆSAR being comm to Rome, with a ſecret intent to make himſelf greater than either of them; CRASSVS and POMPEY affected his friendſhip, by whoſe help they might ſupplant one another. But CÆSAR, being diſcreet and wiſe, would not follow any party, nor tie himſelf to defend their actions; but, carrying himſelf indifferently, he laboured to reconcile them; hauing a conceit, that, if he carried himſelf as a Neuter, they would both yeeld vnto his will: and this his cunning practice (as PLVTARCH reports) was onely diſcouered by M. CATO. In the end, by his endeauours a peace was concluded betweene them, beeing both bound vnto him: yet, being ſtill jealous one of another, and fearing to loſe CÆSAR, they both ſought to gratifie him: and in this ſort he made himſelf equall to either of them; and that power which two had formerly vſurped, was now diuided between three; and in the end wee ſhall ſee who got the ſole command. This league and attonement beeing made, CÆSAR demanded the Conſulſhip, which is the greateſt ordinary dignity. He carried himſelf in this charge with ſuch reputation, as his fellow Conſul BIBVLVS neuer accompani'd him, but kept himſelf retired during his Conſulſhip. CÆSAR, the better to maintain the credit and authority wch he had got, Cæſars policy and practice. A league betwixt Cæſar, Craſſus and Pompey. Cæſar made conſul.

and to attain to the greatnes whereunto he aſpired, he himſelf took to wife CALPHVRNIA, the daughter of LVCIVS PISO, who was to ſucceed him in the Conſulate; and hee gaue IVLIA his daughter in mariage to POMPEY, rejecting her former ſpouſe SERVILIVS CEPIO, by whoſe help he had a little before croſt his Collegue BIBVLVS. CÆSARS conſulſhip being ended, theſe three Confederates being equally greedy of honour, they eaſily made a match to inuade the Common-weal. CÆSAR made choiſe of Gaul or France for his Prouince; CRASSVS, of Aſia; and POMPEY, of Spain: whither they went with three puiſſant Armies. And thus the whole world was to be held by three Princes in partnerſhip. The exploits of CÆSAR in his Prouince, what battels he fought, what victories he won, what cities and people he ſubdued, what ſtratagems, policy and valour he vſed (this warre continuing little leſſe than ten yeers) I cannot relate, my meaning being to obſerue breuity. He left excellent Commentaries of his owne deeds, and full of truth; the which were approued by his very enemies, and much commended by CICERO. Yet ASINIVS POLLIO (enuying CÆSARS vertues) doth in ſome things tax him. They are alſo written by PLVTARCH, SVETONIVS, APPIANVS, ALEXANDRINVS, LVCAN, PAVLVS OROSIVS, LVCIVS FLORVS, EVTROPIVS, and many other: to whom I refer the Reader. CÆSAR got ſuch reputation in this war, as he was held the greateſt Captain of his time, yea, or of thoſe that were in former Ages. He ſubdued all France, from the Pyrene Mountains vnto the Alps, and all the remainder vnto the riuer of Rhine. Hee firſt vanquiſhed the Suiſſers and Tigurins, who (as PLVTARCH affirms) were 300000 men, whereof 190000 were well trained vp in Arms. He conquered the Germains, with ARIOVISTVS their Leader, who had inuaded France, from whence he expelled them. He ſubdued the Belgij, the Ambiani and Neruij, with other warlike people of France, and he ſpilt more bloud than euer was in any wars in the world. Then, paſſing the Rhine vpon a bridge of wood which he built, he ſubdued the Germains to the Roman Empire; and, finding no more oppoſition there, hee paſt with his Army into Brittanie, which was inhabited by a fierce Nation, not till that time knowne by any traffick or commerce: theſe hee forced to ſubject themſelues to the Roman State. During the continuance of theſe warres, in which CÆSAR got great ſpoils and wealth, he neuer left to purchaſe to himſelf friends, both in Rome and in all other places, both by letters and gifts, and in like manner with the Kings and Cities of Aſia, Greece, and other Countries; ſending them aids of men, without any leaue or authority from the Senate: the which he might ſafely do, as long as the league continued betwixt him, POMPEY and CRASSVS. He won men vnto him, and was much beloued of his ſouldiers, giuing theſe double pay, and beſtowing honours vpon others: by which means (POMPEY not foreſeeing it) he grew to ſuch power and reputation, as he began to fear him when he was not able to ſuppreſſe him. But now that ſtrict league of friendſhip, which had been betwixt theſe two, began to diſſolue, for that the pawn which maintained it was taken away; ſo as there grew a mutuall fear & jealouſie betwixt them; firſt, by the death of IVLIA, CÆSARS daughter, who marrying to POMPEY entertained concord between the ſon and the father-in-law, by the league of nuptiall loue; ſecondly, by the death of MARCVS CRASSVS, the third man in this company, who was ſlain by the Parthians in Aſia, whither he went to make war (as ſome write) more to heap vp riches, than to win honour; whoſe reputation notwithſtanding was a ſupport to their good agreement. So as the chief cauſes, whereupon their friendſhip was grounded, being taken away, their emulation preſently brake forth. POMPEY was jealous of CÆSARS greatnes; and CÆSAR hardly endured POMPEY's ſupereminency; the one brookt no equall; the other, no ſuperiour. Whereupon they fell to warre, which was the greateſt and moſt generall that euer was: for, in it there were engaged the Senate, all the Roman Legions, all their friends and ſubjects, Kings and Cities, for the one or the other partie. On the one ſide were eleuen Legions, on the other eighteen; all Roman and Italian ſouldiers, with all the forces of Rome, beſides the aids of their confederates. This war was managed in Italie, France, Spain, Epirus, Theſſalie, Egypt, Aſia and Affrick, by themſelues or their Lieutenants; and in the end, after fiue yeers, it died in Spain. Some Authors ſet down the cauſes of this ciuill war, although they vary in ſome points: but the truth is, the chief reaſons were enuy, ambition, and deſire of command, wherewith they were both infected: and the one jealous of the others greatnes (as if the Roman Empire had not been ſufficient for them two) the one ſought to ruine the other. That POMPEY had any intent to vſurp the State, and become a Tyrant, it doth not appear: but it is apparant, he would not haue CÆSAR attain to that dignity wherein he was. Of CÆSAR ſome write, that being forced through fear he came to Arms, leſt he ſhould ſee himſelf called in quequeſtion, and condemned: for, CATO had threatned to accuſe him whenſoeuer hee ſhould giue-ouer his Prouince. Others obiect, that he had alwaies a deſire to vſurp the State; and therfore, balancing his power with POMPEY's, he thought it behouefull to entertain friendſhip and contract an alliance with him. CICERO ſaith, that he had alwaies in his mouth that verſe of EVRIPIDES, that If it were lawfull to infringe the lawes, it was for a Kingdome; and that CÆSAR, being greedy of command, could not endure to be without an Army: but, in my opinion, the reaſons were ſuch as haue been related; and theſe, the occaſions.

This being the laſt of the ſecond fiue yeers of CÆSARS gouernment in France, LENTVLVS and MARCELLVS being Conſuls, and of POMPEY's faction; it was propounded in the Senate, to ſend a Succeſſor to CÆSAR, and that hee ſhould giue-ouer his gouernment and the Army; and if he would (as he had written) demand the Conſulſhip, he ſhould com to Rome in perſon. CÆSAR demanded, that his command in the war might be prolonged, and the gouernment which he had, and that he might demand the Conſulate being abſent, before he gaue-ouer his Armie; which honor ten Tribunes had formerly granted him, with POMPEY's good liking. But now POMPEY would not yeeld vnto it, as being againſt the lawes, which did not allow any man to demand the Conſulſhip but preſent; forgetting, that he had been made Conſul before he came to lawfull age, and had attained to other dignities, contrary to the ordinarie courſe of law. But it is the common condition of men, To blame that in another which they allow in themſelues.

Lawes for demanding the conſulſhip.

This being denied to CÆSAR, he made another propoſition; that hee would leaue his Army, and come to Rome as a priuate man, ſo as POMPEY would giue-ouer his which he held in Spain. This was put to the queſtion, and did cauſe a great diſtraction in the Senate. CICERO interpoſed himſelf, labouring to reconcile them, and to conclude their jars with peace. POMPEY would haue been tractable, had not thoſe of his faction, being of the prime men of Rome, ſtood proudly vpon tearms; who (notwithſtanding any juſt and reaſonable conditions propounded by CÆSAR) were inflexible. It was therefore decreed in Senate, that CÆSAR, by a certain time prefixed, ſhould leaue his Army, and that hee ſhould not paſſe it ouer the riuer of Rubicon, which did bound-in his Prouince; declaring him an enemy to the Roman State if he did otherwiſe. LVCIVS ANTONIVS and QVINTVS CVRIO, Tribunes of the people, fauouring CÆSAR, oppoſed themſelues to this decree: but they were diſgraced, ill-intreated, and thruſt out of the Senate. Whereupon, they fled out of Rome, and went to CÆSAR: the which was a great help to him to win the hearts of his ſouldiers, for that the office of the Tribunes was held ſacred and inuiolable.

Cicero ſeeks to reconcile Cæſar & Pompey

A decree of the Senat againſt Cæſar.

CÆSAR hearing how matters had paſt, ſeeing himſelf depriued of all future hope of peace, he marcht ſpeedily from Rauenna, onely with 5000 foot, and 300 horſe, commanding his Legions to follow preſently after, and to joyn with him. Comming afterwards to Rubicon (which if he ſhould paſſe, there would be no hope of peace remaining) ſome ſay that he ſtaid there a good ſpace; conſidering with himſelf, of what importance this paſſage was, and what miſeries would enſue. PLVTARCH writes, that he diſcourſed thereof with ASINIVS POLLIO, and other his friends which did accompany him. APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS reports, that hee vſed theſe words, Doubtleſſe, if I forbear to paſſe this riuer, it will be the beginning of my ruine; if I paſſe it, the ruine will be generall. And SVETONIVS writes, that turning towards the riuer, he ſaid, It is yet in our power to turn back; but, paſſing the riuer, wee muſt make our way with our weapons. He writes, moreouer, that CÆSAR ſtanding thus doubtfull and irreſolute, he was animated by the apparition of a man of an extraordinary ſtature & ſhape, ſitting neer vnto his Army, piping vpon a reed. Beſides the ſhepheards and heardſmen, many ſouldiers left their guards, and went down to hear him, and with them ſome Trumpetters; ſo as hee caught hould of one of their trumpets, and leapt forth to the riuer, beginning with a mighty blaſt to ſound the battell, and ſo went on his paſſe to the bank on the other ſide. Then, with a furious reſolution, CÆSAR cried out, Let vs go whither the gods, and the injurious dealings of our enemies, do call vs: The dice are caſt. I haue ſet vp my Reſt, come what will of it. After which words, he ſet ſpurs to his horſe, and paſt the riuer, the whole Army following him. In this maner he reſolued: which was the beginning of the ciuill wars, and of Romes ſeruitude, and the firſt ſtep to a Monarchy and the ſoueraigne command of one, as I will briefly ſet it down.

Cæſars words when he paſſt Rubicon.

Whoſo deſires to haue a full view of this Hiſtory, let him read APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS, SVETONIVS, PLVTARCH in the liues of CÆSAR, CATO, and CICERO; Saint AVGVSTINE lib. 3. de ciuit. Dei, IVLIVS CÆSAR himſelf in his Commentaries, LVCIVS

FLORVS, hist. 4. TITVS LIVIVS his Abbreuiats, PAVLVS OROSIVS, EVTROPIVS, 6. hist. LVCAN, PLINIE de viris illustribus, VALERIVS MAXIMVS, with diuerse others.

CAESAR hauing past the riuer, and drawn his whole Army together, where (as SVETONIVS writes) the Tribunes of the Commons came vnto him, in base and dishonourable garments, with the which they had fledde from Rome; there hee made an excellent Oration to his souldiers; shedding some tears, and tearing his garment down the brest, laying before them the equity of his cause, and craving their helps and assistance. To whom hauing with a generall applause and consent made answer, that they were ready to obey his will, he parted presently, and inning of ill war. the next day came to Ariminum, whereon he seized: the like hee did to all the Towns and Castles where he past. DOMITIVS, who in a factious tumult had been nominated his Successour in Gaul, held Corfinium with a garrison of 30 Cohorts: which being taken, he pardoned the souldiers and inhabitants, and intreated DOMITIVS kindly, giuing him leaue to depart (who went presently to POMPEY) which was an act of a Noble and generous minde: the which, CAESAR obserued in all his victories during the ciuill war; by which clemency he purchased to himself as great honour, as by his victories.

CAESARS resolution being knowne at Rome, it troubled POMPEY, amazed the Senat, and terrified the common people; and it would bee tedious to relate what prouisions they made. POMPEY was much deceiued, for that hee could not beleeue that CAESAR would thrust ey's ser- suming ch of him himself into so great a danger, or that hee should bee able to raise sufficient forces to resist him: but the successe proued otherwise. For, notwithstanding that he had authority from the Consuls and Senate to leuie souldiers, to call home the legions, and to send Captains for the defense of diuerse cities of Italie whereas CAESAR should passe, yet all this was not sufficient to resist CAESARS fury, and the power he brought with him. The fame of his coming increasing daily, POMPEY with the whole Senat abandoned Rome, going to Capua, and from thence to Brundusium, a sea-town vpon the confines of Italie, seated at the mouth of the gulf of Venice: where he gaue order, the Consuls should passe to Dirrachium, now called Durrazzo, a sea-town of Macedonie (whereof a great part is now called Albania) to waite all their forces; beeing out of hope to be able to resist CAESAR in Italie, who had already taken Corfinium, as I haue formerly said: where, hauing drawn DOMITIVS Cohorts to serue him, hee marcht on; and, hearing that POMPEY and the Consuls were together at Brundusium, he went towards them with his Legions with all the speed hee could. But POMPEY had fortified himself sufficiently to make defense; yet vpon CAESARS approach, beginning to inuest the Town, he imbarkt himself in the night time, and so past ouer to Dirrachium, where the Consuls attended him. And thus CAESAR remained in Italie without resistance; being very doubtfull what to resolue: for, although he would gladly haue followed POMPEY, yet he had no prouision of ships: and, by reason that it was winter, shipping could not come so soon as was requisite; and considering withall, how much it imported, not to leaue any enemy behinde him, which might cause any alteration in France or Italie by his absence, he resolued to deferre the pursuit of POMPEY, and to take his way towards Spain, which held for POMPEY: where he had his best legions, and two captains, PETREIVS and AFRANIVS. SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS saith, that when hee had thus resolued, he said to his friends, Let vs first go against an Army which is without a Captain; and afterwards let vs return against the Captain that hath neuer an Army: for, the souldiers that POMPEY had in Spain were valiant, and had been long trained vp in Arms; but their Commanders, PETREIVS and AFRANIVS, were not held for politick or expert in the wars. And, on the contrary, POMPEY was most wise, and a very valiant Captain: but the souldiers which he had with him were newly leuied, and of small experience.

feized e and e. Returning from Brundusium, in sixty daies, without bloudshed or battell, CAESAR becam Lord of all Italie; and coming to Rome, they were in very great fear, remembring the cruelties committed in the time of SYLLA: But CAESAR, vsing his accustomed clemency, did hurt no man of any degree, high or lowe; but called to the Senate those Senators which remained, and which came with him, comforting euery one with milde and good words, and laying the whole fault vpon POMPEY, in accusing him of all things which had hapned, and of this discord. He sought by all means to justifie his owne cause, and declared how much he did then and euer had desired peace, and therewith requested that Embassadors might be sent to POMPEY Consul to procure the same; and, causing himself to be presently chosen Consul, he opened the Roman Treasury, notwithstanding that METELLVS, one of the Tribunes of the people, was desirous and went about to hinder the same. The treasure which he took from thence he diuided among his his souldiers: which, as PLINIE in his three and thirtith Book reports, was very great; the which LVCAN also affirmeth. These things being ended, and CAESAR desirous to go from Rome into Spain (like a wise and discreet Captain) first took order aswell for the ciuill gouernment, as for the wars; and, making choice of the legions which were to go with him, hee left part of his troops in Brundusium and Otranto, and in other strong places vpon the Sea side, to keep POMPEY from landing if he sought to return into Italie. He also nominated HORTENSIVS and DOLABELLA for his Captains, to make prouision of shipping to be brought to the port of Brundusium, there to bee in a readinesse against his return from his journey. QVINTVS VALERIVS hee sent with a legion to Sardinia against MARCVS COTTA, which held the same for POMPEY. To Sicilia he sent CVRIVS against MARCVS CATO, with direction, that hauing taken the same, hee should passe ouer into Africa. LEPIDVS hee left in Rome, as Prefect thereof; and MARCVS ANTONIVS, for Gouernor of all Italie: and, determining to leaue LICINIVS CRASSVS in France, with his accustomed celerity he went on his journy, and found no resistance, neither in Italie, nor in France, but onely at Marselles, which held for POMPEY: who (in my opinion) more like bould and aduenturous friends, than wise men, would not receiue nor lodge him in their city, but put themselues in Arms against him for their defense. CAESAR coming thither besieged the City; and, to auoid losse of time, left DECIVS BRVTVS and CAIVS TREBONIVS with sufficient forces, who continued the siege, and endured much: he himself followed his way into Spain, where his comming was already knowne; and AFRANIVS and PETREIVS attended him, with the aid of their friends, and foure Roman legions; between which and CAESAR the warres continued many daies, and chiefly neer the city of Lerida. In the beginning, CAESAR was in great danger and much distressed, aswell through want of victuals, as by reason of the winter being com, which annoyed him with the swelling of riuers: before and after which, there passed many great skirmishes and conflicts between the two Armies, and other accidents and aduentures too long to bee recounted. Finally, CAESAR knew how to make war in such sort, as, without giuing them oportunity to come to a battell, he brought his aduersaries to such extremity and distresse, as perishing with hunger they came to a composition; which was, that to the legions (who now were able neither to offend nor defend) should be granted liberty to depart & to go whither they would: which was performed accordingly; and PETREIVS and AFRANIVS went to POMPEY: and part of the legions, which would not abide with CAESAR, had leaue to do as they listed; CAESAR still perseuering in his clemency and mildnes.

Cæsars going into Spain against Petreius and Afranius.

This war being ended, and the spring come (not to leaue any thing in Spain to be subdued) he passed forwards, and came into the prouince of Betica, now called Andaluzia, with part of his forces, leaning commandement with the Armie to march whither hee had appointed, and there to stay for him, because that MARCVS VARRO, being POMPEY'S Lieutenant in that prouince, held it for him, with one legion of good souldiers: but not daring to oppose himself against CAESAR, he peaceably yeelded vp vnto him both the countrey and the legion; and so all was pacified, and at his command. Thence hee went to Cordoua, where hee called a parliament, and an assembly of all the estates of that prouince: wherein, among other things which there were treated of, he highly commending the Cordouefes and Seuillians which had taken his part (as himself writeth) marched forwards, and visiting the prouince he came to the Isle and city of Cales; and, prouiding there certain necessaries, hee took the shippes and gallies which MARCVS VARRO had there in a readinesse, and such other as hee could get, and embarked himself. And, leaning QVINTVS CASSIVS with foure legions in that prouince, he took his passage by sea to Taragona, sending commandement by land to his legions to march thither: where hauing in few daies taken order for that prouince, hee departed with his Army towards Narbona, and from thence to Marselles: which yeelded vnto him, hauing in the siege and assaults endured many calamities. CAESAR, nothing respecting the small regard and ingratitude of that city, but the antiquity and fame therof, would not permit any violence to be offred to the citizens & inhabitants; but, leauing a sufficient garrison to guard the same, he commanded his legions by appointed journies to march towards Italie: himself, with a necessary guard for his person, and others in his company, took passage for Rome; all things succeeding prosperously with him, although that some of his Captains had ill successe. For. CAIVS ANTONIVS, whom (we said) he left with DOLABELLA for Captain of his Nauie, was ouerthrowne and taken prisoner in the gulf of Venice by OCTAVIVS, POMPEY'S Lieutenant. At this ouerthrowe there was an Act don worthy to be recommended with honour to posterity. ANTHO-

Cæsar subdued all Spain.

The taking of Marselles, and Cæsars return to Rome.

NIE was constrained to ship his souldiers in long boats for want of seruiceable ships; the which were taken by a stratagem as in a toil, by the Pompeians, who tied ropes vnder the water. One of them, which carried almost a thousand Opitergins, young men and valiant, was intangled in this snare, and was assaulted by the power of the whole Armie, they making resistance from morning vntill night: but, in the end being oppressed by the multitudes of their enemies, and seeing no means to escape by their valour, by the incouragement of VVLTEIVS their Colonel they slue one another. And DOLABELLA was likewise ouercome neer to the Ile of Cocyra, now called Corfu; and CVRIVS, who (according to CÆSARS commandement) went into Africa with two legions, hauing in the beginning good successe, was afterwards ouerthrown, and the most part of his people slain by POMPEY's friend, IVBA King of Mauritania, which is now the Kingdom of Fez: hee might haue fled away, but shame perswaded him to dy with that Armie which his rashnes had cast away.

CÆSAR being comn to Rome, and made Dictator (as PLVTARCH and APPIANVS testifie) new Consuls were chosen; and he, being one of them, deposed himself from his Dictatorship, and so, changing and prouiding Pretors for the prouinces at his pleasure, sending MARCVS LEPIDVS into Spain, and AVLVS ALBINVS into Sicilia, SEXTVS PEDVCEIVS into Sardinia, and DECIVS BRVTVS into France, and taking such further order as he thought good, he departed from Rome in the moneth of December towards Brundusium: whither hee commanded all his Forces to march, there to take passage for Macedonia, the greatest part whereof (as I said) is now called Albania; where he knew that POMPEY staid with his Armie. Who, all one whole yeer, which CÆSAR spent in his journey into Spain, busied himself in prouiding a Nauie to return into Italie, and in gathering treasure, and in leuying souldiers for that purpose, and had made ready a wonderfull great prouision of all things. For, there came vnto him ships, mony and men, from many kingdoms, prouinces and cities of Asia and Græcia, from Syria, Pontus, Bithynia, Cilicia, Phœnicia, Cappadocia, Pamphilia, Armenia the lesse, Egypt, Græcia, Thessalia, Boëtia, Achaia, Epire, Athens, Lacedemonia, and the Iles of Creta, Rhodes, and many other parts and countries: there came also to his aid, in person, the Kings, DEIOTARVS and ARIOBARZANES. Of which people, and of those which he brought with him from Italie, POMPEY had drawne together a great Armie by land, and an exceeding great number of ships and gallies by sea; which I do not set down, by reason of the diuersity of opinions between Authors touching the number of his souldiers and of CÆSARS: for certain, they were very mighty Armies, but the greatest number were of POMPEY's side. Who imagining (because that it was in the hart of winter) that CÆSAR should not be able, nor haue time, commodiously to passe the seas; and hauing (as indeed he had) aduertisement that CÆSAR was in Rome, he diuided and lodged his people in Macedonia and Thessalia, retiring himself from the sea, commanding and charging his Captains by sea (of which, MARCVS BIBVLVS was chiefe) that they should guard and defend the coast. But CÆSAR knowing, that in the speedy execution consisted the principall point of his victory, and that occasion once let slip is seldome recouered; being departed from Rome, and arriued at Brundusium (as we haue before said) notwithstanding that all his legions were not yet come, yet he embarked aboord those ships which hee had there in readinesse, so many as they could contain, which were seuen legions of his choise men (as he himself recordeth) and sent commandement to those which were comming, to make haste, to the end they should join with the rest which there remained, whom he would speedily send for. And so hee departed from Brundusium, now called Brindez, in the beginning of Ianuarie: and, crossing the seas with prosperous weather, the third day after, he arriued vpon the coast of Macedonia, before that POMPEY had any intelligence of his embarking; and, setting his people on shore in the despite of POMPEY's Captains, hee commanded the ships and gallies presently to returne to Brundusium to fetch the rest of his Armie which hee had there left and commanded to come. And the wars beginning, hee presently seized vpon the cities of Apollonia, which is now called Bellona, and Erico; driuing from thence LVCIVS TORQVATVS and LVCIVS STRABERIVS, which held the same for POMPEY: who as soon as he was aduertised of CÆSARS landing, with the greatest speed possible sending for his troops (such as were neerest hand) hee marched towards Dirrachium, where lay all his victuall, munition, and prouision for the warres; doubting that CÆSAR would come to surprise the same, as in truth he did; but in vain: for, the situation thereof made it inexpugnable.

POMPEY being come, their Camps were lodged within few forlongs one of the other, a riuer running between them: there passed many aduentures, skirmishes, and also some treaties of peace, peace which CÆSAR offred; the which were not accepted by POMPEY, so much he assured himself of his power: and CÆSAR daily expecting the coming of his other legions, who staied longer than he thought they ought to haue done, without the which he thought it no wisdome to come to a battell; beeing much grieued, and very carefull for the same, hee resolued in person, with three confident seruants onely, secretly to embark himself in a Brigandine, and to passe that streight of the sea to fetch them, thinking to bee able to perform the same without the knowledge of any. And, putting it in execution accordingly, he passed down the riuer to the sea, which he found so troubled and tempestuous, as the Master of the Brigandine (not knowing whom he carried) nor daring to passe any further, would haue returned. Then CÆSAR, discouering his face, as it is reported, said, Be not afraid, Friend: for, thou carriest with thee CÆSAR and all his fortune. The Master, heerwith encouraged, striued to hould on his voyage: but, at length, the force of the tempest was so great, and the winde so contrary, that (notwithstanding CÆSARS courageous words) they were constrained to return, vnable to passe anie further forwards. Which being vnderstood in his Armie, they much wondred, grieued, and murmured thereat; praising him more for a valiant Knight, than a wise Captain: and so VALERIVS MAXIMVS recounts it for a rash aduenture; which, in my opinion, was the occasion why IVLIVS CÆSAR records it not in his Commentaries.

The rash aduenture of Cæsar.

This being past, within fewe daies after, ANTONIVS arriued with foure of those legions which were left behinde in Italie, presently returning the ships back again for the rest: and (after some aduentures which hapned) joyning with CÆSARS Armie, and all things set in good order (and the like being done on POMPEY's side) there passed some things between them, which for breuity I omit, vntill that neer to the city of Dyrrachium (whither CÆSAR went, with a determination to haue surprised the same, and POMPEY to relieue it) the two Armies lodged themselues the one so neer the other, as there were daily skirmishes and slaughters of men of either partie; and that one day the skirmish waxing hot, and rescues coming from either Armie, it came to a battell: wherein the successe was such, that CÆSARS troops began to flee, and could not bee made to stand by any intreaties or threats, till they came to their camp which they had fortified; and yet some abandoned the same, and durst not defend it. But POMPEY, either for that (as some think) hee imagined their flight to bee fained, and that there was some deceit or ambush, or that he supposed there was no more to be done, and that CÆSAR had been ouerthrowne with small toil, so as he should bee no more able to recouer himself, did not prosecute the victorie, neither followed the charge, but rather caused a retreit to bee sounded, without assailing his enemies camp. Whither when CÆSAR came, he took such order as was most conuenient, being no lesse courageous and politick in time of aduersity, than of prosperity: and it is reported that he said to his friends, Truely, this day had ended our warres, if our enemies had had a Captain which had knowne how to haue ouercome. This day, IVLIVS CÆSAR lost a great number of his souldiers, amongst which were foure hundred Romane Knights, ten Tribunes, and two and thirty Centurions; and his enemies took from him two and thirty Enfignes. This battell ended, POMPEY sent the newes thereof to diuerse parts of the world, houlding himself for absolutely victorious: And IVLIVS CÆSAR hauing blamed some of his Captains and Ensigne-bearers (notwithstanding that his whole Armie grieued, and were ashamed of their late losse) again desired the battell; yet he would not then fight, his Armie being timorous, against those which were in heart & victorious, but rather took a new course: and, sending his sick and hurt men to the city of Apollonia, hee departed by night, with the greatest silence that could be, from the place where he was, and took his way towards Thessalia, with intent to refresh and encourage his Armie, and to draw his enemie further from the sea-coast, where his chief force lay, and where his camp was fortified and victualled; or, at the least, to go to meet and ouerthrowe SCIPIO, who (as hee was aduertised) came to join with POMPEY.

A battell betwixt Cæsar and Pompey, neer to Dyrrachium.

Pompey's rashnes.

POMPEY, seeing CÆSARS departure, after that hee had followed him some fewe dayes, took counsell, and (as APPIANVS testifieth) was determined (leauing so sufficient a Nauie at sea, as CÆSAR should not be able to make any benefit thereof) to passe into Italie, and to recouer the same, with France and Spain, and then afterwards to return against CÆSAR: but, beeimportuned and ouer-ruled by the Roman Lords which came with him, he altered his determination, and presently departed to pursue CÆSAR, who made a stay in the fields of Pharsalia, which are in Thessalia (making his retreit with such discretion and in so good order, as in all occasions that were offred he had euer the better) vntill that at length, seeing his men full of resolution, force and courage, he resolued no longer to forbear the Fight; and therefore cared not any any more to refuse the battell, but rather daily presented the same to POMPEY. Who knowing (as indeed it was true) that CÆSAR began to want victuals, and that his Armie began to weaken and diminish, he deferred the same, and would not fight; and, as a wise and well-experimented Captain, would haue prolonged the war, defeating his enemie without putting his own Armie in hazard: and although that POMPEY had thus resolued, yet the opinions, murmurings, and importunity of those which were with him prenailed so much (as LVCAN, PLVTARCH, and CÆSAR himself, report) that they made him yeeld to giue battell, euen contrary to his owne opinion and will: wherein ioined, of the one side and the other, all the flower and force of Rome. And although that CÆSARS Forces were fewer in number (for, all Writers affirm, that POMPEY'S Armie was twice as great) yet his men were more actiue, and better trained. How many there were of the one side and the other, I cannot certifie; the Authors doo so much differ among themselues therein. APPIANVS setteth down the diuerse opinions which are held thereof. Some raise the number to three hundred thousand men, whereof LVCIVS FLORVS was one; others, to threescore and ten thousand: and some set down somewhat lesse, among which is PLVTARCH; who saith, that POMPEY brought to this battell 45000 men, whereof 7000 were on horseback; and IVLIVS CÆSAR, two & twenty thousand Foot, and of horse fewe more than one thousand. But APPIANVS vnderstandeth, that this lesser number of these Armies was to be vnderstood of Romans onely, who were the force and hope of both these Generals: for, it is not likely, that of all nations there should be so small a number in a war so long prepensed, and of such importance: and, in my opinion, this is most likely to be true. But, howsoeuer it was, this battell was between the best captains and best souldiers, aswell for experience, as for force and valour, that euer were in the world; and yet being so, it was not much fought, neither did it long continue. So strange and variable are the aduentures which happen in wars and battels: for, where there seemeth to be the greatest force and assurance, oftentimes is found the greatest weaknes; and that which is least feared, doth sometimes annoy most. Before the battell there were many signes of an eminent downfall; The running away of beasts appointed for the sacrifice, swarms of Bees, the sky darkned in the day time, POMPEY'S fearfull dream ouer night of mourning in his Theatre at Rome; and in the morning early he was seen in the head of his main battell in a black Robe.

Either of these two great Commanders, hauing resolued to giue battell, ordered his battalions and squadrons as to him seemed most expedient, making speeches and orations to animate their souldiers; and, the accustomed signe being giuen, the battell presently beganne on either side: In the beginning whereof, POMPEY'S horse-men (wherein he reposed his greatest hope) who were all of the Roman Nobility, and of the Order of Knighthood, and who alwaies had the better; began to come where CÆSAR'S Cauallery was, and forced them to forsake the Field. Which, CÆSAR perceiuing (losing nothing by ouersight) he made a signe to a battalion, which for that purpose he had left a-part from the other squadrons, to charge POMPEY'S Cauallery: who charged them with such fury, wounding them (according to CÆSARS direction) no where but in the face; that POMPEY'S horse-men either vnable or vnwilling to endure it, began to retire, in such sort, as from that part whence POMPEY thought to haue obtained the victory, from thence sprang the beginning of his ouerthrowe. For, notwithstanding that they had broken the first squadron, and were entred into the second, and the other battalions continued still fighting, and that they maintained the same with great resolution; yet, seeing that POMPEY'S Cauallery fled, and that CÆSAR'S came to charge them afresh, they all did the like; in such manner, as in short space the victory plainly appeared for CÆSAR: and POMPEY, hauing lost all hope to preuail, fled to his camp, leauing the field and victory to his enemy. Happy had POMPEY been in this misery, if he had runne the same fortune with his slaughtered Armie: but he out-liued his owne glory, that with dishonour he might flee for life through Thessalie, be chased from Larissa, and vpon a forlorn rock of Cilicia studie whether to flee; to Parthia, Affrick, or Egypt: Finally, that vpon the Pelusian shoar, by the command of a most vnworthie treacherous King, by the councell of gelded men, he should be murdered by the sword of SEPTIMIVS his Fugitiue, in the view of his forrowfull wife and children. CÆSAR, letting slip no occasion, seeing that hee found no resistance in the field, assembled his Forces to assaile POMPEY'S camp, which with small difficulty hee entred: which POMPEY perceiuing, leauing his ensignes and robes of Generall, and putting on other apparall, vpon the first horse that he could get, with foure on horse-back onely that accompanied him, which (as VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS saith) were his son SEXTVS POMPEIVS, and the two LENTVLI, and FA-

FAVONIVS of the Pretorian order: he fled so fast as he could, as you haue heard, and neuer staied vntill he cam to the citie of Larissa; where ioyning with some thirtie other horse, which had fled, without any stay he continued his flight, vntill he came vnto the shore-side of the Egean sea; where, finding a certaine Merchants ship of Rome, he embarked himselfe therein, and failed to the Isle of Lesbos, which is in that sea which now is called Archipelago, to the citie of Mytilene in that Iland: For, in that citie were his wife and familie, which he tooke with him: and, gathering together such ships and men as he was able, he departed from thence very doubtfull, and not able to resolue whither to go. Some counselled him to sail into Africa, for that King IVBA was his friend, and very mighty. Others were of opinion, that hee should retire himself to the Parthians. Finally, he resolued to go into Egypt, for the friendship which hee held with King PTOLOMY, father of that PTOLOMY then raigning; and did so. Hauing first touched in the prouince of Cilicia in Asia, and in the Ile of Cyprus, sailing into Egypt, and arriuing at the city of Alexandria, he had such an end as we will presently declare. Pompey's flight.

IVLIVS CÆSAR hauing obtained so great a victory, as is aforesaid, vsed therein his accustomed clemency, not suffering any Romane to be either slaine or hurt after the battaile was ended, and pardoning all those which were taken therein, or found in the Campe; among which was MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO. And although that in the battaile were slaine of POMPEIES side fifteen thousand men, and of the Conquerors lesse then two thousand, as CÆSAR himselfe writeth: yet vnderstanding which way POMPEY fled, to the end to giue him no place or meanes to returne and repaire himselfe; without losing any time, he pursued him with the lightest and swiftest of his Army. And comming to the Sea side, bringing to his obedience in his way all the Cities whereby he passed, and gathering together such Ships and Gallies as hee then could, together with those which CASSIVS had, who was at this time receiued to his grace and seruice, he therein shipped such troupes as he was able, and passed into Asia the lesse; where being aduertised that POMPEY had been in Cyprus, he presumed that he tooke his way towards Egypt. For which cause he tooke the same course, taking with him two whole legions of old souldiers only; and arriuing in safety at Alexandria in Egypt (where we said that POMPEY had lately taken port) he vnderstood that POMPEY was arriued there: who presuming of the benefits and good entertainment which this King PTOLOMIES father had receiued in his house, he sent to request PTOLOMY to harbour and assist him. But as with men which are fallen from a high fortune, few men hold faith and friendship; and in their aduersities, the benefits and good turnes receiued are commonly forgotten: so this King sent him his promise to perform what he required: and comming vpon safe conduct, in a small boat towards the shore, hee was murdered before he came to land by the Kings commandement, by the hands of one called SEPTIMIVS, and another ACHILA; thinking by meanes hereof to winne CÆSARS friendship. This was done by the perswasion and counsell of FOTINVS an Eunuch, who was of great authority in the Court, and by whom the King was much ruled. He vnderstood also that CORNELIA, POMPEIES wife, and his sonne SEXTVS POMPEIVS were fled from that port in the same ship, wherein they came. CÆSAR being landed and receiued into the City, they presently brought him for a present, the great POMPEIES head; which hee would not see: and his ring and seale of Armes being presented vnto him, he wept for pity, considering the end and successe of the great aduentures and prosperities of POMPEY, who with such honour and fame had three times triumphed, and bin so many times Consul in Rome, and had gouerned the same, and had been the most eminent man there for so many yeers, and had in like sort obtained many victories and dignities. Cæsar pursued Pompey. The death of Pompey. Cæsar wept for the death of Pompey.

When IVLIVS CÆSAR landed in Egypt, he found the country infested with ciuill wars, and great discord between yong King PTOLOMY and his sister, the fair CLEOPATRA, about the diuision and inheritance of that Kingdome: wherein IVLIVS CÆSAR (as a Roman Consul) took vpon him to intermeddle. For which cause (as CÆSAR himself writeth) or because that their guilty conscience, for the treacherous murder of POMPEY, made them to fear, as PLVTARCH affirmes; the before-named FOTINVS which had been the practiser of this murder, and ACHILA who had been the actor thereof (both which were in great authority in Court and with the King) imagining that CÆSAR inclined to fauour CLEOPATRA'S faction, sent for the Armie which the King had neer the city, consisting of 20000 good men, purposing to do by IVLIVS CÆSAR as they had done by POMPEY: and so within few daies there beganne between CÆSAR and the small forces which he brought with him, both within the city and in the harbour, between the ships and gallies, the most cruell war and in- The clemencie of Cæsar. Cæsars way in Egypt.

incounters that he euer had; which I cannot distinctly set down, for the many aduentures that passed. But let this suffice, that IVLIVS CAESAR fought therein many times in his owne person, both within the city (whereof his enemies held the greatest part) and also in the harbour with his ships; and was sometimes in such perill and danger, as he was driuen to leap out of the boat wherein hee was, into the water, and by swimming to flee into one of his gallies: and, as SVETONIVS writes, he carried his Commentaries in the one hand out of the water, lest they should bee wet; and his Robe in his teeth, to the end it should not fall into his enemies hands. But at length his forces and aid being comn from Asia and other parts, he at the end of nine moneths (for, so long lasted these wars) remained victorious, as in all others hee had been; and the yong King PTOLOMY was slain in Fight. In this warre CAESAR did such exploits, and shewed such valour and wisdome, that for the same onely hee did well deserue the fame and renowm of a most excellent Captain.

death of Iomy King Egypt.

CAESAR hauing tamed the pride of the Egyptians, and put to death the murtherers of POMPEY, and established CLEOPATRA for Queen and Gouernesse in that Kingdome, whom during his staie there he entertained for his friend, and she conceiued and had a sonne by him, called CAESARIO; all things being quietly settled, he departed from Egypt towards Asia, trauelling through Syria, now Soria, by reason that he was giuen to vnderstand, that while he was busied in the warres of Egypt, King PHARNACES, sonne of the mighty King MITHRIDATES, thought it now a fit time (seeing the ciuill discord between the Romans) to recouer that which his father had lost; and hauing ouerthrowne DOMITIVS, whom CAESAR had sent to gouern those parts, and also hauing taken by force of Arms the prouinces of Bithynia and Cappadocia, expelling thence King ARIOBARZANES, a friend and subiect to Rome, and beginning to do the like in Armenia the lesse, which King DEIOTARVS had made subiect to the Romans: IVLIVS CAESAR coming with his Armie sooner than King PHARNACES imagined, although hee had expected him, and had intelligence of his approach; within fewe daies they came to a battell: in which (without any great resistance) the King was ouerthrowne and put to flight, with great slaughter of his people, from which hee escaped by flight. Great was the joy CAESAR conceiued of this victory, for the desire he had to return to Rome, where he knew that many scandals and insolencies were committed, by reason of his absence: he knew also, that POMPEY'S eldest son had seized on a great part of Spain, and had raised great forces of those which M. VARRO had there left, and of his fathers troops. Hee also vnderstood, that in Africa many principall Romans, which had escaped from the battell at Pharsalia, were gathered together, whereof M. CATO (called VTICENSIS, because that in Vtica he slue himself) was the chief, and SCIPIO, POMPEY'S father-in-law; and that these went thither with a great part of the gallies and ships of POMPEY'S Nauie, and with the greatest power they were able to leuie; joyning with IVBA King of Mauritania, they had subdued all that countrey, and had a great Armie in readinesse against CAESAR, hauing chosen SCIPIO for their Generall, because that CATO would not take that charge vpon him, and for that the name of SCIPIO was very fortunate in Africa. CAESAR, hauing intelligence of all these things, within fewe daies, with great celerity and diligence, recouered all that which PHARNACES had vsurped: and, chasing him out of Pontus, he recouered all those countries: and leauing CELIVS MINVCIVS for Generall, with two legions to guard that prouince, pacifying the contentions and controuersies in the rest, rewarding the Kings & Tetrarchs which had continued firm in league and amity with Rome; without any longer aboad he departed from Asia, and in short space passing into Italie, came to Rome: within little more than a yeer after that, he departed from thence; a short time in truth, for the performance of so great matters and so long a journey.

esars victory inst Pharces King of um.

Within few daies after his comming to Rome, he made himselfe to be chosen the third time Consul, and reforming (the best that he could in so short a time) all disorders in Rome, being grieued and not able to endure that his enemies should possesse Africa, with great expedition he prepared all things necessary, and from Rome tooke his way thitherward, commanding his forces to follow him. First he went into Sicilia, and there shipped himselfe, and thence passed into Africa: and notwithstanding that neither his Nauie nor Armie arriued with him; trusting in the valour and goodnesse of his souldiers, and his owne good fortune, he tooke land with those small forces which he brought with him, neere vnto the citie of Adrumentum in Africa; and from thence marched to another citie called Leptis, where he was receiued: and after some conflicts which passed, his legions being come, and certaine troopes both on foote and horseback; he began the warre, which lasted foure moneths, viz. from the beginning of Ianuarie till till the end of Aprill, beginning first against PETREIVS and LABIENVS: afterwards it was continued against SCIPIO and King IVBA, which assisted the contrary faction with 8000. men, the one halfe whereof were horsemen, whereof the prouince of Africa did then, and to this day doth abound; among all which were leuied against CAESAR eight legions of footemen and 20000. horse: In this warre were many encounters, skirmishes and battailes, which HYRCIVS in his Commentaries, PLVTARCH, LVCAN, LVCIVS FLORVS & others write of at large, in which CAESAR was in great danger: but at the last with his force and good fortune, he ouercame them all in a great battaile; wherein, of the enemies, were slaine 10000. men, and CAESAR remained master of the field, and in few daies after of all the Countrie. SCIPIO and all the principall Captaines which were his aduersaries, died sundrie deaths within few daies; and king IVBA by slight escaping from the battaile, and finding no place of refuge, in despaire, he and ARANIVS determined to die fighting, the one against the other, till they were both slain, in which combat King IVBA being of greater strength then ARANIVS, slew him; and afterwards commanded a slaue of his own, to kill himself, and so he died desperately.

The good MARCVS CATO who was in the citie of Vtica, knowing that CAESAR marched thitherwards, and although he knew that he would not put him to death, but had rather a desire to pardon him, and to doe him honor; yet to the end that he would receiue neither life nor honor from his enemie, he slue himselfe: in whose death passed many notable accidents recorded by many authors both christian and heathen. CICERO did write in commendation of the death of CATO, against the which CAESAR did write another discourse: both which are lost. And FLORVS writes his death after this manner; Hearing of the decease of his partners, hee dallyed not at all, but (as it became a wise man) did ioyfully hasten his owne death: for after he had imbraced his sonne and friends and bid them good night; he rested a while vpon his bed, hauing perused PLATOS booke of the immortalitie of the Soule; then about the first relining of the watch, he drew his sword, and thrust himselfe into the bodie: After which the Physitians sought to wrong this resolute man, by applying some salues, the which he endured vntill they were out of the roome; but then he pulled them away: and, the blood following abundantly, he left his dying hand in the very wound. SCIPIO, who had been Generall in this warre, escaped from the battaile by flight, and shipping himselfe in certaine galleyes, wherein he fled, was met withall by CAESARS nauie; who, to the end hee would not be taken, giuing himselfe some wounds, cast himselfe into the sea, and so was drowned. CAESAR, hauing obtained so great and absolute a victory, spending some fewe dayes in ordering the prouinces of Africa, reducing the kingdome of king IVBA into a prouince, hee came to the citie of Vtica, where he imbarked himselfe the third of Iune, and came to the Ile of Sardinia, wherein he stayed some few dayes, and arriued at Rome the fiue and twentith day of Iuly. At his comming (as SVETONIVS, APPIANVS, and PLVTARCH record) there were grapted vnto him foure triumphs. The first triumph was for his conquest and victories in France, where were set the portraitures of the riuers of Rodanus and the Rhine, wrought in gold: and in the second triumph of Egypt, and of King PTOLOMEY, were set the riuer of Nilus and the Pharus of Alexandria burning. The third triumph was of the prouince of Pontus and of King PHARNACES, wherein for the speede wherewith he prosecuted the victorie, was placed a briefe writing which signified as much; which was, veni, vidi, vici, which is to say, I came, I saw, I ouercame. The fourth triumph was of the prouince of Africa, wherein was placed King IVBA his sonne, as a captiue: and in this triumph (as SVETONIVS writeth) were giuen iewels and armes to OCTAVIVS, CAESARS Nephew, who afterwards was Emperor, as we will declare, notwithstanding that he was not present in those warres by reason of his yong age: for he was not then fully sixteene yeares old. As for the battaile which CAESAR wanne against POMPEY, he would not triumph for it, because it was against Citizens of Rome.

Cæsar would not triumph for his victorie against Pompey.

These triumphs being ended, giuing great rewards to his souldiers, and entertayning the Romane people, with feasts, gifts and other great bountie, hee caused himselfe to be chosen the fourth time Consul, and to the end that there should be no place in the world wherein he would not be obeyed, he resolued to goe into Spaine, where he vnderstood that GNEVS POMPEIVS (POMPEIVS sonne) with the remainder of the armie which had escaped out of Africa, was gone to ioyne with his brother SEXTVS POMPEIVS, who already was there, as I haue said, and was in possession of a great part of Spaine, with the cities of Seuill and Cordoua, and many others in that coast, and many Spaniards were come to their ayde. CAESAR, departing, carried with him his most experienced and chosen souldiers, and made so good speede, as within few dayes he arriued in Spaine, and in this iourney (as SVETONIVS and VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS recorde) his Nephew OCTAVIVS followed him.

CÆSAR, being entred Spaine, came into the prouince of Betica, which is Andaluzia, where SEXTVS POMPEIVS and his brother GNEIVS POMPEIVS were with such legions and souldiers as they had gathered together; and so there began betweene them a cruell and bloudie warre. The end whereof was, that neere to the citie of Munda, CÆSAR and GNEIVS POMPEIVS (for SEXTVS POMPEIVS was in Cordoua) ioyned battaile; which was one of the most obstinate and cruell, that euer was in the world. For CÆSAR being the most excellent Captaine, and the souldiers which he brought with him, the most valiant and accustomed to ouercome; the resolution and courage of POMPEY and his men was such, and they fought in such manner, as CÆSARS esquadrons began to giue ground and were ready to forsake the field, and at the very point to haue been wholly ouerthrowne; And the matter came to this issue, that (as SVETONIVS and EVTROPIVS do write) CÆSAR was about to haue killed himselfe, because he would not see himselfe ouercome; and that he took a target from one of his souldiers and rushed in among his enemies, saying with a loud voice (as PLVTARCH reporteth) If you be not ashamed, leaue me and deliuer me into the hands of these boyes: for this shall be the last day of my life and of your honour. With which words, and his example, his souldiers took heart in such manner, that, recouering the ground which they had lost, the battell became equal, which (as APPIANVS affirmeth) lasted the most part of one whole day, without any signe of victory; sometimes seeming to incline to one partie, and sometimes to the other, vntill that at length CÆSAR and his men did so great exploits, as the euening being come his enemies became faint, and began to flee, and the victory was apparantly CÆSARS. There died of his enemies aboue 30000 men in this fight: and of CÆSARS part, were slaine a thousand men of account, besides many other of lesser note. CÆSAR esteemed this victorie so much, and so gloried in the danger wherein he had been, that after the victorie he vsed to say, that only that day he fought for his life, and in all other battailes euer for honor and victorie. He then remayning master of the field, his aduersarie POMPEY, who in nothing had failed of the office of a valiant and good captaine (after that he saw no other hope) escaped by flight, and wandring through many places was afterwards taken and slaine by CÆSARS friends, whose head was brought vnto him; the like hapned vnto LABIENVS. His second brother SEXTVS POMPEIVS fled form Cordoua, & in the end forsook Spain: hereafter more mention shall be made of him. I. CÆSAR recouered the cities of Seuill and Cordoua, & all the rest; and disposing of all things in Spaine at his pleasure, returned to Rome, & entred in triumph for the warres in Spaine, which was his fift and last triumph: in this place LVC. FLORVS and PATERCVLVS speak of all his triumphs.

CÆSAR came to be the most mightie, the most redoubted, and most highly esteemed man that euer had been in the world, hauing subdued and conquered the greatest part thereof, with an Armie and by force, in as little time, as it might seeme that another man might be able to trauail those countries by reasonable iourneys. All which being in subiection vnto him, he made himselfe perpetuall Dictator of Rome; and so without contradiction he finished the making of himselfe soueraigne Lord and Monarch of the Romane Empire, within little lesse then fiue yeeres after that he began the same. And this was the originall and beginning of the Romane Emperours: for IVLIVS CÆSAR would not be called King (for the name of King was odious to the Romans aboue all things, euer since the Kings were chased from Rome) but contented himselfe to be called perpetuall Dictator and also Emperor; although not with a name of such power and dignitie as his successors haue done since, but as by a name which signified he had been a conqueror in the warres, which in this sense was giuen to the Romane Captaines, when they had obtained any notable victorie: but after IVLIVS CÆSAR, all his successors took that name, glorying to be called Emperors, which was held for the highest title and dignitie in the world.

IVLIVS CÆSAR hauing attained to that absolute power which he so much desired, he shewed in all things great clemency and magnanimitie, honouring and rewarding his friends, and easily forgiuing, and very cheerefully pardoning all those which had been his aduersaries; and so he not only pardoned BRVTVS and CASSIVS, CICERO, MARCELLVS, and many others: but also some of them he admitted to his companie and priuate familiaritie, and to offices and dignities. It is certaine that among all the many vertues wherewith CÆSAR was endued, his clemencie and liberalitie were most glorious. But this suffiiced not to quench the desire of their lost libertie, neither to asswage the hatred and malice conceiued against him by his aduersaries, as in time did appeare.

And

And notwithstanding that many were grieued: yet some for the loue which they bare him; others for feare and dissimulation; the Senate and people of Rome, and finally all, gaue him names, preheminencies and titles of honour, such as neuer had been giuen to any other; neither ought he to haue accepted the same, as PLVTARCH, APPIAN and others doe report: But CÆSARS minde and ambition was such, and his thoughts so eleuated and so high; as he held nothing so great, but he was worthie thereof and had deserued the same: and so he not only accepted that which they offered him; but many more were offered, because they knew that he desired the same. Whereupon they gaue him the name of Emperour, Father, restorer and preserver of his countrey: He was created perpetuall Dictator, and Consul for ten yeeres, and perpetuall Censor of their customes. His statue and image was erected among the Kings of Rome, and a chayre and throne of Iuorie in the Temples and Senate, and a high pulpit and throne in the Theatre, and in the place where the Senators did vse to sit, his pictures and statues were set vp in all the Temples and publike places. I passe ouer some titles which they gaue him, and he accepted, which only, to those whom they held for God, ought to haue been attributed. The moneth which they called Quintil, they called IVLIVS after his name, as March of their god MARS, and Iune after the goddesse IVNO: they did also consecrate and build Temples vnto him, as vnto IVPITER, and their other gods: and gaue him certaine honours which they held particularly for their gods, which they call Thensas: and so they did many other things to his honour, which exceeded all measure.

The names and high titles which were giuen to Cæsar.

IVLIVS CÆSAR enioying such honour and power, so as he had no equall or second in the world with whom he might contend; it seemeth that he would contend with himselfe, and attempt something wherein he might excell himselfe: for he was not contented with all the victories which he had obtained, neither (as PLINIE, SOLINVS and other report) to haue fought in fiftie seuerall battailes (in all which he ouercame) sauing in that one at Dyrrachium against POMPEY; where, as we haue alreadie said, he was not wholly ouerthrowne, neither (according to the same authors) to haue slaine in the warres and battailes which hee fought, a million, ninetie and odde thousand men; and yet they say that they reckon not those which died in the ciuill warres: but that as he was of a most haughtie minde, he sought to doe greater matters, if greater might be. For, first he resolued to passe into the East, there to conquer and subdue the fierce nation of the Parthians, and to reuenge the death of MARCVS CRASSVS, and to passe through Hircania and other countries, vntill he should come to the Caspian sea, and so through all the prouinces of Scythia Asiatica; and passing the riuer Tanais, to returne through Scythia in Europe, and in this retreit to come into Germany, and other prouinces bordering thereupon, conquering and subduing them all to the Romane Empire; for the which conquest hee presently caused to be leuied in sundrie places, ten thousand horsemen, and sixteene legions of chosen footmen, and appointing the time wherein he thought to depart, he commanded them to march towards their Rendeuous. And besides all this, he sought not only to subdue all the nations of the world, but to correct and reforme nature it selfe: for he purposed to haue made an Iland of Peloponesus, which now is called Morea, by cutting the neck of the land which is betweene the Egean and the Ionian Seas.

The high thoughts and purposes of Cæsar.

Of the Riuer Tiber and the Riuer Anien (as PLVTARCH saith) he purposed to haue altered the courses, and to haue opened new chanels, through which they should run into the Sea, making them to leaue their naturall course, and capeable to bear great ships. He commanded, and alreadie began to dig down and make plain many hils and high mountains in Italie, and to dry vp and dreine some of the great lakes and marishes which are therein: and, in this manner, hee thought to haue done other things more than a man, which seemed to bee possible to none but to God alone. He corrected (as many Authors affirm) the computation of the yeer, conforming it with the course of the Sun, and brought it to that rule which is yet held: for, before that time it was much out of order. He did the like in the course of the Moon, and the conjunctions and oppositions of her and the Sun: and this was attributed to him for tyrannie, by those which did hate him. For, one day, in a discourse in the presence of CICERO, it was said, that the next day there should be an Eclipse of the Sun; yea, quoth he, it is so: for, CÆSAR hath so commanded. Many other things CÆSAR began, which were very great, in reforming the lawes, customes and offices, which for breuity I omit: among which, the reedifying of the ruined city of Carthage by SCIPIO (as all the world knoweth) was one, and he sent thither Colonies and Roman citizens to inhabite: the like hee did by Corinth. But all these works and these so high conceits and resolutions were abbridged by death, which within fewe daies ensued: and this
